many of man's most cherished beliefs. As Book I shows, it all began in magic. To the cave man objects were animate—sticks, stones, storms, and all else. The primitive savage had fears still common to the animal mind of modern man, those idols of the tribe which persist in the belief in unlucky numbers, in ghosts, in telepathic messages, in malicious magnetism, in prophetic dreams, and the like. These fragments of ancient occultism, still surviving in the borderland beliefs of the numerologists, the theosophists, and even the New Thoughters, the author ingeniously traces back to primitive animism, shamanism, and fetishism. The reader might amuse himself by searching for further modern analogies of kindred superstitions. Thus the taboo against kindling fire on a holy day may still be found in New England farmhouses, where it is considered wrong to serve hot victuals on a Sunday, while the conception of agriculture as a phase of religion was exemplified only last year when the crops were blessed in the episcopal diocese of Fond du Lac. Further taboos, from foods to holy days, are to be found in restaurants on Bleecker Street and the Sunday opening rumpus at the Sesquicentennial.

Book I, How it All Began, is perhaps the most interesting of all; but Book II, How Religion Developed in the Ancient World, is also an eye-opener. There were the Celts, who gave us the merry mistletoe and also the Maypole dance, "reminiscently very naughty." The Babylonians were likewise not all they should have been. As to the Egyptians, more might have been said as to "Isis unveiled," considering the strange revival of the cult of this mother goddess which caused the New York police to run certain of her modern devotees out of the city. The treatment of Greek religion is decidedly weak. For one thing the Homeric religion was scarcely "a shallow, light-hearted cult," as Gilbert Murray shows in this year's edition of his "Four Stages of Greek Religion," not mentioned in Mr. Browne's bibliography. With Rome as the melting-pot of ancient faiths we gain significant contacts with early Christianity and discover that continuity of pagan thought which has persisted in the church until the present day. There are "tell-tale atavisms" in the Saturnalia of December 25 with its giving of gifts; in the holy day of Diana in August, which has become the festival of the Assumption of the Virgin; in the magic rites of Mithraism with the comforting conclusion that the mere consumption of the supposed flesh and blood of the god assured the partakers of life everlasting. Thus the early church borrowed, assimilated, and succeeded, but like the later policy of accommodation to native rites in Mexico and South America it was a costly triumph for Christianity. As the author sums the matter up: "What happened to Buddhism when it set out to conquer the Far East now happened also to Christianity in the West. It became an official and successful institution—and so degenerated."

WOODBRIDGE RILEY

A Catholic Vicar of Bray

Stephen Gardiner and the Tudor Reaction. By James Arthur Muller. The Macmillan Company. $4.

BEHIND the unceasing strife of Christian creeds there lies intact a certain fund of respectful sympathy entertained by eminent clergymen for the prelates of other Christian denominations—something like a pan-Christian feeling of solidarity. I suggest, as a fascinating possibility, that this sentiment may even cross the boundary-lines of the Christian faith. Who knows but that the Archbishop of Canterbury, in his [illegible] soul, may look upon the Dalai Lama as a somewhat wayward but none the less well-beloved cousin, not to be mentioned disrespectfully to a laity always ready to encroach upon the privileges of spiritual peers? Be that as it may, it is certain that modern Anglican scholars, in their historical writings, frequently show an affectionate respect for the priestly statesmen of the dark ages and a sympathetic understanding of their doctrinal, political, and personal difficulties. This retrospective class-consciousness is by no means without its uses—the psychological insight into motives and impulses which it bestows has enabled many a learned clerk to write an excellent monograph on some priestly worthy of old times. It has inspired Mr. Muller, for instance, to write one of the most amusing and instructive of biographies.

Stephen Gardiner was born the son of a fairly well-to-do cloth-maker at Bury St. Edmunds in 1497, in the reign of Henry VII, and died in 1555, in the reign of Bloody Mary. Between these two dates he managed to squeeze a pretty lively and on the whole amazingly prosperous career—he went to Cambridge and became Doctor of Canon Law just at a time when skill in canonical chicanery was a recommendation to Henry VIII in his matrimonial troubles. Being notorious for that very skill, he was made Henry's ambassador to the Vatican, and—after his return from Rome—archdeacon, bishop, chancellor of his alma mater, and minister of state. Throughout his entire adult life he was an orthodox Catholic, a hater of Protestants, and, secretly or openly, according to the drift of the times, a devout believer in the spiritual supremacy of the Pope. But the most unwavering of his convictions, before which his other tenets had to yield, concerned his god-given right and title to a prosperous, comfortable, office-holding existence removed from the dangers conjured up from time to time by the secular and spiritual broils of his own day. As long as his dread sovereign paid court to the Holy Father, Gardiner was humbly glad to have his own convictions confirmed by royal authority; when Henry set up as supreme spiritual head of his loving subjects Gardiner wrote a book in defense of this new position, and stood by his book under the reign of the Protestant boy-king Edward; under Mary he swore off and became once more a Papist; in short, whoever was on top, Stephen Gardiner remained Vicar of Bray.

To make such a hero interesting and humanly presentable is no mean feat. Mr. Muller has actually achieved that feat—or would have achieved it had he not given in the frontispiece a contemporary portrait of his well-beloved Bishop. Such another compound of threatening tiger and frightened hare, let us hope, no picture gallery of spiritual peers can show.

JAMES FUCHS

Life and Times

Francesco Petrarca. His Life and Correspondence. A Study of the Early Fourteenth Century (1304-1347). By Edward H. R. Tatham. Vol. I: Early Years and Lyric Poems. Vol. II: Secluded Study and Public Fame. London: The Sheldon Press. New York: The Macmillan Company.

"PERHAPS there is no greater gap in the knowledge of European history possessed by the average educated man than that between the Fall of the Western Empire (476) and the Fall of the Eastern Empire (1453), or the period commonly known as the 'Middle Age'." If the Middle Ages are to become vivid to us, "we must call in the aid of Historical Biography, and try to recover from contemporary documents the details of a single life, intellectually in advance of its time, and passed in the most enlightened region of Europe. In this way only can we be made to realize that the men of the fourteenth century—when the seeds of the new times were germinating—were, despite external differences, more like ourselves than we had been apt to suppose." With Petrarch for subject Canon Tatham projects a four-volume essay in "Historical Biography," two volumes of which have now appeared.

On the evidence of the first two stalwart volumes, it is difficult to discover in what essential Canon Tatham's "Historical Biography" differs from the more familiar formula of "The Life and Times." Canon Tatham starts off with forty-two pages of Historical Survey wherein he sketches the state of Italy and the Papacy at the time of Petrarch's birth in 1304—a procedure urged by the peculiarly close connection, both direct and indirect, between Petrarch's life and the whole course of contemporaneous European events. The papacy at Avignon, medieval university life, the welter of Italian politics, the conflict between church and state—theocracy against growing nationalism—the revival of ancient learning, these are the topics that come in for extended consideration. And their treatment is more conspicuous for erudition than for edge. This "historical" aspect of the biography is relentless in its scholarship.

The more strictly biographical part is best when Canon Tatham lets Petrarch speak for himself, and the two volumes contain far more of his letters than does any other English work. Canon Tatham's comments about Petrarch, especially in the chapter called His Misplaced Passion—who was "Laura," would seem to indicate that his very extended learning had been acquired at the expense of any very first-hand contact with the springs of human character. Canon Tatham in one place speaks of Petrarch's "passion for books as books," of Petrarch's being "the first, since the decline of Rome, to possess the literary—as apart from the creative—instinct." Herein is the most striking compatibility between Petrarch and his historical biographer. Canon Tatham's is a work tempered for scholars with a passion for books as books. Those persons who are scandalized by biographies with the clarity, the compactness, and the unblushing decency of Joseph Wood Krutch's "Poe" are assured a long and safe seclusion from any disquieting impacts within Canon Tatham's tomes. In volume II, however, there is a diverting stretch of unintended gaiety; The Crowning of the Poet is prolific in matter for a Gilbert and Sullivan opera.

These first two volumes do, indeed, humanize Petrarch; there is a god's plenty of fact. But Canon Tatham's is the scholarly rather than the creative instinct: splendid industry and accuracy, but no flare. His veracity is impeccable; but in order that his veracity be transmuted into truth, scholarship is not enough. Canon Tatham has told everything—and the bones of Petrarch lie buried under monumental superfluity.

RAYMOND WEAVER

Books in Brief

Western Australia. A History from its Discovery to the Inauguration of the Commonwealth. By J. S. Battye. Oxford University Press. $8.35.

Dr. Battye's scholarly work not only meets the need for a comprehensive history of Western Australia but also adds another important item to the list of special studies of the constituent parts of the British Empire, which has been growing rapidly of late. Beyond a full and thoroughly documented account of the development of the colony from the days of discovery and belated exploration to 1901, when Australia became a member of the Australian Commonwealth, the reader will find a wealth of information regarding the land question, the beginning and end of convict labor, and the hard and exciting struggle for the opening and exploitation of the gold fields. The land question in particular, apparently much more difficult and complicated in Australia and New Zealand than in any of the other British overseas possessions, illustrates in striking fashion the intimate connection between a land system and the growth of settlement and social institutions. An appendix of elaborate statistical tables, covering all important phases of the economic life of the colony, should be valuable for reference. The only regret is that Dr. Battye, having done so much and done it so well, did not include at least a summary of events since 1901.

An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice. By William Godwin. Edited by Raymond A. Preston. Alfred A. Knopf. Two volumes. $5.

No better book could have been chosen as second in the series of Political Science Classics being reprinted under the general editorship of Professor Lindsay Rogers. "Political Justice," out of print since the suppression of the edition of 1843, represents the logical extreme of late eighteenth-century rationalism and individualism. The student of literature finds it absorbing because of its influence on Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, Hazlitt, and Shelley, and the political historian sees in its sudden eclipse significant evidence of the force of the British reaction against the French Revolution. The present [illegible] wisely followed "the naked boldness of the first edition." Unfortunately there has been some abridgment, involving the lopping off of certain quaint appendices which illustrate admirably the pitfalls of uncompromising intellectualism. Its present form, however, offers the modern reader surprising forecasts of nineteenth- and twentieth-century political, ethical, and economic changes, and still unrealized ideals of philosophical anarchy.

Organized Labor and the Law. By Alpheus T. Mason. Duke University Press. $2.50.

This book describes the legal status of organized labor in the United States. The conspiracy doctrine of combination and restraint of trade are traced from their English origins, and the American development treated. Emphasis is placed upon the Sherman and Clayton acts, and their judicial construction in labor cases. The book is not reliable as a legal treatise, being neither complete nor professional. If it is intended for labor-union officials or students of the labor movement, it must be taken with a liberal dose of salt; for the author assumes, in the face of the chaos of the decisions, that there is a predicable state of labor law. The truth is that labor law today is so indefinite and subjective that Mr. Mason's neat summaries are meaningless and misleading. The book will prove useful, however, as a convenient, well-organized reference book, especially on the historical development of labor's legal responsibilities.

The Industrial Evolution of India in Recent Times. By D. R. Gadgil. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

Indian industry is still in its infancy. According to Mr. Gadgil, in 1911 "industry," which includes the raising of special products such as tea and coffee, employing 810,407 persons, engaged 2.1 million people or 7 per mille of the population. He may well say, therefore: "Even today agriculture is so overwhelmingly important in India that the periods of prosperity of the country as a whole depend almost entirely on the nature of the agricultural seasons." And the nature of the agricultural seasons depends almost entirely on the monsoon. The industrial evolution of India has so far been mostly a supersession of the products of ancient handicrafts by the products of Western machine industry. Mr. Gadgil carries his survey down only to 1914, excusing himself from a consideration of the succeeding years on the ground that the period during the war and since is too abnormal for an examination of it to lead to reliable conclusions. This is a doubtful position. He has already surveyed decades of great abnormality, such as that of 1891-1901, which was marked by general and severe famines. In any case the results of the war are with us, and mere wishing will not restore the order of 1914, either now or in the future. This period, in fact, was one of irresistible industrial growth that seems likely to continue rather than to cease.

Letters to Judd, an American Workingman. By Upton Sinclair. Pasadena. Published by the Author.

It is a great gift to be able to believe as strongly in anything as Upton Sinclair does in the impending social revolution, despite all evidence to the contrary. He is taking care of his health in the expectation of seeing the glad day of its coming, and now he has written and published a little uncopyrighted book of sixty-four pages, which he invites anyone interested to reprint from his plates in order to help the common people understand, and thus to hasten that day. As such a bit of propaganda it is a good book, containing most of the old socialist catchwords, illustrated by facts, near-facts, and statistics. As an explanation of the existing economic scheme and how it actually works, it is an incredibly bad book.

The Oxford Book of Scandinavian Verse. XVII Century—XX*th* [illegible]. Chosen by Sir Edmund Gosse and W. A. Craigie. Oxford University Press. $3.75.

The latest of that excellent series called the Oxford Books of Verse. This tasteful little volume will do good service in the hands of lecturers on Scandinavian literature—providing such persons still exist. The selections are well made, but one misses, among the Danish authors, Jeppe Aakjær, and among the Norwegians, Arne Garborg. Emphatically, these should have been added.

Drama

Miss Rambeau Enjoys Herself

UNFORTUNATELY the stage attracts innumerable people who, their firm belief to the contrary, have not even the [illegible] to act. Acting is a rare and difficult art which involves the submergence of personality and the creation of character; it has, however, a false and seductive counterpart in the make-believe of children and the posing of adults. Most little girls like to imagine themselves queens, many women get their chief delight in life from dramatizing themselves as misunderstood or wronged, and upon such the theater exercises an irresistible fascination. They fondly imagine that they feel the call to act, but what they really want is some more concrete embodiment of the fantasies of their ego. They long for some play whose heroine will body forth [illegible] their imagination has ever been able to do the role in which they fancy themselves. They want to be [illegible] in the visible trappings of the queen, the heroine, the vampire, or what not they deem themselves to be, and they long, too, for an audience both larger and more appreciative than that which their circle of friends has been able to furnish. Acting they call it, but megalomania is what it really is.

Fortunately most of those who actually reach the stage are taken in hand by the managers and the directors whom they hate. Not many of them can play leads, and they are fitted in here and there where their "personalities" correspond to the thing for which a particular play happens to call. But let one of them—and they have of course their male counterparts—become an independent star, let him or her have a major voice in the choice of plays, and unless we are in the presence of that rare thing, a real actor, the theater will be turned into a theater not for art but for the display of the inner vanities of the player.

Hence it is that when an actor or actress appears in a series of plays as persistently and consistently bad as those to which Miss Marjory Rambeau has recently lent herself, one may generally be sure that the performer himself has had a hand in choosing them. No one may very much enjoy seeing her in any of these recent roles; to the mere spectator the fact that they permit her to be emotional to the top of her bent and the limit of her tragic laugh is no satisfactory excuse for their banal artificiality; but however little pleasure they give to others, they obviously give a great deal to her. Her plays have been bad in various ways, but they have been alike in one thing. All enable her to be the noble and resplendent woman who suffers for others and who suffers with a smile. Worshiped by the world, and yet unspoiled by praise, not even an indiscretion sullies the perfection of her character; and yet in this unjust world she pays and pays, taking up the burdens of others with a brave little laugh and accepting with a forgiving shrug the ingratitude with which they reward her. Grant her the emotional indulgence attendant upon appearing before the public in such a role, and Miss Rambeau will accept anything. Very likely she thinks herself devoted to her art. I have no doubt that she is one of those actresses who "feel their parts." But it is exactly here that the trouble lies. She feels them too well and too joyously to realize how preposterous they are.

As for the particular play at present in question, "Just Life" (Henry Miller's Theater), little need be said. It concerns a very noble and once very famous opera singer who gives up everything for a scoundrelly husband and for a daughter whom she considers ever so much more important than her career. She begins her sacrifice by selling her pearls, proceeds with it to the point where she desecrates her vocal cords with jazz in order to earn money, and does other things still worse. There is, it goes without saying, the faithful servant who offers to contribute her little savings, and there is besides a more lavish and impartial distribution of platitudes to all the characters involved than in any play seen here for a long while. All the virtuous female characters refuse cigarettes and all the virtuous male characters refuse high-balls; one might gather a large bouquet of such faded flowers as "I could never accept my happiness at another's expense" or "Love is the biggest thing in life"; but obviously the concoction is of no importance to anyone except to the lady whom it enables to play so personally satisfying a role.

The pity of it is that Miss Rambeau, though she could never be a first-rate actress, might prove effective enough under proper direction. She has stops in her voice, gestures in her arms, which, if employed at the proper moment in some tolerable play, might move an audience; but if she insists upon ruining her career to gratify a desire for womanly nobility in the same fashion that Miss Elsie Ferguson ruined hers by an inflexible determination to play anything which would enable her to be "queenly," she has only herself to blame. A successful actress must have brains—either her own or a director's.

"Queen High" (Ambassador Theater) and "Naughty Riquette" (Cosmopolitan Theater) are musical comedies, the first based upon the once popular farce "A Pair of Sixes," the second closely resembling all the operettas ever written in Vienna. Both are decidedly mild, but "Naughty Riquette" has as its prima donna Mitzi (concerning whom tastes differ) and as its chief clown Stanley Lupino, a first-rate comic.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

Modjacot Shpeel

Yiddish Marionette Theatre—95 Second Ave.—Orchard 7162
Z. Maud, Y. Cutler, J. Tworkov, Directors
Now playing every evening—Sat. and Sun. matinees
THE DYBUK PUPPET DANCES
THE MERCHANTS OF PEPPER

MEETING

FREETHINKERS' SOCIETY OF NEW YORK
226 West 58th Street
The first meeting of the season will be held Sunday, October 3, at 3:00 P. M. At this meeting
Mr. Joseph Lewis will answer an address entitled
"CALLES, NERO OR HERO"
Admission Free Questions

International Relations Section

France in Algeria and Tunisia

By ELIZABETH KNOWLTON

ALL of North Africa is restless today. From Morocco through Egypt, there is uprising or threat of uprising, open insurrection or rumbling underground. The Great Powers have been compelled to realize that their North African dependencies are outgrowing their period of tutelage; and wherever this recognition has come in time to ward off actual rebellion, as in Egypt, Algeria, and Tunisia, there have taken place substantial concessions to native desire for self-government. But the best of these measures are only palliative, only the beginning of the solution of a highly complicated problem.

Of all the nations that, following the prevailing fashion for colonies, took over during the last century the control of North African Moslem lands, there is none that has quite so much at stake as France. France is by far the oldest settler, having first gone into Algeria in 1830. She dominates the greatest extent of territory, some 349,000 square miles, not including the deserts south of Algeria proper. Much of this territory is favorably comparable to Egypt in agricultural possibilities, and, especially in Morocco, it is rich in mineral wealth.

In any consideration of the shifting kaleidoscope of instability that North Africa is today, it may be taken for granted that France will consider no rearrangement that might weaken her hold there. Her African possessions are to her of the most vital importance, the keystone of her whole colonial empire. For military reasons alone, they are almost a necessity to her. The French fighting force is now reckoned as the number of Frenchmen plus the colonial troops; and the pressure of conscription at home is greatly relieved by the import of man-power from Africa. Algeria and Tunisia, for example, have furnished almost all the troops used to subjugate their co-religionists in Syria. These colonies count, also, not only for the Arab* fighting men they themselves can supply but as points of export for the black hordes from French Equatorial Africa, which it is expected will soon be linked up to the Mediterranean seacoast by a railroad to Algiers. Incidentally, those black soldiers on the Rhine, so much discussed some years ago, were stationed there not to insult the Germans but to reassure the French as to their numbers and availability. France looks also to Algeria and Tunisia for a sure grain supply in emergencies. Grains and cereals are now among North Africa's chief exports; easily accessible, just across the Mediterranean from Marseilles, it offers a source impossible to cut off in time of war, except by an opposing power having complete control of the seas.

An even stronger reason, perhaps, for French tenacity is a psychological one. Her North African colonies incarnate most vividly to the homeland her dream of colonial empire. She thinks of them as giving her room for expansion, for surplus population—a constant hope for the future, still cherished in spite of the stern reality of the decreasing birth-rate. At present her efforts to populate these regions with Frenchmen seem anything but successful. In Algeria for twenty years she has done all that a government can to encourage permanent settlers on the land. Still her colons have come only slowly and scatteringly; and the French small landholders are now showing a disconcerting tendency to sell out to the Arab and drift into the towns, so that today Algeria's French urban population is increasing much faster than her agricultural population. In Tunisia her efforts seem to be even less productive; it is said that all government encouragement is practically useless until France starts great irrigation projects necessary for any extensive cultivation. The final result of years of endeavor in Algeria and Tunisia is a total count of some 977,000 Europeans—only about half of whom are of French blood, the rest being mostly Italians, Spaniards, Maltese, and Jews—as against 6,816,000 natives, with the native population increasing much faster than the European. As the climate, which has proved healthy for Europeans, is obviously not to blame for this poor showing, North Africa seems to make it plain that the French are not the stuff of which great colonizers are made. The love of the family and the native soil is perhaps too integral a part of French nature to be overcome by governmental desire.

In spite, however, of such meager success, France clings tenaciously to her vision of herself as a colonial Power, equal in this to all the other Great Powers. And if she cannot import her own people, she will dream of making Africans into Frenchmen. The French ability as administrator of alien races has long been proverbial, and even recent mistakes have been only the exceptions proving the rule. With the minimum of friction, France in Algeria and Tunisia long ago accomplished all the usual colonial transformations. She has built roads and railroads and bridges, dredged harbors, opened up mineral wealth, introduced modern methods of agriculture, stimulated commerce, brought in modern sanitation, erected schools and hospitals, and given European government methods to lands of despotism and corruption. In short, she has laid at the feet of the outwardly acquiescent Arab all the benefits of modern Western civilization. Her officials show themselves on the whole uniquely adept at delicate surface contacts, at graceful interest in the ideas of the conquered race—of which such incidents as the recent opening of a Moslem mosque at Paris are symptomatic.

But those superficial smoothnesses and mutual acceptances, that deft avoidance of open trouble, have made many Frenchmen dream, as no stiff Britisher, for instance, would ever dare dream, of a final assimilation, by means of a series of only minor adjustments on both sides, an absorption of these very definitely Eastern peoples into the civilisation française. The French too readily ignore the fact that the great majority of the Moslems show very little interest, one way or the other, in the civilisation française, or in the feast of benefits, material and intellectual, of modern Western life, which has so persistently been spread before them. They are either unable or unwilling to use modern agricultural methods. They do not readily learn the simplest manufacturing processes. They do not send their children to attend the schools which the French have started for natives. They continue to prefer drowsing and dreaming in the sun, or philosophizing together in coffee houses, to the European ideal of economic productivity. The fact is that these white-robed, slow-moving, meditative followers of Islam are of the East Eastern in all their thoughts and feelings and interests; and the true direction of their desires, the very orientation of their whole lives, is buried deep in the mystery of race, far beyond the understanding of any casual Western conqueror.

* Throughout, I use "Arab" as the French generally do, not ethnologically correctly, but as a convenient term for all native North African Moslems.

Meanwhile things may move in a quite different direction. Against the present French desire for peace and the status quo, three forces are pressing, nationalism, Islam, and foreign communism. Nationalism—a new belief of the cultured Europeanized few, to which they are trying to convert the many; Islam—the embodiment of the unifying racial culture of the masses; French communism and Russian bolshevism—outside influences encouraging native revolt. In the presence and interaction of these three forces, the situation in Algeria and Tunisia roughly parallels that in Egypt, India, or even our own Philippines, of every land, in fact, where a somewhat backward people of different racial culture is under a Western government.

Although Islam appears politically chiefly as a racial tradition, binding together those peoples who have already a common temperament and point of view, yet its distinctly religious aspects cannot be entirely discounted. In North Africa, and especially in Tunisia, Mohammedanism is today a living belief. Religious feeling runs high everywhere, and is stimulated by a network of Mohammedan secret societies which covers Algeria and Tunisia, with branches in all but the smallest villages. Definite facts about their size and strength are unobtainable by non-Moslems, but it would be dangerous to underestimate their importance. Nine different organizations are believed to flourish in the city of Algiers alone. Mohammedan missionaries are also busy extending the power of the Prophet southward, making converts among the blacks of the Sahara. Islam's experiences and success elsewhere are closely watched in North Africa, and the illiterate nomads of the desert, meeting in village coffee-houses, discuss with keen interest such points as the recent Turkish law against the fez, or the present situation in Syria or Morocco. That other parts of the Moslem world are equally conscious of the tie that binds them to their North African co-religionists, and even look to these regions for future religious leadership, is shown by a proposal after the Turkish abolition of the Caliphate to make the Sultan of Morocco Caliph, and a rather more recent one to choose for that office the Moroccan insurrectionist and conqueror of Europeans, Abd-el-Krim. As far as non-Moslems may know, the Mohammedan religious activity in French North Africa is not, at present, aimed directly toward political ends, but it is feeding a fire of unity and fanaticism, from which other forces may kindle a general conflagration.

Such another force is nationalism. The nationalist leaders, as in so many other Eastern countries, have received their teaching and inspiration from their European rulers. Almost all of them in Algeria and Tunisia have had an education either in France itself or in some such French-founded institution as the Lycée Carna at Tunis. And from France also come their dreams of political liberty and a democratic government.

The Young Tunisians are the most important nationalist group. Now between fifteen and twenty years old, they are theoretically non-existent, since their complete suppression after the revolt of 1922. In that brief and little-known rising the Arabs of Tunis, roused by Young Tunisian agitation, poured out in a body to the Palace of the Bey to beg him to drive forth the French invader and resume his ancient power. That crisis was handled in a typically French way, by a combination of the iron hand, which with a prompt show of force broke up the mob and arrested all the leaders, and the velvet glove, which smoothed things over by some concessions to Arab desire for self-government. Of these the most important took the form of a limited representation in the consultative council which directs local affairs in Tunisia, under the veto of the French Resident General and the aegis of the Moslem Bey. More recent Young Tunisian activities have, of necessity, been completely underground, but occasional newspaper agitation, followed always by prompt suppression and arrests, bears witness to a present heat of rebellion beneath.

The Young Algerian movement, modeled after the Young Tunisian, has never been so large or active. In fact, it has hardly been in evidence at all since the beau geste of the French administration in Paris in giving to the Moslem natives, in recognition of their services in the war, various political privileges, including a much widened franchise. This particular gesture of the home government, having resulted in increasing the number of native voters to 421,000, as against 120,000 French, has been greatly deplored and bitterly resented by the colons on the spot. And the Algerian Europeans, although numerically unimportant, represent, after all, the economic wealth of the colony, having in their hands practically all the banking and commerce and the large-scale farming enterprises. But this much-protested act, in giving the educated nationalistic Arabs the new toy of political power to play with, and also, if we are to believe the colons, the old familiar Arab tools of secret corruption and graft to work with, does at least seem to have resulted in keeping them out of more destructive mischief.

In Tunisia are other conditions making for unrest. Of these perhaps the chief is the fact that in the Protectorate the Italians, with their dreams of national glory, and with Tripoli next door, are in the majority over the French of 84,000 to 54,000. This situation, and the French suppression of Italian culture there, are continual thorns in the side of Italy. Tomaso Tittoni, in a semi-official article, quotes approvingly a French remark calling the Tunisian question "the principal element of discord between France and Italy." The Italian schools in Tunisia provided a special source of controversy, until the matter was satisfactorily settled under Herriot's regime. Feeling, however, still runs high on both sides. In this condition of tension Mussolini's imperialistic utterances and Mediterranean aspirations are the opposite of reassuring.

There are then, in general, more reasons for immediate disturbances in Tunisia than in Algeria. But its inhabitants provide less hopeful material for prolonged and successful native revolt. "The Moroccans are tigers, the Algerians are men, the Tunisians are women," so says a native proverb; and the instability of the gentle, indolent, fanatical, easily-influenced Tunisian Arab, plus the lack among even the educated of any natural ability for organization, would seem to be safeguards against elaborate rebellion.

How imminent, however, would be any danger of serious trouble in either country in the natural course of things, is hard to say; for the internal forces of unrest have powerful and active outside allies in French and Russian Communism. In accordance with the avowed policy of the Third International of centering attention on the world's

H. G. WELLS

THE WORLD OF WILLIAM CLISSOLD, A Novel at a New Angle by H. G. Wells, is being published in England in three volumes, one month apart, beginning September. In the United States it is published September 30th in two volumes complete, by George H. Doran Company.

As a sheer piece of writing it is Mr. Wells' masterpiece. As a novel, it must rank as one of the very great novels of our day. A first large printing is completely absorbed by advance orders from booksellers who are prepared now to receive your order for delivery on publication day. We urge the early placing of your order.

GEORGE H. DORAN COMPANY, Publishers, New York and Toronto

DORAN BOOKS

Was Jesus a Myth?

"GEORG BRANDES [illegible] in the face of established ideas. The thesis of the new book is that Jesus is as wholly fictitious and legendary a figure as Hercules, Prometheus or William Tell." —The World.

JESUS
A MYTH

by GEORG BRANDES

Translated from the Danish
by Edwin Björkman

"HIS argument, as might be expected from so learned and able a critic, is eloquent and powerful." —New York Sun.

$2.00 at all bookstores or from the publishers. Address Dept. A

Albert & Charles Boni—66 Fifth Avenue, New York

Lewis Browne's New Book

This Believing World

A Simple Account of the Great Religions of Mankind

Romantic

He has written his narrative with transparent clearness and sometimes with romantic eloquence. He has brought the entire procession of the world's faiths upon one canvas, illuminated with order and clarity.
—Will Durant, New York Herald Tribune

Notable

This is a book not to be criticised but to be read, and those who do this will be amply repaid. It tells people what many desire to know, the character of the great religions of the world. The writer has a rare gift of making his subject interesting.
—F. J. Foakes Jackson

Vivid

The substance of the matter is here. We get the essential outlines of the picture. Mr. Browne's book, for all its brevity, is as accurate [illegible]
—John [illegible], New York World

Graphic

Graphic, vivid, informed with a fine sense of drama, gently ironic and penetrating. This reviewer for one can testify that no recent novel has held him into the late watches of the night as has this book of Lewis Browne's.
—Henry Hazlitt, New York Sun

Complete

There is strong meat here, nourishment for real people, both mental and spiritual... The real test comes not only as you read it and see the way it is done, but also afterward. You can think of nothing to add to it that you really want to know. There is nothing.
—Thomas L. Masson, [illegible]

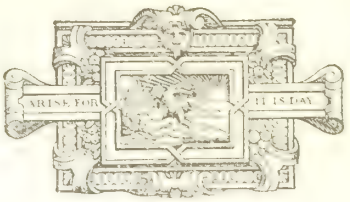
[illegible]

New York Boston Chicago

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

Atlanta Dallas [illegible]

sore spots, French Communist agitators have long been active in North Africa. They have frequently in the last years roused Arab workmen in Algiers and Oran to First of May demonstrations; and it is thought by the French Government that of the two it was French Communists and not Arab nationalists who were the chief instigators of the brief Arab revolt in Tunis. Russia first put in her finger in 1921, when the Congress of Eastern Peoples, called at Baku by Russian Communists, enunciated that doctrine so encouraging to North African patriots, "First Egypt. Then Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco." Along with the talk in 1924 and 1925 of Bolshevist propaganda in France, and Herriot's expulsion of agitators, there went similar talk of activity in French North Africa, especially in Tunisia. A year ago last November, a special commission was appointed to study the Bolshevist menace there, and to deal with it by the regular French combination of repression and concession. It is the general opinion of European residents who know the Arab, that the Communist who hopes to make not only trouble for the rulers but permanent converts to his doctrine is preparing for a bitter disappointment. For they say that the Arabs are not the stuff of which Communists are made that the whole spirit and philosophy of that party is uncongenial to the native temperament. If there seems to be an alliance of these two forces against the powers that be, it is the various nationalist movements of Islam that are using bolshevism for their own national ends, and not the reverse, whatever may be the self-deluding hopes of Moscow.



"That Film"

THE following interesting if unfavorable opinion of a widely heralded American film and the leading motion-picture comedian of the world appeared recently in the Haagsche Post (Holland):

I have seen a miserable film, one that earns millions—"Gold Rush," written, directed, and played by Charlie Chaplin. Nobody with the slightest self-respect can derive any pleasure from this stupid product. Mankind must be childish to regard this as a world success. Chaplin's vaunted healthy humor turns out to be merely American sentimentality that has become a habit. Charlie Chaplin has acquired a new mannerism, a new success-mannerism, that is all. This is the recipe: Humor equals one laugh plus one tear, presented by a clown with a soulful face and a pair of soulful legs. But now we are also aware that all this is worn without any psychic necessity and that in its foundation there is not an atom of deeper humanity. The recluse of "Gold Rush" is not tragic, though such is the presumable intent; it is Charlie Chaplin trying to make propaganda of the legend that his seeming foolishness is derived from, or overshadowed by, a pure human melancholy. . . .

Such a tasteless and childish business, this whole scenario of Charlie Chaplin. A puppet of Madame Tussaud goes to Alaska to dig for gold (dressed in an undertaker's mourning coat). He is not funny, he is only an exaggerated improbability. And why does he go to Alaska? To make the acquaintance of a young damsel with a bad reputation but a good heart, something that could readily have been found in Hollywood. Only in Hollywood they are probably more human than in the cold of Alaska, for in this dame all individuality seems to be frozen. She is neither fish nor flesh, a puppet operated by strings. Then Charlie Chaplin pulls a string and in sudden love she falls into the arms of the new millionaire. . . .

JOHN DAY

announces the publication of its first group of books

MY HERESY

The Autobiography of An Idea

By Bishop William Montgomery Brown

The story of a man who lost a religion and found a faith. The central figure in the most famous ecclesiastical tragi-comedy of modern times tells the story of his life and "heresy" in an apologia that does not apologize. $2.00 net.

THE MUSIC FROM BEHIND THE MOON

By James Branch Cabell

With eight full-page illustrations from wood engravings by Leon Underwood.

The chronicle of Madoc of Netan and the pallid witch, Ettarre. Edition limited to three thousand copies. Printed on Vidalon vélin paper, from type hand set by William Edwin Rudge. Out of print. Boxed; $6.00 net.

LESS THAN KIN

By Charles Caldwell Dobie

The story of the Sinclair fortunes and the Sinclair pride; of Adrienne, strong in her rebellious youth; of the infamous Selina Parsons and the group of people she entangles in the web of her vengeful ambitions. $2.00 net.

THAT LAST INFIRMITY

By Charles Brackett

A new chapter in the social comedy by the author of "Week-End." $2.00 net.

Ready in October

NEW SCHOOLS IN THE OLD WORLD

By Carleton Washburne and Myron M. Stearns

A study of twelve modern European schools with special reference to American educational problems. Dr. Washburne is superintendent of schools in Winnetka, Ill. $1.75 net.

THE PEOPLE NEXT DOOR

By George Creel

Challenging the position of tradition-bound historians, Mr. Creel offers a new view of Mexico. Starting with the Toltec and Aztec civilizations he follows the violent current of Mexican affairs down to the present day. $4.00 net.

THE BLACK ANGELS

By Maud Hart Lovelace

The adventures of a crew of laughing, singing vagabonds, who set forth in an ox-drawn covered wagon in Minnesota to make their fortunes as a concert troupe. $2.00 net.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS

THE JOHN DAY COMPANY

25 West 45th Street New York

True food is the foundation of Good health

Health Food Whole Wheat Products

Satisfying Diet for Diabetics

Trufood

VEGETARIAN RESTAURANT

153 West 44th St., East of Broadway

Open Daily Until 12 P. M.

BOOKS FOR LESS THAN TWO CENTS A DAY

Mercantile Library makes a specialty of new books.

Novels, Travel, Drama, Biographies and new books upon all topics of the day.

SUBSCRIPTION

$5.00 - - - - per year
$3.00 - - - six months

MERCANTILE LIBRARY

Astor Place & 8th St.

Opposite Wanamaker's.

FALL VACATIONS

Every a week or two, or a weekend with your friends, at

THE INN

at Phillips Cove, Cape Neddick, Maine

ON THE SEA—65 acres—old fashioned farmhouse—catering to private house parties of ten or less of professional people—excellent table—hunting and golfing—private beach—isolated—a writers' retreat.

Accessible overnight from New York.

Rates $30 per week per person or $5 a day.

FOR RENT

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL, N. Y.

LIVE in a modern, fireproof hotel by the seashore for less than in the crowded city. Homelike comforts, moderate priced restaurant, maid, valet and telephone service. Winter rates:—$12 per week for two. 37 minutes from Times Square, B.M.T. Phone Esplanade 3000.

WILL share my charming two-room, kitchenette apartment West 68th St. with young professional or business woman. Rate very reasonable. Call mornings before 9:30. Trafalgar 2790.

WANTED—A young woman, cultured, intelligent, companionable, to share attractive apartment. Cost reasonable. Write or phone Jerome 2953. Box No. 550, c/o The Nation.

FOR SALE

APARTMENT near Lincoln School, Columbia, for sale, strictly modern cooperative house, seven rooms, facing Morningside Park; rent $75. Must sell at once. Mrs. Cotton, Plaza 4700.

PUPPIES FOR SALE

COLLIE Puppies that will bring joy to the kiddies and the grown-ups as well. Handsome, pedigreed dogs with character, disposition and intelligence bred in them. Not kennel dogs. On approval anywhere. Newtown Square 75-W. W. N. Van Dyck, Broomall, Delaware Co., Pa.

POSITION WANTED

COLLEGE senior, 23, well-read, typist, wishes evening, week-end connection with bookshop, publisher, writer, social work. Box 549, care The Nation.

FOR SALE

British Miners' Lantern Pins

The British Miners' Federation has [illegible] thousand little miners Unions are [illegible] to help feed the starving women and children.

[illegible] and very attractive [illegible] every one should buy. Send a dollar (or more) today and one will be sent you prepaid.

INTERNATIONAL WORKERS' AID,

Room 237—799 Broadway,

Marion L. Emerson, Sec'y Local N. Y.

Mexican Government & Railroad Bonds

These bonds at prevailing prices offer attractive investment and speculative possibilities.

Detailed information furnished on request. Correspondence invited.

J. SANTILHANO

[illegible] Issues

50 Broad Street Tel. Han. 4419

BOOKS

The TRUTH SEEKER National Freethought Weekly. Est. 1873 G. E. Macdonald, Edr

Three mos. Trial, $1. Sample free.

Books: Voltaire, Paine, Ingersoll. Catalog free

TRUTH SEEKER CO., 49 Vesey St., New York

PERSONALS

WANTED, a child, preferably a boy, between 8 and 11 years old, to board in the country. Special attention given to [illegible] Modern Experimental School near by. Florence King, R. F. D. 1, White Plains, N. Y.

WOMAN worker wants to find private family within commuting distance New York City to board [illegible] 12 years old attending public school or small boarding school in country. Terms must be moderate. Write Mrs. F. Keller, 1665 Monroe St., New York City.

ACCOMMODATIONS WANTED

APT wanted [illegible] rooms; on Long Island, not over 20 minutes from N. Y., preferably in Kew Gardens or Forest Hills section. Address: H. Humphrey, 8266 Austin St., Kew Gardens, L. I.

WRITER wants, for week ends, October to [illegible] in country, not more than [illegible] from New York—some heating facility, [illegible] Box 547, c/o The Nation.

YOUNG lady desires unfurnished room in [illegible] Must be light and reasonable. [illegible] The Nation.

MISCELLANEOUS

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

BELL SYSTEM

One Policy, One System, Universal Service

Privately Printed for Subscribers

The Real Arabian Nights

RENDERED INTO ENGLISH BY E. POWYS MATHERS

Literal Translation by Dr. J. C. Mardrus

Limited Edition Now Nearly Exhausted

THE Thousand Nights and One Night rendered from the literal and complete version of Dr. J. C. Mardrus and collated with other sources by E. POWYS MATHERS.

Privately Printed for Subscribers

Burton's translation has hitherto been the last word. But it is no longer. Dr. Mardrus began in 1899 his new French translation and this English translation of his completed work has been privately printed for subscribers. Of it The London Times says:

"In the 'THOUSAND AND ONE NIGHTS' the tale after all is the thing, and the tale is better told by Mardrus than by Burton. But let not those who are jealous of every word suppose he has attained this result by the method of a sub-editor. For artistic temperament the abhorred shears are not necessary. All the superfluities have also a value. Burton cut out a great deal. The Mardrus version is very much fuller in detail."

The London Spectator says: "The simplest and most vigorous translation into a European language is that of Dr. J. C. Mardrus. Mr. E. POWYS MATHERS has published a translation and we have an unexpurgated English text that will be for many years the best."

Each of these handsome volumes on hand-made, water-marked paper. Frontispieces in four colors from Persian illuminations. Sixteen volumes bound in four 6¼" by 9¼" by 2" thick. Bound in French boards, Oriental motif, gold tops, gilt backs, colored end papers.

The English Review of Reviews says of this remarkable set: "It is incomparably the best we have ever had—a revelation of new beauty."

More than two-thirds of the 700 sets printed for American subscribers have already been sold. The price of $50 will be advanced to $60 after November first.

Mail the coupon for descriptive brochure

DINGWALL-ROCK, Ltd.

41 West 45th Street, New York City

Dingwall-Rock, Ltd. Dept. 19.
41 West 45th St., New York City

Gentlemen: Without obligation or cost to me, kindly forward information in detail about "The Real Arabian Nights."

Name .....

Address .....

City .....

State .....

And all this proves again the axiom that the public accepts everything, swallows everything, enjoys everything if it has been for some years manipulated with a certain business dexterity. Even if a man, from personal conviction, has come to the conclusion that it is disappointing—as in this case—he feels called upon to praise it. The hero worship gets the better of him. When the hero, Charlie Chaplin, tumbles from his pedestal, he is ready to return him to the elevated place. The film public no longer believes in God; it believes in an Olympus where the god-millionaires sit enthroned, those gods called Douglas Fairbanks, Charlie Chaplin, Harold Lloyd, and innumerable Aphrodites like Gloria Swanson and Mary Pickford. Probably the time will come when from this will be born a new religion; that is as soon as it pleases one of the above-mentioned superhuman celebrities to die. Then Charlie Chaplin will arise as the sun god, another Helios, and the Americans will bring him offerings consisting of cooked films. And in the sight-seeing bus they will drive to Mary Pickford's palace, to pray to the image of this holy Mary. For the present Charlie Chaplin is still the infallible pope. F. H.

Contributors to This Issue

W. E. Woodward is the author of "Bunk," "Lottery," and other volumes.

Glenn Frank is the president of the University of Wisconsin.

Michael Gold is one of the editors of the New Masses.

Hal Saunders White was a teacher of English at Yale University last winter.

Mortimer J. Adler is a lecturer in psychology at Columbia University.

Joseph Wood Krutch is associate editor of The Nation, and the author of "Edgar Allan Poe: A Study in Genius."

Woodbridge Riley is professor of philosophy at Vassar College.

James Fuchs is known as a writer for the liberal and radical press.

Raymond Weaver wrote "Herman Melville, Mariner and Mystic" and "Black Valley."

Elizabeth Knowlton wrote Digging Up Carthage in The Nation of October 29, 1924, and Iceland's New Birth in the issue of October 8 of the same year.

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers to Purchaser's Door
Sent Length Cut to Order. Price $2.25 per Yard. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 120 Stornoway, Outer Hebrides, Scotland

Your Fall Problems

Rates on application. Special three-time rate. Dept. F. P., The Nation.

The Nation's Fall Book Number
October 13

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of graduate study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.
The Fall Quarter begins October 4, 1926.
For further information, address the Director,
THE TRAINING SCHOOL
for
JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
(a department of the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)
210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

In Wallace Thompson's
RAINBOW COUNTRIES OF CENTRAL AMERICA
there are combined romantic history, vivid description, and plentiful information. It is a book to lure you from a northern winter into this accessible, neglected wonderland at your very doors. $5.00
E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

THINKING An Introduction to its HISTORY AND SCIENCE
By FRED CASEY
THIS is the first authorized American edition of a text-book in logic, based on the work of Joseph Dietzgen, which has been exceedingly popular in England. Thinking has for thousands of years been a theological or metaphysical mystery. This book shows how the methods of modern science can be applied to it, and how the process of thinking can thus be improved. Cloth, $1.25 postpaid. We also publish Dietzgen's PHILOSOPHICAL ESSAYS and his POSITIVE OUTCOME OF PHILOSOPHY, each $1.50 postpaid.
CHARLES H. KERR & COMPANY
347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

AURORA HEALTH FARM Mendham Road MORRISTOWN NEW JERSEY
Not a sanitarium, not a boarding-house
Beautiful country location, one hour from New York. Open all year. Unfurnished bungalows for cheerful and healthful living. Personal medical supervision. Homelike atmosphere for convalescents, nervous or mental cases.
DR. [illegible], Medical Director.
[illegible], Program.

Midol
for HEADACHE
GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1926 No. 3196

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 309

EDITORIALS:

Hugh Cooper Touches a Dream

Bad Manners at Geneva

The Greatest Farce of the Century

Crime and Punishment

Taking Life Seriously

MY BLACK BROTHER MAFEKING. By Wyndet Dodge Rollins

GEORGE WASHINGTON—THE IMAGE AND THE MAN

II. Gunpowder and Petticoats. By W. E. Woodward 317

CALLES IS GAINING IN MEXICO. By Carleton Beals 320

THE ANSWER (To Rudyard Kipling). By Harry Kemp 322

THE WORKERS BUILD THEIR OWN. By James Rorty 322

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter

CORRESPONDENCE

BOOKS AND PLAYS:

Vanguard. By Leslie Nelson Jennings

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 326

Cook's Tours Through Art. By Thomas Munro 326

The Story of Psychology. By Joseph Jastrow 327

A Rare Temper. By Ludwig Lewisohn 328

Baroja. By Alice Beal Parsons 328

Books in Brief

Drama: Broadway. By Joseph Wood Krutch

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

British Labor in Transition. By Scott Nearing

Color and World Migration 332

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: No. 28 South Dearborn Street. British Agency for Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London W. C. 1, England.

"Did it ever occur to you" [Bruce Barton asked] "that you might be President when you grew up?"

". . . I do not recall that anyone in whose judgment I would place much reliance ever told me in my younger days that I should be President" [answered Mr. Coolidge].—Associated Press.

A CANNY child, young Calvin built
No White House in the air;
No battery of flattery
Could catch him unaware.

When uncle said to Calvin,
"You'll be President or bust!"
The boy replied, with modest pride:
"Your judgment I distrust."

PEACE—REAL PEACE—on the Rhine moves nearer and nearer. There are rumblings and grumblings—M. Poincaré has just made a speech about German responsibility for the war which does not help matters—but economic pressure is making itself felt with the force of an avalanche. Gradually the outlines of the tentative agreement reached by M. Briand and Herr Stresemann on the shores of Lake Geneva become clearer. France was to agree to evacuate the Rhineland in 1927, to return the Saar coal region in 1928, and to withdraw opposition to the resale of Eupen and Malmedy by Belgium. In return Germany was to pay for the Saar and for Eupen and Malmedy—about $100,000,000; to assist in mobilizing the Dawes obligations so that they could be used now to stabilize the franc; and to relinquish the protection of the transfer clause of the Dawes Plan. The immediate gains to France would be enormous—she would obtain cash in hand beyond the capacities of her tax collectors. The military guard on the Rhine has long ceased to be a matter of military strategy and become chiefly a matter of prestige, and prestige in these days comes high. France knows now that she can never persuade the Saar folk to vote for French rule and must ultimately lose them, and little Eupen and Malmedy have a mainly sentimental value even for the Germans. To a Cabinet whose overwhelming preoccupation is finance the advantages of the plan are obvious.

TO GERMANY, TOO, the plan has its attraction—it widens out the Western frontier at two sore points, regains the Saar coal, and gets rid of the irritating foreign troops who hold the post-war watch on the Rhine. It means, in essence, discounting the payments on the Dawes Plan in the American market. Ultimately something like a billion dollars' worth of bonds would have to be floated—and of course there is no market but the American capable of absorbing anything like that amount. The loan would have to be absorbed at an enormous sacrifice—at present the talk is of offering the first issue of 5 per cent bonds at 75, and the bankers' commissions would have to be deducted from the 75 before Germany would get her cash. The transfer clause of the Dawes agreements has hitherto guaranteed Germany against large transfers of reparations payments when they might affect the stability of the mark, and this would have to be renounced before the bonds could be sold abroad. Foreign investors would demand regular interest payments. The program is predicated upon the assumption that Germany's financial recovery will continue and that she will be able to meet the Dawes Plan payments as they become due. Thus far the Dawes Plan has worked; Germany has this year even increased her payments by $75,000,000 in return for future concessions. But can Germany keep it up? And will American investors believe in her capacity sufficiently to make the gamble? The ultimate decision will be made neither in Paris nor in Berlin, but in Wall Street, New York City.

THE CAT CAME BACK. The World Court had been laid on an extra high shelf by a Senate which did not quite have the courage either to take it or leave it. The theory, unavowed but clear, was that the nations which are signatories to the World Court protocol would either get down on their knees and accept the American reservations, or refuse them out of hand, in either case bothering the Senate no more. But the assembled nations did neither. They followed the Senate's own technique: they accepted the reservations, with reservations. And now the reservations to our reservations must go back to the Senate which, in its infinite wisdom, may find that the only way to maintain peace, in the Senate, is to accept the reservations to our reservations, with further reservations. The merry game goes on. The best legal minds of Geneva were set to work upon the Senate's reservations, a few of the obiter dicta of the Presidential Spokesman in the Adirondack fastnesses being supplied to help them out. The Geneva conferees agreed to three of the five Senate reservations. They accepted the American veto upon amendments to the Court's statute with the proviso that the signatories might by a two-thirds vote withdraw their acceptance. They struck a snag in the question of advisory opinions. The Senate had insisted that the Court refuse to give any advisory opinion without Washington's consent upon matters in which the United States might claim an interest. The Spokesman explained that the Senate meant by this merely to put us on a par with the members of the League's Council. The Geneva reply is that the Council members have no such veto power, and that accordingly they will be pleased to give us an equal voice but no more. And the Senate is now entitled to say whether the Spokesman was right in explaining what the Senate meant.

FLORIDA SEEMS to be bent upon alienating as soon as possible the sympathy which rightly went out to her because of the hurricane. In the New York Times we read the following dispatch from Miami, dated September 23:

> Conscription of all unemployed persons to aid in clearing away wreckage and to speed the work of rehabilitating the Florida storm-swept area was adopted everywhere in that area today. Militiamen and police, aided by several hundred members of the American Legion who have been specially deputized, patrolled all streets and highways, apprehending all persons who could not show that they were employed, and putting them immediately to work.

It is conceivable that such conscription of labor, although forbidden by the federal Constitution, might be upheld by the courts if ordered by a governor or legislature to meet an extreme emergency. But in Florida the decree appears to have been a mere municipal fiat and the emergency nothing more urgent than a desire to restore the attractions of Miami in time for the winter tourist season. It was easy to predict, also, that the order would be applied only to poor Negroes—not to white idlers of adequate means. A day after the above dispatch it was stated that "two marines" had been shot while trying to force a couple of Negroes to join a labor gang. What business, we should like to ask, had "two marines" to be assisting in an illegal attempt at municipal peonage? The Negroes, it seems, had only recently arrived from Nassau, and therefore were probably British subjects. If so, His Majesty's ambassador may be able to obtain for them redress which as mere American citizens they would not stand a chance of getting.

STUDENT PROTESTS at the College of the City of New York against compulsory military training have borne their fruit. The incoming freshman class is now to have a choice between military training and "civilian drill" under the direction of the department of hygiene; upperclass men, however, who have already begun military training will not be permitted to relinquish it. Thus the authorities save their faces and at the same time respond to what was a rather troublesome protest. The intrepid young men of City College who quoted from the army manual used in the drill course last year must feel amply rewarded for their pains. They heard themselves called "traitors," "cowards," "bolsheviks," "parlor pacifists"; they were assured that the faculty would of course pay no attention to the pratings of mere students, and that City College was second to none in zeal for its country and its flag; they fought on. And somehow the student protests carried sharper barbs than President Mezes and his associates would confess to. One wonders just what did happen. Did it occur to someone that colleges might be made for students instead of the other way around? Probably not. Whatever happened, compulsory military training in colleges has received another setback. Its sponsors, however, are busy and alert; the fight to eliminate from the schools this unwelcome immigrant has only begun. We count upon the students who have waged so effective a struggle against it from City College to Wyoming to carry on.

THE STATE OF KENTUCKY has lately shown a commendable courage in preventing lynchings, but there have been a number of trials which have appeared to colored residents as little better. Last January a Negro in Lexington was sentenced to be hanged for murder and rape after a trial of sixteen minutes, but a month later in the same city a white man, charged with assaulting a colored girl, was declared insane. In April three Negroes were arrested in Madisonville charged with assault upon a white woman. The evidence against them did not seem conclusive to many persons, but race feeling ran high and the Courier-Journal reported in advance that the men would be convicted and hanged. Two were, in fact, speedily sentenced to die and the third got twenty years in jail, but the sentences were later upset by the Court of Appeals. Previous to the trial, however, the Leader and the News, Negro newspapers of Louisville, protested that the men could not expect a fair hearing in the atmosphere of Madisonville. The Leader spoke of certain recent trials as "legalized lynchings." Later the editors of the News and the Leader, William Warley and I. Willis Cole, were charged with creating race hatred, but when it was discovered that the law making this a crime had been repealed they were indicted for libeling the judge at Madisonville. The outcome of this case, involving as it does both the freedom of the press and justice for the Negro race, is highly important in the annals of Kentucky.

THE ORGANIZATION of the textile workers of Passaic, New Jersey, under the auspices of the American Federation of Labor, has been the signal for a final lawless effort to crush the strike. Since the strike began some nine months ago it would seem that the employees had already been sufficiently fertile in inspiring illegality, having led the public officials of Bergen County to prohibit lawful meetings, to break up legitimate picket lines, and to exhaust the workers' funds by demanding excessive bail. But now that the mill-owners can no longer cry "Bolshevik" and "Communist" at the workers they are trying to connect them with recent bomb explosions. A score of strikers have been arrested, held incomunicado for several days, and in some cases subjected to the third degree. Meanwhile Henry T. Hunt, counsel for the strikers, declares that all available evidence indicates that the various bombs were "planted" by detectives in the pay of the mills. This seems quite in keeping with the ethics which sponsored a spurious breach-of-promise case against Albert Weisbord when he was leading the strike. Neither is it surprising that the charges against Norman Thomas were promptly dismissed by a grand jury when after five months' delay under bail of $10,000 it was finally possible to get a hearing before such a body. We are glad to see that Mr. Thomas, who courageously consented to lead in a test case of Bergen County's illegal application of the riot law, plans to bring suit for false arrest.

WE SINCERELY HOPE that the outcome of the Dempsey-Tunney fight is as much a triumph of mind over matter as it has been represented to be. Mr. Tunney has been heralded as the only heavyweight champion who ever read "The Way of All Flesh," and in these days when the taste of Presidents runs to vaudeville and detective stories it is something to have the cause of culture triumph in the prize-ring. Unfortunately, certain cynical reporters insist that, his reputation as a highbrow notwithstanding, the new champion hesitates a little over all words of more than three syllables, but others represent him as deeply versed in metaphysics and according to one story a spectator in the arena remarked that this extraordinary boxer "could discuss Kant with ease." To this a companion replied: "Then he must be good, because that's more than Kant could do," thus illustrating the fact that in these days even the fans are contemplative men. In any event Mr. Tunney's fist seems to have appealed to Mr. Dempsey with all the force of a categorical imperative.

Hugh Cooper Touches a Dream

DURING the last years of his active life Nicolai Lenin was probably the busiest man in Europe, but somehow he managed to find time for day-dreams. His pet dream related to millions of kilowatts of electrical energy. It envisaged Russia's immense storages of coal and heat and water-power—particularly the potential 65,000,000 horse-power running to waste in Russian rivers—harnessed to work for the communal society of his vision. When Soviet troops were holding a dozen fronts, and adventurous Czarist generals, financed by our best civilized governments, were hemming in the Soviet armies, when Russia apparently lay in ruins and starvation stalked across the steppes, when in the city a bushel-basket of paper rubles would hardly buy a few crusts of bread, Lenin found time in the course of his overcrowded 24-hour workday to preach his dream of an electrified Russia, and he even drafted the foremost engineering authorities of the country to produce the most ambitious plans for federal superpower development that Europe had ever seen. Matter-of-fact persons indulged in considerable ribaldry about the little visionary in the Kremlin and his paper electrification.

Now Lenin lies dead under the Kremlin wall these several years, but his dream is assuming reality. On the peat fields of Moscow province, along the racing Volkhov east of Leningrad, in the coal basin of the Don, on the marshes of Balakhna near Nizhni-Novgorod, in the Caucasus, in a half dozen other places where before was nothing, great regional power-plants of concrete and steel have risen. The other day news dispatches from Moscow set forth that Hugh L. Cooper, whose designs have added more than 1,500,000 kilowatts to America's hydroelectric-power development, was returning to the United States to lay before his financial associates the terms of a concession from the Soviet Government for the construction on the Dnieper River, in Soviet Ukraine, of the most powerful hydroelectric development yet attempted in Europe.

The power plant which is the center of this plan is to have an ultimate capacity of 455,000 kilowatts. It will feed power to a good part of the southern mining district of the Soviet Union, which furnishes 75 per cent of the coal mined in Russia, 70 per cent of the iron, and a large proportion of the manganese, and also contains heavily developed chemical and dye industries. The project involves collateral plans for the irrigation of four and a half million acres and the construction of a considerable system of inland waterways. The cost will be $75,000,000. Colonel Cooper was attracted to the plan during the visit of a commission of five hydroelectric engineers from the Soviet Union last spring. They came primarily to study the larger power developments of the United States, but incidentally they carried in their briefcases the plans for the Dnieper project, so fully worked out that they commanded the high admiration of some of our foremost hydroelectric authorities.

The Dnieper project, still in the paper stage, is but one link in the superpower chain already under way in the Soviet Union. The building began in the days when the country was still struggling with starvation. In 1917 Russian electric-power stations engaged in general public service had a total capacity of 396,000 kilowatts. Factory plants and others not in general public service provided about a million kilowatts more. In all Russia there was only one plant rated as high as 20,000 kilowatts. By the close of this year plants engaged in general public service will be producing close to a million kilowatts, an increase of 150 per cent. Virtually all this gain has been made in the past three years, during which time the federal Government has squeezed $100,000,000 out of its budgets for superpower construction. The budget for the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1926, appropriates nearly $50,000,000 more. During the next two years ten existing superpower plants will have their power capacities increased by 260,000 kilowatts, and three new stations will add another 70,000 kilowatts. This is exclusive of the Dnieper plant. Last year electric power consumption in the Soviet Union reached 3,000,000,000 kilowatt hours, and per capita consumption in Moscow was 202 kilowatt hours or 225 per cent of the pre-war figure.

Thus Lenin's dream gathers momentum as one by one the dark Russian villages blaze into sudden light. Increasing orders for turbines and generators and other high-power electric apparatus flow to London and Berlin and Prague. The consuls and commercial agents from these capitals in Moscow miss no tricks in keeping in advance of this lucrative business—while members of our hard-headed "business administration" in Washington still peer timidly under their beds for synthetic bolsheviks invented during the merry days of Palmer and Daugherty to distract public attention, while they try to sell Muscle Shoals and other American power projects to gentlemen whose primary interest is to make money out of them.

Bad Manners at Geneva

VISCOUNT CECIL was about to deliver a glowing tribute to the new spirit of peace which had cast such a radiant glow over the September sessions of the League Assembly when the Chinese delegate arose. He asked permission to speak four minutes, obtained it, began with the smiling announcement that the Chinese Government intended to present the League with a Chinese encyclopedia, and then, while the delegates were still beaming with appreciation, proceeded to inform the League of the kind of peace waged by Viscount Cecil's Government on the Yangtze River in the heart of China.

> On July 9 and August 2 and 29 [he said] several British merchant ships sailed up the Yangtze River at full speed, swamping a number of native boats, drowning more than 100 passengers, soldiers, and military officers, and destroying much merchandise.
>
> When the authorities sought to make inquiry a British cruiser appeared and interfered. It threatened the villagers on both shores with cannon. The Chinese authorities were obliged to detain the British merchant vessels, taking the matter up with the British consul at Chungking.
>
> Unfortunately, before the matter was settled, British cruisers arrived at Wanhsien, September 5, and opened fire on the town, destroying a thousand houses, killing a thousand civilians, and a hundred gendarmerie. . . .
>
> The incident has assumed international importance, threatening the peace of the Far East. Consequently I am making the facts known to the Assembly.

The Chinese delegate sat down. Viscount Cecil arose. "In heated terms" he denounced "this strange course of procedure." The Chinese delegate, it seems, should have informed the British of his intentions beforehand. Chao Hsin-chu's course was "undiplomatic." Scant attention was paid by Viscount Cecil or by the assembled delegates to the questions, What had been done on the Yangtze, what could be done to prevent further slaughter, whether the prevailing state of "peace" in the Far East was in fact menaced. The Geneva state of mind was probably accurately described by the serious correspondent of the New York Times who reported that > There is no question in the mind of anybody that the Chinese have the right to present to the League any situation which they consider dangerous to peace. But it is considered bad judgment on their part to break the rules of the Assembly and beg four minutes' time on the agenda immediately before the British delegate's reading of a carefully prepared statement on disarmament and make a discourse on a matter which they do not intend to follow up. The prestige of Chao is held to be irreparably ruined.

And there you have the vice of the Anglo-Saxon mind in a nutshell. It does not matter what one says or does, but one must do it in the best form and according to the international book of etiquette.

Chao Hsin-chu was right, we believe, in shocking Geneva. The world needs a little shock if it is not to suffer a big shock in China. When an American tourist is killed by Mexican bandits in the hills of Morelos, it is front-page news; when the fact leaks out that an American explorer was killed by Eskimos ten years ago, that is worth a three-column head on the front page; when seven Englishmen are killed in a battle in which a thousand Chinese are slaughtered, the Englishmen's death is cabled round the world while the murder of the Chinese remains hidden in the obscurity of the back pages until an undiplomatic Chao Hsin-chu, egged on to his violation of the rules of etiquette by an excited delegation of young Chinese students, interrupts the pacific benisons of Viscount Cecil with a warning that the East is angry.

America in particular needs a shock. We bask in the comfortable belief that we are conciliating China while the Navy Department orders more and more warships to Hankow, 600 miles up the Yangtze, where the anti-foreign feeling is today at the boiling-point. An international navy is gradually assembling at that center of trouble, and the official American policy of cooperating with the alien Powers in China means that any trouble between British or Japanese and Chinese may readily be transformed into trouble for America too. According to recent reports the Japanese now have two cruisers, two torpedo-boat destroyers, and nine gunboats in the Yangtze; the British, in addition to their regular flotilla, have detached twelve warships from the Mediterranean fleet and sent them steaming for China, as if determined upon trouble; our own gunboat Pigeon was fired upon, with three American sailors wounded, when passing Hanyang, above Hankow, on September 19; two additional destroyers, the Truxton and the Peary, reached Hankow on September 24, escorted through the danger zone by the destroyers Pillsbury and Ford; and the American merchant ships, persisting in the attempt to do business as usual at whatever human cost, have drawn fire in the Upper Yangtze, with some casualties among the Chinese crews. And this international naval concentration, be it remembered, will, whatever its official excuse, be regarded by the Chinese as in support of the British demand for redress for the seven British "heroes" killed at Wanhsien, where British guns razed a thousand Chinese homes and mowed down men, women, and children alike!

What is the League of Nations for, if not to hear such protests as that of Chao Hsin-chu? What does diplomatic procedure mean if it closes the ears of the world to news of the bitterness which is brewing in China? The menace of an inter-continental war, of a gigantic inter-race conflict is no longer the plaything of wild dreamers; it is being driven closer to reality every time the Western Powers unite to force awakening China to her official knees. China is no longer the China of Boxer days, or even of the days of the Washington Conference. It is a nation of four hundred million people, torn by civil wars in the course of which it has been learning to fight, and embittered by decades of white arrogance.

The days of the Western flotillas in the Yangtze River are numbered; for the new China will not tolerate such intrusions of Western power into the heart of the nation. Hankow has just been taken by Chiang Kai-shek, generalissimo of the forces of the Nationalist Government of Canton, and his Southern army is winning new victories in every direction. Part of its success is no doubt attributable to its superior military training; most of it is due to the fact that it is the one army in China which is loyal not to an individual but to a cause. The Canton Government has for a year and a quarter maintained a boycott of British goods in the rich markets of South China and has sapped the strength of the British merchant fortress of Hongkong: it sweeps northward because it has expressed the new national pride and the Chinese people recognize in it a loyalty to China which they cannot find in the armies subsidized by Britain and by Japan. Let America, before she permits herself to be drawn into the coming conflict, profit by the warning of Chao Hsin-chu. The first step is to withdraw our navy from the Yangtze.

China seems a remote land of perfumed romance, less important to us than the Macedonian minorities or the Polish corridor. Geneva—and the rest of us—may wake up soon to discover that while studying etiquette it neglected something more important—the peace of the world.

The Fake of the Century

IT was advertised by the daily newspapers, without charge, as "the fight of the century." The New York Evening Post, heir to the journalistic ideals of Alexander Hamilton, William Cullen Bryant, Henry Villard, and Carl Schurz, sent nine sport "experts," artists, and feature writers to report the stupendous event. The New York Times (which had leased a house for its staff, under a special city editor, to cover the Hall-Mills murder) was not to be outdone; it sent ten men, one of them an outsider hired for the emergency. The other papers displayed similar zeal and initiative. The World War was not so thoroughly reported, because, apparently, it was not "the fight of the century." The Dempsey-Tunney bout was that.

The New York World got out a "fight extra," so labeled in 60-point type, about this commercial event. It devoted to it five pages and an editorial—it sent up "huzzas for the new champion," although the "likable" and "picturesque" Dempsey had "become a sort of legend with us, a superhuman colossus of brawn." The World would refuse its news columns to any other commercial enterprise. George Ed Smith paid a pretty penny for the radio rights, as a means of advertising the Royal Typewriter; yet neither Heywood Broun nor Ringside Lardner nor Hype Igoe nor Dudley Nichols nor Benny Leonard nor Gertrude Lynahan nor George Daley nor any of the anonymous drudges who helped these luminaries describe the fight for the World gave the Royal Typewriter as much as a line. The Times devoted 5,000 words to a supposedly verbatim report of the radio account, without mentioning George Ed Smith, whose money paid to get the account into the Times office.

Yet the newspapers helped Tex Rickard sell to a gullible public for two million dollars a thirty-minute exhibition of inefficiency by "the Manassa Mauler." They spoke of Rickard in terms of adulation not unmixed with awe. He was "the master mind," the "greatest fight promoter," as the World said under an eight-column headline. The Herald Tribune joined the chorus. The others told us to what a high plane this merchant of uppercuts had brought his business. All announced, a week before the fight, that Dempsey himself was unable to buy seats for his friends, when, as a cub reporter could have learned had he wished, there were thousands of seats for sale up to the last moment. These included what Rickard called "ringside" places, forty rows from the arena. On the day of the fight speculators were hawking tickets on the streets of Philadelphia, some at a discount, and there were plenty of others to be had at the box office.

How does such a merchant get free space in the newspapers? The Times, for instance, boasts of its scrupulous supervision over its paid advertising. It printed the story about Dempsey's inability to buy seats; why is it less meticulous about such free—and false—advertising? The answer may lie in the fact that Rickard stages occasions which make possible a huge temporary factitious inflation of circulation. The newspapers promote Rickard's promotions in order to promote their own sales, whereby they may fatten their charges for paid advertising.

In reporting the fight the Times was not perceptibly worse or better than other papers, including the picture tabloids. But it has emitted recently such a vigorous blast about its preeminence as an impresario of real news that it has earned the right to special attention. Its first page told us that Tunney flew to the match in an airplane; a similar headline noted that the Geneva conference had accepted, with reservations, the American reservations on entering the World Court. Its first page reported with equal conscientiousness the fact that Tunney wore a "scarlet-trimmed blue dressing-gown" and that the loss from the Florida storm was $165,000,000. The main headline upon the fight consists of three eight-column "banner" lines; when the armistice was signed, ending the World War, on the same day that Berlin was seized by revolutionists and the Kaiser fled to Holland, the Times gave four eight-column "banners" to these world-shaking events—one more line than to the prize-fight. Such is the pattern held up by our Petronius of the press.

We do not regard prize-fighting as more brutalizing, say, than football. Probably both should be reported within reasonable bounds. But when we find choice first-page space being given over to worshipful drivel about biceps and dressing-gowns, when newspapers lend themselves unanimously to plain fakery, they deepen the distrust and suspicion of the press already dangerously prevalent.

Crime and Punishment

HE had always been a good son, a faithful student, a hard worker—the judge said as much at the trial. He owed his firm $168—not a sum to set empires shaking; he was such an utter fool as to try to repair his losses by holding up cheap restaurants in the middle of the night. Seven hold-ups; an old army pistol—though "he wouldn't ever have shot it at anybody"; proceeds, less than a hundred dollars. He was to have been married on September 29; instead, at the age of twenty-three, he is in Sing Sing, serving the first days of a sentence of twenty-five to forty years in prison! And the republic is saved from another predatory and rapacious character.

The judge who pronounced this cruel sentence was within his legal rights. The new Baumes law permits heavy penalties for robbery with a pistol. Under the same law one of the "cry-baby bandits," who have figured so largely in the New York newspaper headlines, is now serving a term of twenty-five years, at the termination of which he will begin a life term, and the other five will complete terms of seventeen and one-half to thirty-five years and then begin additional sentences of from forty years to life.

Grotesque—except that these years have to do with human beings; incredible—except to the men who will watch the days turn past with the slowness of prison days; those fortunate enough to be out of jail will never see and probably never give a thought to the men inside. They will pay board for them, to be sure; but that burden on the taxpayer will be absorbed along with all the other burdens. And the republic, we repeat, will be preserved, because these desperate and bloodthirsty men are not at large.

The imposition of sentences like these plainly shows that the "crime-wave" stories and the blaring editorials in the newspapers charging the courts with laxity are getting on the nerves of the judges and legislators. And when the "crime wave" is not checked by sending young criminals to prison for life, as it assuredly will not be, there is no telling what lengths fear for their jobs and perhaps also honest concern for the safety of the commonwealth will drive our worthy law-enforcers. A few months ago Judge Mancuso, who has done his share of sentencing, discovered a panacea that would cure banditry forever. Let every citizen be armed, said this second Solomon, and we shall have no more crime. Without in the least intending to do so, His Honor put his finger square on one of the chief causes of lawlessness. Let every policeman be *dis*armed, and let no citizen find it possible to purchase a revolver, with or without a license, and there is no doubt that the number of hold-ups and murders will be more than cut in half. To enter a shop, demand the contents of the cash register, and depart unscathed with the spoils has become an easy matter—when done at the point of a pistol. Unarmed, how many "bandits" would risk the chance of a broken head for a few dollars? The armed man has the bravery of a coward; and to resist him is as foolhardy as it is dangerous. But the policeman carries a gun too. The robber feels obliged to be at least as well protected as his most persistent enemy. There would still be a few automobile thieves who would get away because the policeman could not shoot at them; but fewer innocent bystanders would be the victims of arguments between criminals and the police, fewer policemen would be killed in the line of duty, fewer members of a gang sent to the electric chair because one of them had made a fatal mistake with a gun.

There is, of course, another side to the business of sentencing men to jail. A few years ago there was a simple formula for dealing with criminals: steal a loaf of bread and you were hanged; steal a kingdom and you lived to enjoy the spoils. Nor is this so far from true today. The unfortunate young man whose seven hold-ups netted him less than a hundred dollars will spend half a lifetime behind bars; the New York milk inspector who accepted a bribe of $2,000 and permitted a shipment of untested cream to be admitted to the city and sold to unsuspecting customers will languish in Sing Sing for from three and one-half to ten years. Of the two, which did more harm, which committed the greater crime? Further, the gentlemen high in the offices of the government who were clever enough to give away hundreds of millions of dollars of government property—Teapot Dome, for example—far from being in jail, are enjoying life as much as the proceeds from their generosity permits them to do. Foolish bandits, who do not recognize these things. There are those, of course, who maintain that all "bandits" are foolish—that they are even a little defective mentally. That bad food and poor surroundings and a crowded home and an insufficient education and no training for any sort of honest living make "bandits" as surely as stables make flies. But these persons are doubtless cranks. It is as plain as the nose on your face that what we want is to treat criminals rough; then we won't have any more criminals.

At least we are having ample opportunity to test this splendid theory.

Taking Life Seriously

ENGLAND takes its Gilbert and Sullivan seriously. Forty years have made "The Mikado" as sacred as Parliament or Ale, and when a new production, costumed in novel fashion, opened recently at the Princess Theater, London, the sounder members of the audience raised horrified hands to heaven and asked what the world was coming to. A few light-minded persons pointed out that the piece was not, in itself, marked by ethnological exactitude and that the original costumes treated the Japanese mode with some freedom, but those who had the good of England at heart refused to be distracted by the impertinence of the giddy. Time makes even jokes solemn, and your true conservative likes to know where he is even when he laughs. Is it unreasonable to suppose, they seem to feel, that he who would approve a break with the tradition of "The Mikado" would look with favor upon revolution in church and state as well? Only a few weeks ago the newspapers seriously discussed a mad proposal that the rules of cricket be modified, and who could doubt that these two phenomena were inspired by the same subterranean intrigues? Open treason can be seen and dealt with; it is in those insidious influences which sap the spiritual foundation of a nation's greatness that the real danger lies. What would the outward forms of Parliament and navy avail an England deprived of her beer and beef, vulgarized by a too American cricket, and corrupted by a Gilbert whom impious hands had perverted? As Lady Bracknell once remarked, "It reminds one of the worst excesses of the French Revolution, and everybody knows what that unfortunate movement led to."

Since we in these United States have fewer traditions we are less watchful of them, but in other respects we are quite as keen-eyed as our brothers across the sea. Sooner or later some Japanese-American Chamber of Commerce or some League of the Loyal Sons of Nippon will, doubtless, enter a righteous protest against the affront which the piece must cause to every right-thinking member of that race. Already certain Jews have demanded that Shylock be banished from the stage, and ministers throughout the length and breadth of the land have protested—not always in vain—against the insult hurled at them by the play "Rain." The Mikado is a figure sanctified by religious as well as political affections and no Lord High Executioner ever comported himself in a manner even faintly like that suggested in the play. In a country as sensitive as ours has come to be, should such a wanton affront to the feelings of a sister nation be permitted? How would you feel, the Legion might inquire, if some dark-skinned man should make equally free with figures sacred to us—with Mr. Bryan, say, or Mr. Coolidge? Doubtless, frivolity and cynicism might make even them seem, to people devoid of reverence and ignorant of the facts, ridiculous or fantastic.

My Black Brother Mafeking

By WYNANT DAVIS HUBBARD

"HOW old are you, Mafeking?"

"Inkos?"

"How many Christmases have you?"

"I know not, Inkos. My father is so young he kills elephants for Letia. I cannot eat whole grain; I have no teeth. My son has white hair. I am an old man."

As a matter of fact, Mafeking was probably about forty-five years old. He was a magnificent Negro, chest like a bull, small hips, straight legs. He stood about five feet ten. On his face he had tattooed spearheads in blue ink. Down his nose ran a straight line of navy blue. For over a year he had been my chief hunter.

It seems longer, but it was a little over a year ago that I hired him. He had been working for a man on the next farm to mine at Tara in Northern Rhodesia. On a Sunday afternoon Mafeking came down to my house with several Barotse natives and danced. I have never seen anything like it before or since. It was a pantomime. The story of an old woman left alone with a young child. As the giant Negro revolved and danced it was clear even to me that the old woman was alone, that she hunted and dug roots for the child, brought them out and after pounding them made a gruel for the child which kept it alive. The sobbing child quieted down. The old woman, shriveled and worn, gazed at the fire. Then she too lay down. Perhaps it was the soft singing of the natives and the haunting music of the n'piras, but I could see it all. Even the little fire glowed before my eye. Such was the dance of Mafeking, the greatest hunter I have known.

We moved to Choma in October. It was a farming community of about thirty souls, counting the women and all the children. Game is scarce and wild close in, but Mafeking averaged three duiker antelope a week. He was so regular that we counted on his meat as on a store.

A year later I decided to make a trip into Portuguese East Africa. We were to go from Choma to Shamwa in Southern Rhodesia by rail. From there it was a four-hundred-mile walk overland to the Ruia River. I wanted to take some of my old natives with me as cooks, nurse-boys, trackers, and hunters. The problem was to sort out the very best. Of all the sixty then working for me, only a dozen were unsuited for the trip. But they all wanted to go. I could not afford to pay the railway fare for sixty natives no matter how much I liked them, so I put a proposition up to them. If they wanted to go with me to Portuguese East I would take five of them with me on the railroad and would wait outside Shamwa for any others who would walk overland to join us. It was more than a thousand miles, over mountains and through swamps and across the Zambesi. Sixteen were game and decided to make the trip. Mafeking offered to lead them, so I gave him tobacco and salt to trade for food on the journey, a little money, passes for them all, and my best dogs, including four puppies three weeks old.

Thirty miles outside Shamwa on the Mazoe River we set up camp and prepared to wait. Three weeks passed and I began to wonder if anything had happened. Another week passed and I sent boys up toward the Zambesi to meet Mafeking and tell him I was waiting. They returned without word, but with bad news of the country. Starvation was rampant everywhere. The valley natives were living on wild roots and grass, the old women had been driven out of the villages to fall a prey to hyenas.

I sent Manjineera into Shawma with telegrams to all the Native Commissioners to be on the lookout for sixteen natives. I guaranteed to pay any money which might be advanced to Mafeking to help him along. Still I had no word.

Then one day a telegram came telling me that my boys had turned up in Sinoia, sixty miles away. They had been told where I was and sent on. I was jubilant. My faith had not been misplaced. They were coming. How I needed them. Boys for safari work were hard to get and time was pressing. Soon the season of the year when water was scarce would be with us. The boys' arrival would mean that we could start. Five slow days dragged past. Then one afternoon Tickie rushed to the tent. "Inkos, Inkos, they are coming."

He did not need to tell me who. I dropped my work and rushed out. There down the dusty lumber trail came a line of laden natives. But they were not singing. Something was the matter. There was a droop to the shoulders and a weariness about them I never associate with my Barotse. Silently they filed into camp and stood in front of me. Tears coursed down my cheeks. I understood. Dilated eyes stared at me from shrunken and fallen cheeks. My husky boys had vanished. Instead, sixteen emaciated, trembling natives wearily slung their loads from blistered, bleeding shoulders and without a word turned toward the camp. There were five dogs left. Only the strongest had survived that trip. Skin and bones were all that were left. Then a little crate caught my eye. I walked over. Two of the puppies! Mewing and whimpering they cuddled against each other in a vain effort to find food and comfort. I let them out. They could not walk. I looked at the other bundle, nothing but mats. Where were all the blankets, the extra coats, the calabashes which I knew the boys possessed?

"Inkos, we have arrived."

It was Mafeking. What a world of weariness and patience in his voice! A lump rose in my throat. His coat no longer seemed to be bursting at the seams. What was left of it hung in ribbons on a frame gaunt with hunger. Where were those tremendous shoulders I had so often envied? His hands trembled as he played with the battered remnants of a sun-helmet. I spoke to him.

"I have looked for you and looked for you. It is good that you have come. I have shot a sable. There are no rations tonight. Tell the boys to take all the meal and meat they want."

"Thank you, Inkos."

That would have been all, but I called them up in the evening and listened to Mafeking's story.

"Inkos, it was far, it was very far. When you had gone Bwana Stanley took away all the tobacco and salt which you had given us for food on the road. He said we were thieves. He said that we would not come to you."

"What? Bwana Stanley took all the n'pasha I gave you? What was the trouble?"

"There was no trouble, Inkos. He said we had stolen, so he took it for his store."

"What did you do?"

"We came. At Shamaruba we killed an ox. It was one of nine, very fat. We walked and we walked. The mountains, we climbed like this. (Holding his arms straight in the air.) From the top we saw the Zambesi. Six days later we reached the water. There was no food. All the men were in the bush looking for leaves to eat. At a village two handfuls of meal for a ten shilling blanket."

"Did you go to Bunybunyama?"

"Indeed, Inkos. It is not good there. Lions walk in the paths. Elephants walk everywhere. All the time you see elephants and buffalo. It is very hot. It is not a good place."

"How did you cross the Zambesi?"

"A boy brought us over in a dug-out. Very expensive. One boy one shilling. This side no food. We walked and we walked. No food. We ate grass. For ten days we ate grass and water. Two dogs died there. All our blankets were gone. We solu them all. We arrived at Sinoia. We told the Bwana we wanted food. We worked in the stable. For one day's work we got one cup of meal."

"Did you tell the Bwana you were my boys? I beat on the wire and spoke to him. He knew that you were coming."

"He told us that you were far, that it would be better to work at Sinoia. Another Bwana came and offered us a pound a month to work for him. He wanted Barotse. He told us that you would not wait for us."

"Why did you not work for him? I can only pay you ten shillings?"

"Inkos, you are our father. We like you. We have stayed a long time with you. We are your boys."

"How long did you stay at Sinoia?"

"Four suns. Then we came to Shamba. We went to the station. The Bwana told us that you had taken a wagon and gone to the Mazoe. He did not know that you had stayed. Perhaps you had gone again."

"Why did you not go to the Native Commissioner?"

"We said perhaps he would want us to work in the mine. We spoke with the natives. One told us that Manjineera had come for the post two days before. We knew then that you were waiting, so we came here."

"Tomorrow come back. If you have sold a blanket for meal, I will give one to replace it. If you have sold a shirt, I will give a shirt. If you have sold money, I will give money. Also tomorrow I will pay you. You have done well. You are indeed my brother."

A week later we were ready to start on our long overland journey. The Barotse had recovered some of their strength. It had been a hard spot in which to collect natives to carry. We had only some sixty-odd all told. They were the riff-raff of the country. Scoundrels and loafers, too bad or too well known to get work in the mines. But I knew that with the Barotse as a special guard and driving force the safari would go. The Barotse are well known for their habit of strangling men until their eyes pop out. All of my men were huge. They were devoted and I knew that rather than see me go under they would die themselves.

It was a terrible trip. The country was stony and impossible. The natives were unfriendly. When we arrived at a village the women hid the waterholes and would sell us water only at the enormous price of a yard of calico for one pot, three-quarters full. One night we tried to best them. We located the water, but it was the cattle drinking-pool. We shared it with them. It tasted awful. It smelled worse, but when boiled up with tea we made believe and gulped it down. Food was very hard to get and when obtainable ruinous in price. At one village I forced a woman at the point of a pistol to go into her hut and bring out the meal I needed so badly. At the Portuguese border we entered a country so wild and so little known that white men we met later would not believe we had traversed it.

The first night across the border we camped at a village at the edge of the Luia River. During the night the crash of elephants pulling down trees resounded on all sides. A lion roared. Leopards were coughing and grunting in the reed. It was a wonderful spot for game. So I decided to spend a day and see if we couldn't shoot meat to trade for meal. Our cash was giving out, our cloth had long ago gone. Mafeking went one way, I went another, and scattered over the rest of the country was every native who claimed he could handle a gun. I hunted all morning. Buffalo were numerous. I plugged at them until about one o'clock. Then the sun hit me and I collapsed. Mafeking went down to water and met five lions, but you can't eat lion, so he didn't shoot. He too spent all his time after buffalo. They were too cute for him. The only man to get anything among all the eight of us was Sieve. He shot a waterbuck cow. I tried to trade some of it for meal, but the head man of the village would have none of it. Among sixty natives an antelope weighing four hundred pounds doesn't go far. We divided it as equally as we could. Even the skin was cut up into strips and handed out. The boys went off. There was an undercurrent of mutiny in the air. I called up the head man again.

"What do you want for your meal? I have sugar, that I will sell you."

"Inkos, the women will not sell. They have not enough. Perhaps if the Inkos had cloth they would sell a little."

I conferred with my wife. Cloth? We had no cloth. We had sold the last of it days before, but there were sheets. Good linen sheets. We tore them up and sold them at the price we would sell the cheapest calico. For them we got a little meal. I was trying again to sell the sugar, but Shilling, one of the Barotse, heard me.

"Inkos, don't sell that sugar."

"But, Shilling, perhaps I can get meal for you. I have no more cloth. There is very little money."

"It does not matter, Inkos. If we have no food we die. But it doesn't matter. We are black boys. The Inkos and the Missus and the little Bosses must not die." The old man drove off the head boy and returned to his fire.

I was sitting in my deck chair wondering what to do. Behind me in the two tents slept my two little boys, one-and-a-half and three years old. My wife was sitting on her bed. On one side of the huge fire were grouped my twenty-one Barotse. Suddenly one of the forty natives got up and coming over stood in front of me.

"Inkos, I want to leave."

"What is the trouble?" I asked wearily.

"There is no food. It is far to Tete. There are many lions on the road. I do not know these natives. Perhaps they will kill me on my return."

"Pocket, I cannot keep you, I am too tired to give you a hiding. Go."

He started toward the gate leading out of the little inclosure of the camp. No sooner had he disappeared into the darkness than I heard a yell. Back through the gate Pocket came flying. After him were Saiman, my huge animal tamer, and Manjineera, my ex-cannibal gun-bearer. They caught him and dragged him in front of me.

"Inkos, did you tell this baboon, this son of a hyena, that he could leave?"

"Yes. He gives so much trouble that it isn't worth while to beat him. I threw him out."

All the natives had jumped to their feet. They crowded around me in a menacing circle. I heard murmurs about hunger, the lack of meal, the distance to Tete, and threats that all forty would decamp. I looked at my Barotse. They stood glowering and sullen behind me. Pocket broke away from his captors and made a dash for the door. Pandemonium broke loose. Jack grabbed a stone as big as his head and nearly broke the boy's arm as he dodged out the gate. Manjineera threw a knobkerrie and caught him square in the back. Down he went and Manjineera, pouncing on him, proceeded to beat him up. That was the signal. The forty natives rushed us. Into them piled the Barotse with knobkerries, spears, sticks, stones, kettles, picks, anything they could use as a weapon. It was a savage free-for-all. Into the fire they milled, yelling and cursing. I piled into it. Somebody hit me on the jaw. I found Johnnie and Peter strangling a native against one of the huts. I separated them, not forgetting to land the mutineer a hearty wallop of my own in the process. Suddenly there was quiet. The forty natives cowered, beaten, in a corner. In front of them stood Mafeking. He held up his hand.

"Baboons, I, Mafeking, Mafeking the Barotse, speak to you. Do you want to leave our Boss, our Missus, the little Bosses alone? Who is going to carry the packs which you drop? Is it that you have no food that you would do this? Listen, Mafeking, the Barotse, talks to you. I have not known the Boss for a long time. One year only have I worked for him. But he has been my brother. When I was sick he gave me medicine. When I needed money for my hut tax he gave me money. When I wanted food he gave me food. Then he left the place where we were working. He said to me, 'Mafeking, I give you my dogs, and I give you these sixteen boys. Bring them to me at Shamwa. I will wait for you there.' Two months we walked on the road. We ate grass like cattle. The dogs died. A Bwana offered us a pound to work for him. The big chief in the Boma asked us 'Why is it that you walk so far to find this white man? Why do you not work here, where food is plentiful?' We told him. Our Boss is not like other men: he is our brother. He waits for us at Shamwa. We must go. You know the Barotse. The men of Lewanika have never been beaten in battle. I, Mafeking, hunter for Lewanika, tell you that if you desert our Boss we will strangle you until your eyes pop out. We, the Barotse, say this."

There was dead silence for a few minutes; then Sieve, the leader of the mutiny, stood up.

"Inkos, we have made a mistake. We will work."

It was over. The next morning the beds were taken apart, the tents rolled up, and the horses loaded quicker than ever before. We snapped out of camp and made forty miles before sunset. Such a man was my black brother Mafeking.

George Washington—The Image and the Man

By W. E. WOODWARD*

II. Gunpowder and Petticoats

WASHINGTON'S defeat and the French occupation of the Ohio territory had stirred the British Government to action. They had resolved on a general war with France—the skirmish at Fort Necessity was looked upon as merely an impromptu clash—and Braddock's landing at Alexandria with two half-regiments was the first move.

* * * * *

To this Alexandria camp came Colonel George Washington, dining with the officers, dancing at the balls, and looking with a wistful eye at the preparations.

He had left the service the year before because of an order issued by the British War Office to the effect that provincial officers, of whatever rank, should be subordinated to any officer holding a King's commission. It was not clever of the King's government to have done that—but the King's government was not clever in several other ways.

"You make mention," Washington wrote to a colonial official, "of my continuing in the service, and retaining my colonel's commission. This idea has filled me with surprise; for, if you think me capable of holding a commission that has neither rank nor emolument annexed to it, you must entertain a very contemptible opinion of my weakness, and believe me to be more empty than the commission itself. . . . Yet my inclinations are strongly bent to arms."

There can be no doubt that he wanted to take a part in these military operations, but his desire to preserve his dignity was even greater than his martial ardor.

Braddock's thinking was a sort of mental operation by which several antecedent prejudices were combined to form a new prejudice. He thought about colonial soldiers and had a boundless contempt for them. Nevertheless, some appreciation of Washington's soldierly qualities trickled through his airtight mind and he invited him to join the expedition. Braddock had no authority to give a commission higher than that of a captain, and Washington insisted on being a colonel or nothing. The matter was finally settled by Braddock making Washington his personal aide-de-camp. In this position he was outside the military hierarchy and was called colonel by courtesy.

* * * * *

On May 14, 1755, he wrote to Mrs. Sally Fairfax from Fort Cumberland, where Braddock's column was resting on its way to Fort Duquesne, that he has found out why

*This is the second of three instalments from the book "George Washington—The Image and the Man," to be published by Boni and Liveright on October 15. A final instalment will appear next week.

Mrs. Wardrope is a favorite with the general. The cause of the fascination she exercises, he assures his correspondent, is "nothing less than a present of delicious cake and potted wood-cocks."

Mrs. Fairfax seems not to have replied to this letter, but in June Washington takes his pen in hand again, and says to Mrs. Sally:

> Dear Madam: When I had the happiness to see you last you expressed an inclination to be informed of my safe arrival in camp with the Charge that was intrusted to my care [he means the army's pay, which he conveyed to Fort Cumberland], but at the same time desired it might be communicated in a letter to somebody of your acquaintance.

How stilted and formal these Virginia gentlefolk were in their philandering! Wants to hear from him, but pretends that she wants him to write, not to her, but to somebody of her acquaintance. Of course, she was a married woman—and, in that day, married women were not supposed to correspond with young men.

> This I took as a gentle rebuke and a polite manner of forbidding my corresponding with you; and conceive this opinion is not illy founded when I reflect that I have hitherto found it impracticable to engage one moment of your attention.

A mere form of speech; he has known her very well for seven years.

> If I am right in this, I hope you will excuse the present presumption and lay the imputation to elateness at my successful arrival. If, on the contrary, these are fearful apprehensions only, how easy it is to remove my suspicions, enliven my spirits, and make me happier than the day is long by honouring me with a correspondence which you did once partly promise to do. . . .

Mrs. Sally Fairfax was a tall, handsome brunette, and is said to have been very attractive. There is some faint reason to believe that she encouraged Washington to read books, and that she talked to him on the subjects which are of interest to cultured people.

He acted occasionally in amateur plays, in which she also appeared. Mrs. Fairfax was probably a woman of virtue, though the extremely slippery nature of this quality always gives it an air of uncertainty. I think that Washington had been in love with her from the time he first met her, but had never told her so. She was his friend's wife; and that alone, unless I am greatly in error as to his character, would have prevented him from revealing his affection in any definite manner.

In those days men only were supposed to possess individuality or to have desires. Men owned their wives; and to be very friendly with another man's wife was not only bad morals but also bad manners.

* * * * *

Before Braddock had left England somebody in London had written to Lord Fairfax, describing Braddock as a general devoid of "both fear and common sense." By the time the expedition had reached Will's Creek—then renamed Fort Cumberland—the colonial officers with the column realized vividly that the common-sense part of this observation was true. They were soon to learn that the fear part was equally accurate.

* * * * *

On July 9, 1755, the first column had crossed the Monongahela, and was proceeding briskly toward Fort Duquesne, which was about ten miles away. General Gage —then a colonel—whom we shall see twenty years later as Washington's adversary on the hills of Boston, was in command of the regiment in front. With the column there was another British officer, Horatio Gates, a red-faced captain, who was destined to rise to eminence in the continental army, and to become Washington's secret enemy.

The route lay through a beautiful country. Beautiful then, but not so beautiful now, for the steel-manufacturing town of Braddock is built on the spot. In winter the bare trees stood on the hilltops against the cold sky like sharp visual music, but on this July day there were no bare trees. Summer poured from the hills in wind-rippled cascades of green. A sea of primeval silence. . . .

* * * * *

Platoons load and fire! Fire at what? At the smiling green woods, still smiling, with the white smoke drifting lazily over the tree tops. Here and there among the leaves appears a painted Indian face or a white French one, but only for a flash, like people peeping from windows.

Down the road there is a swirl of men and plunging cattle . . . and horsemen riding rapidly. General Braddock is coming up . . . and at his side rides Colonel Washington, lean and gaunt, sitting on a pillow instead of a saddle. He has been ill for days, laid up with a fever, and brought along in a covered wagon.

A river of panic flows through the noise and smoke. . . .

But look at the Virginians! They have forgotten all they learned in the instruction camp at Alexandria. Every man of them has left the ranks and is sneaking behind a tree or a rock, or running bent-over along the ground, stalking something in the woods, like a weasel hunter.

General Braddock rides among the Virginians, striking them with his sword, and shouting that they are a disgrace to the British service. He orders them to stand up in the open and fight like white men. They do not pay any attention to him; nobody pays any attention to him. He is everywhere in the confusion of the fight, shouting something or other. A man devoid of both fear and common sense.

Now Colonel Washington shines. He is also without fear, but not without common sense. Of that valuable commodity he and the Virginians appear to possess a monopoly on this occasion. Washington keeps the Virginians in hand. They hold back the enemy while the wreck of Braddock's army races to safety.

A target for a hundred rifles, Washington remains on horseback . . . but not on the same horse, nor on the saddle-pillow. That first horse has long ago been shot down, and the pillow is lost forever to men and museums. He is on his third horse, and there are four bullet holes in his coat. He is unwounded, though. Those whom the gods have kissed cannot die until their destined course is run.

The road is cluttered with pop-eyed fugitives who have thrown away their arms, with wounded horses, with fear-crazed cattle, with overturned wagons, with bleeding men, trampled upon while they were begging piteously to be taken along.

A British officer, writing of this rout, said "the scene beggar'd description." Very likely it did; but description was not the only thing that was beggared. The opinion of Colonel George Washington as to the valor and steadiness of British troops was reduced to beggary, or worse. A few days after Braddock's defeat, in writing to his mother, he said: "The dastardly behaviour of those they call regulars exposed all others who were inclined to do their duty to almost certain death; and at last, in despite of all the efforts of the officers to the contrary, they ran as sheep pursued by dogs and it was impossible to rally them."

As for General Braddock, he was carried mortally wounded from the field and died two days later. Died of a gun-shot wound and a broken heart, either of which is extremely unpleasant. When both come together they are usually fatal.

* * * * *

When Mary Washington heard of Braddock's disaster she wrote a letter to her son, in which she begged him not to go to the war again. This is his reply:

> Honoured Madam: If it is in my power to avoid going to the Ohio again, I shall; but if the command is pressed upon me, by the general voice of the country, and offered upon such terms as cannot be objected against, it would reflect dishonour upon me to refuse; and that, I am sure must or ought to give you greater uneasiness, than my going in an honourable command, for upon no other terms I will accept of it. At present I have no other proposals made to me, nor have I any advice of such an intention, except from private hands.

He seems to be addressing a public meeting—"general voice"—"command is pressed upon me"—"reflect dishonour"—"upon no other terms."

His letter is naturally supposed to be intimate and confidential—the letter from a son to his mother—but he does not give the name of the person or persons who have told him that he might be appointed to the command.

Several lines above he hands his mother a reproof. He writes "it would reflect dishonour upon me to refuse; and that must"—

Then he ponders a moment and decides to put in "or ought to give," and underscores the "ought." She may not be uneasy, he thinks, about "dishonour," but he tells her that she ought to be. The haughty tone of this letter reveals quite as much, or more, than its plain, brutal statements. She is informed that she is to have nothing to do with his decision, and he fails to thank her for her solicitude.

It happened that, on the very day he wrote this letter, which was August 14, 1755, he was appointed commander of the Virginia forces, and he rode down to Williamsburg to confer with the governor.

* * * * *

Colonel Daniel Parke Custis, a wealthy gentleman of Virginia, dawdled along as a bachelor until love had ceased to be a passion and had become a duty. Then he married a girl of eighteen, produced two children and died.

The memory of Colonel Custis deserves some recognition from our patriotic societies. He did a great deal for the Father of our Country, though what he did was done unwittingly. Nevertheless, he helped a lot, and we ought not to pass him in silence. He accumulated the largest fortune—or one of the largest—in Virginia, and obligingly departed this life. His widow, thus bereft at an early age, married George Washington and brought her fortune with her.

Washington, who had been one of the Best People all along, as we have seen, thereupon became one of the Very Best People.

Colonel Custis had been dead about a year when his widow—a small, dumpy young woman, with dark eyes and a sharpish nose—went on a visit to her friends the Chamberlaynes, near Williamsburg. This was in May, 1758.

She was a mild young widow, easy to control, and possessing the standard domestic virtues. The streak of romanticism which she had in common with all other women found its solace in the reading of novels about "female jilts" and daring lovers who abducted fabulously attractive young ladies and married them without their consent.

Colonel Washington stopped for a bite to eat at Major Chamberlayne's—everybody was a major or a colonel—and he was in a hurry. That is, he was in as much of a hurry as Virginia courtesy permitted, for he was on his way to Williamsburg to see Governor Fauquier—who was Dinwiddie's successor—about the condition of the troops on the frontier, and he was eager to get back to his military post.

Major Chamberlayne, who had gone on his horse to the ferry to meet Washington, mentioned his guest . . . Mrs. Daniel Parke Custis . . . formerly Miss Martha Dandridge . . . agreeable lady . . . rich . . . slathers of money, slaves, land. . . .

And so, in pleasant converse, they reach the great, airy house, with its cool green blinds softening the hard whiteness of its walls. Under the veranda's tall columns there is a flutter of ladies. Tall leisurely columns and the tall Washington. Servants stand at the horses' heads, and stable boys are astir. Washington hands his riding gloves to his servant; the gravel of the driveway crunches under his feet.

"Mrs. Custis, may I present my friend Colonel Washington"—pause—"of whom you have doubtless heard."

Yes, Mrs. Custis had heard of Colonel Washington. Everybody has. And he had heard of Mrs. Custis, too. In Virginia she was quite as celebrated as George Washington, but in a different way. If he was the bravest man, she was certainly the wealthiest woman.

Only the brave deserve the rich.

It was swift work. The colonel did not go on to Williamsburg that day. The governor and official business had to wait. During the long afternoon he and Mrs. Custis sat alone in a parlor of the Chamberlayne house. Love at first sight.

There had been other suitors for the hand of Martha Custis; there usually are, for the hands of wealthy young widows. Stammering gentlemen, a little dazed by the bright face of gold, falling on their knees, kissing fingertips, reciting memorized speeches, and departing in mawkish confusion.

But Washington was as fearless in the face of gold as he was in the face of danger. The haze of oblivion lies over what he said that afternoon in the Chamberlayne parlor. We do not know what it was, but we know that it was effective.

Next morning he went on to consult the governor. In a few days he started back to the frontier, but stopped for a brief moment at the home of Mrs. Custis, on York River. Immediately thereafter their engagement was announced.

Calles Is Gaining in Mexico

By CARLETON BEALS

[The Nation will shortly print an article from Mexico presenting the impasse that has developed between church and state as seen from the Roman Catholic point of view.]

Mexico City, September 16

THE church-state deadlock continues. The state refuses to recede from its position, declaring that it has no alternative but to enforce the existing laws and decrees. The priests remain on strike, but are not idle. Secret masses, house-to-house canvassing, general soliciting of funds, maintenance of the economic boycott—these are their weapons.

Yet now that the emotional smoke raised by the struggle toward the end of July has been dissipated somewhat and the newspapers of the United States are no longer handling an "atrocity story," some rational attempt can be made to clarify the facts and principles involved in the present impasse.

From the standpoint of mere power, the Government clearly has the upper hand. Never was the Calles Government more firmly in the saddle. The wave of fanatical fervor which the church stirred up that week prior to the "strike" on August 1 did not crystallize into an armed revolt against the civil authorities. Aside from minor demonstrations, the loss of fewer lives than in an ordinary election, the throwing of stones from church roofs by the beatas, the bubble of impending disorders—largely inflated by the American press—completely collapsed. And since that day when the priests walked out, the government seals were placed upon the sacristies, and the churches were placed in the hands of the previously appointed neighborhood committees of ten to be kept open, clean, and illuminated for the faithful, it becomes increasingly evident that the church has lost its one-time hold on the politically organized forces of the country.

Mexico has gone a long way since the bitter wars incident to the Juarez reformation, of which the present crisis is but the epilogue, or even since the days of 1913 when Roman Catholic elements contributed to the armed overthrow of Madero and supported Victoriano Huerta. Nor have the minor measures of the church proved too effective. The economic boycott instituted by the National League of Religious Defense "to paralyze the economic and social life of the country"—while cutting down retail sales of groceries and clothing, in such super-Catholic centers as Guadalajara, nearly 50 per cent—has been largely abortive. Thirteen million people in Mexico have been obliged—partly because of the past attitude of the church—to observe a luxury boycott for four centuries. Three heads of large department stores in Mexico City have informed me that their sales for several weeks fell off about 20 per cent, due, in part, to their own curtailment of advertising, but had since recovered. Similarly, the circular letter sent out by the same league to all the foreign legations and embassies advocating "urgent and vigorous intervention of our brothers, the civilized nations of the entire world," had no more noticeable response than did the efforts of the Knights of Columbus in the United States to upset order in Mexico through trying to have the embargo on arms lifted by President Coolidge. In short, the Government of President Calles has thus far successfully and energetically maintained its position against both internal and foreign dissidents. The position of the church is growing weaker with every day of the present "strike."

The Government insists that its activities have been merely those of law enforcement. The church replies that the July 3 decree which required the priests to register was issued by the President (authorized, it is true, by the constitution and Congress), that he exceeded his powers, that he had no right to invoke the penal code for the enforcement of his decree. Just how violations were to be handled by the authorities the church did not make clear, though at the same time it indicated that the decree would not be obeyed. The church declares the state is attacking religion. The Government denies any intention of discriminating against the Roman Catholic church. The nearest indication of any such spirit of discrimination occurred in a statement of President Calles made some months ago to the effect that foreign Protestant ministers showed greater disposition to obey the law and respect the Mexican sovereignty than the foreign Catholic priests. Even so, numbers of foreign Protestant ministers were arrested and most have left for the United States. All the native Protestant ministers have registered with the municipal authorities and hence have been able to continue at their posts unmolested. The apparent discriminatory character of the present legislation springs largely from the fact that the Roman Catholic church is for all practical purposes a monopoly organization and hence the one most vitally affected. The Catholics make the further claim that the closing of religious schools not only deprives children of proper religious instruction but that the government schools are inadequate for the number of children clamoring for instruction. True. But the Government replies that in a question of law enforcement expediency is not a point of issue. The Government can set off against the 129 primary Catholic schools closed the 4,000 new rural schools, the steady expansion of the city schools, and the pursuit of a vigorous school-building program. Were not the Catholic schools, in not submitting to the law forbidding religious instruction in primary schools, equally responsible in denying the children instruction?

In other words—and this has been constantly blurred—there is in the present struggle, first, the question of law enforcement—the primary obligation of any serious government. Quite over and beyond this is the question as to the justice of the existing constitution and laws. There are instruments for altering the constitution; there are courts for testing the laws. And, finally, there is the whole philosophic and social problem of the nature of religion and its relation with political organization. The general fanfare of emotion, pro and con, has caused these things to be inextricably confused.

One of the outstanding features of the Calles Administration has been the vigorous, almost rigorous, enforcement, through proper regulation, of the constitution of 1917. This constitution, adopted at the culmination of the reaction against the Diaz and Huerta dictatorial regimes, as a result of the constitutional revolution of Carranza, had never been put into bona fide operation. Carranza was too harassed with the problem of military pacification; Obregon, his successor, was too busy reconciling the various greedy factions and setting in motion reconstructive measures to worry too much about the constitution; only with President Calles has the country entered upon a phase of technically legal administration. It is rather amazing, therefore, to hear the present Government tagged as "a reckless crew of bandits," as in a recent issue of a prominent Roman Catholic publication. President Calles has systematically pushed through Congress laws not merely regulating the churches but carrying out almost every clause of the 1917 constitution—land tenure, petroleum, labor, irrigation, forestry conservation, banking, taxation, rural credits, social insurance, mining, transportation. The church provisions were next in line. Calles, in his message to Congress, the first of this month, announced that other problems of the revolution had demanded prior legal attention but that the Government at no time intended to neglect to put into effect the religious articles of the constitution.

An examination of the constitution and the regulating decree of July 3 reveals that the latter is merely a restatement, in some parts verbatim, of the constitutional provisions, most of which had been already more or less successfully enforced—some for more than seventy years—in order to make their application effective via the penal code. Provisions already established included: Exclusion of all foreign-born ministers (185 have been deported); national ownership of all churches, bishops' palaces, seminaries, convents, etc., these to be used for religious purposes at the discretion of the Government in accordance with the law; the performance of all religious acts within the churches; denial of the right to wear distinctive religious garbs or insignia outside of the churches; no political meetings in churches; denial of the right of ministers through public writings or statements to incite the public to refuse to acknowledge the political institutions or obey the laws; denial of the right to both priests and religious publications to express political views, criticizing the fundamental law or the acts of the authorities; complete laicizing of primary education; dissolution of all religious orders, convents, and monasteries. The additional provision—also previsaged in the constitution—which precipitated the pending "strike," is that requiring registration of the priests. President Calles in recent interviews with the Episcopate declared that this had nothing to do with the actual performance of religious acts, but was necessary if the Government was to keep tab on the administration of the church buildings which are government property. Also, this may be the only practical method by which foreign priests can be kept from resuming their offices.

These represent the leading requirements the Government is in honor bound to uphold. In other words, the present Government can scarcely be criticized for its attempts at law enforcement through the medium of the penal code. The justice or desirability of the laws in question is an entirely distinct issue. I am not unaware that the Roman Catholic church—along with other foreign interests—indicts the whole adoption of the 1917 constitution as illegal, this having occurred at a time of grave national disturbance when the democratic election of the constituents of the Queretaro convention was well-nigh impossible. But three administrations have been founded upon this constitution, all of which were recognized by the United States; it has been the fundamental law of the land for ten years. To impose another constitution would require further force and undemocratic measures.

Personally I do not feel that any man should be torn from his home, arrested, loaded on a train, deported, all in the short span of six hours, as was done in the case of some of the foreign priests. Personally I believe that the restrictions imposed upon religious periodicals with respect to discussion of political problems oversteps the constitutional limits and will prove unenforceable, as is already evidenced by the considerable number of rabid, clandestine anti-Government Roman Catholic sheets that are springing into existence. Yet if the Government has proceeded dictatorially, one must admit that what popular political organization exists is all on its side and not on that of the church. Also, in addition to the immediate necessity for summary state measures, there remain the older historical arguments. These are the monopolistic character of the Roman Catholic church, past and present; its support of reactionary, anti-republican, foreign, and oppressive governments; its hold upon the fanaticism of the ignorant native populations, without any concomitant attempt to improve economic or educational standards; the preponderant influence in the hierarchy of foreign priests; its close affiliation with all the elements opposing the present series of reconstruction governments (Carranza, Obregon, Calles), with the landed proprietors, the local Fascisti, the rebel de la Huerta elements, and the intrenched bureaucracy.

The solution? Outside intervention? Writes the editor of the Catholic weekly America in a recent issue:

> Mexico is too near us for its subversive philosophy to affect our public life. Mexico's Government is far too dependent upon our Government for its existence for us to disclaim any responsibility for what happens beyond the border. If it were France or Germany or Italy or England, it might be different. They have an independent existence. But not Mexico. . . . The Mexican bishops have long known, and if they did not know it, the fate of American oil-men and others has taught them, that you cannot bargain with men like Calles.

But this is not the traditional bitter and selfish conflict between two petty ruling cliques that featured so many of the conflicts between the ecclesiastical and civil authorities, where one side or the other could run, in a moment of defeat, to beg aid from the mother country or from the outside world. And even the Roman Catholics of Mexico would be likely to rally against any armed invasion.

Will the priests gradually register and resume their places? A few have done so. But there is, as yet, no general indication of a landslide movement against the orders of the Episcopate.

Will the Government carry out its threat that if the priests do not resume services the buildings will be turned into schools, libraries, and hospitals?

Will the church succeed in convincing Congress to pass more conciliatory laws? Though the Episcopate presented a memorial to Congress, it has as yet been unable to find a single representative willing to introduce its measures.

The answer cannot be far distant.

The Answer

(To Rudyard Kipling)

By HARRY KEMP

At your eleventh hour of blood and flame
We gave our answer to a thankless call
By setting our backs with yours against the wall—
Paid with your shameless, small, black words of blame,
True coinage of the ingrate, after all!

But let us build no more, in bickering rhyme,
Old, sick mendacities of Use and Time,
Nor with safe words our little hatreds wreak,
Sulking beneath the Literary Lie! . . .
Only the unspeaking Dead have right to speak—
Unless to live, through such times, is to die! . . .

Youth, born for life and song, we urged embark
Down to the songless, grim, unpitying Dark;
While in sure traps their shortened days were caught
We sang their battles but we never fought!

Then, that such deaths of slaughtered youth may cease,
In Life's great name, let us make songs of peace!

The Workers Build Their Own

By JAMES RORTY

THE other day a contractor delivered some decorative stone-work at the northern edge of Bronx Park, New York City, where a big new apartment house is building. It was a somewhat unusual order and after the contractor's truckman had dumped his load he addressed one of the bricklayers on the job.

"Say," he remarked. "What's this funny sickle-and-hammer stuff? This is the queerest order I ever seen come through the shop. Ain't you going to have no floral arches and urns? What sort of cuckoos is going to live in this place anyway?"

The bricklayer straightened, spat, and wiped his hands on his overalls.

"You want to know what sort of cuckoos is going to live in this place?"

"Yes."

"Well, I'm the sort of cuckoo that's going to live in this place."

"Yeh?"

"Yeh," replied the bricklayer with cold finality and started to lay another course.

The first unit of the housing program of the United Workers' Cooperative Association will open in November with every apartment occupied. It consists of a five-story building of 337 apartments which occupies an entire city block. The second unit, already almost completely subscribed by union workers, mostly from the needle trades, will be ready in May, 1927, and subscriptions are already coming for the third. The association has bought and paid for six blocks and two half blocks at the northern end of Bronx Park. In addition it has an option on 325 city lots on the other side of White Plains Avenue, on Gunhill Road. This parcel will be used for the second "colony." The first "colony," consisting of six buildings, each occupying a square block, with dining-rooms, swimming pool, day nurseries, theater, library, kindergarten, preventorium, and health service, will be completed by the summer of 1928 if the present program works out according to schedule.

It has all happened almost overnight and it sounds like Florida. It sounds too good to be true. Has the cooperative movement actually got going in America? If so, who did it? Where's the philanthropist? Where's the State?

The answer is, Nowhere. None of them are in the cast at present and they don't seem to be needed. The workers have unrolled their own roll; bought their own bricks and the soil to lay them on. The trouble with most of the workers' cooperative housing schemes in America is that workers can't afford to live in the houses when they are built. The workers move out, or never move in. It's great for small professional and trades people. But the slums remain and the poor stay there.

Well, 337 families are moving out of "railroad" flats on the East Side, Harlem, and the Bronx next November and are moving into one of the most desirable residential sections of the Bronx. They are not the very poor. Admittedly, that problem still waits for solution as far as the activities of the United Workers' Cooperatives are concerned. But they are union workers in good standing, all of them. Nobody else is admitted. They get two-, three-, and four-room apartments, with bath, admirably arranged, with light and air in every room, a big interior garden court, and a repertory of cooperative services that includes everything from day nurseries to a theater. They pay $12, $13, or $15 a month per room. The smallest room in the building is eleven by fifteen. This rental is subject to reduction as the mortgage is amortized to a minimum of $5 per month per room for maintenance. In addition the tenants invest $200 per room, half of which may be paid over two years in instalments. For this they get the privilege of living in the apartment and a vote in the management. If a cooperator moves out he gets his money back and no more. Nobody is making any profit out of the enterprise except the mortgage company which underwrote the building loan.

It is too early, of course, to prognosticate complete success, but this much seems to be demonstrated: the workers can build their own homes with their own money; they don't have to pay Rockefeller or anybody else 8 per cent interest in perpetuity for doing it; finally they don't have to bleat for tax exemption although they, surely, if anybody, are entitled to it.

The United Workers' Cooperative Association was organized in 1917. A group of Jewish workers in the needle trades rented one floor of a building at 1815 Madison Avenue and operated it as a cooperative rooming house with a cooperative dining-room as an adjunct. It succeeded. The members saved money and had a better life. On Sundays and holidays they would take hikes into Westchester and New Jersey. They bought their provisions cooperatively and it cost them seventy-five cents a day apiece. But the mess sergeant had big ideas. He was beguiled by the attractive prices he could get through quantity buying. So one time, instead of buying enough for two days, he bought enough for a week. What to do? Some of the boys decided to stay through the week—they were then camped on the property of the wireless station near Belmar, N. J.—

and eat up the food. Before the week was out, more members arrived. They discovered that they had a permanent camp. Moreover, the group was growing at a rate which both demanded and made possible a considerable expansion. They rented a site—a beautiful stretch of woods and pasture overlooking the Hudson near Beacon, N. Y. They established Camp Nitgedaiget—described in The Nation of September 29. It was there, on July 4, 1925, that some 2,000 cooperators held a mass meeting and decided that they were going after the New York City housing problem in earnest.

The results to date have been briefly outlined. The plans for the future are staggering. They are enough to make the most florid of the Florida realtors bite his nails with envy. Besides the two huge "colonies"—one started and the other scheduled in the Bronx—there is talk of cooperative department, drug, grocery and other stores, a series of camps at the seashore and in the mountains, medical and dental clinics. An invasion of the lower East Side is within the possibilities.

Meanwhile, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers are preparing to break ground for the construction of five apartment buildings on an area of forty-four city lots on Sedgwick Avenue, bounded by Mosholu Parkway, the Jerome Park Reservoir, and Van Cortlandt Park. The project is similar in many of its details to that of the United Workers' Cooperative Association. Subscriptions are limited to wage earners and preference is given to members of the Amalgamated. The estimated cost of the project is $1,450,000—about $1,400 per room.

A few blocks south, bordering the Jerome Park Reservoir, the Yiddishe Cooperative Heimgeselshaft is constructing an apartment building, covering thirty-eight city lots, which before completion in February, 1927, is expected to cost approximately $1,250,000. The cooperative provisions are in general similar to those of the other two projects.

The builder employed on all three projects is B. Brodsky, president of the Dwellers' Building Corporation, an experienced Bronx apartment-house builder with numerous financial successes to his credit and an impressive bank rating. That Mr. Brodsky also happens to be an enthusiastic cooperator is perhaps a factor in the situation. He says what everybody who has studied the cooperative movement in America knows: that the entering wedge of cooperation in industrialized America is housing; also that half the cooperative loaf is frequently worse than no bread when the other half goes to private profit. These cooperators are getting the whole loaf and its taste is good.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has never been to Newburyport; he has never seen the farmhouse in which Stuart Chase's great-great-grandfather raised his no doubt numerous family. But he knows another house, built just as the eighteenth century was turning to a close; he knows it intimately; it is, indeed, one of the many places he will choose, when his drifting days are over, to rest in forever. And he believes that his knowledge of and affection for this house and the township in which it stands gives him authority enough to affirm that Mr. Chase was, when he wrote his article in The Nation, talking through his hat.

HEAR Mr. Chase, wearing an elegant pair of rose-colored spectacles: the "sunny, low-eaved, great-ovened farmhouse"; the "knee breeches, the noble colors, the brave brass buttons of Newburyport"; "if you fell ill, your chances of dying were considerably greater in the old days, but you did not fall ill so frequently"; "those factors of craftsmanship . . . awareness of nature, spontaneous play . . . which my great-great-grandfather's children received naturally, automatically, and costlessly in Newburyport." The Drifter thinks of the house he knows so well; sunny, indubitably; roomy, set in grass and flanked by smooth meadows; plenty of air, light, space; plenty of fresh vegetables and fruit to eat; plenty of flora and fauna to become acquainted with, tools to work with, heartening and healthful chores to do. But how was the house in the year 1800? Not plastered, for one thing; heated only by the great chimney-stack, of course; five children slept in one room. There were other rooms, to be sure, but one had to keep warm somehow. Food was cooked over the crane; bread was baked in the brick oven. Fires had to be kept going all the time, fires that ate up logs four feet long. Woodpiles higher than the house melted under the fierce winter winds. And in summer? Well, fires had to be fed then, also. There was nowhere else to cook. No stoves in 1800. No screens to keep out the flies that swarmed in from the barns. In summer the house was unbearably hot, even set in the hills where breezes fan the branches outside. Fresh vegetables? Surely; winter turnips, carrots, beans; a little popping-corn, plenty of cabbage. There were gentlemen farmers who experimented with all sorts of new-fangled and probably poisonous garden truck: green peas, for instance, and some kinds of greens called salads—and they do say some folks actually eat those round, red love apples, but of course we all know they are poison. Plenty of fresh air in Newburyport—outdoors. But don't let me catch you opening one of those windows. Don't you know how bad the night air is for you?

* * * * *

FOUR a.m. in Newburyport. It's not daylight yet, but the critters want to be milked. Breakfast ready? Where's that strip of wool I wind around my neck? Mighty cold out in the barns these mornings. Likely to have snow soon, then we'll have to get up earlier to shovel out. Won't be back till dinner; got to work out in the west pasture. Broke a crowbar yesterday getting out one of those biggest stones; we'll have a farm here some day when we get the stones and stumps out. Through the morning in Newburyport: the sound of the spinning wheel, the thud of logs being pitched on the coals, an iron spoon scraping the inside of an iron pot. Fruit hangs drying from the smoked rafters; the pot on the crane sends up a column of steam; the hearth, new-swept, is the warmest place in the house for the children to play. Get off to school, you young ones; it's nearly eight o'clock, and you've three miles to walk. Of course it's cold, but you've got to learn your a b c's, haven't you? Do you want to grow up an ignoramus? Here's your lunch; see you get home before dark. . . . Supper time at Newburyport. The family reunited once more, father and the two oldest boys from the west pasture—digging out those stones makes your back hurt; the little children murmuring lessons in the light of the fire—candles don't give much light; the girls serving out soup hot from the pot—there's such a clutter around the fireplace you can't get near enough to fill the bowls; give me the baby—I'll nurse him now and maybe he'll go off to sleep. Evenings are getting short. Well, it doesn't matter, does it? I'm glad for an excuse to get to bed. It's nice and warm there and I like the smell of soup to put me to sleep.

* * * * *

THE Drifter presents this picture as at least as true a portrait of the household at Newburyport as Mr. Chase's. There was work in those days, the back-breaking work of clearing the forest and making the meadows fit to plow; work all the time, indoors and out: cloth to weave, clothes to sew laboriously by hand, tallow-dips to make, the everlasting fire to feed, and more everlasting wood to cut for it. The fireplace was picturesque; but somehow as soon as stoves were invented it was torn out. The farm was a health-giving place. But for some reason the boys wouldn't stay there. They said they had to work too hard. To be sure, in their new homes in the new cities they must often have thought wistfully of the corn-huskings, the sugaring-offs, the sleigh-rides over snow as hard and white as stone. But life was hard in the old days, and days were long. And if there were large families, there were also rows of head-stones in the burying ground. A woman who had given birth to a round dozen was lucky to bring half of them to manhood and womanhood.

* * * * *

NO, the Drifter would not have enjoyed living in Newburyport in 1800. The hand-wrought tools, the pine chests, the great four-posters, the iron latches on the doors, the rugs woven by flickering candle-light would not have been compensation enough. Now he can go to his farm-house and count the world well lost. But now things are different. He wonders if Mr. Chase has not somehow confused his delight in his great-great-grandfather's farm-house as it is today with his notion of how it was in 1800. New York City in 1926 presents numerous disadvantages to the seeker after the good life. But Newburyport a century ago was no paradise either.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

How Many Miles to Culture?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Is it fair to compare the New Englander of early days with the Bronxite of today, and to say that machinery did it or at least failed to do it?

The question is not [illegible] from a cultural point of view than the artisan of a hundred years ago—but Has he more opportunities for culture than the European peasant who was three or four generations from acquiring a strap? If so, even though part of the improvement is due to the availability of virgin natural resources, is not part of it due to the technical exploitation of those bounties?

Or, to put it another way, were the conscript armies of the war for democracy nearer to culture than were the Napoleonic cannon-food? Are the proletarians of England and Germany more cultured than the agricultural classes from which machinery called or dragged them—a finer comparison than with the small class of artisans which machinery doomed? Is the Russian peasant, with his American tractor to free him from famine, headed for or away from illiteracy, ignorance, superstition, and provincialism? What is the belief of Stuart Chase, Treasurer, Russian Reconstruction Farms, Inc.?

Bronx, New York, September 4 J. B. C. WOODS

Thank God for the Bronx!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In his splendid article My Great-Great-Grandfather and I Stuart Chase, considering the present system of "machine production in the terms of tonnage output" and comparing what we really have with what "Fulton and Arkwright and Watt promised us," comes to the conclusion that the present world we live in "is the defeat of human intelligence"; it "is waste—meaningless, destructive, gigantic"; it "is a child smashing a microscope." He comes to conclusions too glum because, looking through lenses of aesthetics, he views only the lives of the middle classes.

I am a proletarian. My great-grandfather belonged to the same class. Let's consider the change in mode of life of my great-grandfather, myself, and my offspring.

First, shelter. I remember having been reared among a family of six children in an "apartment" of two dingy rooms, with earthen floors, with no plumbing or sanitation. No doubt we had more yard space, more playground space, more sunshine in our rooms than we have at present. But the space inside the rooms had to be shared with different insects, unpleasant even to remember. And this not because my grandmother and mother were poor housewives—no, they could not prevail against the insects because there were no cheap underwear and pajamas then, because there were no tenement-house departments, boards of health, or building departments to make the landlords do cleaning and make repairs, and because there were no such insecticides as we have today. Today my family of three, sometimes four, lives in four rooms. The rooms are small; but there is steam heat, electric light, hot water. A tenement-house department protects me from the extreme rapaciousness of landlordism.

Food. My father's family and I, before I could earn my own living, had not enough to eat to prevent our stomachs from grumbling. It is true that the food I remember in my childhood was more delicious, the fruit more juicy. But what consolation when it came so rarely?

Clothing. I remember my father wearing an overcoat eight or nine years till it tore at the elbows; then it was patched, mended, and given to the eldest son. When the eldest son grew out of it, it was patched and mended again and given to the younger son. And when it reached me it had been remodeled so many times that I felt like a gray cat in it. New suits were bought only for the eldest children and worn by them till they grew out of them, then given to the younger ones, until it was physically impossible to patch and remodel them any more; and then . . . they were put to some other use.

Take health. My grandmother had nine or ten children. Only three survived; none reached sixty. My mother had twelve children; only two survived. I remember the stories of how my brothers and sisters died. Under present-day public sanitation plus the services of doctors and dentists, at least eight of the ten would have lived. My first-born died at birth in a Vienna, Austria, hospital eighteen years ago. And I am positive that born then in a New York hospital, or now in any country, that child would have been saved. So God bless our doctors and dentists.

One can see that Stuart Chase has not suffered the anguish of wanting education and not being able to get it. He belongs to the leisure class.

My parents revered education. Yet only after protracted beseechings could I move them to keep me at school till my fifteenth year. My other brothers had to go to work at twelve; for my parents could afford neither to pay for private tuition nor to feed us any longer. My son will surely be sent to college, if only the money-making spirit does not claim his soul.

I was twenty when I saw a play for the first time. In my childhood, like my parents, I considered that a luxury fit only for the aristocracy. Even now I see plays only when they are brought to the Bronx Opera House, at popular prices. But I do see and enjoy them. My son was eight when he saw his first good play, and at fourteen he had seen as many plays as I at forty; my father never saw any.

The haphazard management of machine production, the soulless competition causes senseless waste. But it is not like a child smashing a microscope. Rather is it a youth going blusteringly wild and senselessly spendthrifty. And the D[illegible], Thorstein Veblens, Upton Sinclairs, Scott Nearings, Stuart Chases, The Nation will help bring the youth to his senses.

New York, September 4 ISRAEL KAHAN

From a Richmond Garden

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have the greatest desire to take your contributor Stuart Chase by the hand and show him many things. I want to bring him around the back of my half-acre estate and let him see the master of the house with his children working in the little garden. This summer we have raised practically all of the vegetables and fruit needed. He can peep into my garage and see a first-class work-bench and tools. Let him see that he need not send his children to expensive experimental schools. Unless a strain of laziness has come to him through his great-grandmother, he can supplement any public school education. He can discard his radio and have his children study music. . . . Oh I am full of ideas and suggestions which will help him, and our town isn't small, our income isn't large, our home is modest, and our children twice as numerous as his. I feel quite immodestly able to compete with his great-grandfather.

Richmond, Va., September 9 WILMA MARX STRAUS

Florida?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I had lived in New York City for sixteen years, my husband all his life. Like most New Yorkers we too, in our quest for more sunshine and fresh air, had tried almost every section of the city. With the arrival of our baby, New York seemed more and more impossible. Life with all its modern equipment for health and happiness, all its intellectual advantages, was but one round of appointments, interruptions, social obligations, without any time left for real living. At the dreaded realization that another baby was coming, we decided to go to some small town, preferably in a sub-tropical climate.

Everybody advised against such a "crazy" move. The unanimous conclusion was that six months would see us humbly returning to the only place in the world—New York City.

That was in May of 1924. Since then a number of our friends and relatives have visited us at Joy Hill, our farm in Florida. They have frankly envied us our peace of mind, our happiness, our freedom, and our two healthy boys.

One can earn more money in the city, but the utter waste in superfluous clothes and over-stimulating and rich foods rob the family exchequer, and most of the savings usually go to the doctors. We raise all our foodstuffs on our farm. The Florida climate allows us a variety of fresh fruits and nuts and berries and vegetables all the year round. Our flock of chickens pays our other expenses.

We have abundant time to play with our children and assist them in their "work." More! We who in the city found the rearing of one baby a very expensive and gigantic task, are now planning to raise three or four! We can afford it here.

Zephyr Hills, Fla., September 10 ROSE YUNI CHENKIN

The Agonies of Orthodoxy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If I should compare the environment of my childhood with that of my children I am inclined to think that the balance would tip in their favor. My grandfather Dole, born in Maine, on the Kennebeck, was a farmer, but his three sons, all named after prophets of Israel, managed to go through Bowdoin College and the hardships of two of them planted the seeds of consumption. My father died when I was two and a half years old and I was brought up in the little town of Norridgewock, unique for its beauty, its cultivated and congenial society, and its extremely plain living—but atrociously pious. Orthodoxy so permeated the atmosphere that one could see it hanging like a pall over the tranquil river against the opposite hill; no circus was permitted to pitch its tents on the sacred soil, and when the ice went out in the spring freshets none of us youngsters was permitted to go out on the bank with the unregenerate and unredeemed to witness the show; my mother would not allow my cousins to walk to the graveyard to visit their mother's grave—for fear that the example might be used by Sabbath-breakers as a justification. Sunday was a day of horror. This fearsome superstitious Orthodoxy-Calvinism, of itself, was heavier in the scale than all the culture otherwise prevalent.

The lights used to illuminate the long winter evenings were of sperm oil—yet the river was then ready, as it is now utilized, to furnish electricity for making brilliant the streets and houses and for lightening household labor. People were not nearly so healthy as they are now—certainly not so happy. On the whole I think my children were far happier than my brother and I were, though neither of us had any superfluity of income. So it seems to me that on the whole the world has improved!

Ogunquit, Maine, September 4 NATHAN HASKELL DOLE

Down with Everything!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Hail! And congratulations! Your courage in printing Mr. Stuart Chase's speculations in regard to the possible degenerating effect of machine culture deserves all praise. Those of us who have long ago ceased to speculate and got down to the gold tacks of practicing the auto-regenerative, not the automotive, life can now take a new hold on hope. When political radicals begin to revolt against "spectator's culture, listener's culture" and—to add another—reader's culture, when this sign begins to become visible in the heavens we who have turned our backs on the husks and harlots of Egypt can begin to lift up our heads. If Mr. Chase begins to doubt the sterling virtues of lectures, concerts, operas, and committees, the unadulterated advantages of automats, automobiles, elevateds, subways, and sunless apartments, perhaps it will not be long before Mr. H. L. Mencken begins to cook his own meals, darn his own socks, dispose of his own garbage, create his own music, and—throwing away his library—think his own thoughts. Perhaps, if you culture-hounds keep traveling in this direction at your present rate of speed, The Nation will print—ten years after the grand, final smash-up of the machine age and its culture—an article advocating the abolition of electric lights, steam heat, telephones, radios, and all cities of more than a population of two thousand. Perhaps . . . perhaps you will then suspend publication. In the meantime, congratulations.

Chicago, Illinois, September 8 CLAUDE STONE

Books and Plays

Vanguard

By LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS

He said: If Time is what I now believe,
Patience is less a virtue than a gift
We all are born with, whether we achieve
Tranquillity of spirit with the drift
Of years, or suffer still the pangs of growth.
But he was driven to the wall and passed
By the fleet-footed and the laggard both,
Who smiled at such a prophet coming last.

So for a while we lost him; none could say
If he had gone down preaching in the crowd,
Or, like a man defeated, crawled away
To make his fool's philosophy a shroud.
Self-righteously we kept the beaten track. . . .
And then one day we met him coming back.

First Glance

OF the reigning Professor of Poetry at Oxford, Mr. H. W. Garrod, I can only say that I wish he would follow up the two small volumes which he has published on Wordsworth (Oxford University Press: $2.50) and Keats (Oxford University Press: $2) with others equally small but full on Milton and Shakespeare, and perhaps, to show how far he can go in the understanding of poets, on Dryden or Pope. For Mr. Garrod, the like of whose criticism I have never quite met anywhere, has a definite responsibility—not at all as Professor of Poetry, which might mean very little, but as one who claims with reason to be able to read good poetry as it was intended to be read. Coming to Matthew Arnold's chair after a life devoted to classical scholarship, he exclaims against the "conspiracy of careless reading" which he finds, as anyone may find it, among those who discuss the literature of England. "In general I am inclined to the belief," he says with the dryness which is one of his chief incidental qualities, "that not only are poets commonly a more truthful race than other men, but that they frequently understand themselves better than other people understand them. . . . We shall never understand poets unless we believe what they tell us. . . . For myself, when poets tell me that they are inspired, I am disposed to believe them—I have found it always the shortest way, not only of placating them but of understanding them. It may even be that it is the only way."

We have been careless readers of our great poets, it would seem, because we have paid too little attention to what they said about themselves. Mr. Garrod addresses himself, then, to this task among others—to discover precisely what Wordsworth and Keats thought they ought to be doing, and only then to decide wherein, if at all, they were deceived. In both cases he finds enough confusion of mind, but he finds enough clarity, too, for his purposes; and, since he is a critic of rich and fine equipment, the result is a pair of essays hardly to be matched in English criticism for accuracy of analysis or completeness of comprehension. In Wordsworth he stresses neither the "old half-witted sheep" of the famous parody nor the Byronic radical of Professor Harper, but—I am convinced—the poet himself as he existed most gloriously in the ten years between 1797 and 1807. He frankly accepts the author of the "Prelude" as one who possessed abnormally fruitful senses; and he minutely traces the steps by which Wordsworth emerged from the intellectual conflict within himself, occasioned first by the French Revolution and next by Godwin, into the marvelous decade when, set going by Coleridge, he went the whole way of his senses. "Perhaps, indeed, Coleridge's greatest work is Wordsworth—and, like all his other works, Coleridge left it unfinished." Coleridge and Wordsworth parted in 1806; Mr. Garrod then traces the slow descent of Wordsworth into the valley of the Ecclesiastical Sonnets. In the "Keats" Mr. Garrod disposes pretty well, I think, of the notion—held intermittently and unhappily by the subject himself—that the author of St. Agnes Eve had ever any business with the intellect. "I think him the great poet he is only when the senses capture him, when he finds truth in beauty, that is to say, when he does not trouble to find truth at all." Had Keats lived he would have been more Keats, not less; and while he lived—this is one of the more brilliant of Mr. Garrod's many brilliant perceptions—he was most himself in those moments when, after struggles to understand politics or metaphysics, he suddenly relapsed into luxury.

But I wish Mr. Garrod would go on. He has been as wise in expounding Wordsworth and Keats as he has been witty in exposing the weaknesses of their critics. So far, however, he has confined himself to romantic material—inspiration, nature, the senses. There are ampler domains. Milton gained stature through using his mind; Shakespeare observed persons as well as places, looked on as well as dreamed; Dryden worked with wit. Or did they; and if so, how so? I should relish Mr. Garrod's answers to these questions, and to others. He is so good a critic that he can afford to be a broader one. MARK VAN DOREN

Cook's Tours Through Art

Art Through the Ages. An Introduction to Its History and Significance. By Helen Gardner. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

THE value of such books as this depends mainly on whether the reader comes out with a feeling that he has really swallowed and digested a whole subject or is stimulated to follow up some few parts of it intensively. Which of these will occur, in turn, depends not wholly on the reader; some books glut the appetite with a false impression of completeness, obscuring the more subtle meanings and charms of a subject, while others create powers of further assimilation.

"Art Through the Ages" has bitten off so large a chunk of history that, in spite of its bulk, it is necessarily a quick survey. Is it the good kind or the bad? The answer must be comparative. Hitherto the most popular book of its kind has been Reinach's "Apollo," which for a generation has fed to students pictures of a few popular classics and many initiative mediocrities, along with the perfunctory tags of academic criticism. During the Wells craze for universal outlines an "Outline of Art," composed largely of sentimental anecdotes, was hastily put together under the name of Sir William Orpen, and it is still enormously read. Most textbooks on the history of art are unbelievably dull, repetitive, and prejudiced. By contrast with these, "Art Through the Ages" is full of solid substance, scholarly in background, and liberal in point of view. It has a concrete basis of freshly chosen photographs in rich variety, many unfamiliar enough to surprise a connoisseur, yet typical enough to distinguish hundreds of major and minor traditions in a score of fine and applied arts. The primitive, exotic, and modernistic are given a share of representation among them that is rare in textbooks, if still somewhat slighter than could be wished for. By its illustrations alone the book is enough to tempt the reader to closer acquaintance with the originals.

Is the text of a sort to intensify this attractiveness and stimulate the power to enjoy discriminatingly? By comparison with older books, again, there is distinct progress toward this end, largely because the author has followed the present tendency of art education to stress design. To a considerable extent Miss Gardner has avoided the usual anecdotes of artists' lives and the literary interpretation of pictorial subject matter, and has tried to bring out instead the direct aesthetic qualities of typical works of art. When a quality of color is suggested, or the rhythm of two lines, and when a light-and-shade pattern or a disposition of masses is pointed out in a statue or cathedral, the reader's attention is directed toward the object itself and his power of appreciating similar objects tends to be increased.

That this line of approach is not followed out with enough thoroughness is evidence of the surviving demand for other modes of approach to art. Few teachers or general readers are yet ready to devote systematic study to plastic form for its own sake; they insist on being told interesting facts about its human and literary associations. There is at present a conscious educational trend, moreover, toward presenting all subjects "in their social setting," which often means merely flooding them with miscellaneous facts of a vaguely sociological flavor. Miss Gardner must be constantly inserting information about the political and religious environment of the artist, about the mechanical devices by which the building was made to stay up, about what the people in the picture seem to be thinking of, and how the subject expresses the interests of the time. There is some attempt to separate these viewpoints, but not enough to prevent frequent confusion. With so many artists and schools and so many aspects of each to be touched on, the directly aesthetic treatment has to be extremely sketchy, and often misses essential qualities. The text never stops long enough on any single object to give the reader anything like a full realization of its complex unity of line, light, mass, space, and color. Instead he is hustled down the ages, plied with miscellaneous information, his attention switched this way and that, until he closes the book without ever having had (so far as the text can help him) a single clear and vivid experience of a work of art.

By the total absence of either psychological approach or personal viewpoint the book further misses the significance of art as a thing to be created, liked, disliked, and reflectively evaluated. It is perhaps too much to ask of a textbook that it present any fresh appraisals, but it may at least be expected to show a realization that feeling, perception, habit, and conscious standards have something important to do with the history of art. In a textbook, again, a certain catholic objectivity and tolerance are perhaps better than too narrow and violent preferences (although even the latter may stimulate a reader to doubt and think things out for himself). But throughout this book there is little indication that a divergence in standards of artistic value is possible or that one picture may be judged better or worse than another. Works of every description, major and minor, original and imitative, Renaissance masters and American academicians, are reviewed with the same placid amiability that extends almost (with a few timid doubts) to the post-impressionist radicals. The result is not only a slightly tedious softness but a failure to show that art history has been permeated with the battle of traditions and clashing impulses and a failure to start the beginner on the essential task of discriminating values for himself.

THOMAS MUNRO

The Story of Psychology

The Meaning of Psychology. By C. K. Ogden. Harper and Brothers. $3.

MR. OGDEN has taken upon himself an attractive and well-considered task. His singleness of purpose and directness of exposition enable him to produce a survey of the scope as well as the meaning of psychology, all in terms of the modern man's interests and the modern man's concepts of comprehension; and that means neither the "high brow" who would expect a more technical and systematized text-like procedure, nor the "low brow" who (if we may credit the questionable judgment of the editors of popular magazines) will swallow and digest only thin pabulum highly spiced with journalese sauce, but the man of medium cranial altitude whose needs are properly met by a writer loyal to scientific standards, and whose interests are worth stimulating and satisfying. Such a reader, whose I. Q. would entitle him to be called more than average, wants to know what psychology is all about, how it approaches and how it solves its problems, what kinds of facts it considers, and particularly what kinds of conclusions it draws as to the mental nature of man. To cover this ground would, in the vernacular, be a pretty large order; but that is precisely what Mr. Ogden is willing to fill.

He undertakes to set forth how psychology bears upon life's problems, its endeavors, its criteria of fitness, its motives; to indicate how the mind machine operates, how it is constructed, and what it produces; to set forth the psychic side of man as a living organism and a going concern. In further detail: to take a psychic inventory in terms of behavior liabilities and assets, native trends and their adjustment to condition; how the mind goes wrong and leaves home; what light psychology throws upon the products, the institutions, the man-made (which means so largely mind-made) environment in which man matures to adult stature racially and individually. Viewed through the large end of the psychologist's opera glass, there appears the total scene in miniature; viewed through the small end, there appears magnified the close-up of its features, its analysis, the varieties and types of mental performance. In addition there is the illumination which childhood sheds upon mature traits and vice versa; throughout there is the story of application paralleling the story of principles; there is the historical tale, of how these problems arose and how differently they were viewed and solved according to old-time interests—a glance backward at the perplexities arising in the academic pursuit—and how radically all this has changed with the removal of the grove and cloister and the right-about-face that turned psychology to a control of human lives intimately to their profit or undoing.

There is the collateral tale belonging more specifically to the related disciplines: what physiology, anthropology, psychiatry bring to and take from the psychological viewpoint. Religion, ethics, education, all bring tribute to and take tribute from psychology, and yet it must retain the dominance within its own domain, and this despite the division into schools, affiliations, "isms." From another approach it appears that psychology underlies economics, art, invention, even philosophy, and the common thought of the common man. For in an unprecedented sense this is the psychological age, and the term is properly as well as glibly used to follow the clue to the understanding and control of human beings in all relations—of family, state, class, industry, recreation, and spiritualization. On this trail Mr. Ogden necessarily includes the question of method, the question how the modern insight has come to be established through the laboratory, the clinic, the work of the evolutionist and of the "social" student; how the outgrowing of barren methods was necessary to the dissipation of old-time fallacies—largely the mistaking of myths, theories, metaphors for facts and relations and realities.

From it all emerges the directive influence of the pragmatic temper. Psychology must be and has been rewritten from the point of view of mental phenomena in terms of the actual realities: nerves, glands, muscles, impulses, instincts, urges, mechanisms. Again specifically, the Freudian viewpoint tells the story in terms of psychic hungers and appetites, ministering to bodily as well as mental satisfaction, recognizing—as in the life of sex—the complexity of both phases and their fusion. In every reasonable sense this is behaviorism; and Mr. Ogden, like many another psychologist (though unlike his compatriot McDougall, who finds it irritating), finds the assumption of the radical Watsonian behaviorism, as the one-and-only, beware-of-imitations brand, amusing. Hospitable to all the cultivated fields of investigation that contribute to the psychological harvest, he is perhaps a bit too hospitable when considering (though without indorsement) some of the aspects of "psychical research" which are unassimilable with the position which he favors; but he wishes to indicate frontiers as well as settled territory. Under the pragmatic survey he includes the psychology of the learning process—naturally in brief compass—and the story of how the mind as well as the world which it knows unfolds. He looks outward as well as inward, discusses what we bring to as well as what we get out of the life mental, how we meet the temptations and delusions of wrong thinking, how we develop the strengths or weaknesses of inherent capacity in character as well as in intelligence.

It requires so much space barely to enumerate the things which Mr. Ogden tells about that none is left to indicate the acts and scenes of his drama. Suffice it to say that he is sparing of incident, confines attention to significant movements of modern and pragmatic interests, shifts the scenery frequently but with an orderly plot, and gives a readable and useful picture of what the active psychologists of today are contributing to an understanding of the mental world. It is a pretty large order, but it is expertly filled within the limited facilities of a narrow volume.

JOSEPH JASTROW

A Rare Temper

From Goethe to Hauptmann. Studies in Changing Culture. By Camillo von Klenze. The Viking Press. $2.50.

A GREAT deal of criticism is being written in America and a great deal of what is being written is stimulating and amusing. But most of it is the result of merely personal reactions or else it limits itself to the merely rhetorical properties of letters—this is true of nearly all our criticism of poetry—or, like Mr. Spingarn's on the one hand or Mr. More's on the other, it derives from an antecedent embraced philosophy.

Now, there is still another kind of criticism of which we have very little, but of which, I am sure, we stand in great need. This kind of criticism regards literature as the articulate record of the history of human civilization. I say civilization because unluckily we lack the word Kultur, which, properly used, makes the necessary distinction between, let us say, machinery as an end and a symptom. Cultural history is the history of man's spirit, of the relations of the spirit to the world, of the reactions of the world upon the spirit. Properly pursued, it is the most philosophical kind of history. Criticism that derives from it and regards itself as integrated with it is the most philosophical kind of criticism.

We have so little of this kind of criticism because it can be practiced neither by the lean specialist nor by the bustling reviewer. To practice it you must have a command of practically all the major literatures in their original languages and you must in your own person sustain a relation to life that is broad, intense, flexible, and yet profoundly guided from within. Now, these are precisely the qualities that Dr. von Klenze brings to his task. That he is a professor is a happy accident for his students; that he is a professor of German is due to ancestral sympathies and practical exigencies. What makes him an important critic, especially in America, is that he both knows and experiences, that his vast scholarship is irradiated with life and thought. We have dullards who know the brilliant and charming minds that guess or blunder. The combination of knowledge with wit and vividness is rare.

I have dwelt on Dr. von Klenze's character and methods as a critic because these seem to me more in need of being emphasized than the particular subjects to which he has applied himself. He writes of the varying visions of Italy and their meaning, of the development of the romantic views of art, of two great typical mid-century temperaments, of naturalism in the drama as part of man's social history, and finally of that compassion for the disinherited which has produced perhaps the most important writing of modern time. He starts, far more properly and philosophically than is commonly thought, from a German center. But his vision sweeps Europe and America. His results are, both in method and in kind, calculated to deepen and vivify the proper study of literature among us.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Baroja

The Lord of Labraz. By Pio Baroja. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THIS is the seventh book published in America by a great writer whom Americans do not read, preferring to take their Spain from Ibáñez and the movies. Brandishing this seventh book the critics heap scorn on the American public—those imperial vulgarians to whom artists of all the world must come bearing their treasures—for their blindness in passing this great one by. But the scorn having been hurled, we can open the book and read.

Here we find people—Domingo Chiqui, for example, "who offended during many years the chivalrous sentiments of the city of Labraz . . . short rather than tall, merry and addicted to lying, and when it was a question of work, as light as a bar of lead. . . . His nose was long and hooked, and an Adam's apple rose from his throat like another crook desperately anxious to join his nose." When he died, from living too well, "his illness seemed to have sharpened his wits and added to his facetiousness, for at every instant he had some witty remark in his intricate language, so that laughter filled his bedroom instead of lamentation. . . . He consoled his friends with a grotesque account of the road of Purgatory he would have to tread and how he would tell St. Peter that, although a tavernkeeper, he had not often baptized his wine."

Here is Perico, "one of the Liberals of the town. To be liberal meant for him to be gruff and outspoken. He owned a plot of land and a vineyard which yielded him a bare sustenance, and spent his days in amazing the town. His mustache was of an alarming size, and he wore his hair long; his suits were too large for him, he wore a large hat and carried a huge stick."

Here is the romantic Goya, whose father the innkeeper married her to the accommodating Chiqui to prevent her being hounded out of the pious priest-ridden town, reading another novel. "This scene fills me with greater enthusiasm each time I read it. The Duke Rodolfo is about to enter the room of the dressmaker. I think he is her lover. Yes, he must be her lover; I have no doubt of it."

Here is the dying wife of Don Ramiro, looking older than he, thin and weak, dressed in black; "her nose was slender and slightly aquiline; her eyes gray and sunken; her mouth large and kindly, and her expression straightforward, open, and energetic"; and the beautiful Micaela with "her serene lack of passion and clear cold understanding of life," who was to supplant the wife and hasten her death and to waken for the first time in Don Ramiro's turbulent heart "a tendency to tenderness, a need of humiliation." Here is the priest, "a little ugly man, who out of egoism imagined that everything went well in the world," the organist with a "certain mystery in his face, with its long nose, narrow clean-shaven cheeks, wide forehead and the great silver spectacles," and his complete set of Voltaire locked up behind clerical treatises and stories of saints.

And finally, here is the town, with its unconscious hypocrisy. "The brutal instincts which were half restrained by the fear of hell and half excited by that loophole which hypocrisy affords to every vice had rendered the inhabitants of Labraz marvelously ferocious. During public festivals this ferocity found an outlet in the bullfights. . . . The young men, gentlemen and clowns, placed themselves behind the barricade, and when the bull pressed near them they would prick it, beat it over the muzzle, knock out one of its eyes if they could, and finally when an old bull or an old cow was led into the ring they would act as bullfighters and throw themselves upon it, holding it down and stabbing it with their knives until it was a mangled mass. After they had danced the jota, which is stupidity and ferocity converted into a tune, they drank a great deal, and returned to their houses to pray. The most dissolute inhabitants, when Holy Week came around, put on their penitential robes and walked in procession."

Here in short is an eye as keen as that of an old Dutch painter of peasant interiors, a feeling for every kind and circumstance of man, tolerance, understanding, sympathy; here is Voltaire ripping away the swaddlings from rottenness, and Ibsen wrestling with the inert mass of his people; here is a master comedian. All these are here in a rambling, helter-skelter story, poorly composed, as Baroja tells us himself with Shavian frankness, borrowing too much from too many people, or rather borrowing too hastily. Thus the plot might have made a Schiller epic, or a Selma Lagerlöf saga, or a Scott romance. Baroja started out to tell it all in dialogue, and portions remain which are still all dialogue. The chapters do not grow out of one another smoothly. They change in style and tempo and in intention. There is an artificiality about the mechanism of the story that takes us back to the time before Balzac and Flaubert and Turgenev welded the old ungainly elements in a new unity. It is as true and as fantastic as a Shaw play or a Dickens melodrama. One feels a master craftsman, disdainful of his craft, throwing his treasures at us in mad profusion. But that is by the way, for greatness makes its own forms and transcends forms. When we sort out the great books of the world we find that many of them fall into no category recognized before their time. And so here greatness has given us a badly composed, helterskelter book, ample as it is poignant, merry as it is scornful—another fleeting glimpse of that road between reality and our souls.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Books in Brief

Mothers in Industry. By Gwendolyn Hughes. The New Republic, Inc. $1.

The problems affecting working women are complicated by a host of social and economic preconceptions which like most preconceptions have their origin in kernels of truth long since withered. Analytic studies of the actual economic and social position of women workers clear the atmosphere of these old generalizations and are therefore of particular value. The Federal Women's Bureau has made a number of studies of the economic position of married women in several large industrial communities. These studies have considered women's wages, their contribution to the family income, and kindred economic facts. Now Dr. Hughes in a study of 728 working mothers in Philadelphia has gone a step further by securing information concerning the effects of wage-earning upon the children of these mothers, upon child-bearing, and upon the health and social conditions found in the home. Her study indicates that the majority of wage-earning mothers are forced into industry by economic necessity. A preliminary survey of 11,913 families in Philadelphia revealed the fact that only 6 per cent of this entire group were supported by the earnings of the husband alone. Furthermore Dr. Hughes has a mass of information showing that the mother in industry still remains the home-maker; that industry itself makes few concessions to the working mother in the way of special arrangements for working hours and nurseries; that the existence of a working mother does not necessarily mean a low standard of family welfare.

Other People's Daughters. Seventeen Stories from Real Life of City Girls and their Surroundings. By Eleanor Rowland Wembridge. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

The hybrid form of this book—its appearance in novel size, its easy running style, and its seventeen stories of young girls, their sweethearts, jobs, and families—requires a name as substantial as Mrs. Wembridge's to give it any semblance of scientific validity. But with such authority back of them the stories may be accepted as particularly brilliant examples of the popularized case history. Mrs. Wembridge presents stories illustrating various psychological mechanisms functioning in particular situations. Among these are day-dreams, wishes, adaptation, exhibitionism, compensation, imitation, sex, parental love, egotism, etc.

Federal Reserve Banking Practice. By H. Parker Willis and William H. Steiner. D. Appleton and Company. $10.

This immense work is practically an encyclopedia of matters connected with the Reserve System. The authors, who were formerly minor officials of the Federal Reserve Board, seem to have devoted most space to the subjects which most appealed to them. From the standpoint of the business man or the financial man, the allotment of about one-quarter of the work to agricultural credits and of 26 pages to the subject of financing manufacturer and merchant does seem disproportionate. Exactly five lines are devoted to the relations between the New York clearing-house and the Reserve system, while the writers seem never to have heard of the present relations of the system to the investment and speculative loan market despite several chapters on interest rates and the discount market. But while these blemishes properly detract from the value of the book, it remains the only good and full exposition of the system's practice.

The Northern Tribes of Nigeria. By C. K. Meek. Oxford University Press. Two volumes.

Mr. Meek has done an excellent service to ethnology; and it is interesting to note that this is a case in which the tail has wagged the dog. Originally setting out to make a census of Northern Nigeria, the author found the ethnological material gathered to be of such great interest and importance that he ended by giving it three-fourths of his space. Mr. Meek has had no easy task, for the area he describes is a truly marginal one, and every phase of culture presents a tangle of influences, from the coastal Negroid culture to the south and the Arab-Berber Mohammedan culture to the north, that is almost hopeless to unravel. In consequence we have a study which is very confusing, and this is as it should be, the material being what it is. There are some 235 tribes in the region. The census itself is a valuable collection of statistics, giving the names and numbers of the tribes, the occupations of the peoples, their civil condition, education, and religion.

Ixion in Heaven. By Benjamin Disraeli. Decorated by John Austen. Henry Holt and Company. $1.75.

A reprint of the least clever of Disraeli's three burlesques. The brilliance that in 1836 set fashionable London by the ears is now merely useful material for the student of mores. Disraeli was happiest, after all, when he had living personages to model from, as in "Vivian Grey." His forte is neither irony nor humor, but malice. And so these take-offs on Olympian conversations sound a little bodiless, particularly when we remember one Lucian of Samosata, who also wrote Dialogues of the Gods. John Austen's gravely malevolent illustrations which portray Jupiter and his family as bucks and belles of Victorian England are alone worth the price of the little book. Antimacassars, glass bowers, ormolu, leg-of-mutton sleeves, ornamental chin-whiskers—the entire paraphernalia are rendered with the most ridiculous seriousness and the greatest comic effect.

Drama

Broadway

BROADWAY, as every reader of the newspapers knows, is a world in itself, intricate, colorful, and varied. Into it are drawn all sorts and conditions of men ranging from the mere tough who has discovered opportunities for the exercise of his talents which the slums do not afford to the genuine artist who finds there the only market for abilities of a certain kind. And yet, various as are its denizens, they have something in common. They share a whole realm of private gossip, they possess volumes of "inside information" which leaks only in driblets to the outside world, and they are united by a common acquiescence in certain traditions and conventions which make the pattern of that life. Crooks and playwrights, night-club proprietors and actresses are all tacitly members of the same guild, they are collectively "of Broadway" just as really as they are by groups "of the underworld" or "of the theater." Theirs is a world as distinct from the rest of New York as the court of Charles II was distinct from the rest of London.

And if a certain tawdriness is inseparable from this glamorous existence there is no inherent reason why this same tawdriness should be shared by every artistic representation; yet somehow it always is. No play or novel which took Broadway as its theme has ever, I think, made very much of the materials at hand. No writer has yet done for Times Square what "Main Street" did for the small town or the novels of Edith Wharton did for New York society, though it is an entity as distinct and as interesting as either. Last year George Kaufman, whom one might have thought equal to the task, got as far as that highly promising title "The Butter and Egg Man" and then relapsed into purely artificial farce, while Sidney Howard, putting forth a more serious effort, allowed "Lucky Sam McCarver" to slip from his grasp. Whoever has known Broadway well enough to represent it has somehow been corrupted by it; whatever has been about Broadway has been of Broadway also, and that, of course, is fatal to art which, of necessity, implies a transcendence of the material it employs. No one has yet appeared who has encompassed the region of White Lights as Sinclair Lewis encompassed that of his chosen region, no one, that is to say, who has been at once so intimate with and yet aloof from its life and its mores.

All the strictures which have been offered here apply in full force to the play which Philip Dunning has fashioned in conjunction with that extraordinarily stage-wise actor, George Abbott, and which has been comprehensively labeled "Broadway" (Broadhurst Theater). Every element which goes to make it up has been carefully and skilfully calculated for the meridian of Forty-second Street; scene has been linked to scene by people who not only have an uncanny sense of theatrical effectiveness but have, besides, a delicate finger upon the pulse of the public—by people who know, for example, that though in melodrama the distressed maid must still be rescued by the sober lover, we must now give to the triumph of virtue a half comic, half cynical air. Decidedly "Broadway" is of the region which it undertakes to portray. Yet within the limits here implied nothing can be given to the piece but superlative praise; it is magnificently successful in achieving its purpose.

For the scene the authors have chosen the back room of a night club in which wholesale bootleggers pursuing their business and members of the homicide squad looking for evidence mingle with the cabaret girls who come in quarreling to change their costumes and exit in the first step of their dance. Not only have they realized to the full the obvious picturesque possibilities of this scene but they have, moreover, turned the trick which is the secret of every successful melodrama; they have, that is to say, contrived a story which is centuries old in all its essentials but novel in all its external dress. Here is the sleek, sinister villain matched against the simple-minded hero for the love of the inexperienced girl, here is the unexpected murder done by the revengeful woman, and here, too, is the officer of the law who slips discreetly away when he realizes that justice, though irregular, has been done. But here as well is a locale new at least in the sense that it has never been so effectively used before, and here is dialogue whose liveliness, verisimilitude, and flavor constantly rise far above the intellectual level of the plot. The result is that even the sophisticated spectator finds the old situations made surprisingly effective once more. "Broadway" is the first substantial hit of the new season, and it deserves its success since no more effective melodrama has been produced here in years. To the general it is a perfect play; even to the judicious it is continuously entertaining; and, the stage being what it is, no person who attends the theater often should miss it. Indeed, I suspect that very few will; the chances are that this day next year will see it still playing to enthusiastic audiences.

Those who like operettas in the Viennese style will get their money's worth and more at "Countess Maritza" (Shubert Theater), which the Shuberts have planned in accordance with the same policy which has guided them in the production of various other elaborate musical comedies during the last year or two. There is acceptable music of the "Blue Danube" sort, lusty singing by a large company, and a general air of profuseness in everything. Some of the dancing and the comic relief rises well above the level of the usual musical comedy standard. "Scotch Mist" (Klaw Theater) is a polite comedy-drama centering about the career of a lady who was generally regarded as light but whose indiscretions were due solely to the fact that her brilliant political husband didn't understand her. The dialogue has the ease and smartness made familiar by many English comedies, but otherwise the play is undistinguished. Rosalind Fuller and Philip Merivale head the cast, but the best performance is given by David Tearle in the role of an amiable rotter.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LECTURES

"Social Thought in Victorian Literature"
Course of Eight Lectures
By ROBERT MORSS LOVETT, A. B.
in the COMMUNITY CHURCH AUDITORIUM
Park Avenue and 34th Street
On THURSDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 14, 21, 28, Nov. 4, 11, 18, Dec. 2, 9, at 8:15 P. M.
Course tickets, $4.50, can be secured in advance at the Office of the COMMUNITY CHURCH
12 Park Avenue, New York City. Single Admission 75c.

At the RAND SCHOOL
7 E. 15th St.

V. F. CALVERTON
CONTEMPORARY WRITERS AND SOCIAL THOUGHT
Fridays, 8:30 p.m., Oct. 1 to Nov. 5
PROF. HENRY E. CRAMPTON
THE EVOLUTION OF LIFE
Saturdays, 2 p.m., Oct. 2 to Oct. 23
VERNON LOGGINS
MODERN POETRY: LECTURES AND READINGS
Saturdays, 4 p.m., Oct. 2 to Dec. 18

International Relations Section

British Labor in Transition

By SCOTT NEARING

THE Trades Union Congress which met at Scarborough in September, 1925, was full of dynamite. From the presidential address of A. B. Swales, through the resolutions on imperialism and world-labor unity, the delegates vied with one another in their efforts to go "left." It was a militant congress, facing big issues with vigor and resolve. A year later many of the same delegates met at Bournemouth in a very different frame of mind. Meanwhile, there had been a general strike; the miners had been locked out for four months, and the British workers were facing a general employing-class offensive against their working hours and their standards of living. Representatives of the Russian Trade Unions spoke at Scarborough, amid general approbation. These same representatives were excluded from the British Isles by the Home Office when they applied for permission to visit Bournemouth.

Evidently the general strike has had a profound effect on the British labor movement. As President Pugh said in his Bournemouth address, it is undoubtedly the most important event in the past half century of British labor history. It was for this reason that the general strike was not discussed at the Bournemouth conference. The General Council of Trades Union Congress, which made the program and directed the conference proceedings, safeguarded itself in every possible way against having to stand a discussion of the general strike from the floor. There were many informal comments made during the conference, but all direct discussion was ruled out of order by the Chair.

The contrast between Scarborough and Bournemouth was particularly noticeable because, with a few minor exceptions, the same men and women who sat on the platform at Scarborough occupied platform seats at Bournemouth. There was a new president, of course, but the militant president of last year was the silent vice-president of this. J. H. Thomas, his work completed for the moment, was away in Canada. George Hicks played no part in the Bournemouth Congress. A. A. Purcell gave no fighting lead and made no vigorous speeches. His comments on international unity, in contrast with those of 1925, savored of the caution of John Clynes. Fred Bramley, last year's secretary, had died. His place was filled by the assistant secretary, W. M. Citrine. Bevin played his usual role of political major-domo to the movement. The other members of the General Council were nervously quiet.

The whole British movement has faced a general strike. President Pugh declared that the delegates did not assemble in any penitent mood. J. H. Clynes described their temper as "reflective." They were beaten; and very badly frightened, not so much by the Government as by the fierce vigor with which the rank and file of the labor movement responded to the strike call and carried on during the period of the strike.

President Pugh, in his opening remarks, said that the supreme lesson of the strike was the belief of the rank and file in the principles of democracy. The Government did its best to provoke violence: "Nothing but the restraint, forbearance, and good sense of our members prevented the agents of the Government fomenting a revolutionary temper and plunging the country into conditions of civil war." These provocations could not succeed, according to Chairman Pugh, because "the British people have set themselves to achieve their aims by the methods of democracy, which means in politics the parliamentary system and in economic life a system of collective trade-union effort."

It is along these lines that the advances will be made, Pugh insisted: "We have had a Labor Government. . . . What is more to my present purpose, we have our deeply rooted trade-union movement, powerful, efficient, well-organized, the instrument by which the working people have begun to secure and will, I am convinced, ultimately accomplish industrial and economic freedom. It is not a question of altering our fundamental aim or the direction of our efforts and our thoughts, but rather one of a continuous strengthening and broadening of our ranks to embrace all who accept our principles and have a conviction of the justice of our cause and sympathy with our ideals."

Continuing his argument in favor of traditional thinking and acting, Pugh said: "When the unions combined their forces last May they were not invoking any new principle of industrial action, but simply asserting more effectively on a larger scale the traditional trade-union refusal to accept dictated terms of employment whether from the employers or the Government."

This was the tone of the General Council at the time of the general strike. It was their attitude at the Bournemouth Congress: "Nothing out of the ordinary has happened. The general strike was merely an enlarged industrial dispute. Business as usual!"

The British ruling class talked that way during and after the Great War. But with all the talk they never have made good. The war did make a difference. British trade-union leaders talked that way during and after the general strike. They are wasting their breath. The strike has made a profound difference which no verbal denials can modify. The real lesson of the strike was not a lesson in democracy at all, but a lesson in dictatorship. When the strike was threatened the Government invoked the Emergency Powers Act of 1920; divided the country into districts with a civil commissioner over each; took over the essential services, such as food, fuel, transport, etc., and under the provisions of the Emergency Act arrested and jailed people merely for having certain types of literature in their possession. Baldwin "played cricket" with MacDonald and Thomas till he felt that he was in danger of losing the game. Then, by an executive act, he shifted the game and changed the rules.

Pugh and his backers still talk about the principles of democracy. But they have been face to face with a dictatorship. Their experience has driven them from the leadership of the British labor movement.

The general strike was the biggest event in recent British labor history, but it was taboo at Bournemouth, not, as the leaders asserted, because its discussion might prejudice the case of the miners, while their lockout was still in progress, but because the leaders could not face the implications of the general strike. The issue will be gone into, perfunctorily, at some future conference of trade-union executives, but it will not be threshed at any central point by accredited representatives of the rank and file. The Trade Union Congress leaders have turned that job over to the minority. They cannot face the general strike issue because the general strike was a challenge to the whole theory on which MacDonald has built his Labor Party as well as to the traditional practices of British trade unionism. In a very real sense, therefore, the Bournemouth conference was the swan-song of the present generation of British labor leaders. They presented no line of policy, advocated no program, and blocked every effort at policy making. Ideologically, their epoch ended with the Russian Revolution of 1917. Practically the general strike proved their coup de grace.

Of course, these men and women are not out of the movement. They have merely stopped leading. They will continue to hold their places until they are taken away by a leadership of the new generation. Meanwhile, the British labor movement will continue to be as it is today, in a fog of purposeless uncertainty; the chosen leaders out of the fight; the new leadership not yet designated; the masses struggling, resigned, militant as circumstances dictate.

Color and World Migration

THE People, a weekly published at Lahore, in its issue of July 25, prints the following report of a speech delivered by L. Lajpat Rai at the World Migration Congress in London during the last week in June:

I am here to express the point of view of Asia in general and of India in particular, and as I am the only speaker for that vast beehive of humanity, I hope you will in the matter of time show me somewhat greater indulgence than perhaps you may otherwise be inclined to do.

Let me tell you most candidly that the questions with which you are dealing are perhaps among the most important of those which are going to influence favorably or otherwise the cause of peace in the world. It is perfectly true that Asia is just now in a condition of subordination and her voice does not count for much in the affairs of mankind. But it must not be forgotten that this was not always so and there is no guaranty that it is going to be so for a very long time. It will be a short-sighted policy then, which is not likely to further the cause of humanity at large, including that portion of humanity which resides in Europe and America, to ignore the interests and rights, even sentiments and prejudices, fears and hopes of the peoples of Asia.

Our complaint against you is not that you do not open the doors of your countries to us unreservedly but that you have in the past two centuries, by the use of political, military, and economic weapons, not only compelled us to work for you on your own terms but that after we have labored for you and given you of our best, you have thrown us out most mercilessly, and added insult to injury. If you will look at the history of emigration from India during the last hundred years, you will find that the majority of our emigrants were taken to different parts of the British Empire and to some foreign countries by a system of indentured labor, which was hardly distinguishable from forced labor, and men and women were taken to Natal, Fiji, Guiana, the West Indies, and later to other places. At the time certain promises were given to our people of being allowed to settle on terms of equality in the countries of immigration, which are now being abrogated on various grounds, some of them seemingly substantial and others patently unsubstantial. Even now we have no desire to thrust ourselves on any country whatsoever. We have compelled our Government to abolish indentured recruitment and we have also placed on the statute book an emigration law which forbids the emigration of labor without the permission of the Government and the Indian Legislature. We perfectly recognize the right of all self-governing states and communities to regulate immigration into their countries, but what we insist upon is that those of our people who have already settled in other countries, particularly where they were taken under certain agreements and certain promises, and the descendants of those settlers should be placed in a position of equality with the other people of those countries. The anomaly of the present position is that while the white people of the world demand their right to exclude non-white people from the countries of which they have taken possession by one means or another (sometimes even by force or fraud) they themselves want complete freedom to move about wherever they find it profitable to do so. These rights they enforce by the use of the political and military powers that they possess. Let me illustrate what I mean by referring to the conditions regarding my own country.

We are not only being excluded from the United States, South Africa, Canada, Australia, and other countries but our men who have gone to settle there quite lawfully are being turned out from those countries under different pleas, of inferior civilization, insanitary habits, and lower standards of life. While this is being done in the interests of white labor, the white governments are forcing upon us their own skilled labor to the detriment of our people. It comes to this: heads you win, tails we lose. You will not have our skilled labor, but you will thrust your own skilled labor on us. Now, may I ask you if this is not unfair, nay, cruel? I put it to you, would you tolerate this if you were treated accordingly? You may take it from me that although we are at present helpless to remedy this state of things and to maintain our rights, we cannot be expected to bless such a system and to tolerate it for a long time. How long is this to continue? If continued unchecked, it can only end in disaster, the responsibilities of which will be entirely upon your shoulders. We do not want to encroach on anyone's rights provided no one else encroaches on ours. If the white countries of the world can exclude us, our skilled and unskilled workers, we insist on having the same right to exclude others.

We have, gentlemen, heard a great deal about civilization, standards of life, and other things. I have no desire to retort, but let me tell you that we are not prepared to accept the validity of these pleas. The poorest classes of our people have virtues of their own, which are not very common in the poorest classes of your countries. This is the same argument which your own rich and propertied classes use against our workers. The poorer classes all over the world are ignorant, dirty, and uncivilized, for which capitalism and imperialism are solely responsible. If your argument is valid against us, that of your propertied classes will be equally valid against you. Let us, therefore, dismiss all these arguments, which are born of arrogance, pride, and greed. Let us remember that the cause of the worker all over the world is one and the same. By all means protect your rights against unfair competition, but if the only way to do so is by a policy of exclusion and segregation, then goodby to the unity and solidarity of the working classes. You may lay down your standards, provided you do not make them unattainable; but you must treat equally all who are prepared to accept and adopt them. In your struggle with capitalism you are throwing the whole weight of the colored workers of the world against you. This will not enable you to maintain your civilization; the result will be to the contrary. For God's sake, then, away with race and color pride, and with the pride of your superior civilization—a civiliza-

A Novel of Twisted Marriage

STRANGERS

by

Dorothy Van Doren

"ASTONISHES me as a first novel—it is so skilful and assured; it might have been done by such a veteran as May Sinclair. And its characters are challenging and provocative in their uncompromising reality.

"Ann is the most disturbing 'modern' young wife that has yet got into fiction." —Floyd Dell.

$2.00 at booksellers

DORAN BOOKS

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

THE FIRST CIVILIZED AMERICAN

By Phillips Russell

This book rescues a great American from the myth-makers and endeavors to present him as he was in his living dimensions—mirthful, curious, companionable, loyal to his own creed, a hater of oppressions and falsities, a lover of mankind, song and witty women.

It presents new evidence and contains many heretofore unpublished documents that reveal Franklin in a new light and serve but to increase his stature. Profusely illustrated with rare prints, photographs and letters. $5.00

BRENTANO'S

Publishers New York

You Need It Every Day—

If you value correctness and scope of vocabulary—accuracy of information about words, people, places—convenience in securing facts on a wide variety of daily questions—then you are in need, every day, of the ready fund of knowledge offered in

WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY

The Best Abridged Dictionary

It is based upon Webster's New International

This handy book is indispensable. 106,000 entries, and many valuable sections, including General Vocabulary; Pronouncing Gazetteer; Pronouncing Biographical Dictionary; Foreign Words and Phrases; Guide to Punctuation, Use of Capitals, etc.; Abbreviations Used in Writing and Printing; 1700 illustrations; and many other features.

New Words—Do you know the meaning and pronunciation of dactylogram, escadrille, Hooverize?—the identity of Cabell, Gluck, Cecil?—the location of the Far Eastern Republic, Chemin des Dames, Monte Adamello? These are but a few of the up-to-date entries in Webster's Collegiate.

A SHORT CUT TO ACCURATE INFORMATION

The thin-paper edition is especially handsome and convenient to handle. Art Canvas binding, $5.00; Fabrikoid, $6.00; Leather, $7.50.

Purchase of your bookseller; or send order and remittance direct to us; or write for information. Free specimen pages if you mention this periodical.

G. & C. Merriam Co.
Springfield Mass.

PREPARE FOR WINTER NOW!

You can ensure yourself one evening's pleasant reading a week during the coming winter by devoting it to

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

You will like its freshness of viewpoint coupled with the accuracy of its facts.

It is a store-house of information on international politics, European trends of thought, current English literature, and cultural developments the world over.

The intellectually inclined in more than sixty countries depend on The Manchester Guardian Weekly to keep them furnished with reliable information on all important world happenings and on new trends of thought in various countries.

MAIL THIS COUPON

To The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
222 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed to me direct from Manchester, England.

Name .....

Address .....

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

tion which has invented submarines, bombs, and poison gas. Let us come to some harmonious and brotherly understanding which will advance the cause of humanity and peace. Asia wants nothing but justice and fair play. If you refuse it, you refuse it at your peril, which may not be imminent, but which nothing can prevent. Now, this is not the language of a threat, it is a plea which I submit to you in all humility and respect and with the greatest good-will. There is an undercurrent going on in the colored world which is bound to subvert the existing order of things if you do not look ahead.

Let me also say one word about the distinction which is being made between political and economic grounds. The line of demarcation is very thin. The colored world thinks that your political leaders use the political weapon, and your labor leaders use the other. For the colored people of the world there is not much to choose between the two, as the result under either plea is their subordination, exploitation, exclusion, and segregation. The subject you are dealing with is of the greatest importance. Do not play fast and loose with it, but develop a policy which is considerate and humane. We of Asia will help and cooperate with the greatest possible good-will.

Contributors to This Issue

WYNANT DAVIS HUBBARD recently spent three years on his farm in Rhodesia.

W. E. WOODWARD is the author of "Bunk," "Lottery," and other volumes.

CARLETON BEALS is in Mexico, making a study of social and political institutions.

JAMES RORTY is one of the editors of the New Masses.

HARRY KEMP is the author of "Tramping on Life," and "More Miles," to be published this month.

THOMAS MUNRO is professor of fine arts at the University of Pennsylvania.

JOSEPH JASTROW is professor of psychology at the University of Wisconsin.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN is the author of "Up Stream" and "Israel."

ALICE BEAL PARSONS is the author of "Woman's Dilemma."

SCOTT NEARING is the author of "Education in Soviet Russia," and other books. He attended the British Trades Union Congress which met at Bournemouth last month.

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Louise Strong. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 847 East Ohio Street, Chicago

HONDURAS
(Yellow Hills)
SALVADOR (Green Valleys) NICARAGUA (Orange Dawn)
GUATEMALA (Pine Gardens) Rainbow Countries of Central America COSTA RICA (Red Earth)
By WALLACE THOMPSON
Colorful description, romantic history and a wealth of information as to agriculture, highways, trade, people and their lives, education and thought, unite to make this book an alluring introduction to an accessible, neglected wonderland. Illustrated with 30 half tones. $5.00
E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 5th Avenue, N. Y.

The New School for Social Research

Registration begins September 27
School Year begins October 4

HARRY E. BARNES—Intellectual History of Europe. Wednesday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

FRANZ BOAS—Race and Culture. Tuesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Twelve lectures)

NATHANIEL PEFFER—Imperialism and Its Practical Implications. Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

EDWIN B. HOLT—Psychology of Response. Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Ten lectures)

JOHN B. WATSON AND OTHERS—Behaviorism and Psychoanalysis. Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Twelve lectures)

S. FERENCZI—Selected Chapters in the Theory and Practice of Psychoanalysis. Tuesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

IRA S. WILE—Conduct Disorders in Childhood. Monday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

FRANKWOOD E. WILLIAMS—Mental Hygiene—Its Personal and Social Aspects. Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

LEO WOLMAN—The Labor Movement in the National Life. Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

NORMAN B. WARE—Rise of the Modern Labor Movement. Wednesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

PAUL SINGER—Social and Economic Functions of International Banking. Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

WALTER W. STEWART—Current Tendencies in Finance. Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Twelve lectures)

EDWIN W. KOPF—Insurance History of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Twelve lectures)

FREDERICK R. MACAULAY—Principles of Statistical Method. Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

H. W. L. DANA—Literature Since 1918. Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

STARK YOUNG—The Theatrical Season, 1926-27. Tuesday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

WALDO FRANK AND OTHERS—Modern Art. Wednesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Twelve lectures)

TERRY RAMSAYE—The Motion Picture. Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M. (Twelve lectures)

ARTHUR F. PAYNE — Technique of Vocational Guidance. Friday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN—Fundamental Problems in Adult Education. Wednesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

EDUARD C. LINDEMAN—Method and Content of Adult Education. Monday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

HARRY A. OVERSTREET—Practice Course in Adult Education. Tuesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

LETA S. HOLLINGWORTH—Educational Psychology. Thursday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

Tuition for course of eighteen lectures, $20; for twelve lectures, $15

Write for Catalogue

465 West Twenty-third Street, New York City

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1926 No. 3197

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 365

EDITORIALS
- Sweet Land of Buncombe ..
- Starvation and Surrender 368
- Complete 369
- The American Past 370

REAL ESTATE — HUMAN LIVES IN FLORIDA. By [illegible] 371

GEORGE WASHINGTON—THE IMAGE AND THE MAN
- III Aborse. By W. E. Woodward 372

FREE SPEECH (?) IN CINCINNATI. By Mary D. Brite 374

A BATTLE OF EDITORS. By Frances Paul 375

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 376

CORRESPONDENCE 377

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- [illegible] the Land of Contentment. By [illegible] 379

SOME NOTABLE FALL BOOKS 380

FALL BOOK SECTION

POEMS:
- Animula Vagula. By Babette Deutsch 381
- The River. By James Rorty 382
- Dark Summer. By Louise Bogan 382
- Text for a Bitter Vision. By Rolfe Humphries 382

THE ROAD TO THE SPRING. By Mary Austin 383

JAMES RALPH, JACK OF ALL LITERARY TRADES. By R. P. Dibble 384

AN UNKNOWN POET. By Ludwig Lewisohn 384

THE PLASTIC ARTIST IN AMERICA. By Ralph M. Pearson 384

BOOKS:
- First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 385
- The Democratizing of Civilization. By William Linn Westermann 386
- Primitive Sculpture. By Joseph Wood Krutch 387
- New Lights. By Zona Gale 387
- A Cure for Democracy. By H. L. Mencken 388
- The Rape of the Lock. By H. S. Jennings 389
- "Little Golden Guinea." By John Macy 390
- The Religion of the State. By J. A. Hobson 391
- The Yankees. By Clarence Walworth Alvord 392
- God as History. By Shirley Jackson Case 393
- Books in Brief 394
- Music: Music and the External World. By B. H. Haggin 395
- Drama: Alloy. By Joseph Wood Krutch 396

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: No. 38 South Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London W. C. 1, England.

PROHIBITION sops up political interest like a sponge, leaving other issues high and dry. In the New York State campaign, for instance, rum and personalities crowd all else out of sight. There are issues, of water-power, State ownership, methods of taxation, which a decade hence will matter more to the people of the State; but today it is Wet vs. Dry, and "Al" vs. "Jim." "Al" is, as his opponent says, running for two offices—for Governor in 1926 and for President in 1928. He will, of course, win the former post; but his hope of the latter will be dimmed unless he can send his running-mate, Judge Wagner, to the United States Senate in place of Mr. Wadsworth. Senator Wadsworth holds a logically absurd but politically strong position: he is himself an avowed Wet, but his party's platform is relatively Dry. The Dry Republicans, who have nominated Franklin P. Cristman in opposition to the squire of Geneseo, are in a dilemma. They may win sweet revenge by defeating the Wet candidate of their Dry party, but only at the cost of electing the Wet candidate of a Wet party. The Democratic platform flatfootedly asks to "change the narrow, senseless definition of what constitutes an intoxicating beverage, as set forth in the Volstead Act, so as to permit light wines and beers." The Republican platform is emphatic in demanding rigid law enforcement as long as the Eighteenth Amendment and Volstead Act are on the books. But as to the referendum upon the desirability of changing the law the Republicans speak as a crab walks: "The referendum," their platform says, "gives all the opportunity to express themselves. We urge a full expression at the polls on this matter."

THREE AND A HALF MILLION tons of American-mined coal have been shipped to British ports since the coal strike began. Soft coal was not exported to England until this year; and it is this American coal, together with four and a half million tons of continental coal, that has broken the British strike. Yet the American Federation of Labor still insists that each nation's labor problems are its own, and refuses international federation.

FORTY-THREE MINERS trapped underground for five days! This is such a familiar news story that it is rarely found on the front page of the newspapers. But forty-three miners trapped for five days and then rescued alive and uninjured—that receives the news position of honor. At Ironwood, Michigan, this happy ending to the usual mine disaster took place; the men were imprisoned by a cave-in caused indirectly by a recent earthquake; in every miner's life the possibility of such an accident looms large, and he is prepared to meet it. These men had nothing to eat, but five gallons of kerosene and a birchbark brew made with the water that is always running down the shafts furnished them with heat and a substitute for nourishment. They waited, knowing that efforts to rescue them were going on. Their wives and children waited also, outside the shaft, in dumb fear of the usual result. When the rescuers at last crawled through to them, forty were asleep and three were standing watch. There were three others caught in the beginning of the slide who were less fortunate. Their bodies were taken out the first day. But forty-three to three is a good ratio in mine accidents, considering that 25,000 miners have been killed in the United States during the last ten years. It is a pity that the lucky forty-three could not have enjoyed the company of some of the gentlemen who believe that miners are overpaid. Waiting without food, in wet, dirty clothes, 120 hours for rescue that may never come must be a fairly enlightening experience.

A COMMENDABLE STRAIN of common sense and desire for justice runs through the opinion of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals at St. Louis reversing the decision of the lower tribunal in regard to the Teapot Dome oil lease, obtained by Harry F. Sinclair and others from Albert B. Fall when the latter was Secretary of the Interior. The higher court orders that the lease be canceled and that Sinclair's company account for the oil already taken. The decision, which was rendered by former United States Senator William S. Kenyon, with Judges A. S. Van Valkenburgh and W. A. Kent concurring, lays down the principle:

> If a government official, engaged in making contracts for the government, receives pecuniary favors from one with whom such contracts are made, a fraud is committed on the government, and it matters not that the government is subjected to no pecuniary loss or that the contract might have been an advantageous one to it.

The government, it will be recalled, submitted evidence that Secretary Fall had received a sum of money from Mr. Sinclair after the lease. The defense held that this was a loan and was repaid, but the Circuit Court of Appeals declares there is no evidence of the payment of either interest or principal. The court says further:

> A trail of deceit, falsehood, subterfuge, bad faith, and corruption, at times indistinct but nevertheless discernible, runs through the transactions incident to and surrounding the making of this lease.

THIS DECISION makes the outlook good for an eventual and not too distant victory by the government in its attempt to reclaim the Elk Hills oil reserve in California and the Teapot Dome reservoir in Wyoming, both of which were bartered to private interests by Secretary Fall. The lease of the Elk Hills tract to E. L. Doheny was ordered to be canceled by the first court before which it came. This ruling was later upheld by the Circuit Court of Appeals at San Francisco and the case is now awaiting final decision by the United States Supreme Court. The Sinclair lease will also be carried to the Supreme Court, without question. The two cases involve similar principles and, as the weight of legal opinion to date is strongly on the side of cancelation, we may reasonably look for a final decision returning both properties to the government. But in addition to the civil suits there is an equally important criminal prosecution pending against the two Dohenys and Messrs. Sinclair and Fall which is dawdling along in a way to sicken anyone who tries to reconcile court procedure with justice. This prosecution, involving charges of bribery and conspiracy to defraud the government, has got almost nowhere in two and a half years, none of the defendants having yet been required as much as to set foot in court. Another technical motion in the case was disposed of on October 2, favorably to the government, the newspaper dispatches say. Yet it doesn't sound so very favorable when we read further that the defendants may still ask—and no doubt will—for either one of two writs to keep the case from actually going to trial. And beyond this do there lie other subterfuges?

THE GERMAN RAILWAY BONDS—which are the key to the present plans for Franco-German reconciliation—have a par value of eleven billion German gold marks and bear a 5 per cent annual interest. They came into existence when the German railroads were denationalized under the Dawes Plan and turned over to a "private" company. This German Railway Company is a fiction. Its directors are simply employees and its bonds are held in trust for the Powers receiving reparations by a Frenchman, M. Léon Delacroix. The company pays interest on the bonds from its profits, and this interest—amounting, together with 1 per cent amortization, to about 660,000,000 marks annually—represents the railway's quota in each annuity distributed by Mr. Parker Gilbert among Germany's reparation creditors. The railroads, in other words, have been pawned to the Allies, and the Germans who are running them are doing so for the Reparation Commission. At present M. Delacroix has these bonds in his safe at Luisenstrasse 33, Berlin. The bonds have no actual value until they are floated on the open market. Now, it is no light task to put eleven billion marks in bonds on the market. There is probably not enough ready cash on all the bourses of all the continents to absorb one-half of them. M. Delacroix suggests beginning with a billion or two gold marks, and adds that "to avoid abrupt disturbances of the exchange it would be desirable to distribute the amount of the issue as much as possible among the ultimate recipient countries, that is to say, among he countries to which the proceeds of the issue are to be finally assigned directly or indirectly." In a word, America will again be called upon to finance the venture.

VISCOUNT D'ABERNON, the retiring British ambassador in Berlin, will probably go home a disappointed man. After he had braved French anger to lay the foundations of the Locarno pacts and of the English orientation for Germany which was to have followed, the clever Briand snatched away the palms of victory. At Geneva D'Abernon's chief, Sir Austen Chamberlain, was left in the cold while Stresemann and the French Foreign Minister powwowed at breakfast, dinner, tea, and supper. This new friendship is probably a mirror of the Franco-German economic rapprochement practical signs of which are beginning to multiply. Iron pact, potash combine, steel trust, German aid for the franc—these are only the most conspicuous. Moreover, France has much to give, Britain very little. Briand can promise to make the Rhineland armies of occupation "invisible," to permit the restoration of Eupen and Malmedy, to recommend abolition of the Inter-Allied Military Control Commission. For these favors Germany would have to pay, in railroad bonds apparently. And despite the petulance of Poincaré events are moving Briand's way. French and German steel interests have combined, and even the killing of two German civilians by French occupation troops does not weigh against that potent fact.

THE AMERICAN EXPERT who has been attempting to reorganize Polish finances declares that considering her start from zero "Poland has made greater progress in the last six years than any other nation in Europe." But for all his optimism Poland's politicians seem loath to accept Mr. Kemmerer's suggestions of further paths of progress. The Diet, which General Pilsudski, for all his loud talk, did not dissolve, has rejected the Government budget by a vote of 206 to 90. The Government apparently planned to get along without a Diet and to continue à la Mussolini, but suddenly changed its mind and resigned. General Pilsudski then took office as Prime Minister. The New York World's correspondent adds this footnote:

> More unexpected even than the resignation—in view of the time and occasion—was the unprecedented visit of the American Minister, John B. Stetson, Jr., and French Ambassador Larouche to Premier Bartel in the midst of the crisis.
>
> The purpose of their visit and the purport of their conversations are shrouded in secrecy, but the common comment here is that the two diplomats impressed upon Bartel the bad impression that would be created abroad if the Diet was dissolved and the Government carried on as unconstitutional dictators after such an overwhelming defeat.

Well-informed circles here, while expressing surprise at this apparent foreign intervention in a Polish domestic crisis, admit that France's treaty relations with Poland and America's financial interest in the country through recent investments might easily account for such action.

Is this what the State Department calls "avoiding European entanglements"?

A SORRY PICTURE of England is painted by the Dean of St. Paul's in his recent book on the British Empire. "English naval supremacy is at an end. . . . Our position as a world power is thus permanently altered for the worse." England, "for idealistic reasons," has dismantled its "splendid air force, thus making it impossible for us to back our counsels of moderation with any threat of coercion." "Events have shown that to rely upon the help of the United States would be to trust in a broken reed." In the event of any attack on England, the United States would help only if the invader were a "black army." Dean Inge not only describes the erstwhile mistress of the seas as alone, friendless, without an ally on either side of the Atlantic, without a fleet worth mentioning, but as grieved by this isolation, desiring an alliance of English-speaking nations, yearning for the hand of fellowship, struggling for peace. Nor do England's troubles end there; she is torn by fraternal strife—or perhaps not quite fraternal strife, since India and Egypt have hardly been accepted as blood brothers. This, of course, is a tale to rend the heart. The gloomy dean's remedy is simple: plain living and high thinking. Plain living might help; plain speaking might help even more.

"THE RADIO IS A FAILURE," says Thomas A. Edison, "so far as music is concerned." It is, he says, good for news and for reports of ball games and boxing matches—and political conventions, we would add—but the distortion of music is too great. "After the novelty has worn off," says Mr. Edison, "the phonograph will reclaim its own." And so the great inventor starts what may be the first rumble of a great collapse. We Americans are a people of passions, but they pass. We all rode bicycles—today we have left the bicycle to the small boy. Millions of us played Mah Jongg—who plays it now? We devoted our evenings to cross-word puzzles—who still remembers "ern" and "ai" and "Ra"? We tinkered endlessly with radios, and installed new sets in rapid succession; radio shops sprouted on every corner, their noisy horns vieing with the blasts of the autotrucks. And now Mr. Edison says that there is no more money in radio for the dealers. Fourteen million Ford cars have rolled out of the Ford factories; today the experts say that the country is turning sour on Fords, and Henry is working hard on his "air flivver." What will be the next craze?

THE INDEFATIGABLE E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS, not content with dispensing millions of drops of pure literature and speculation in the form of his Little Blue Books at four to ten cents each, has added the Haldeman-Julius Quarterly to his long list of publications. It is a sizeable, bustling magazine, containing almost 200 pages of stories, articles, and pictures and an incredible number of editorials and short pieces by Mr. Haldeman-Julius himself. From old-fashioned "free-thinking" to modern architecture, from George Sand's amours to Sinclair Lewis's Sunday School class at Kansas City, the subjects cover a range wide enough for everyone. Like the Little Blue Books, the Quarterly offers nuggets of wisdom mixed with sensationalism, ideas presented energetically, briefly, easily, for the consumption of the many. This is the American democratic ideal, the ideal of popular education, and in a country of one hundred million persons, most of whom are unfamiliar with ideas, it is immensely valuable. Mr. Haldeman-Julius disclosed that the biggest seller of his five-cent classics was Plato; this is a feat to boast of. It may be that this energetic publisher is about to perform another feat—that of publishing a quarterly magazine whose circulation will run into the tens of thousands.

FROM DORCHESTER, England, comes to the American newspapers for October 3 a piece of literary intelligence which in none of the reaches of the imagination could be called a scoop. The correspondent, acting for the Associated Press, whispers to the American public that Thomas Hardy, "the aged dean of English literature," "is spending the twilight of his life at his home here in penning poetry—the first love of his youth. With the fiction which made him famous he is probably finished. . . . Just what he is writing is not divulged, as he is offering nothing for publication. Whether the poems ever will be given to the public is a matter which has not been decided." This, with some modification of the references to Mr. Hardy's age, would have been news in 1896. Today with half a dozen published volumes of verse behind him, and with the reputation, earned at the cost of thirty years' labor, of being perhaps the best of contemporary British poets, Mr. Hardy need not be set down as a novice of eighty-six fumbling with his first love. "With the fiction which made him famous" he was finished before the present century. His poems and his verse plays, given to the world with no reticence whatever and as soon as they were done, have all this time been making him as famous as any man would want to be. We wince a little at thought of the cost of this cable. The correspondent would have done as well to sit down and write a letter, using his leisure to look into the facts.

HENRY T. FINCK, for many years musical critic and editorial writer for the New York Evening Post and The Nation, was no pompous and academic preacher of highfalutin doctrine nor a slinger of mealy and empty phrases about Art with a big "A." He was personally an accomplished musician and a thorough scholar of music, but withal he was a human being with a racy humor, strong individual likes and dislikes, a zest for life in many aspects, and a sunny capacity for friendship. As a musical critic he had pronounced prejudices—he cared nothing for Beethoven and for few of the moderns except Stravinsky—but he was liked even by those whom he attacked, because of his good humor. In addition to music Mr. Finck had numerous other interests. He was a passionate amateur gardener, an expert on food, and besides numerous books on music he wrote volumes on "Romantic Love and Personal Beauty," "Food and Flavor," "Gardening with Brains," "Primitive Love and Love Stories," and "Girth Control." Mr. Finck's death occurred at his birthplace in Bethel, Maine.

Sweet Land of Buncombe

THERE are times, even in the heyday of a political campaign, when one takes seriously the theory that the people of these United States are capable of self-government. There are other times when the only remaining prop for faith in our so-called popular system of government is the obvious incapacity of the dictators, near-aristocrats, experts, and business men who offer themselves as a substitute. Reading advertisements in some of the popular magazines is an encouragement to such disillusion. Reading the advertisements of advertisements is still more discouraging, but it is at least amusing.

Here, for instance, are a few paragraphs from a circular sent to advertising agencies by a corporation with headquarters in Chicago, which styles itself Famous Names, Inc.:

> The Famous Names, Inc., was formed through the cooperation of the most prominent managers of moving-picture stars and theatrical celebrities who assigned to this corporation the exclusive selling rights for commercial advertising purposes, of the names, pictures, and indorsements of a majority of the most popular and famous stars. . . .
>
> The service of this corporation is to supply the rights to use in commercial advertising names, pictures, and indorsements of famous moving-picture stars and stage celebrities and other famous personalities such as musicians, operatic stars, etc. . . .
>
> Almost without exception any moving-picture star or stage celebrity is available through our service. (See attached list of stars with whom we have established contact.)
>
> Many of the stars are available for special posing. These poses can be made according to specifications of the purchaser and can be made in a studio, in the artist's home, or on location. Many of the stars' homes are famous for their artistic settings, and such pictures posed by the artist in the home with the advertiser's commodity offer many advantages, particularly in the production of advertising material.
>
> In addition to the pictures and names we also supply indorsements signed personally by the stars. These indorsements can be, if desired, of the advertiser's own dictation.
>
> The rights to use this service are sold on an exclusive basis. This means a definite protection to the advertiser against duplication in pictures, names, and indorsements. This is possible because of our contracts with the stars. We will not offer the same stars to any other manufacturer or advertiser of similar commodity when our service has been accepted. We evidence the exclusive rights by a direct assignment to the purchaser signed by the star and likewise an assignment by the Famous Names, Inc. . . .
>
> The fee for the exclusive use of a star is between $150 and $2,500, depending upon the standing of the star and the length of time the exclusive use is desired. This fee includes the special posing and signed indorsements. Also, a 15 per cent differential to the agency. . . .
>
> Millions are daily attracted to moving-picture theaters because of the popularity of the names and pictures of these stars. Likewise, additional millions can be attracted to national advertising through the use of pictures of these stars who are familiar and popular with the buying public.
>
> The picture of a famous star will always attract copy attention!

Fooling the Public, Inc., this kind of advertising "service" might well be called. The star signs indorsements written by an advertiser perhaps without ever seeing or trying the ware. And the public—the kind of public which expresses itself in snobbish imitation of cinema heroes and pseudo-millionaires—buys on such false recommendation. At least, if one takes at par value the claims of the agencies that they have made advertising a science, one must assume that they have tested the method and that it pays.

A hasty study of a few "national-advertising" sections does not reveal that much use has yet been made of John Barrymore, Richard Barthelmess, Marjorie Rambeau, Lenore Ulric, Clara Kimball Young, Constance Talmadge, Bebe Daniels, and the other stars listed as part of its "service" by Famous Names, Inc. ("prices on the above stars will be gladly furnished upon request and without obligation"), but the samples of the method are there. Blue Jay Cornplasters feature "Famous Feet," and seem able to persuade almost any dancer to admit corns and preach the use of the Blue Jay products. The Pond's Extract Co. has enlisted the Queen of Spain to serve its business, and Prince Wilhelm of Sweden indorses Melachrino cigarettes. The fair face of T. C. Clark, '26, "chosen as the best-dressed man of Princeton," is becoming nationally familiar through his selections of Ide shirts and collars. Indeed Princeton seems to "attract copy attention," for the advertising pages of McCall's tell us that the windows of Avalon, the residence of Dr. Henry van Dyke at Princeton, N. J., are "shaded throughout with Hartshorn shade cloths mounted on Hartshorn rollers."

It's all business now. There was a time when sentiment played its part. Helen Woodward, in that absorbing story of her advertising career, "Through Many Windows," says that the ingenious agents of the ancient days—half a decade or so ago—used to work through societies collecting funds for philanthropic purposes. To such societies they would say, "We'll contribute $5,000 to your fund for each well-known name among your members which you will allow us to use in publicity,"—and, Mrs. Woodward explains, the secretary of the association, who had a hard job raising funds, took the proposition to its members and the job was done.

"Even as an advertising man I resent this type of testimonial," writes the friend who sends us the announcement of Famous Names, Inc. "It was much better in the old patent-medicine days, when at least they took the dope they wrote about." We resent it more because its implied contempt for the American people is too often justified. The dominant sections of American life believe that the people want to be gulled, and delight in gulling them—and, obviously, they do gull them. Like all advertising dodges, this particular method will lose its value when it becomes too common, when famous names, standardized, commercialized, and incorporated, lose their surprise value. But new tricks will be invented, and the dear public will gape and swallow them. One may only faintly hope that the public will also learn to laugh at them. Even politics is today successfully conducted as a form of advertising. Bruce Barton's recent interview with President Coolidge was great advertising and good politics, much more realistic than the serious discussion of political battles in which editors indulge. The chief hope of the republic sometimes seems to lie in awakening the capacity for independent laughter in the serious-minded, famous-name-worshiping people of this country.

Starvation and Surrender

STARVATION is a hard master; it is driving British miners back to their jobs at the owners' terms. The miners were not quite willing to die, or to see their children die; so they are dribbling back to their jobs. And for the moment the owners may deceive themselves into a feeling of security.

If the British coal industry were safe in a pocket all by itself, if the miners dug coal for the sole use of the owners, then perhaps this end of the strike, with the workers acceding to every one of the employers' demands, might solve the problem once for all. But coal is a national commodity, affecting every basic industry in the country; sooner or later the miners will have found new strength to fight for a living wage; and the country will have another two-billion-dollar coal strike on its hands. This inevitable traveling of the weary circle seems so evident that one wonders why anyone fails to see it. Perhaps, indeed, Mr. Baldwin sees it quite clearly; but perhaps also he realizes that by the time the miners recover from the present setback it will be somebody else's problem. That is the most charitable view to take of the British Government's role in the crisis now drawing to a close; the Government was as weak, as shillyshallying, as shortsighted as it seems humanly possible for a government to be.

Mr. Baldwin was hailed, when the general strike was called off, as a colossus, a broad-minded, powerful he-man who by his courage and determination was solving a hitherto unsolvable difficulty. After conference with him the Trade Union Council agreed to call off the strike under the impression that the proposals for reorganization of the coal industry drawn up by Sir Herbert Samuel were to be made, under the aegis of the Government, the basis for negotiations between miners and mine-owners. The strike was called off under a sort of "gentlemen's agreement" which left the initiative to the Prime Minister. The miners, to be sure, were not consulted; they hoped in those days for better things than the Samuel memorandum. Mr. Baldwin then stepped into the breach with proposals of his own invention.

Unfortunately the first thing on his list was a reduction of wages for the miners, and this, since refusal of a wage-cut had been the corner-stone of the strike from the beginning, was turned down by the men. The owners rejected his plan for other reasons. But from time to time Mr. Baldwin hopefully offered new proposals, which were likewise declined by both sides. He spent each week-end at Chequers, hoping for a settlement of the strike. Mr. Churchill, guardian of the Exchequer, would not consider a subsidy while the industry was being reorganized; the owners would not consider settling with the men in any but district agreements, which would destroy hope of reorganization and break the back of the national union; the workers remained firm in their slogan of "not a minute on the day, not a penny off the pay." In the face of this deadlock all the Prime Minister could suggest was more conferences, more endless and futile discussions. Now time works against day laborers. The mine-owners have been better able to weather five lean months than were the workers, and the miners, face to face with the awful choice between starvation and surrender, are, by handfuls, surrendering. Their leaders have little better to offer them than the stale hope that the Tory Government will remember the gentlemen's agreement and keep the pledges which it has neglected for five long months.

The fundamental trouble is that England's fundamental industry is sick. The workers have a right to demand a living wage, the mine-owners a right to refuse to operate at a loss. The industry needs a national reorganization, which would mean closing marginal mines and reducing the number of workers in the industry—and would, in turn, require a temporary subsidy by the Government. The last subsidy was sheer waste, because nothing was done during its operation to make its continuance unnecessary. A government with courage and convictions could act in this emergency. Behind the difficulties of the mine-owners are the heavy royalties paid the land-owners, which amount to more than any subsidy. Unhampered by a supreme court and a written constitution, England's government has the power to tax the royalties out of existence. That, of course, would bring it into conflict with powerful interests, which Mr. Baldwin is unwilling to do. Instead, he shilly-shallies. And as a result of his eternal vacillation men are stumbling back to work at wages which, as his own Government's commissions have shown, mean rickets and near-starvation for their children. A policy of frank opposition would be more decent.

Couplets

ONCE when Bernard Shaw had been irritated beyond endurance by the repetition of some metrical platitude he exclaimed petulantly "You can't make a lie true by putting it into a couplet"; but, Shaw notwithstanding, one can do almost that. To the simple mind any jingle has something of the miraculous about it; the very fact that a statement falls into rhyme and rhythm seems to indicate that there is a harmony, preestablished in nature, between the statements it makes; men speak in prose, but the gods rhyme. Hence it is that, the world over, proverbs which embody the credo of the vulgar are usually expressed in jingle, and since whatever is true rhymes, whatever rhymes is true.

The more sophisticated have not, to be sure, quite this simple faith. They are not absolutely sure that or even that "Early to bed," etc., is true just because these statements seem to have an irrefutable neatness. Yet even here rhyme casts its magic spell, and many a platitude, many a false statement has gone thundering down the years merely because a Pope or a Dryden gave it that triumphant finality which is the secret of the heroic couplet.

> A pint's a pound
> The world around,

Such being the case it is remarkable that this couplet has fallen so completely into disuse. Mastery of it is difficult enough, but it requires only a little familiarity with the literature of the eighteenth century to show that quite serviceable and readable stuff was turned out by hundreds of fifth-rate writers. No form so completely disguises utter banality of thought or so easily gives the air of saying something when nothing whatever has been said. It sometimes descended to frightful depths, especially in the hands of the writers of political verse, but there are thousands of lines lost in forgotten volumes which, at least to those who have read enough couplets to appreciate their slightly absurd charm, may be read with amusement. Here, for example, is a comment upon woman's rights taken from a prologue contributed by a "Rev. Mr. Nares," whom oblivion has completely swallowed, to a play by Elizabeth Inchbald, an ornament to her sex, whose name still lingers faintly:

> I grant, as all my City friends will say,
> That Men should rule, and Women should obey:
> That nothing binds the marriage contract faster
> Than our "Zounds, Madam, I'm your Lord and Master."
> But since the Sex at length has been inclin'd
> To cultivate that useful part—the mind;
> Let us not force them back with brow severe,
> Within the pale of ignorance and fear,
> Confin'd entirely to domestic arts,
> Producing only children, pies, and tarts.

Here, "children, pies, and tarts" becomes, aided by the jingle of "domestic arts," a very fair imitation of wit.

On its serious side the great virtue of the couplet is in its intellectual simplification. Whoever would write it must acquire or assume a philosophy as lacking in shade as Pope's. Within its narrow limits is no room for complexities or qualifications; there can be nothing except Virtue and Vice, both capitalized and neither defined. But for that very reason those who find the modern world too complicated might practice it with profit. They will come, willy-nilly, to conclusions; they will be forced to conquer a doubt rather than spoil a couplet. What pessimist would not give up the protest which he struggles in vain to express if he could say the reverse in form as perfect as

> All Nature is but Art unknown to thee;
> All chance direction, which thou canst not see; . . .
> And spite of Pride, in erring Reason's spite,
> One truth is clear, Whatever is is right.

The American Past

THE study of Rome's democratization and decline which Professor Rostvotzeff has written and which Professor Westermann has reviewed for this issue of The Nation takes its place among a noble number of lengthy works produced by European scholarship in the necessary attempt to understand the grandfather of all Western nations. Gibbon had his own purpose in writing the "Decline and Fall," and the great German historians of the nineteenth century had theirs. Professor Rostvotzeff's purpose, no doubt, is a purely modern one. Though we know nothing of his intellectual career, we can suppose that this investigator of the effects which followed the dissipation of Roman culture through the masses is one of the many men today who doubt the once unquestioned wisdom of the people, and who are disinclined to believe that a civilization can ever thrive after it has become the common property of vast numbers.

Something like the same question, if not the same answer, might be said to underlie the researches which we in America have been making into our past since the beginning of the republic. For we have thought quite as much about our past as about our future. Our youth, as Oscar Wilde let one of his stage people say, is merely the oldest of our numerous traditions. The reader of contemporary books is likely to jump at the conclusion that the urge to poke around among the Fathers or to reconstruct, as museum pieces are reconstructed, the life of an older American generation is a brand-new urge, born perhaps of fatigue induced by too much speculation concerning the destinies still ahead of us. But no generation, at least during a century and a quarter, has been without this urge. The results of the research have differed with the shift from decade to decade of philosophical and political emphasis; it may be that our method just now is indeed brand-new. But always there has been research. And the lure has been the same, even when no one confessed it—the spectacle, everywhere beckoning to be examined, of a wide new continent into which Europeans poured, bringing portions large or small of a civilization with which they were free to do what they would.

That is the picture which we have painted in whatever colors have happened to be fashionable or have seemed to be enduring. To Parson Weems it surely never occurred that W. E. Woodward, whose portrait of Washington is today presented to the American public, would come along and say of the principal Father that he was a good man—Parson Weems said as much—but a dull one. Weems was not interested in dulness or rather he was unconscious that the picture he lavished his best strokes upon was essentially uninteresting. And indeed it was not uninteresting to him. His virtues were not our virtues; with his Washington, if he ever existed, we will have nothing to do. He might reply from the grave that with Mr. Woodward's Washington, if he ever existed, he would have nothing to do either. To George Bancroft it could not have occurred that a tribe of historians might be born in America whose business it would be to scrutinize the heroes of our early politics as ordinary politicians are scrutinized. But Charles A. Beard took a look at the makers of the Constitution, and the tribe was formed. James Truslow Adams began upon New England—and lo, we no longer gazed upon a little Greece, a little Rome, where statesmen of the Bancroft sort moved in classic, shining light. To Bancroft the spectacle of raw America filling up with Europeans was stately; to some of his successors it has yet to become so. Even Claude G. Bowers, who uses warm colors as he covers his canvas with figures of old statesmen at war, and who obviously admires those statesmen when he does not agree that they were right, would not suit Bancroft or the generation of Bancroft's readers. He too makes a recognizable man out of his hero Jefferson—as do most of the writers in this centennial year who have reconsidered the Sage of Monticello.

Recognizable men. That is what we happen to be after today, and the emphasis must be placed upon the first word. We want the Fathers to look like human beings—our own kind if need be, and at the thought we grimace, but at any rate human. The question, What do we recognize, or What is recognition, is a metaphysical one which philosophers would have to answer. The question whether we are in a better position to apprehend reality than our predecessors were is one that had better remain unanswered. We are interested in the facts, we say. And we should be. But every generation has been interested in what it considered facts. So time and history go on.

Real Estate vs. Human Lives in Florida

By STELLA CROSSLEY

"THE poor people who suffered are regarded as of less importance than the hotel and tourist business of Florida."

To any one unacquainted with the almost inhuman cupidity and unquenchable boosting instinct of the Florida realtor this public statement made by John Barton Payne, chairman of the American Red Cross, together with his charges that Governor Martin and other State officials and real-estate promoters were deliberately blocking relief work by nation-wide propaganda minimizing the extent of the recent hurricane disaster, must seem at first incredible.

But to anyone like myself, without property interests in Florida, yet with the experience of having lived there through all seasons for the last two years, Mr. Payne's assertion can be recognized as the literal truth. His charges, moreover, are substantially corroborated by other Red Cross officials and by the reports of reliable Northern newspaper correspondents in the devastated area.

These charges are that leading Florida boosters sent out thousands of circular letters and telegrams saying the damage was slight, reports had been greatly exaggerated, the situation was "well in hand," and outside contributions were not needed. One outstanding example of the effect of this was that Richmond, Virginia, stopped payment on a $10,000 relief-contribution check. This in the face of the Red Cross survey showing that at least 18,000 families were homeless and destitute and at least 4,000 persons lay suffering from injuries in makeshift and other hospitals.

It was further charged that to minimize the extent of the disaster with an eye to this winter's tourist trade Florida officials falsified figures of the number of dead; that even many of the victims were hastily buried without attempt at identification though most could easily have been identified. Many of these latter were Negroes who were not counted among the dead, though Negroes afterward were considered of sufficient importance to be compelled at the point of guns to clear away the wreckage.

When we add to all this evidence the explanation first given out that the chief cause of loss of life was the flimsy and faulty construction of most of the houses, we see Nature's unwitting cruelty ably assisted by man's cupidity written in Death's black letters over Florida today. In peculiar high relief one can see there not only the tragedy of Florida but also that of modern civilization in placing the importance of big profits over that of human life and over all the values that make that life worth living.

Of course, blaming the loss of life upon flimsy construction is an attempt, as I see it, to lessen if possible the severity of the hurricane, to insinuate to the outside public that the greatest tragedy resulted more from man's shortcomings than from an aspect of south Florida's climate; but a contributing cause of loss of life was the influence of the realtor. This influence not only was back of the flimsy and faulty construction but worked, as I can testify it always has worked, against full warning reaching the rank and file of the people.

Florida is on the edge of the tropics and hurricanes are to be reckoned with in the tropics. The best that man can do there is to admit calmly to himself and others that such things are always likely to happen and to take such precautions as are possible. But in Florida the realtor's cupidity and public opinion, which this cupidity dominates, forbade this. So in a land where human habitations should be specially constructed for strength they are generally constructed flimsily for huge profits; and where the public should have a full understanding of the possibilities of such hurricanes and severe storms it is considered sacrilege to speak of them.

The policy of Florida newspapers which in recent years have become mere real-estate house organs, has been to play down local storms and play up Northern ones to the advantage of the realtor. Before me now as I write is the Evening Independent of St. Petersburg, Florida, dated Saturday, September 18. This was the day St. Petersburg had been repeatedly warned by United States weather observers that a hurricane would be likely to descend upon it. Such a warning, one would normally expect, should bring newspapers on the streets perhaps in extra editions or at least with their first pages devoted largely to this local news of such grave importance.

Not so with the "Sunshine Paper," so called because it is given away, not sold, on any day the sun fails to shine on St. Petersburg. It carries a four-column halftone on its front page under a heading, Flood Takes Possession of Kansas Town, and in a small box, one column width away, is the warning from the Washington Weather Bureau that the hurricane which has just swept the Florida East Coast is now descending upon St. Petersburg. And the heading over this warning is Storm Danger Here Seems to Be Past.

The general public—even in St. Petersburg—will never know the full extent of damages, injuries, or deaths, if any of the latter, there. The "Sunshine City's" realtors demand that such things be played down. Despite them, however, word did reach the outside world by way of northbound eye-witnesses that concrete benches were picked up and whirled about by the wind and that frame houses were leveled.

Tampa, across the bay from St. Petersburg, suffered extremely little—so one would think from reading the Tampa Tribune. Its issue of the Monday following the storm, like the previous day's issue, gives virtually no news of what happened in Tampa other than damages sustained by the telephone and telegraph companies in fallen wires, while on the editorial page, in a column always given to bright editorial paragraphs, are such remarks as the following:

"Tampa was signally fortunate"; "Florida has survived worse blows than this"; "The East Coast is getting more than its share of wind"; "The storm subtracted from the interest in the prize-fight."

We read in one dispatch from Miami that one paper there went contrary to the Weather Bureau and announced there would be no hurricane—thereby, of course, assisting Death. This likewise is the realtor speaking. He is ready to deny quickly anything that may affect realty values even when he has no facts to back up his statements. Typical of this attitude was a man accosted by Washington reporters on a Pullman just arrived from Miami after the hurricane. He insisted the reports of hurricanes and storms were "all lies" and that the newspapers were printing "irresponsible accounts which would cost Florida a lot of money."

If derogatory reports cannot be downed in this way, the Florida realtor or booster has a way of pointing somewhere else for a comparison which will show his climate not so bad after all. While Mr. S. Davies Warfield cannot exactly be classified as a realtor, being better known as a railroad president, his quoted remarks are typical of this method: "I doubt if there is as much water in the streets of these several localities [Florida East Coast] as there was in the streets of Jamaica, Long Island, two years ago when automobiles there were floating through the streets instead of running on their tires." He added that "reports of the disaster are greatly exaggerated."

Many realtors and boosters tried in other ways to minimize the extent of the disaster, some even going to the extent of declaring the hurricane a "blessing in disguise." Several were quoted as saying that the tourist camps about Miami had been destroyed, pointing out that "this was a good thing." Tourist camps net the realtor no profit and their usual unsightliness affects realty values. But what of the 13,000 poor campers?

Having lived in South Florida through all seasons amid all the bombast and fustian of the real-estate boom, I have been particularly depressed by the reports coming out of Florida and the statements of absentee realtors in the North commenting thereon. For, interpreting them as I learned how to interpret them through my residence there, it has seemed to me that many deaths and much property loss might have been avoided had the realtor not been allowed to dominate everything.

I can testify of an instance wherein the press agent of one Tampa development caused all the newspapers there last December to suppress a story of deaths and damages caused by a mild hurricane to which his development was subjected. This story got into the bull-dog edition of one of the papers before he could finish his midnight rounds, with the result that leading local realtors held an indignation meeting next day and cautioned the newspapers not to let such a thing happen again.

George Washington—The Image and the Man

By W. E. WOODWARD*

III. Abhorse

AFTER George Washington's death his widow burned every letter that she had received from him, with the exception of three or four, a handful that escaped apparently by accident.

No one has ever elucidated the motive behind this letter-burning episode. Martha Washington knew at the time—indeed, the whole world knew—that George Washington was a star of the first magnitude in the field of history, and that every scrap of his writing would be treasured and printed. Did she feel that his letters to her were so sacred in their intimacy that posterity had no right to read them?

Possibly.

But there are other tenable hypotheses. She was anti-democratic and anti-public to an extreme degree. Considering her as surrounded by such limitations of perspective, one may readily conceive that her motive may have been simply one of aristocratic seclusion.

In destroying his letters she effectually effaced herself, for she lived only in his reflected light. But that may have been what she wanted. The highest form of pride is a disdainful humility.

From another point of view it is a reasonable inference that these letters did not show her and her husband in a satisfactory relation to each other. His letters—many of them—were probably dictatorial, for that was his ordinary manner in communicating with other members of his family.

However, these are merely conjectures. We do not know why she destroyed his letters. She never gave her reasons. The episode lies at the bottom of the ocean of silence that surrounds so much of Washington's private life.

One of the letters which eluded Martha's incendiary hand is dated June 15, 1758, and is written from the headquarters of the column on its way to Fort Duquesne. When this letter was written George and Martha had been engaged about a month. He wrote:

> My dear: We have begun our march for the Ohio. A courier is starting for Williamsburg, and I embrace the opportunity to send a few words to one whose life is now inseparable from mine. Since that happy hour when we made our pledges to each other, my thoughts have been continually going to you as another self. That an all powerful Providence may keep us both in safety is the prayer of your ever faithful and affectionate friend, Geo. Washington.

Nice letter, but full of reserves. Short and unromantic. He "embraces the opportunity to send a few words," and he does send very few of them. One thinks that the brisk hurry of the campaign is the reason for his telegraphic style; yet on September 12 he wrote a letter to Mrs. Sally Fairfax that is not a bit telegraphic in manner. It was written from the camp at Fort Cumberland, and runs in these words:

> Dear Madam: Yesterday I was honoured with your short but very agreeable favour of the first inst. How joyfully I catch at the happy occasion of renewing a correspondence which I feared was disrelished on your part, I leave to time, that never failing Expositor of all things, and to a monitor equally as faithful in my own Breast to Testifie. In silence I now express my joy. Silence, which in some cases—I wish the present—speaks more intelligably than the sweetest Eloquence.
>
> If you allow that any honour can be derived from my opposition to our present System of management you destroy the merit of it entirely in me by attributing my anxiety to the animating prospect of possessing Mrs. Custis, when—I need not name it, guess yourself—should not my own Honour and My Country's welfare be the excitement? 'Tis true I profess myself a votary to love. I acknowledge that a lady is in the case; and further, I confess that this Lady is known to you. Yes, Madam, as well as she is to one who is too sensible to her charms to deny the Power whose influence he feels and must ever submit to. I feel the force of her amiable beauties in the recollection of a thousand tender passages that I could wish to obliterate till I am bid to revive them; but experience, alas! sadly reminds me how impossible this is, and evinces an opinion, which I have long entertained, that there is a Destiny which has the sovereign control of our actions not to be resisted by the strongest efforts of Human Nature.

* This is the last of three instalments from the book "George Washington: The Image and the Man," to be published on October 15 by Boni and Liveright. The material is used through the courtesy of the author and his publishers.

You have drawn me, my dear Madam, or rather I have drawn myself, into an honest confession of a Simple fact. Misconstrue not my meaning, 'tis obvious; doubt it not, nor expose it. The world has no business to know the object of my love, declared in this manner to—you, when I want to conceal it. One thing above all things, in this world I wish to know, and only one person of your acquaintance can solve me that or guess my meaning—but adieu to this till happier times, if ever I shall see them; the hours at present are melancholy dull—

Be assured that I am Dr. Madam with most unfeigned regard. Yr. most obedient, Most Obliged Hble. Servant, Geo. Washington.

* * * * *

Mrs. Fairfax replied promptly, but her letter has disappeared. A historical misfortune. She evidently pretended to misunderstand, and Washington wrote to her again on September 25.

Dear Madam: Do we still misunderstand the true meaning of each other's letters? I think it must appear so, tho' I would feign hope the contrary, as I cannot speak plainer without—but I'll say no more and leave you to

[I omit most of this letter, as it is devoted mainly to a description of the military operations.]

One thing more and then I have done. You asked if I am not tired at the length of your letter. No. Madam, I am not, nor never can be while the lines are an inch asunder to bring you in haste to the end of the paper. . . .

He says in this letter that he "cannot speak plainer without—" Yes, but without what? We may confidently supply the answer, which is that he cannot speak plainer without coming right out and telling her that he loves her. He does not want to do that, because she is his friend's wife and because he is engaged to another woman. But he wants her to know it, just the same.

* * * * *

Now, they [Washington and Martha Custis] are married, happy, and settled down at Mount Vernon. Martha called George her Old Man—a term still used in the South by wives in speaking of their husbands—and he calls her Patsy. When she wants to persuade him to do anything she holds on to a button of his coat and looks up at his face with a smile. A tall, large-jointed man with a pock-marked face and icy cold blue eyes; and a plump little woman twisting his coat-buttons and pouting.

She is a gay little woman, but not frivolous. The gaiety of good health, good nature, and a small mind.

* * * * *

I have mentioned Washington's coldness, his reserve, and his capacity for saying No in such a way that it carried the sense of emphatic finality. Men of this type are often stern and forbidding in manner, but Washington was not. His feeling of courtesy was strong; his manners were good, and he never forgot them.

It would be too much to say that he was a charming person. He was too serious to have the fluid quality of charm, but he was pleasant and agreeable; and his conversation even with people whom he detested left the impression of quiet urbanity.

Beneath the gripping materialism of his nature there ran a warm current of affection for children. He remembered the names of children he had met, and his pockets were full of presents for them.

* * * * *

Washington's political career began in 1758 with his election to the House of Burgesses as a member from Frederick County. He had kept his eye on the office for several years. In 1755 he wrote to his brother that he would like to be a candidate that year if Colonel Fairfax did not want the place. Some of the Fairfaxes evidently had a candidate, for Washington's brother let the matter drop. Two years later he was a candidate, but received only forty votes. Then, in 1758, he appeared on the list again, with the Fairfaxes behind him. Powerful as these great landowners were, they did not make his success at the polls an assured matter, for shortly before the election Lord Fairfax wrote to William Fairfax: "I fear Col. Washington will be very hard pushed."

Needless fears . . . it all turned out well. Washington received three hundred and one votes, which was the largest number cast for any candidate. He did not appear personally at the election, as he was on the Virginia frontier in the war against the French and Indians, but he was well known to all the voters, either by acquaintance or reputation. There were no campaign speeches; liquor was freely distributed and took the place of political eloquence.

With a generous hand he provided refreshments for the tired voters. This is what the election cost him:

	£	s	d
40 gallons of Rum Punch at 3/6 per galn.	7	0	0
15 gallons of Wine at 10/ per galn.	7	10	0
Dinner for your Friends	3	0	0
13½ gallons of Wine at 10/	6	15	0
3½ pts. of Brandy at 1/3		4	4½
13 gallons of Beer at 1/3		16	3
8 qts. Cyder Royal at 1/6		12	0
30 gallons of strong beer at 8d	1	0	0
1 hhd. & 1 Barrell of Punch, consisting of 26 gals. best Barbadoes rum at 5/	6	10	0
12 lbs. S. Refd. Sugar at 1/6		18	9
10 Bowls of Punch at 2/6	1	5	0
9 half pints of rum at 7½d each	0	5	7½
1 pint of wine	0	1	6

Confronted with this comprehensive list, one mentally calculates . . . three hundred and one Washington voters . . . and enough liquor to stock a barroom. They must have been formidable indeed in their carrying capacity. But let us keep in mind that drinking was not a furtive sin, as it is with us; nor was it a pastime. It was a sort of athletic sport. Men tried for records as one-bottle men or two-bottle men. A three-bottle man (and there were a few) was looked up to with the reverence that we show nowadays only to champion prize-fighters and noted preachers.

Washington was a one-bottle man. This means that at dinner he customarily drank a pint of Madeira, besides rum punch and beer. He preferred Madeira to all other beverages, but he was catholic in his drinking habits, and often drank cider, champagne, and brandy. If he was ever intoxicated I have never read of it; and, judging from what I know of his character, I am inclined to think he never was.

* * * * *

Washington's name seldom appears in the vast record of the ten years' controversy that preceded the revolution. It was a time of eloquence and argument, but he was neither an orator nor a writer. Backbiting commentators have hinted that Washington was really pro-British until the bullets began to fly, and that he took up the revolutionary cause only when he came to the conclusion that the patriots would win.

Nothing could be further from the truth. If it were worth while it would be easy to prove that he was anti-British as early as 1760. In this case one may tack "anti" and "British" together with a neat sense of accuracy, for he was more thoroughly anti-British in these early years than many others who held prominent posts on the patriotic side during the revolution.

His antipathies are easy to discern, but when we come to his preferences we find ourselves in doubt. He was anti-British, but pro what? The idle determinative "pro" goes dangling about in the air, endeavoring to hook on to something.

Finally we think of land, and then we have it. He was pro-Land and anti-British . . . and pro-Land meant the American side. A map of his political views in the pre-revolutionary period would be simply a map of the Western Territory, with a few disappointing financial statements from his London agents tacked on to one corner.

* * * * *

At the first attempt of British troops to seize a hoard of the patriots' military supplies at Concord, the redcoats were met by embattled farmers who fired the shot heard supposed to have been heard around the world.

It may not have been heard around the world, but it was heard as far as Virginia. Colonel George Washington heard it, and when the Second Continental Congress convened in Philadelphia he appeared in his uniform, the only man on the floor so attired. He had already declared, at the Virginia Convention, that he was willing to raise a thousand men, and more than that number, equipped at his own expense, to be called of Boston.

He sat in Congress, day after day, a silent member—silent in speech, but loud in military garments like a bright-plumed game-cock in a barnyard. It was his way of saying that war was inevitable, and that he was ready.

The frontiersman had come out of his remote region of land, horses, and deer, to sit in judgment among the great intellects. Rather dramatic, in a way. Every visitor who hung around the door naturally inquired: "And who is the tall gentleman in uniform?"

* * * * *

One day in the middle of June Cousin John Adams met Cousin Samuel Adams as they were both about to enter the door of Congress.

"Well, what for today?" said Cousin Samuel.

"I am going to move today," replied Cousin John, "that Congress adopt the army before Boston, and that Colonel George Washington be appointed its commander-in-chief."

Cousin Samuel was all for the adoption of the army by Congress; but Colonel Washington's name was not to be found among his carefully selected enthusiasms. The army is a New England army—he argued—and Washington is from Virginia; a wealthy aristocrat from Virginia. Wouldn't this appointment rather dampen the ardor? . . .

"It is just because he is from Virginia, and aristocratic and wealthy, that I propose to nominate him," said Cousin John, in substance. "There is nothing that the revolutionary movement needs quite as much as it needs aristocracy and wealth; and above all it needs Virginia and the South."

* * * * *

When John Adams got on his feet to nominate a commander-in-chief John Hancock, who, as president of the Congress, was in the chair, thought that Adams intended to name him. Adams portrayed the high qualifications that the new commander must possess; and continuing, he said:

> Gentlemen, I know these qualifications are high, but we all know they are needful in this crisis in this chief. Does any one say they are not to be obtained in this country? In reply, I have to say they are; they reside in one of our own body > and he is the man whom I now nominate George Washington of Virginia.

John Hancock was all smiles.

Washington, apparently startled, rose hurriedly and left the room. The upturned crescent of Hancock's smile turned into a downward curve of chagrin. John Adams wrote that he had never seen any one's expression change as quickly as Hancock's changed that day.

The nomination was opposed by some of the delegates, even by some of the Virginians. Edmund Pendleton of Virginia spoke against it. In secret session, of course, and while Washington was out of the room. The question was deferred until next day, and then Washington was appointed commander-in-chief by unanimous vote.

* * * * *

The British shall remember the day when Captain George Washington, "a very deserving gentleman," wanted a British army commission and was lightly refused.

Free Speech (?) in Cincinnati

By MARY D. BRITE

I DO not know whether a permit is necessary in order to hold a street meeting in other cities of the United States, but it is necessary in Cincinnati. So when Mother Bloor came to Cincinnati to organize a relief conference for the benefit of the Passaic textile strikers, and said she would like to have a street meeting, I undertook to arrange one for her. Now, street meetings have been rather common occurrences here in the past, but in order not to make any mistake the Chief of Police was approached and requested to issue a permit. He said at once that he would issue the permit, but on being told the nature of the meeting—that it was in behalf of the Passaic textile strikers—he amended his first statement by saying that a permit could not be issued under those circumstances. Said the Chief of Police

—I am quoting him literally: "You know if I were to issue a permit for such a meeting it would be a virtual acknowledgment on the part of the city administration that it was in favor of strikes. The city administration is not in favor of strikes. No permit can be issued."

Now, last fall Cincinnati adopted a new form of city government—that is, new for Cincinnati. We had been ruled for many years by a corrupt Republican gang which had been voted out while a city-manager plan had been voted in. Even some of the radicals had taken a hand in working for the new deal this promised.

It was suggested to me that the Chief of Police was not the last court of appeal, so I took the matter to the local counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union, who agreed to bring it to the attention of the City Manager; he did so and was told by the City Manager that the probabilities were the Chief of Police had refused a permit because an appeal for funds would be made, and there was an ordinance against appealing for funds on the city streets, irrespective of the cause involved. I informed him that this was not the reason assigned by the Chief of Police and that in applying for a permit no reference had been made to such an appeal. Thereupon he offered to interview the chief himself, and was told by him that it was because an appeal for funds was contemplated that the permit was refused.

It was suggested then that if we still desired a street meeting a formal application should be made, assigning the reason for holding it and eliminating therefrom an appeal for financial aid. This was done and with this formal application I called on the chief in person.

After reading it he informed me that no permit would be granted. I inquired if he would tell me why it was refused. Said he: "The purpose of this meeting is to cause a disturbance. Cincinnati people are not interested in the Passaic strike. If you want to inform them why don't you hire a hall? The reason that other towns are lawless and have trouble is because such permits have been granted. I am here," said the noble Chief of Police, striking his desk a vigorous blow which made me jump, "to protect the people of this town against such lawlessness and trouble. The permit is refused. Another reason for refusing it is because you expect to take up a collection, or at any rate appeal for funds, which is not permitted. It doesn't make any difference what you say is the purpose of the meeting. That is only another way of whipping the devil around the stump. No permit will be issued."

As I left the august presence he informed me that I could take the matter to the City Manager over his head, and I lost no time in acquainting the attorney for the Civil Liberties Union with the result of my interview. He wrote a strong letter to the City Manager, pointing out the guaranties regarding freedom of speech and public assemblage contained in the Constitution of the United States. He informed him that he was fully advised as to what the actions of city officials should be under such circumstances and that the Chief of Police in refusing a permit for this meeting had violated the fundamental principles of American civil liberties.

To this letter the City Manager replied that he had conferred with the Chief of Police, in whose office such matters were handled, and that he had stated the reason the permit was refused was because the locations specified in the letter were in a congested area. This was the fourth reason assigned for refusing the permit.

I then submitted a list of alternate locations; street corners which had been used time and again for political meetings, at every one of which I had spoken myself during political campaigns, and said that we were not arbitrary; that we would take any location that was satisfactory to the City Manager and Chief of Police, provided we were not sent to an obscure street in a distant suburb. The upshot was that the City Manager and Chief of Police ruled that in the future no street meetings were to be held in Cincinnati by any organization for any cause whatsoever, having been reduced to this extremity to avoid granting a permit for a street meeting to discuss the Passaic textile strike.

A Battle of Editors

By FRANCIS PAUL

LAST spring Mr. Julian Harris, editor of the Enquirer-Sun of Columbus, Georgia, was awarded the Pulitzer Prize "for meritorious and disinterested public service." His paper was thus signally honored because of his "brave and energetic fight against the Ku Klux Klan, against the enactment of a law barring the teaching of evolution, against dishonest and incompetent public officials, against lynching, and for justice to the Negro."

In the middle of the summer two magazine articles appeared, carrying before a wide reading public congratulations to the little news sheet of less than 10,000 circulation and making it nationally known. Mr. Thomas Boyd, author of "Through the Wheat," who spent part of the past winter in Columbus, contributed to the Forum an article entitled Defying the Klan and Mr. Charles F. Pekor, Jr., head of the Pekor Iron Works, of Columbus, Georgia, a former Texas journalist, wrote for the American Mercury an article entitled An Adventure in Georgia.

These articles told of the coming of Mr. Harris and Mrs. Harris to Columbus in 1921, of the high tone and quality of the editorial page conducted by them, of Mr. Harris's outstanding battle for free speech, for decency, and for tolerance. To make the accomplishments and the courage of Mr. Harris stand out in their true light, the writers painted a black, but somewhat true, picture of conditions in Georgia. At about the same time an army officer stationed in the neighborhood gave a clear presentation of facts concerning a trial in a Georgia court of "justice" in The Nation.

Immediately there arose a furore. The Macon Telegraph accused Mr. Harris of seeking publicity among Northern editors at the expense of his native State, and even went so far as to insinuate that he had written the Boyd article—alleged as one reason the fact that the editor of the Macon paper did not know who Mr. Boyd was. Charles Scribner's Sons, his publishers, would have shuddered with horror; but such ignorance of modern literature is not unusual in those parts. At the same time the editor of the Americus Times-Recorder launched a personal attack on the army officer who had turned author and demanded his court martial.

In the city of Columbus itself the editor of the Ledger aroused himself and with wounded vanity and State pride declared it was time to call a halt on attempts to besmirch Georgia. He repeated, as if he believed it, the charge of collaboration in or authorship of the Boyd article, against Mr. Harris. He accused Mr. Harris of having supported the articles in question simply because the latter reprinted those articles without condemning them. The editor of the Ledger was wrong in his logic but perfectly consistent—for he himself never reprinted any article with which he disagreed, and even went so far as to lambaste such articles without giving their authors the chance of a hearing by producing what had originally been said. All the while, Mr. Harris blithely reprinted all sides of the controversy. He even reprinted, without comment, the Ledger's attacks upon him, thus destroying that newspaper's logic.

Papers more distant took a hand in the controversy. From Dalton, Madison, and Greensboro, Georgia, and from Brooklyn, New York, editors spoke fairly and well of Mr. Harris's attitude. The Dothan (Alabama) Eagle assailed the Ledger in vigorous terms:

> The fact that the Ledger has led the fight upon the Enquirer-Sun is unusual, for the Ledger has for years been in a state of coma, editorially. It has displayed no courage other than to attack a competitor for an article written by a Columbus citizen and published in a magazine several hundred miles away. Prior to its present fit the Ledger has confined its comments to elaborate editorials on hookworm, second-hand opinions on European politics, an occasional puff about Fort Benning, spasmodic grumbles about road hogs, and detailed cures for dandruff. It has not seen fit to offer moral lessons on the South's bigotry, her innate superstitions, her guileless people dominated by mountebanks and demagogues and bullied by any illiterate evangelist who shouts almost silly sermons based on pleas to prejudice and plain ignorance. . . . It has remuneratively followed the crowd, never daring to venture a new thought. In short, the Ledger's editorial page is merely a reluctant bow to established precedent. In all probability it would prefer to run patent-medicine ads in the place of editorials, and we unhesitatingly confess that the patent-medicine ads would, no doubt, be more informative.

This Alabaman explosion caused a turmoil in the editorial office of the Ledger. The editor fell back on the charge of complicity and collaboration:

> As published, the editorial carried the earmarks of local preparation, but we are not going so far as the Macon Telegraph in placing responsibility. Nor are we going to say that Pekor had been asked to prepare his ugly article, despite interesting rumors on the subject. . . . The Enquirer-Sun persists in defending the poisonous articles by going to Alabama, New York, and other points for mere straws of approval.

All the time Mr. Harris of the Enquirer-Sun continues to twinkle his merry little eyes, to smile in his unperturbed fashion, to make no editorial defense or attack, and simply by reprinting the words of others to let his readers know all that is being said on both sides. He believes that the right of free speech includes the right to be controversial. By letting all things be said, by battling straightforwardly on main issues and avoiding the personal, he has accomplished his work.

The Greensboro Herald-Journal has said:

> Julian Harris merited the Pulitzer award several years before it was rightly awarded to his paper.
>
> Sometimes he might err—we all do—but most of the times he is right. He doesn't color his news. He features and prints adverse newspaper criticism concerning himself.
>
> Julian Harris is the man who removed the mask from the Klan in this State. . . .
>
> Julian Harris saved "Mule" Hicks, a Negro, from the gallows."

If a judge be inflammatory, or appear so, Mr. Harris says what he thinks, even if brought up afterward for contempt of court. A Negro stole a mule and was sentenced to twenty years. He escaped with a group on an occasion when a convict guard was killed. A jury was assured by the prosecutor, it appears, that the punishment would be light, and told by the judge that they had better bring in a verdict promptly or they would be locked up for the night. They said: "Guilty"; the Negro was sentenced to be hanged. Mr. Harris exposed the circumstances surrounding the verdict, and it was his effort that secured for "Mule" Hicks the Governor's pardon. And all the while the Ledger was prating of the sanctity of the law and the finality of a verdict, just as though a miscarriage of justice were as rare as a divine miracle in this day and age.

If there were more editors like Julian Harris in Georgia, and in the nation at large, the journalistic profession would be a more worthy one. And if for each such there were excitable opponents like the editor of the Enquirer-Sun's local rival, and chief assailant, there would be some relief to the dead level of editorial space-filling.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter was going to the pereval, or pass, with his friend Boris. In bargaining for a horse and a guide they acquired also eight goats and an ass, which the guide was inspired to take from his town house to his cottage in the mountains. As an American business man this guide would be worth millions. He may even be rich in Russia, where money can sometimes be amassed in secret by a peasant so long as he is careful not to arouse suspicion by spending any of it.

* * * * *

AZAZI was the Drifter's horse. She was loaded with clothing and provisions, but not with two fresh and evil-smelling goat skins which the guide wanted to take along. This small victory went to the Drifter, but all the others went to the little guide. His black eyes, so close together that they were almost one, sparkled with greed. When he met an acquaintance on the road he explained in a buzzing stream of his native Imeritinian what an easy mark an American Drifter was. At last the baggage and live stock were ready. The Drifter climbed up on Azazi's high saddle and the cavalcade started; ahead the capering Azazi with the Drifter; then Boris on foot, amiably carrying a large bundle for the guide; next the ass and the family of goats; and finally the guide, shouting and whistling to his flock. Azazi did not caper long. When the ascent began she quickly tired under her heavy load, so that sympathy compelled the Drifter to get off and walk in the steep places. The guide lagged behind, coaxing a tired young goat. Every now and then the ass wandered, browsing, into the woods. Little by little the procession climbed the trail.

* * * * *

TOWARD sunset they wound into an Alpine meadow, filled with lovely and improbable flowers, and some familiar ones, much superior to their lowland cousins; the deep rose, beautifully shaped daisies, the high stalks with clusters of grayish bubbles, the shaggy round ostrich feathers, wild sunflowers, red thistles, and slender orange crocuses. All these the cows and goats devour, and turn them into milk, which the natives turn into sour, stringy cheese. On the whole it did not impress the Drifter as an improvement, even when the cheese turns into a sturdy, dirty native.

* * * * *

THE Drifter has often confessed in The Nation his secret prejudice against automobiles and other devices of an over-developed civilization. At intervals this prejudice becomes so strong that his doctors advise him to take a treatment. The best treatment he has ever found is living in a balagan. A balagan is a shepherd's hut of one or more rooms, its framework of logs covered with a patchwork of rude shingles. The cracks serve for ventilation; if you want light you open the door. The floor is packed mud, covered with a little straw. Straw also covers the low platform of logs that serves for bed. In the center of the room is a round, stone fireplace. Why the straw and shingles don't burn up in one puff the Drifter did not discover; perhaps because the fire is always a small one of roots and green rhododendron twigs. From a rafter hangs a rope and long wooden hook above the fireplace for the pot. That is all. By night a balagan looks like the paper lanterns children make at Christmas. By day smoke oozes from every pore. The smell of that smoke hangs over the whole valley.

* * * * *

FOR days the Drifter lived in his balagan in the pereval. He lived the simple life, not quite as the natives live it. But if he ate more kinds of things than they did—if he added to their milk and cheese his nasty messes of dried vegetables, he made up by having less furniture. There was no splintery hewn wooden tub to bathe the baby in; there was a single blanket which had to be supplemented with his entire wardrobe before he could sleep at night. If he did not herd cattle and make cheese during the day, he worked hard climbing the valley walls without a trail and visiting an occasional glacier. There were nights when the balagan leaked like a sieve under a pelting shower of rain and hail. The Drifter does not claim that the cure is permanent; but he stored up enough loving thoughts of steam radiators and electric percolators and overstuffed armchairs and hot shower baths, and, yes, even automobiles, to last several months in the gasoline-laden air of New York City.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Mr. Krutch and M. France

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One reason I read every Nation book review, even on subjects so far from my range of interest as the ancient inhabitants of the Canary Islands, is because always, behind the review, I catch the gleam of the peculiar philosophical or literary glow of the individual reviewer, and am heartened thereby. You seem to have the gift of finding reviewers who glow.

Mr. Krutch's review, A Master of the Accessible, is excellent; his vision is straight and deep. In pointing out that one of the deep springs of Anatole France's genius was his power to hold himself aside from the rushing current of life, Mr. Krutch also reveals the cause of that feeling of baffled envy to which the twentieth-century amateur of France is prey. The current of life has caught us and whirls us along its zigzag course. Our generation cannot hope to express itself through such channels of exquisite smoothness as France used.

To this same power of aloofness has often been attributed much of the greatness of Montaigne; but Mr. Krutch is the first critic I have met who points out the great role isolation also played in forming the genius of Anatole France. The latter's power to draw within himself and out of life was greater than that of Montaigne because it was more subtle.

Johnson City, Tennessee, August 9 H. MULVANEY,
Instructor in French, East Tennessee State Teachers College

The Story of Philosophers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Many thanks for delaying the publication of your review of "The Story of Philosophy" until after I had an opportunity to purchase and read the book. Had I read the review before I acquired the book I might have been deprived of many hours of joy, an abundance of knowledge, and the inspiration to enrol at Columbia University for the study of philosophy.

The book was not written for philosophers to whom the manner of its conception "would be rudely uncongenial if not heretical" but for those who missed "the joy of philosophy" in attempting to obtain it direct from the works of the philosophers without the guidance of "The Story of Philosophy." "Real philosophers who ruled the perfect state" not only would not have exiled Dr. Durant but would have elevated him to the position of co-ruler.

Brooklyn, N. Y., September 27 MAX HERZFELD

Divine Wrath

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I don't often object to anything written about me or about my work, especially in America, which still knows me as little as they knew Whitman while he was alive. But you have published recently an attack upon me by someone called Nathan Asch, that I want to speak about because it is a simple series of lying, ignorant statements which ought not to appear in any decent journal.

Nathan Asch tells me that my prose is hardly readable and that the second volume of "My Life" is distinctly inferior to the first, and that the stock of jokes is poorer than that of any smoking-car drummer; he adds, "The sex episodes are similar to those that can be bought in any well-protected bookshop." He ends up by comparing me with Casanova and telling me I have not the latter's gifts or integrity.

Now, sir, the poor fool doesn't know that Casanova wrote in French, which was not his mother tongue. The other day the first newspaper in France, the Figaro, asked me to write on Verlaine, the French poet, and said that I was the only foreigner they had asked to write about a French poet. The Journal des Débats and the Temps both gave six columns to my study of Renan and the Débats said that it was the best portrait of Renan they have seen.

The English have a good proverb: "One can only be judged by one's peers." Bernard Shaw has put me with Ben Jonson as the best critic of Shakespeare. Do you think Nathan Asch is my peer?

Nice, September 14 FRANK HARRIS

After Prison, Thanks

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have been granted a full and unconditional pardon after thirteen years in prison. Many thanks for the efforts put forth through The Nation and otherwise. Can you put a little notice in The Nation thanking everyone who took an interest in and helped me—I have lost the addresses of the friends who have helped me pass otherwise weary moments by corresponding with me. Good luck to you on The Nation—may it always be a power.

Mena, Arkansas, August 29 CHARLES CLINE

The Eucharistic Congress

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: One of your correspondents, A. J. Petty of Newark, N. J., says in The Nation for September 8:

> One of the objects of the Eucharistic Congress in the United States was to bring pressure to bear on Mexico through a show of strength and influence.

I am credibly informed that five years ago Cardinal Mundelein intended to invite the International Eucharistic Congress to meet in Chicago. The present Mexican situation was then undreamed of. Can A. J. Petty give one shred of evidence to back up his statement?

New York, September 22 A. M. Noonan

Education à la Legion

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The American Legion has just been holding its California State Convention, and it cheered wildly a speaker who called for the suppression of some Communist schools in Los Angeles. Since the American Legion is taking charge of our education, it becomes important to know what it has to teach our children.

There follow portions of a letter which give some information on this subject. The writer is a young high-school girl who, with her mother and another woman friend, set out to motor to British Columbia.

> We spent the night at the Tremont Hotel in Red Bluff and there were a great many American legion men there waiting to go to a convention in Susanville.
>
> Heavens you should have heard the noise! They got drunk, of course, and all night long were coming up and down the street shouting to one another, we rang to have the hotel staff attend to them. They even called loud curses forth across the street. You should have been there! And that's not all. They not only kept everybody awake but climbed up the fire escapes and tried to come into our rooms. We shouted and called to them to stop, but one man even forced the lock on the screen door and only stopped when I slammed the inner door in his face. This went on and the noise kept up until 2 the next morning. The hotel clerk could not stop them.
>
> Don't you think it is a perfect outrage that people, and especially American Legion men who are supposed to be the upholders of the government should conduct themselves like that?

Pasadena, California, August 19 Upton Sinclair

Who's Who in America

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I see you have an article with regard to the United States and other Christian nations patrolling the rivers of China, and I should like to call your attention to an act of Congress, entitled The Chinese Trading Act, which was approved September 19, 1922, and authorized corporations to trade in China. This act confers great and special privileges and impliedly guarantees that the government will furnish the money to protect our men trading in China, even if they should import opium or other contrabands in violation of the laws of China. I do not think it is worth while, as long as we hold the Philippines, to make any fuss about our invasion of the sovereignty of China.

The United States is out for empire. The republic ceased to exist long ago. We are a government of, for, and by the corporations—an autocracy of artificial persons without human sympathy, the most cruel form of government ever created by man. An organized movement is now on to acquire the title to the farms of the Mississippi and Missouri River Valley by corporations; these farms in large areas are to be scientifically cultivated by hired men and machinery, to produce cheap food for their factory slaves.

The only issue in this country is the issue between the robbed and the robbers; between the exploited and the exploiters; between the men who do the work and produce all the wealth and have none of it and the men who produce none of the wealth and have all of it.

Sioux Falls, S. D., September 22 R. F. Pettigrew, former United States Senator for South Dakota

Lazarus

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Aberystwith is a gay little watering-place in Wales. Its life depends on the university which holds a position of dignity throughout Great Britain, and on the summer visitors who, when the weather is fine, swarm upon the esplanade and sprawl upon the sands. The annual Plenary Conference of League of Nations Societies was originally scheduled for Dresden, but after the March fiasco at Geneva the plans were hastily changed, and little Aberystwith was chosen in its stead.

Aberystwith greeted it with Welsh music, fervent and stirring, Welsh enthusiasm, and Welsh hospitality. David Davis, M. P., a man of great influence in the countryside, made all the foreign delegates his guests, and hotels and university dormitories opened their doors wide in uncalculating hospitality. Among the delegates were the veteran Dumba of Austria, Giannini of Italy, Norman Angell, who had lived to see his prophecies too truly realized and bore the look of it, the Viscountess Gladstone (nibbling chocolates in moments of relaxation), and the Russian Princess Radziwill, somber and brooding and elegantly gowned. There were Admiral Lowe of the British navy and General Montgelas of the German army, but the delegate who focused most popular interest and curiosity was Count Johann Heinrich von Bernstorff, one-time ambassador from Germany to the United States of America.

This, it seemed, was Count Bernstorff's first public appearance in an enemy country since the war. David Davis presided, flanked by the ruddy bishop with his spectacles on the end of his nose, and the mayor, resplendent in robe and chain. The meeting was perhaps an hour old when David Davis rose to introduce Bernstorff.

He moved forward resolutely with a pale, set face. It was apparent that he was used to facing antagonism and hatred, and that while he would not allow them to stand in his way, that they were iron in his soul. At his opening words a dreadful and passionate cry came from the back of the hall. A man had risen in the audience and with a face distorted by passion shrieked aloud: "How about the Lusitania? How about the Lusitania, I say!" The tones went through and through his hearers. They expressed the extremity of emotion; one wondered of what terrible experience it was the expression.

There was a moment of uncertainty. Many in the great audience shared the emotion of the man who had cried out. Bernstorff's name would always be linked with the most spectacular crime of the war, whose sufferings were fresh in the memory of every one present. The meeting might have in a moment been turned into a riot, but a spirit that did credit to the people of that remote provincial town prevailed. Some one led off in applause, obviously intended to cover the disturbance, and in a moment it was taken up by the crowd till the hall reechoed to it. And when Bernstorff resumed his speech he received an ovation, led by David Davis.

The incident expressed a willingness and a wish to believe in the sincerity of the man so lately hated and feared as a dangerous enemy, when he said to them virtually: "The old way was an evil way. Let us find a better one."

Honfleur, France, August 15 Mary Kelsey

International Relations Section

Russia, the Land of Contradictions

By SHERWOOD EDDY*

I

DURING August I made my fourth visit to Russia with a party of twenty-four American business men, editors, educators, and social workers. On my first visit in 1912, under the Czarist regime, I obtained police permits to conduct religious meetings in St. Petersburg and Kiev, and, although denied permission, conducted meetings in the rooms of the students in Moscow. In 1926, after nine years under the present Government, while our country has been flooded with propaganda both red and white and with the wild tales of émigrés of the old order, it seemed that the time had come for an unofficial group to make an objective, impartial, fact-finding study of actual conditions in Russia and to share their impressions with their friends in America.

As a month was all too short to make such a study, Professor Jerome Davis of Yale, who speaks Russian well after living under the Czarist, Kerenski, and Soviet regimes, was sent in advance to gather information and make preparations for the party. We were particularly on our guard lest we should be a "personally conducted" delegation shown only the most favorable things by government interpreters. Our party included four persons who spoke Russian and we employed twelve other interpreters, the majority of whom belonged to the old order rather than the new. We were granted entire freedom in Russia, we went where we wished, chose the institutions we wished to inspect, and freely interviewed both friends and foes of the present Government.

Some of us flew from Berlin to Moscow in a day, in a never-to-be forgotten flight in a storm. During a total of two weeks in Moscow we interviewed some thirty of the Soviet Union's principal leaders, including Stalin, who, more than any other, has succeeded to Lenin's influence and power; Chicherin, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Lunacharski, Minister of Education, and many heads of departments of the state and the church, members of the Czarist regime, foreign diplomats, business men, and newspaper correspondents, as well as workers and peasants. We visited, of course, all possible places of importance, such as the historic Kremlin, the seat of the present Government, as it had been the fortress and home of the rulers of church and state for eight centuries. We saw the palaces and crown jewels of the Czars, also factories, schools, prisons, museums, galleries, and the remarkable institutions of social education and service for workers and peasants, of which Russia is so proud.

We visited the medieval city of Nizhni-Novgorod and attended its picturesque fair, which for five centuries has been a meeting-place of East and West. We inspected here one of the 300 high-power wireless stations by which Russia keeps in touch with all parts of the world. For a night and a day we journeyed down the blue Volga to Kazan, the capital of the autonomous Tartar Republic which claims to represent one of a hundred peoples, nationalities, and minorities now liberated for the full development of their own culture, education, and government, as a voluntary member of the U.S.S.R. Four members of the party visited the southern Ukraine, the Crimea, and the Caucasus, while one crossed and recrossed the Trans-Siberian Railway. After visiting Leningrad, most of the party left by way of Finland or Poland.

Before attempting to evaluate the present situation in Russia, may I mention one or two fundamental facts:

1. The significance of the present experiment in Russia can hardly be exaggerated either in its possibilities for good or for evil. Here is the largest country in the world, with an area approximately equal to twice that of the continent of Europe, twice that of the United States, or one-sixth of the habitable land surface of the earth, with the largest undeveloped resources of any country in the world. Here is the largest white population in the world, 140,000,000 persons, a truly great people whose human resources far outweigh their material possessions. Siberia alone, almost a continent in itself, rich and fertile, if populated with the density of Belgium would accommodate almost twice the earth's present population. Here is this great people trying the most colossal experiment in history in this vast laboratory of social research. Here for the first time in history, on such a scale, a government of workingmen and peasants is trying seriously to solve social problems that have baffled humanity for centuries. A powerful world movement, with its party already represented in fifty-two countries and united in an "International" with a frankly avowed aggressive world program, is too serious a factor to be met with ignorance, indifference, misrepresentation, or falsehood. Russia is under a stable government which has been recognized by all the other leading governments of the world, after overcoming for nine years probably the greatest obstacles which ever faced any country. It is time we turned from second-hand propaganda to come to grips with the basic facts and stark realities of the situation. For good or evil, from the point of view of shaping history, Russia is one of the two most significant countries in the world today, our own being the other.

2. The basic poverty of Russia must not be forgotten in understanding its situation. The average wage of labor in industry is less than a dollar a day (it was twenty-five cents a day outside the two great cities on my last visit three years ago) and it is much less in agriculture. Russia was ruined after five centuries of a corrupt Czarist regime, after the greatest loss of any nation in the World War, after two revolutions, a world blockade, invasion by armies of the Allied nations, fighting at one time on twelve different fronts, meeting the sabotage of its own bureaucracy, surviving a famine where three millions perished; Russia was swept by pestilence, with the peasants on strike reducing the area under cultivation by half, and with industries disorganized and reduced to one-seventh of their pre-war production. Add to all this Russian character and custom, its primitive methods, its still largely illiterate masses, its casual, inefficient methods, its ancient tradition of graft, its lack of personal initiative, and you have a state of basic poverty which conditions and limits the entire system. Russian industry cannot yet produce enough to meet the demands of its own peasantry and under primitive methods in agriculture the yield per acre is only one-third what it is in Germany.

* Sherwood Eddy headed the unofficial group which went to investigate Russia. The conclusions reached and the judgment of the group on the advisability of American recognition of the Soviet Union will be printed next week in the International Relations Section.

3. Yet industry and agriculture are steadily recovering. After having fallen to 14 per cent of their pre-war production in industry, the Russian people this year have recovered almost 90 per cent of their former maximum production, both in industry and agriculture, and will probably equal it next year. Despite all obstacles their budget has been balanced, their currency stabilized, and most of their available land, although nominally owned by the state, has been divided and has come into the permanent possession of the peasants. Although it will be long delayed for lack of funds, they have begun the most complete system of electrification in the world. After examining the evidence pro and con, although some authorities disagree, personally I believe that the trend of events points to two economic conclusions. First, that although the process will be delayed without foreign capital nothing outside Russia can now prevent the ultimate economic success of the Soviet experiment. Second, barring those who have been accepted and are working loyally in the present economic order, the treatment of the former privileged tenth of the population has been cruelly unjust; yet the condition of nine-tenths of the great masses in industry and agriculture is on the whole slightly better economically and immeasurably better in the releasing of the human spirit for self-realization and self-expression than it was under the blindly repressive Czarist regime. This is true not only among the communal city workers, but particularly among the hardy individualistic and independent peasants now awakened by the World War, the new education, and growing self-government. The 8,700,000 members of trade unions have more influence in the democratic sharing of control in industry and in government than in any other country, but they have no autocratic power. Strikes are legal, infrequent, and as a rule are quickly settled by conciliation boards or by arbitration courts. The cooperative movement is one of the strongest in the world with 11,000,000 members in the Consumers and 7,650,000 in the Producers and Farmers Cooperatives, with some duplicate members. These cooperatives are not only an economic but a vast educational and social force making for the recovery of the nation.

4. The present Soviet Government has come to stay. With all its faults it seems to be on the whole much better than the former hideous Czarist regime. Although its downfall has been eagerly predicted for the last nine years it was never so strong as it is today. Whatever its faults there is no other party or government in sight that could govern Russia and maintain law and order. Few of the people want to go back to the slavery of the Czars or the nerveless rule of Kerenski. We found no government in Europe more stable and strongly intrenched. No other has made so many changes and adaptations in the last nine years, none has been more willing to confess its many mistakes and learn from them. Its army has been reduced to one-tenth the size of six years ago, from 5,300,000 in 1920 to some 550,000 today. Judged both by expenditure and the size of the army in proportion to population, which is lower than the surrounding nations, the actual policy of the Government at home seems to make for peace.

(To be concluded next week)

Contributors to This Issue

STELLA CROSSLEY wrote Florida Cashes In Her Chips in The Nation for July 7.

W. E. WOODWARD is the author of "Bunk," "Lottery," and "Bread and Circuses."

MARY D. BRITE wrote Anyhow Debs Spoke in Cincinnati in The Nation for July 25, 1923.

FRANCIS PAUL is a pseudonym.

BABETTE DEUTSCH, the winner of The Nation's 1926 Poetry Contest, is the author of "Banners," "Honey Out of the Rock," and a novel, "A Brittle Heaven."

JAMES RORTY is on the staff of the New Masses. A volume of his poems, "Children of the Sun," is published this fall.

LOUISE BOGAN is the author of "Body of This Death."

ROLFE HUMPHRIES is one of the editors of the Measure.

MARY AUSTIN is the author of "The American Rhythm" and many other volumes, including the chapter on Aboriginal Literature in the Cambridge History of American Literature.

R. F. DIBBLE is the author of "Mohammed," published this fall.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN is the author of "Up Stream" and "Israel," and "The Case of Mr. Crump," just published.

RALPH M. PEARSON is the author of "How to See Modern Pictures."

WILLIAM LINN WESTERMANN is professor of history at Columbia University.

ZONA GALE is the author of "Miss Lulu Bett." Her latest book is "Preface to a Life."

H. L. MENCKEN is the editor of the American Mercury. His fall publications include "Americana—1926," "Notes on Democracy," and "Prejudices: Fifth Series."

H. S. JENNINGS is professor of zoology at Johns Hopkins University.

JOHN MACY'S latest publication is "Romance of America as Told in Our Literature."

J. A. HOBSON is an English economist and contributing editor of The Nation.

CLARENCE WALWORTH ALVORD has been professor of history at the universities of Illinois and Minnesota.

SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE is chairman of the department of church history at the University of Chicago.

B. H. HAGGIN is writing a set of articles on music and its criticism of which this is the introduction.

SHERWOOD EDDY formerly represented the Y. M. C. A. in Russia, and is the author of "Russia, A Warning and a Challenge," and other books.

EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP
IN THE UNITED STATES
INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS SECTION, PRINCETON UNIVERSITY

An authoritative report on a subject that should receive the attention of every executive and student interested in industrial relations. Explains a new field of investment banking in which over $700,000,000 in securities have been sold to more than 300,000 employees. The book has just been published after careful research by the Industrial Relations Section, which is a separately endowed part of the Department of Economics and Social Institutions of Princeton University.

Price, Cloth, $2.00; Paper, $1.50—174 pp.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS SECTION
PRINCETON UNIVERSITY, PRINCETON, N. J.

Some Notable Fall Books

BIOGRAPHY, MEMOIRS

Allen, Hervey. Israfel: The Life and Times of Edgar Allan Poe. Doran. 2 vols. $10.
Allen, Hervey. Poe's Brother. Doran. $7.50.
Anonymous. The Great American Ass. Brentano's. $3.50.
Asquith, Earl of Oxford and. Fifty Years of British Parliament. Little, Brown. 2 vols. $8.
Aubry, G. Jean. Life and Letters of Joseph Conrad. Doubleday, Page. 2 vols. $10.
Bauman, Emile. Saint Paul. Putnam. $3.50.
Benjamin, René. Balzac. Knopf. $5.
Black, Jack. You Can't Win. Macmillan. $2.
Bodley, Temple. Life of George Rogers Clark. Houghton Mifflin. $5.
Booth, Bramwell. Echoes and Memories. Doran. $2.
Bowen, Marjorie. Mistress Nell Gwyn. Appleton.
Boyd, Ernest. Guy De Maupassant: A Biographical Study. Knopf. $5.
Broun, Heywood, and Leech, Margaret. Anthony Comstock. Boni and Liveright. $3.50.
Brousson, Jean Jacques. Anatole France, Voyageur. Holt. $3.
Brown, William Montgomery. My Heresy. John Day. $2.
Chase, Cleveland B. The Young Voltaire. Longmans, Green. $3.
Clarke, Edward. Benjamin Disraeli: A Romance, 1804-1881. Macmillan. $2.50.
Cobden-Sanderson, Thomas James. The Journals of, 1879-1922. Macmillan. 2 vols. $25.
Coit, C. W. The Royal Martyr. Houghton Mifflin. $5.
Cotton, Edward H. The Life of Charles W. Eliot. Small, Maynard. $3.
Da Bisticci, Vespasiano. The Vespasiano Memoirs. Dial Press. $5.
D'Auvergne, Edmund B. Pierre Loti. Stokes. $5.
de Koven, Mrs. Reginald. A Musician and His Wife. Harper. $5.
Dibble, R. F. Mohammed. Viking. $3.
Emperor Frederick III. The War Diary of. Stokes. $5.
Fisher, H. A. L. James Bryce. Macmillan. 2 vols. $8.
Gibbons, Herbert Adams. John Wanamaker. Harper. 2 vols. $10.
Gilliat-Smith, E. Anthony of Padua. Dutton. $2.50.
Gordon, Armistead C. Allegra: The Story of Byron and Miss Clairmont. Minton, Balch. $2.50.
Guiney, Louise Imogen. Letters of. Harper. $5.
Haggard, H. Rider. The Days of My Life: An Autobiography. Longmans, Green. 2 vols. $7.50.
Hellyar, Richmond H. Barbellion. Doran. $2.50.
Hewlett, Maurice. Letters. Ed. by Laurence Binyon. Small, Maynard. $5.
Hirst, Francis W. The Early Life of Lord Morley. Macmillan. 2 vols.
Holloway, Emory. Whitman: An Interpretation in Narrative. Knopf. $5.
Houston, David F. Eight Years With Wilson. Doubleday, Page. 2 vols. $10.
Hughes, Rupert. George Washington. Wm. Morrow. $4.
Hume, Martin. The Wives of Henry VIII. Brentano's. $4.
Huxley, Leonard. The Life of Darwin. Adelphi. $2.
Jerome, Jerome K. My Life and Times. Harper. $4.
Kemp, Harry. More Miles. Boni and Liveright. $3.
Lawrence, William. Memories of a Happy Life. Houghton Mifflin. $5.
Lee, Sidney. King Edward VII. Macmillan. 2 vols. $16.
Leslie, Shane. George IV. Little, Brown. $4.
Lincoln, Abraham. An Autobiography of. Ed. by Stephenson, Nathaniel Wright. Bobbs-Merrill.
Ludovici, A. An Artist's Life in London and Paris, 1870-1925. Minton, Balch. $3.75.
Ludovici, A. Personal Reminiscences of Auguste Rodin. Lippincott. $3.
MacKaye, Percy. Epoch. Boni and Liveright. 2 vols. $10
Magne, Emile. Ninon de Lanclos. Holt. $4.
Maurice, Frederick. Statesmen and Soldiers of the Civil War. Little, Brown. $3.
Meynell, Everard. The Life of Francis Thompson. Scribner. $3.
Moore, Charles. The Family Life of George Washington. Houghton Mifflin. $5.
Nye, Frank Wilson. Bill Nye: His Own Life Story. Century. $4.
Older, Fremont. My Own Story. Macmillan. $2.50.
Oyved, Moysheh. Visions and Jewels. Holt. $2.
Peck, Walter Edwin. Shelley: His Life and Work. Small, Maynard. 2 vols. $12.50.
Pinto, V. De Sola. Life of Sir Charles Sedley. Boni and Liveright. $6.
Poincaré, Raymond. The Memoirs of. Doubleday, Page. $5.
Quaife, Milo M., Ed. Yellowstone Kelly: The Memoirs of Luther S. Kelly. Yale University. $4.
Reid, Forrest. Apostate. Houghton Mifflin. $4.
Russell, Phillips. Benjamin Franklin: The First Civilized American. Brentano's. $5.
Sawyer, Joseph Dillaway. Washington: A Pictorial Biography. Macmillan. 2 vols. $20.
Sedgwick, Henry Dwight. Cortes the Conqueror. Bobbs-Merrill. $5.
Sherard, Robert Harborough. The Life, Work and Evil Fate of Guy De Maupassant. Brentano's. $4.50.
Smollett, Tobias. The Letters of. Harvard University. $3.
Tarbell, Ida M. A Life of Napoleon Bonaparte. With a Sketch of Josephine, Empress of the French. Macmillan. $2.50.
Towne, Charles Hanson. Adventures in Editing. Appleton.
Van Dyke, Paul. Ignatius Loyola. Scribner. $3.50.
Warren, Louis A. Lincoln's Parentage and Childhood. Century. $3.50.
Welby, T. Earle. The Life of Swinburne. Doran. $5.
Woodward, Helen. Through Many Windows. Harper. $2.50.
Woodward, W. E. George Washington. Boni and Liveright. $5.

DRAMA

Bahr, Hermann. Expressionism. A. and C. Boni. $5.
Darlington, W. A. Literature in the Theatre. Holt. $3.50.
Dos Passos, John. The Garbage Man. Harper. $2.
Drinkwater, John. The Merry Monarch. Doran. $5.
Evreinov, Nicholas. The Theatre in Life. Brentano's. $3.
Hurlbut, William. Bride of the Lamb. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Nathan, George Jean. The House of Satan. Knopf. $2.50.
Odell, G. C. D. Annals of the New York Stage. Columbia University.
Ramsaye, Terry. A Million and One Nights. Simon and Schuster. 2 vols. $10.
Schnitzler, Arthur. None but the Brave. Simon and Schuster. $1.25.
Stallings, Laurence, and Anderson, Maxwell. Three American Plays. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.
Watson, Ernest Bradlee. Sheridan to Robertson. Harvard University. $5.
Werfel, Franz. Juarez and Maximilian. Simon and Schuster. $1.

ECONOMICS, INDUSTRY, POLITICS, SOCIOLOGY

Armstrong, Hamilton Fish. The New Balkans. Harper. $3.
Baker. P. J. Noel. Disarmament. Harcourt, Brace. $3.75.
Baldwin, Stanley. On England and Other Addresses. Stokes. $4.
Bausman, Frederick A. Facing Europe. Century. $3.
Benn, Ernest J. P. If I Were a Labour Leader. Scribner. $1.75.
Creel, George. The People Next Door. John Day. $4.
Dexter, Robert C. Social Adjustment. Knopf. $5.
Dowd, Jerome. The Negro in American Life. Century. $5.
Dyche, John A. Bolshevism in Labor Unions. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Ford, Henry. Today and Tomorrow. Doubleday, Page. $3.50.
Fraser, Herbert F. Foreign Trade and World Politics. Knopf. $3.25.
Frederick, J. George. Modern Industrial Consolidation. Frank-Maurice. $10.
Hirst, F. W. From Adam Smith to Philip Snowden. Adelphi. $1.25.
Ise, John. The United States Oil Policy. Yale University. $10.
Kautsky, Karl. Thomas More and His Utopia. International. $2.50.
La Follette, Suzanne. Concerning Women. A. and C. Boni. $2.50.
Lashly, A. V., and Morley, Raymond, Ed. The Missouri Crime Survey. Macmillan. $6.
Lenin, N. War and Revolution. International. $3.
Lewis, Wyndham. The Art of Being Ruled. Harper. $4.
Lewisohn, Sam A. The New Leadership in Industry. Dutton. $2.
Lubin, Isador, and Everett, Helen. The British Coal Dilemma. Macmillan. $2.50.
Luce, Robert. Congress: An Explanation. Harvard University. $1.50.
Mohr, Anton. The Oil War. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.
Mukerji, Dhan Gopal. The Face of Silence. Dutton. $3.
Murray, Robert H. History of Political Science from Plato to the Present. Appleton.
Pollock, James K. Party Campaign Funds. Knopf. $3.
Ralston, Jackson H. The Law and Procedure of International Tribunals. Stanford University. $5.
Rappard, William E. International Relations as Viewed from Geneva. Yale University. $2.50.
Reed, Ruth. Negro Illegitimacy in New York City. Columbia University. $2.25.
Riasanov, D. Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels. International. $2.50.
Ripley, William Z. Main Street and Wall Street. Little, Brown. $2.50.
Rogers, Lindsay. The American Senate. Knopf. $2.50.
Schiller, Ferdinand Canning Scott. Eugenics and Politics. Houghton Mifflin. $2.50.
Shaw, George Bernard. The Intelligent Woman's Guide to Socialism and Capitalism. Brentano's. $3.50.
Shaw, H. K. Democracy and Finance in China. Columbia University. $3.50.
Shultz, William J. The Taxation of Inheritance. Houghton Mifflin. $3.
Smith, T. V. The Democratic Way of Life. University of Chicago. $1.85.
Spender, J. A. The Changing East. Stokes. $4.
Thrasher, Frederic M. The Gang. University of Chicago. $3.
Wilson, Woodrow. Principles of Democracy. Harper. 2 vols. $8.
Wolfson, Theresa. The Woman Worker and the Trade Unions. International. $1.75.

ESSAYS, CRITICISM, LITERARY HISTORY

Barfield, Owen. History in English Words. Doran. $1.50.
Beach, Joseph Warren. The Outlook for American Prose. University of Chicago. $2.50.
Blanchard, Frederic T. Fielding the Novelist. Yale University. $6.
Boswell, James. The Hypochrondriack. Ed. by Bailey, Margery. Stanford University.
Bowman, James Cloyd. Contemporary American Criticism. Holt. $2.50.
Bradford, Gamaliel. Darwin. Houghton Mifflin. $3.50.
Brinton, Crane. Political Ideas of the English Romanticists. Oxford.
Broun, Heywood. It Seems to Me. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Buck, Howard Swazey. A Study in Smollett. Yale University. $3.
Burdett, Osbert. Critical Essays. Holt. $1.85.
Calverton, V. F. Sex Expression in Literature. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.
Cerf, Barry. Anatole France. Dial Press. $3.50.
Clark, Barrett H. Eugene O'Neill. McBride.
Clemenceau, Georges. Demosthenes. Houghton Mifflin. $2.50.
Crawford, Nelson A. Agricultural Journalism. Knopf. $3.25.
Davis, Hallam Walker. The Column. Knopf. $2.
Drake, William A. American Criticism: 1925-1926. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Edgar, Pelham. The Mind of Henry James. Houghton Mifflin. $3.
Fausset, Hugh I'Anson. Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Harcourt, Brace. $3.50.
Gardiner, A. G. Certain People of Importance. Harper. $3.
Garrod, H. W. Keats. Oxford.
Giese, W. F. Victor Hugo. Dial Press. $4.
Goldberg, Isaac. The Theatre of George Jean Nathan. Simon and Schuster. $3.
Gorman, Herbert. A Victorian American—Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Doran. $5.
Gretton, Mary Sturge. The Writings and Life of George Meredith. Harvard University. $2.50.
Grey, Viscount. Fallodon Papers. Houghton Mifflin. $2.50.
Jackson, A. V. Williams. Zoroastrianism: Studies Old and New. Columbia University.
Jespersen, Otto. Phonetics. Holt. $3.50.
Legouis, Emile. History of English Literature. Vol. II. Macmillan. $3.75.
Littell, Robert. Read America First. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.
Macy, John. The Romance of America as Told in Our Literature. Doubleday, Page. $5.
Manly, John M. New Lights on Chaucer. Holt. $2.50.
Mencken, H. L. Americana—1926. Knopf. $2.50.
Mencken, H. L. Notes on Democracy. Knopf. $2.50.
Mencken, H. L. Prejudices: Fifth Series. Knopf. $2.50.
Mitchell, Langdon. Understanding America. Doran. $2.
Monahan, Michael. Nemesis. Frank-Maurice. $3.
Muir, Edwin. Transition: Essays on Contemporary Literature. Viking. $2.
Mumford, Lewis. The American Essence. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.
Murry, J. Middleton. Jesus—Man of Genius. Harper. $2.50.
Myers, Walter L. The Later Realism. University of Chicago. $2.
Noyes, Alfred. The New World. Holt. $3.
Orcutt, William Dana. In Quest of the Perfect Book. Little, Brown. $5.
Palache, John Garber. Gautier and the Romantics. Viking. $3.
Perry, Bliss. The Heart of Emerson's Journals. Houghton Mifflin. $3.
Raleigh, Walter. On Writing and Writers. Longmans, Green. $2.25.

Redman, Ben Ray. Edwin Arlington Robinson. McBride.
Sterling, George. Robinson Jeffers. Boni and Liveright. $1.
Stoll, Elmer E. Shakespeare Studies. Macmillan. $4.
Strachey, Lytton. Pope. Harcourt, Brace. $1.
Tupper, Frederick. Types of Society in Medieval Literature. Holt. $1.50.
Valéry, Paul. Variety. Harcourt, Brace. $3.
Weekley, Ernest. Words Ancient and Modern. Dutton. $2.
Willey, Malcolm M. The Country Newspaper. University of North Carolina. $1.50.
Willoughby, L. A. The Classical Age of German Literature. Oxford.
Wilson, Edmund. Discordant Encounters. A. and C. Boni. $2.50.
Yarmolinsky, Avrahm. Turgenev: The Man, His Art, and His Age. Century. $4.

FICTION

Anderson, Sherwood. Tar, a Midwest Childhood. Boni and Liveright. $3.
Armstrong, Martin. Desert: A Legend. Harper. $2.50.
Baroja, Pío. The Lord of Labraz. Knopf. $2.50.
Barreyre, Jean. The Blind Ship. Dial Press. $2.50.
Bates, H. E. The Two Sisters. Viking. $2.
Bennett, Arnold. Lord Raingo. Doran. $2.50.
Bercovici, Konrad. Singing Winds. Doubleday, Page. $2.
Bodenheim, Maxwell. Ninth Avenue. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Brackett, Charles. That Last Infirmity. John Day. $2.
Bunin, Ivan. Mitya's Love. Holt. $2.
Cabell, James Branch. The Music from Behind the Moon. John Day. $6.
Canfield, Dorothy. Her Son's Wife. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Capek, Karel. The Absolute at Large. Macmillan. $2.50.
Cather, Willa. My Mortal Enemy. Knopf. $2.50.
Couperus, Louis. The Comedians. Doran. $2.50.
Crosby, Oscar T. Adam and Eve. Stratford. $1.25.
Deland, Margaret. The Kays. Harper. $2.
Dell, Floyd. An Old Man's Folly. Doran. $2.
De Montherlant, Henry. The Bull-fighters. Dial Press. $2.50.
Deutsch, Babette. A Brittle Heaven. Greenberg. $2.50.
Diehl, Ludwig. The Sardonic Smile: A Novel Based on the Romantic Life of Heinrich Heine. Houghton Mifflin. $2.50.
Dobie, Charles Caldwell. Less Than Kin. John Day. $2.
Dreiser, Theodore. Chains. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.
Du Gard, Roger Martin. The Thibaults. Boni and Liveright. 2 vols. $5.
Dunsany, Lord. The Charwoman's Shadow. Putnam. $2.
Eddison, E. R. Styrbiorn the Strong. A. and C. Boni. $2.
Farrère, Claude. The Useless Hands. Dutton. $2.50.
Ferber, Edna. Show Boat. Doubleday, Page. $2.
Feuchtwanger, Lion. Power. Viking. $2.50.
Firbank, Ronald. Valmouth. Brentano's. $2.
Flecker, James Elroy. The King of Alsander. Knopf. $2.50.
Ford, Ford Madox. A Man Could Stand Up. A. and C. Boni. $2.50.
Forrest, N. Ways of Escape. Little, Brown. $2.
Garland, Hamlin. Trail Makers of the Middle Border. Macmillan. $2.50.
Gibbs, A. Hamilton. Labels. Little, Brown. $2.
Glasgow, Ellen. The Romantic Comedians. Doubleday, Page. $2.50.
Gorky, Maxim. Decadence. McBride. $2.50.
Gorman, Herbert S. The Two Virginities. Macaulay. $2.
Gregory, Alyse. She Shall Have Music. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.
Guthrie, Ramon. Marcabrun. Doran. $2.50.
H. D. Palimpsest. Houghton Mifflin. $2.50.
Hemingway, Ernest. The Sun Also Rises. Scribner. $2.
Hergesheimer, Joseph. Tampico. Knopf. $2.50.

IMPORTANT BOOKS

On the Trail of Ancient Man
By Roy Chapman Andrews

In this vivid account of the American Museum expeditions to Mongolia, the huge beasts of thirty million years ago are made to live before our eyes; we assist in the discovery of giant dinosaur eggs; we share the rigors of scientific struggle and achievement. Illustrated. $5.00

The New Natural History
By Prof. J. Arthur Thomson

George A. Dorsey, author of "Why We Behave Like Human Beings," says: "Professor Thomson is without doubt the most brilliant, the most gifted and the most sympathetic writer of Natural History that has ever lived." Two volumes now ready; the final volume will appear in October. Lavishly illustrated, $6.00 the volume.

Cordelia Chantrell
By Meade Minnigerode

A romance of Charleston in the days when America's bluest blood fused with the reddest. "No one will deny the perfection of Mr. Minnigerode's setting. No one will deny the pathos, the intensity, the dramatic appeal of the many situations which carry forward Cordelia's fate. The final scene is magnificently absorbing. It has a beautiful harmony. It should provide a good deal of pleasure to even the most exacting taste."—N. Y. Times. $2.00

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

New York London

AN INTRODUCTION TO SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY

By L. L. Bernard, Author of Instinct, Etc.

A brilliant behavioristic study of social psychology. The book discusses synthetically the human organism as a functioning unit in a social situation, the socio-psychological processes proper, and the group processes which condition and organize the individual responses collectively. $3.60

SEX HYGIENE

By Dr. J. Kinberg, von Sneidern and Dr. A. Sundquist; translated by Mary E. Collett, Ph.D.

A terse and objective treatment of such matters as the sex organs, parturition, venereal disease, sexual abnormalities, race hygiene, sexual education, etc. The principles of hygiene are applied to every phase of the subject. In Sweden the book is a prize winner and best seller. Excellently illustrated. $1.75

CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN CRITICISM

By James C. Bowman, Editor of Essays for College English, etc.

This collection presents the clash of ideas over such questions as moral values in literature, nationality in literature, the importance of beauty of form in literature, the nature of realism, etc. Twenty-three prominent critics participate, among them being such men as Lowell, Spingarn, Mencken, Sherman, Canby, Babbitt, etc. $2.50

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY

One Park Avenue New York

Heyward, Du Bose. Angel. Doran. $2.
Hudson, Stephen. Richard Kurt. Knopf. $2.50.
Hume, Cyril. The Golden Dancer. Doran. $2.
Hurst, Fannie. Mannequin. Knopf. $2.
Ibáñez, Vicente Blasco. The Pope of the Sea. Dutton. $2.
Istrati, Panaït. Kyra Kyralina. Knopf. $2.50.
Johnston, Mary. Michael Forth. Little, Brown. $2.
Kaye-Smith, Sheila. Joanna Godden Married. Harper. $2.
Kipling, Rudyard. Debit and Credit. Doubleday, Page. $2.
Larsen, J. Anker. Martha and Mary. Knopf. $2.50.
Lawrence, D. H. David. Knopf. $2.
Lewis, Wyndham. Tarr. Knopf. $2.50.
Lewisohn, Ludwig. The Case of Mr. Crump. Paris: Edward W. Titus. $10.
McBeath, Thomas O. The Half-Breed and Other Stories by Walt Whitman. Columbia University.
Macaulay, Rose. Crewe Train. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.
Maugham, W. Somerset. The Casuarina Tree. Doran. $2.
Mauthner, Fritz. Mrs. Socrates. International. $2.
McKenna, Stephen. Saviours of Society. Little, Brown. $2.50.
Millay, Kathleen. Wayfarer. William Morrow.
Montross, Lynn and Lois. Fraternity Row. Doran. $2.
Nathan, Robert. The Fiddler in Barly. McBride. $2.
Newman, Frances. The Hard-Boiled Virgin. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.
Norris, Kathleen. Hildegarde. Doubleday, Page. $2.
Onions, Oliver. The Spite of Heaven. Doran. $2.50.
Ostenso, Martha. The Dark Dawn. Dodd, Mead. $2.
Pirandello, Luigi. Shoot. Dutton. $2.50.
Poole, Ernest. With Eastern Eyes. Macmillan. $2.
Putnam, Emily James. Candaules' Wife and Other Old Tales. Putnam. $2.
Roberts, Elizabeth Madox. The Time of Man. Viking. $2.50.
Sinclair, May. Far End. Macmillan. $2.50.
Smith, Arthur D. Howden. A Manifest Destiny. Brentano's. $2.50.
Stewart, Donald Ogden. Mr. and Mrs. Haddock in Paris, France. Harper. $2.
Suckow, Ruth. Iowa Interiors. Knopf. $2.50.
Sullivan, Frank. The Life and Times of Martha Hepplethwaite. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Swinnerton, Frank. Summer Storm. Doran. $2.
Tully, Jim. Jarnegan. A. and C. Boni. $2.
Tzenskyl, Sergeev. Transfiguration. McBride. $2.50.
Undset, Sigrid. The Cross. Knopf. $3.
Van Doren, Carl. The Ninth Wave. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Van Doren, Dorothy. Strangers. Doran. $2.
Van Vechten, Carl. Nigger Heaven. Knopf. $2.50.
Walpole, Hugh. Harmer John. Doran. $2.
Wassermann, Jacob. Wedlock. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.
Wells, H. G. The World of William Clissold. Doran. 2 vols. $5.
Wescott, Glenway. The Apple of the Eye. Harper. $2.
Wilson, Margaret. The Painted Room. Harper. $2.
Wolf, Robert. Springboard. A. and C. Boni. $2.
Wylie, Elinor. The Orphan Angel. Knopf. $2.50.
Young, E. H. William. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Young, Stark. Heaven Trees. Scribner. $2.

FINE ARTS, MUSIC

Ball, Katharine. Decorative Motives of Oriental Art. Dodd, Mead. $12.50.
Chorley, Henry. Thirty Years' Musical Recollections. Knopf. $5.
Cornelius, Charles O. Early American Furniture. Century. $4.
Gardner, Percy. New Chapters in Greek Art. Oxford.
Guillaume, Paul, and Munro, Thomas. Primitive Negro Sculpture. Harcourt, Brace. $6.
Major, Howard. The Domestic Architecture of the Early American Republic. Lippincott. $15.
Mather, Frank Jewett. Modern Painting, 1664-1914. Holt. $3.

Announcing Mr. Gorman's New Novel

The Two Virginities

by Herbert S. Gorman
Author of "Gold by Gold" and "James Joyce; His First Forty Years"

The dramatic story of a man and woman dragged through the mire of life and who rise superior to their environment because of that clean inner urge—that secret virginity which nothing can touch. His characters may seem to fly in the face of conventionality, yet their steadfast idealism is as admirable as it is unusual. A brilliant, realistic story of aspiration revealing a new trend in modern fiction

At all book stores, $2.00

Macaulay
PUBLISHERS NEW YORK

INTERNATIONAL

What Plato failed to tell of Socrates' dialogues, Mauthner does.

BY FRITZ MAUTHNER
$2.00

Mrs. Socrates

In which the scold's mask is lifted from the fair Xantippe, revealing the puzzled wife of the philosopher battling alone against her fate. We see the famed Aspasia and her aristocratic satellites and commingle in their most intimate moments with the gilded youth, the jaded men and women, the demi-monde, the politicians, poets and warriors of ancient Athens.

The WOMAN WORKER and the TRADE UNIONS
by THERESA WOLFSON
The author sheds an understanding light on conditions of women wage earners. She considers the extent of their organization and participation in union life—in strikes, union meetings, as shop chairmen and organizers, and their place on wage boards and committees. $1.75

THE PEASANT WAR IN GERMANY
by FRIEDRICH ENGELS
A graphic description of a neglected phase of German history, throwing a revealing light upon the present day unrest of the farming and peasant classes throughout the world. $1.50

THE 18th BRUMAIRE OF LOUIS BONAPARTE
by KARL MARX
A new and striking translation of one of Marx's most brilliant essays, enriched by a chronological table of events in French revolutionary history (1789-1871), and a glossary of terms, names and dates. $1.50

OIL IMPERIALISM by Louis Fischer $2.00
BROKEN EARTH by Maurice Hindus $2.00
THE NEW THEATRE and CINEMA OF SOVIET RUSSIA by Huntly Carter $6.00
WHITHER RUSSIA? by Leon Trotsky $1.50
ARE THE JEWS A RACE? by Karl Kautsky $2.50
CHAINS by Henri Barbusse, 2 vols. $4.00

AT ALL BOOKSTORES.

INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS
381 FOURTH AVENUE NEW YORK

Morison, Stanley. A Short History of the Art of Printing. Macmillan.
Newman, Ernest. Contemporary Musicians. Knopf.
Northend, Mary Harrod. American Glass. Dodd, Mead. $5.
Osgood, Henry O. So This Is Jazz. Little, Brown. $3.
Rutter, Frank. Evolution in Modern Art. Dial Press. $2.50.
Rutter, Frank. The Old Masters. Doran. $2.50.
Spargo, John. Early American Pottery and China. Century. $4.
Sparrow, W. Shaw. A Book of British Etching from Barlow to Seymour Haden. Dodd, Mead. $12.50.
Terry, R. R. Medieval Music. Dutton.
Tyler, Royall, and Peirce, Hayford. Byzantine Art. Stokes. $6.

HISTORY

Adams, Randolph Greenfield. Political Ideas of the American Revolution. Duke University. $2.
Allison, John M. S. Thiers and the French Monarchy, 1797-1848. Houghton Mifflin. $5.
Breasted, James Henry, and Robinson, James Harvey. The Human Adventure. Harper. 2 vols.
Callcott, Wilfrid Hardy. Church and State in Mexico. 1822-1857. Duke University.
Capart, Jean. Thebes: The Glory of a Great Past. Dial Press. $20.
Chapman, Charles E. History of the Cuban Republic: A Study in Hispanic-American Politics. Macmillan. $4.50.
Davis, William Stearns. Europe Since Waterloo. Century. $5.
Dutcher, George Matthew. A Guide to Historical Literature. Macmillan. $8.
Fortesque, John. On the Writing of History. Longmans, Green. $1.
Frothingham, Thomas Goddard. The Naval History of the World War. Harvard University Press. Vol. III. $3.75.
Greer, Walter. The Campaigns of the Civil War. Brentano's. $5.
Grenier, Albert. The Roman Spirit: In Religion, Thought, and Art. Knopf. $6.
Howe, M. A. De Wolfe. Causes and Their Champions. Little, Brown. $4.
Inge, W. R. England. Scribner. $3.
Iorga, N. A History of Roumania: Land, People, Civilization. Dodd, Mead. $4.
Kenton, Edna. The Indians of North America. Harcourt, Brace. 2 vols. $10.
Newbigin, Marion I. Canada: The Great River, the Lands, and the Men. Harcourt, Brace. $4.
Randall, James G. Constitutional Problems Under Lincoln. Appleton.
Rose, J. Holland, and Others., Ed. The Cambridge History of the British Empire. Vol. I. The Old Empire. From the Beginnings to 1783. Macmillan.
Rostovtzeff, M. Social and Economic History of the Ancient World. Vol. I. The Early Roman Empire. Oxford.
Shepherd, William R. The Story of New Amsterdam. Knopf. $2.75.
Shotwell, James T. The See of Peter. Columbia University. $5.
Spiller, Robert E. The American in England. Holt. $4.
Sullivan, Mark. Our Times: The Turn of the Century. Scribner. $5.
Toynbee, Arnold J. Turkey. Scribner. $3.
Weber, Max. General Economic History. Adelphi. $3.50.
Wertenbaker, Thomas Jefferson. The American People: A History. Scribner. $5.
Wheeler, Olin D. The Trail of Lewis and Clark, 1804-1904. Putnam. 2 vols. $10.
Williams, Judith B. A Guide to the Printed Materials for English Social and Economic History. 1750-1850. Columbia University. 2 vols. $10.

NORTON BOOKS

Announcing

THE NEW SCIENCE SERIES

Edited by C. K. OGDEN

One of the most significant developments in our life today is that as scientific knowledge advances educated people are left more and more in ignorance of its achievements. Scientists for the most part write for each other. It is apparently forgotten that many of the greatest scientists, from Galileo and Copernicus to Darwin and Huxley, wrote largely for the general reader. The New Science Series, written by leading scientists, will present the latest scientific trends and discoveries from all parts of the world.

Myth in Primitive Psychology

By BRONISLAW MALINOWSKI, Sc.D., Univ. of London

The first book in the field of primitive psychology, by the foremost authority. $1.00

Science and Poetry

By I. A. RICHARDS, Cambridge University

"What kind of a thing, in the widest sense, is poetry?" "How can we use and misuse it?" "What reasons are there for thinking it valuable?" A psychological explanation of how science is destroying poetry. $1.00

Fatalism or Freedom

By C. JUDSON HERRICK, Sc.D., Univ. of Chicago

Do we human beings actually exert control over our conduct? Are we really free in any sense? The author gives the biological reasons why, in actual practice, "progressive and constructive men of all times" have acted as if they were really creative agents and in control of their destiny. $1.00

Leading booksellers everywhere carry this series. If your bookseller cannot supply you write to the publishers.

W·W·NORTON & COMPANY·INC 70 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK

IF You Are Both Intelligent and Stage-Struck!

Then send us only one dollar and we will send you the next three numbers (regular price 50c a copy) of the most interesting magazine about the theatre edited in any country.

To quote Gilbert Gabriel, dramatic critic of the New York Sun, it is "stimulating, fascinating, excellently written and exquisitely illustrated." Why miss such a treat at the height of the theatrical season? Send us your trial subscription today—or, if you prefer, tomorrow, after you've asked someone who reads it now!

To NEW subscribers only

THEATRE ARTS MONTHLY

119 WEST 57th ST. NEW YORK CITY

Enclosed $1.00 for your next three issues
E-2

Name .....
Address .....
City ..... State .....

PHILOSOPHY, PSYCHOLOGY, RELIGION, ANTHROPOLOGY, EDUCATION

Asbury, Herbert. Up From Methodism. Knopf. $2.50.
Asin, Miguel. Islam and the Divine Comedy. Dutton. $5.
Benrubi, Isaac. Contemporary Thought of France. Knopf. $2.50.
Brandes, Georg. Jesus: A Myth. A. and C. Boni. $2.
Browne, Lewis. This Believing World. Macmillan. $3.50.
Carncross, Horace. The Escape from the Primitive. Scribner. $2.50.
Crespi, Angelo. Contemporary Thought of Italy. Knopf. $2.50.
Davis, Jerome. Business and the Church. Century. $2.50.
de Sanctis, Sante. Religious Conversion. Harcourt, Brace. $3.75.
De Wulf, Maurice. History of Mediaeval Philosophy. Longmans, Green. 2 vols.
Durant, Will. The Story of Philosophy. Simon and Schuster. $5.
Haldane, Viscount. Human Experience. Dutton. $2.
Hankins, Frank H. The Racial Basis of Civilization: A Critique of the Nordic Doctrine. Knopf. $3.25.
Huntington, Ellsworth. The Pulse of Progress. Scribner. $5.
Jespersen, Otto. Mankind, Nation, and Individual, from a Linguistic Point of View. Harvard University. $1.40.
Lenin, N. Materialism and Critical Empiricism. International. $3.
Lévy-Bruhl, Lucien. How Natives Think. Knopf. $4.
Mudge, E. Leigh. Varieties of Adolescent Experience. Century. $1.75.
Parrington, Vernon L. Democracy in American Thought. v. I and II. Harcourt, Brace. $8.
Parsons, Elsie Clews. The Pueblo of Jemez. Yale University. $7.50.
Perry, Ralph Barton. General Theory of Value. Longmans, Green. $6.
Randall, John H. The Making of the Modern Mind. Houghton Mifflin. $5.
Rivers, W. H. R. Psychology and Ethnology. Harcourt, Brace. $5.
Schmidt, Max. The Primitive Races of Mankind. Little, Brown. $6.
Smuts, J. C. Holism and Evolution. Macmillan. $3.50.
Snowden, James H. The Truth About Mormonism. Doran. $2.50.
Summers, Montague. A History of Witchcraft and Demonology. Knopf. $5.
Westermarck, Edward. Ritual and Belief in Morocco. Macmillan. 2 vols.
Whitehead, Alfred North. Religion in the Making. Macmillan. $1.50.
Wright, Cuthbert. The Story of the Catholic Church. A. and C. Boni. $2.50.

POETRY

A. E. Collected Poems. Macmillan. $3.75.
Baudelaire, Charles. Complete Works. Tr. by Arthur Symons. A. and C. Boni. $3.50.
Bynner, Witter. Cake. Knopf. $2.
Cooke, Edward Vance. From the Book of Extenuation. Doran. $1.50.
Crane, Hart. White Buildings. Boni and Liveright. $2.
Crane, Nathalia. The Singing Crow. A. and C. Boni. $2.
Ficke, Arthur Davison. The Selected Poems Of. Doran. $2.
French, Joseph Lewis. An Anthology of Chinese and Japanese Poetry. Boni and Liveright. $7.50.
Hardy, Thomas. Collected Poems. Macmillan. $4.
Johns, Orrick. Wild Plum. Macmillan. $1.25.
Johnson, James Weldon, and Johnson, J. Rosamond. The Second Book of Negro Spirituals. Viking. $3.50.

The Negro
Presents His Case

Without Complaint

Without Bitterness

Without Propaganda

The Negro Year Book

1925-26 edition
A Book of Facts

$1.00 Paper Cover

$1.50 Board Cover

NEGRO YEAR BOOK COMPANY
TUSKEGEE INSTITUTE, ALABAMA

ADAM and EVE

BY

OSCAR T. CROSBY, F. R. G. S.

AUTHOR OF

Tibet and Turkestan - International War

A study of the Garden of Eden Story, inspired by travel in Mesopotamia and in other Oriental Lands.

Cloth $1.25

THE STRATFORD COMPANY - Boston, Mass.

New Vols. The TODAY AND TOMORROW Series Just Ready

Stimulating provocative significant

THE FUTURE OF ISRAEL

By JAMES WATERMAN WISE, who discusses the "separateness" of the Jew and his relation to society in the future.

PLATO'S AMERICAN REPUBLIC

By J. D. WOODRUFF, who describes in a dialogue quite after the Greek manner Socrates' account of his lecture tour with Xantippe in the United States.

Each $1.00
Published by DUTTON'S 681 Fifth Ave. New York

JOHN MASEFIELD

will give

SIX READINGS

October 18—Stories, early poems and plays.
October 21—Narrative poems: Everlasting Mercy and Widow in Bye Street; Daffodil and Daffodil Fields.
October 25—First Plays: Nan; Pompey; Faithful. Plays in Verse: Philip; Good Friday.
October 28—Later Poems of the Countryside; Reynard and Right Royal.
November 1—King Cole; Enslaved.
November 4—Miscellaneous poems. Later plays. Trial of Jesus; A King's Daughter.

Fee for the course, $10

Readings to be given at 5:20 P. M. at the

NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH

465 West 23rd Street New York City

THE PROGRESSIVE PARENT

THE OCTOBER ISSUE OF

PROGRESSIVE EDUCATION

A Quarterly Review of the Newer Tendencies in Education will be all about

THE PROGRESSIVE PARENT

The single issue fifty cents, year's subscription (four issues) $2.00

THE PROGRESSIVE EDUCATION ASSOCIATION

10 JACKSON PLACE WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE PROGRESSIVE PARENT

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK offers a fifteen months' course of study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

The course is open to graduates of colleges of recognized standing. Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.

Social workers who are not college graduates will be given special consideration in the preparation of courses of study suitable to their individual needs.

THE FALL QUARTER BEGINS OCTOBER 4, 1926

For further information, address the Director

THE TRAINING SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)

210 West 91st Street, New York City

LABOR TEMPLE, 14th St. and Second Ave., New York

EDMUND B. CHAFFEE, Director

Fall Program

Labor Temple Forum

Sunday Evenings at 8:30

DATE	SPEAKER	SUBJECT
Oct. 10	Arthur Garfield Hays	"Russia Today"
17	James Weldon Johnson	"The Negro and the American Labor Movement"
24	Will Durant	"The Modern Woman"
31	Charles Stelzle	"What About Prohibition?"
Nov. 7	Tony Sender	"Socialism and the New Germany"
14	Rabbi A. Josiah Ford	"The Black Jews"
21	J. Malcolm Bird	"The Present Status of Psychical Research"
23	Senator Gerald P. Nye, of North Dakota	"The Revolt in the West"
Dec. 5	Margaret Sanger	"The Future of Birth Control"
12	Judge Florence Allen	To be Announced
19	John Haynes Holmes	"The Rights of Man versus the Rights of Men—A new Reading of Democratic Ideals"
26	Edmund B. Chaffee	The Significance of Christmas

Admission Free

American International Church

Sunday Evenings at 7:15

DATE	SUBJECT
Oct. 10	"The Great Social Sin"
17	"The Emotional Basis of Disbelief in Immortality"
24	"Behaviorism and Religion"
31	"The Future of Democracy"
Nov. 7	"The Philosophy of Oswald Spengler"
14	"Is One Race Better Than Another?"
21	"Can American Radicals Be Thankful?"
28	"Judging Our Pleasures"
Dec. 5	"Peace—How to Attain It"
12	"Prohibition—Facts and Fallacies"
19	To be Announced
26	Christmas Program

Admission Free

Labor Temple School

Dr. Will Durant, Director of the School, author of "The Story of Philosophy," will lecture every Wednesday evening at 8:30 in his course "Contemporary Psychology," and every Sunday afternoon at 5:00 in his course "Contemporary Literature." Admission 25c. for single lecture, or $5.00 for entire course. For further information inquire at Labor Temple office, 244 E. 14th St.

Every Thursday evening at 8:30 Mr. Chaffee conducts a Forum on "The Events of the Week and Their Inner Significance." Admission is free. All are welcome.

KEEP THIS FOR REFERENCE

Kemp, Harry. The Sea and the Dunes. Brentano's. $2.
Lowell, Amy. East Wind. Houghton Mifflin. $2.25.
Masters, Edgar Lee. Lee. A Dramatic Poem. Macmillan. $2.
Pound, Ezra. Collected Poems. Boni and Liveright. $3.50.
Rickaby, Franz, Ed. Ballads and Songs of the Shanty-Boy. Harvard University. $3.50.
Rorty, James. Children of the Sun. Macmillan. $1.75.
Sandburg, Carl. Selected Poems. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Sandburg, Carl. The American Songbag. Harcourt, Brace. $3.
Sassoon, Siegfried. Satirical Poems. Viking. $1.50.
Snow, Wilbert. The Inner Harbor. Harcourt, Brace. $1.75.
Stevens, James. Collected Poems. Macmillan. $3.
Swartz, Roberta Teale. Liliput. Harcourt, Brace. $1.75.
Teasdale, Sara. Dark of the Moon. Macmillan. $1.50.
Untermeyer, Louis. The Collected Parodies Of. Harcourt, Brace. $1.75.
Van Doren, Mark. 7 P. M. and Other Poems. A. and C. Boni. $1.75.
Wolfe, Humbert. Humoresque. Holt. $2.

SCIENCE

Berry, R. J. A. The Nervous System of Man. Macmillan.
Bölsche, Wilhelm. Love-Life in Nature. A. and C. Boni. 2 vols. $10.
Carr-Saunders, A. M. Eugenics. Holt. $1.
Cline, Isaac M. Tropical Cyclones. Macmillan. $3.50.
Daly, Reginald A. Our Mobile Earth. Scribner. $5.
de Réaumur, René Antoine Ferchault. The Natural History of Ants. Knopf. $5.
Hale, George Ellery. Beyond the Milky Way. Scribner. $1.50.
Herrick, C. Judson. Brains of Rats and Men. University of Chicago. $3.
Lodge, Oliver. Evolution and Creation. Doran. $2.
Mach, Ernst. The Principles of Physical Optics. Dutton. $6.
Michelson, A. A. Studies in Optics. University of Chicago. $2.
Morgan, Thomas Hunt. The Theory of the Gene. Yale University. $4.
Pearl, Raymond. Alcohol and Longevity. Knopf. $3.50.
Wellhouse, Walter Housley. How Insects Live. Macmillan. $5.

TRAVEL, GEOGRAPHY, NATURE, DESCRIPTION

Anderson, Romola and R. C. The Sailing Ship: Six Thousand Years of History. McBride. $5.
Andrews, Roy Chapman. On the Trail of Ancient Man. Putnam. $6.
Colum, Padraic. The Road Round Ireland. Macmillan. $4.
Couperus, Louis. Nippon. Doran. $6.
Franck, Harry A. East of Siam. Century. $3.50.
Geil, William Edgar. The Sacred 5 of China. Houghton Mifflin. $7.50.
Genthe, Arnold. Impressions of Old New Orleans. Doran. $5.
Graham, Stephen. The Gentle Art of Tramping. Appleton $2.50.
Graham, Stephen. London Nights. Doran. $4.
Grey, Zane. Tales of New Zealand. Harper. $5.
Hawthorne, Hildegarde. Corsica: The Surprising Island. Duffield. $3.
Ibáñez, Vicente Blasco. A Novelist's Tour of the World. Dutton. $6.
Lucas, E. V. A Wanderer in Rome. Doran. $5.
Meier-Gräfe, Julius. The Spanish Journey. Harcourt, Brace $6.
Peabody, Robert E. The Log of the Grank Turks. Houghton Mifflin. $4.
Tomlinson, H. M. The Gifts of Fortune. Harper. $4.
Younghusband, Francis. The Epic of Mount Everest. Longmans, Green. $3.

WHERE TO BUY BOOKS

A BOOKSHOP BROUGHT TO YOU
We specialize in service to those far away from bookshops or too busy to do their own browsing. Any book sent anywhere post free. Send for our Fall book list and particulars.
THE POST-BOX BOOK SERVICE
15 West 44th Street, New York

Special Sale of GERMAN SCIENTIFIC AND ART BOOKS
at greatly reduced prices during October
B. WESTERMANN, CO., Inc.
13 West 46th St., New York

JUDAICA BOOKS HEBRAICA
EVERYTHING PUBLISHED AND IN PRINT
Send for Catalogues and Lists
BLOCH PUBLISHING COMPANY
Established 1854 "THE JEWISH BOOK CONCERN"
26 East 22d Street, New York

LECTURES

"Social Thought in Victorian Literature"
Course of Eight Lectures
By ROBERT MORSS LOVETT, A. B.
in the COMMUNITY CHURCH AUDITORIUM
Park Avenue and 34th Street
On THURSDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 14, 21, 28, Nov. 4, 11, 18, Dec. 2, 9, at 8:15 P. M.
Course tickets, $4.50, can be secured in advance at the Office of the COMMUNITY CHURCH
12 Park Avenue, New York City. Single Admission 75c.

STUDENT WORKER CONTEST

First prize $100 Second prize $50 Third prize $25
For particulars address
The Nation 20 Vesey Street New York, N. Y.

Real Estate

—If you have a house or property to sell or lease, try The Nation classified advertising section.

—If the experience of other advertisers of real estate is a guide, your advertisement in The Nation will pay.

—Write for rates to Dept. R., The Nation.

Poems

Animula Vagula

By BABETTE DEUTSCH

Afternoon edges toward evening
Like a tired stallion,
Snuffing the yellow grain that the road spreads
Before the bin of sunset.
But I, the rider,
Must slip from the saddle only to mount again.
The moon will fur with light all the great heads
Of night's twelve horses
Galloping under me,
Before I come
To what awaits me—
And that will not be home.
Travelers, heavily sleeping in strange beds,
Hearing in sleep the whistling groan of a mare
In labor,
I am one
Of your sad company.
And when you rise and miss a horse to ride,
And crouch over your sore bodies,
And curse
Because you cannot journey further, I
Shall nurse my wounds with you—
I shall be there.

The River

By JAMES RORTY

Given a broad-flowing river, a calm and lordly river,
Peace may be made with a green bank sloping, a red cow drinking,
Trees, and white houses, the ripe corn shedding
Pollen for bees to go bearing and sharing
Up the warm valleys.
Peace may be made, and happy songs for singing
Under the blue sky, softly, quietly singing
Beside the broad river.

War may be made with a river, happy war;
A pushing war upstream, the tough blades churning and the blunt prows shoving back
The will of the wide-bowing river. This
Be your Answer and your Cause: to wage
Against the twilight silence of the shadowy capes that reach
Gray hands to quell the river's day-warmed pride,
A steaming, shouting war; to lead
By night, by day, your burdened conquest through
The willow-bordered bays, the slow canals that thread
The humming fragrance of the summer fields,
Until the rolling barges swim at last
In the wind and the sun of the lake's wide freedom. . . .
War,
Brave war may be made with a river.

Death may be found in a river, night and death;
Death without fear, a grave and reasoned death.
For the river is wide, and the mirrored window-lights that peer
From the depths of the night-stricken river—do they not Say always the same thing? Or do the voices change
That whisper, close in the night among the trees,
"Kiss me," and "Love me, do not wait" . . .?
Death may be found in a river. If the tower clock
Thrust high in the night by the surge of the turbulent city,
Weary of Time, should bend and dip
The light-flower of its spire within the flood
Of the deep, unhurrying river—would that be
A thing for wonder? Or if one or two Stray souls grown very free should leave
The blaze of the boulevards, and walk far out, and cast
Deep anchor where the river meets the sea, and there
Baptize their quiet brows
With the salt of a sure salvation . . . well, what then?
Must there be shouting and alarms? . . . One yields at last
To the will of the wide-flowing river.

Dark Summer

By LOUISE BOGAN

Under the thunder-dark, the cicadas resound.
The storm in the sky mounts, but is not yet heard.
The shaft and the flash wait, but are not yet found.
The apples that hang and swell for the late comer,
The simple spell, the rite not for our word,
The kisses not for our mouths, light the dark summer.

Text for a Bitter Vision

By ROLFE HUMPHRIES

The flesh is a cheat, said I, the flesh is a cheat,
A mockery in dumb show, a pantomime
To fool my vision on the sunny street,
Or dupe my blindness in a darker time;
Under this acid gaze, this second sight,
Beloved girls who wander to and fro
Turn into racks of skeletons, ash-white,
Who jerk and hitch a little as they go.

And all the old distinctions I have known
And had some faith in, what are they, I said:
The flesh, a draper's imposition, thrown Across the ribs; that other hoax, the mind,
A thickish gruel, more or less refined,
Poured in a bony noggin called the head.

The Road to the Spring

By MARY AUSTIN

TWENTY years ago those of us who were in a position to assert our faith in the relevancy of Amerind poetry to the evolving American aesthetic did so in the face of a general skepticism as to its authenticity. Improbable, said editors and critics, that verse so limpid and explicit could be the work of ignorant "savages." Today, unable longer to deny the fact, reluctant critics defend their failure to appreciate the significance of the increasing bulk of credible translations, on the ground that it is none of it sufficiently pleasing as poetry to be taken into the national account. Both of these attitudes are eminently characteristic of our American—or should I say democratic?—disposition to rate art values by their concurrence with the immediate intellectual prepossession. As a matter of fact, except for less than a score of individual lyrics, the absolute rendering into English of what Witter Bynner has called "the serenities, the simplicities, the grave and happy mysticism of Indian song" has not yet been made. Probably it can not be made until, at least among people who concern themselves professionally with poesy, there exists toward our aboriginal literature such a cultural perspective as we give to the Greek Anthologies.

For the present, however, it is not necessary that such translation appear, since it is evident that for the people who do interest themselves in Indian song it serves a purpose other than and—for the time—more important than aesthetic appreciation. It serves for the untwining of the three-plied cord of rhythm, melody, and ideation of which poetry is made. For in our time all three of these modes of poetic expression have so altered their form and relative values that the modern poet, when not inhibited in the use of one or the other of them, is at least staggered. Not only have the sword-waving, crosier-bearing, lute-plucking gestures that accompanied the dance of life for the elder poets changed to the movement of a machine-timed, crowd-swayed age. The key of poetic inspiration, the plane of consciousness from which poetic perceptions arise, has been transposed to regions unfamiliar to the young muses. So much so that the whole art of poesy, from being the special mode of youth, promises to become, as it was in the beginning, the preoccupation of the grave and wise, the medium of truth to be apprehended only at levels beyond the reach of sense and sentiment.

Poetry is a medium of expression which requires the whole man; body movement, concreted in the drum and the rattle or, as with us, in the stress and fall of syllables; voice, tempered to musical pitch and interval and these modulated finally to the flow and succession of vowels and consonant; and ideation, controlled by the precise choice and dexterous use of words. The various kinds of poetry take their technical names from the several manners in which these elements are employed. In the passage of poetry from its aboriginal expression by the whole man—pounding feet, shaken rattle, singing voice, leaping body—into the printed page, poetry has taken on an infinity of devices. Many of these, such as assonance, alliteration, rhyme, both internal and terminal, and stanzaic pattern, the modern poet tends to discard in the effort to renew his footing on the bare and salty earth; some of them no doubt to be picked up again with new insight into their value and use. But what now to discard, what to maintain as fundamental amid the clanging alterations of the national expression? Rhyme and fixed stanzaic pattern, as substitutes for melodic effect, are being rather widely let go. But what of rhythm, the printed modulation of body gesture? To what extent will the machine-rhythm, rapidly reducing the gestures of the whole world to uniformity, prevail against the local rhythms of natural environment, the landscape line, the seasonal succession, race, climate?

The poet, who sings more or less under the pressure of such readjustments subconsciously taking place in the racial matrix of his group, will accept with what dignity he can the handicap of a fumbling uncertain age. But the critic and the teacher, while they wait for sheer genius to produce the absolute rearrangement of the technical elements, must resort for forecast and example to the unselfconscious song of the American aboriginal. American for choice, not only because it is the only living body of primitive verse easily accessible but because it has, binding it to the modern condition, the inescapable natural background, all that the soil, the scene, supplies. Students can find, if they know where to look for them, rhythms of the corn lands, of the great plains, the desert and the wooded ranges. But Amerindian verse has more than this which is intrinsically American in the modern sense. It has that preponderance of the communal impulse over the personal which is beginning to be hopefully and yet so menacingly the American note. And it has this advantage over every other body of primitive literature which can be conveniently studied in schools—racial purity of expression; nothing borrowed, nothing engrafted. Altogether an admirable medium in which to study the movement of the poetic impulse working from within outward to clothe itself with literary form.

The true use of poetry is to the makers of it. It serves others, if at all, by giving pleasure, the pleasure arising from the absolute welding of force and form which we call aesthetic. Anybody who is expecting from our aboriginal verse, or neglecting it because it has not, the quality of giving rise to poetic impulses in others announces himself by that expectation as lacking in the original strain from which poetic impulses immemorial take their source. He is showing himself to be, if a poet at all, merely an induced poet; a state from which, like the soft iron which becomes a magnet when subjected to the electric charge, he will, when the inducting charge is cut off, find himself returning to the condition of soft iron. No one can by taking thought or by reading the works of other poets become more poetic than he naturally is. The most he can hope for is the illumination of form. For what is all art, all manners, but the experimental search for form adequate to the animating impulse? And when the current forms of a given art are no longer found equal to the current inspiration, to what source could the artist more hopefully turn for such illumination than to a society in which man has not yet shorn himself of any of his possibilities of expression? The Amerind, if he requires it to complete his poetic form, may stamp the earth, leap in the air, shake a rattle, or, for the announcement of his title, paint himself red and yellow, as a Song of the Sun, or black and white and green, as a Song of the Earth Needing Rain. He is not only free of all possible rhythms and patterns but he is not even bound to the word. He may add or interpolate syllables until the words are "lengthened for singing"—that is, until they fit properly into the rhythmic pattern which his poetic emotion naturally takes. By the fresh observation of this instinctive choice among the elements that make up poetic form the perplexed modern, tormented by ideas which he cannot make at home in traditional verse forms, may see his way in his own work to a choice nearer to his desire. It has never been so much as suggested, by any of us who have been in a position to make such observation, that modern poets should write in the Indian manner. Only that, by studying the manner in which the untutored mind displays itself among its materials—stress, movement, color, pattern, sounds, and words—we may make a new and more satisfactory alignment of the modern equivalents for such material. It is the road to the spring that we travel, to the source of man's medium, rather than to his emotions; a road which every people must take from time to time if it would not see its own most intimate expression smothered in staleness, ossified by tradition.

Not that Amerindian verse has not aesthetic charm when successfully rendered into English. It is a wicked waste of a national resource that we make no move to finance the translation of the best of it by students poetically endowed, instead of trusting it to ethnologists who make no claim to poetic gifts, or to scholars, such as Nellie Barnes, Hartley Alexander, and Eda Lou Walton, whose interest is scholarly rather than poetic. Nevertheless, it is in the work of faithful students that the treasures of Amerindian poetry are most usefully preserved. In these unpremeditated motions of man's mind toward the use of his whole self in the expression of the deepest impulses of that self is the root, sound and nourishing, of the sum of all those affective impulses which we know as culture. Only when we come around again to the Amerindian capacity for putting the whole man into any cultural expression shall we achieve its ideal.

James Ralph, Jack of All Literary Trades

By R. F. DIBBLE

AMONG all that numerous crowd of forgotten literary worthies and unworthies who wrote and rewrote, ate and starved, hated and loved with equal abandon during the early eighteenth century, James Ralph is probably buried in the profoundest obliteration. His name can be found today in only three works of importance: Franklin devoted some pages of his "Autobiography" to him; Pope slaughtered him in one of the most merciless couplets in the "Dunciad"; and Boswell honored his memory with two small footnotes in the "Life of Johnson." Yet during his topsy-turvy life Ralph was a luminary of considerable magnitude. He was a sort of literary godfather to Fielding; Walpole and Bolingbroke alternately sought and feared his vitriolic political pen; it is probable that King George III himself paid 150 good British pounds to secure a document written by Ralph, in which the kingly vices were uproariously revealed; and in 1753 Franklin, disillusioned though he was, admitted that while Ralph's "reputation was indeed small as a poet . . . he was esteem'd one of the best political writers in England, and his prose was thought as good as any man's."

His early years are shrouded in irritating obscurity. Born possibly in Pennsylvania, perhaps in 1698, though more probably in 1705, he first appears definitely in Philadelphia in 1724 as a merchant's clerk who loved to read, to scribble impossible heroic couplets, and to say nasty deistic things about God. Franklin first met him in that year and found him to be "ingenious, genteel in his manners, and extremely eloquent; I think I never knew a prettier talker." For Ralph's budding poetic soul was already soaring far above the pettinesses of facts and figures. He thoroughly believed that he was destined to become an eminent poet; and when Franklin tried to discourage him by pointing out the innumerable flaws and conceits in his couplets, he would grandly reply that other poets, when they first began, made as many and probably more mistakes. Nor was he at all abashed when Franklin, forever prosy-minded, coldly remarked that he "approv'd the amusing one's self with poetry now and then, so far as to improve one's language, but no farther." So it came about that when Franklin sailed to Europe late in 1724 Ralph—nothing doubting that he would soon become the peer of Pope—sailed with his friend. The deceitful knave, who was both a husband and a father, pretended that he was going abroad merely on mercantile business; but Franklin soon discovered that, being in great disfavor with his wife's relatives, he "proposed to leave her on their hands and never return again." He never did.

For a time the two travelers were inseparable. They lodged, ate, and slept together in London; but there the partnership stopped, for Franklin alone paid the bills. Ralph had spent his last pistole on the ocean voyage, and therefore thought it only right that his friend should both discharge his debts and lend him money—did he not more than repay Franklin every day by parading solemnly around their little room, his hands swinging aloft and his voice vibrating with emotion, as he spouted a geyser of newly improvised verses? Bored almost to extinction, Franklin was only too pleased a find a good job at which he labored with all his terrific utilitarian efficiency. Left thus to himself, Ralph—who above all things needed an audience—decided to become an actor; but after he had displayed his wares he was candidly advised "not to think of that employment, as it was impossible he should succeed in it." His success in obtaining money from Franklin's rapidly diminishing store, however, was uniform and constant, and he used it in going to playhouses "and other places of amusement."

From this time on, in fact, he "seem'd quite to forget his wife and child." In the house where the two men resided there lived a "sensible and lively" milliner; and after Ralph had driven Franklin out into the streets to escape those awful mouthings and gestures the crafty fellow tried his poems and plays on the lady. The result was so perfectly satisfactory that "shortly in the book they read no more that day," but grew so intimate that "she took another lodging, and he followed her." For a year he dawdled about, doing nothing but manufacture verses and gratify himself in other ways; for his companion believed herself to be so much in debt to him that she paid all his accounts and supported herself and their child. At the end of this time, however, her money and patience were simultaneously exhausted, and Ralph accordingly decamped from London to take charge of a country school. But, deeming such a business to be far below him, he dropped his own name and assumed the name of Franklin; for he was "confident of better future fortune, when he should be unwilling to have it known that he once was so meanly employed." Furthermore, he felt perfectly justified in taking Franklin's name, since such a mere hard-working grind as Ben would obviously never make any name for himself.

Yet he still had enough respect for Franklin's literary judgment to send him large specimens of an epic poem, "desiring" as Franklin says, "my remarks and corrections." Ben replied by sending Ralph one of Young's recently published satires which showed the folly of pursuing the Muses, but "all was in vain; sheets of the poem continued to come by every post." Then Franklin, vexed even more by Ralph's rhymes than by his constant requests for more money, determined to get an ample revenge. He made overtures to the abandoned and lonesome milliner, and, "being at that time under no religious restraint, I attempted familiarities (another erratum) which she repuls'd with proper resentment, and acquainted him with my behavior." This affair gave the sly Ralph his cue. Equally tired of his debts and of the milliner, he saw the way to be free of both. On the one hand he could accuse her of infidelity, and on the other hand he could tell Franklin that, on account of his amorous activities, he "had cancell'd all financial obligations." But Ben was able to take care of himself He had lately published his first bit of writing, "A Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity, Pleasure and Pain," and had dedicated it to his friend; but he held the scamp up to the scorn of posterity by including the publication of this pamphlet among his countless errata and by penning this line in his autobiography: "In the loss of his friendship I found myself relieved from a burthen." Yet at a later day, in commenting bitterly on the twenty-seven pounds he had forever lost to Ralph, Ben could not refrain from adding: "I loved him, notwithstanding, for he had many amiable qualities."

Meanwhile Ralph, thrown wholly on his own resources, returned to London and became a hack-writer. In 1728 he first burst into print with "Touchstone, or . . . Essays on the Reigning Diversions of the Town," a divertingly dull hodge-podge which showed an enormous amount of familiarity with the stage and the customs of Grub Street. During the next year there appeared his "Miscellaneous Poems," dedicated in most fulsome terms to the Earl of Chesterfield. They included "Night: a Poem," four cantos of blank verse that imitated Thomson's "Seasons"; "Clarinda, or the Fair Libertine," four cantos of heroic couplets that imitated Dryden; and "Zeuma, or the Love of Liberty," three cantos of such incredible blank verse that by no stretch of imagination can they be said to imitate anything. The book failed to succeed; but the "mungril Criticks," as Ralph called them, snarled and snapped over the shreds of the volume, while Pope conferred immortality upon him by writing:

> Silence, ye wolves, while Ralph to Cynthia howls,
> And makes Night hideous; answer him, ye owls.

Perhaps it was rather unkind of Pope to italicize Night; certainly it was unnecessary—in every way—for him to append a footnote which stated that Ralph was a "low writer."

For the first time in his life Ralph now felt despondent. Pope's couplet and footnote, he complained, prevented his success in any employment, even in the everlasting job of writing poetry. But in 1730 he became acquainted with Fielding, whom he at once took under his expansive wing; and in the same year Fielding's "Temple Beau" appeared, with a prologue written by Ralph. In it he lamented the decline of genuine comedy to farce, complained of the want of patronage by the great, and prayed that they would encourage true merit by making Fielding's play a success. They did. The result was that poor Ralph discovered he had started Fielding on the road to fame, while he himself remained as deep in the literary dumps as ever. But when Fielding ran the Haymarket Theater in 1736 he seems to have repaid the debt by allowing Ralph to become his assistant, and he also put in rehearsal Ralph's play, "The Astrologer." Unfortunately it was found necessary to subject the piece to an indefinite postponement; and in the end Ralph had to be satisfied with only one benefit performance of another of his plays, whose name, sad to relate, has not come down.

The disappointed poet and dramatist now turned to journalism. In 1738 Dodington employed him to write fiery denunciations of the Ministry, and in 1739 he became associate editor of Fielding's paper, The Champion, which constantly attacked Walpole and his coterie. When Fielding withdrew from this publication in 1741 Ralph succeeded him as sole manager and chief editorial writer. But though he did his best to imitate Fielding's indirect methods of attack, his ironies and his allegories, he failed, and The Champion quickly descended into a peevishly dull political journal that soon petered out in a chronic decline. Even successful imitation, it appears, was outside the scope of Ralph's genius.

His febrile activity soon turned itself into new channels. In 1742 he wrote a five-hundred-page attack on the aged Duchess of Marlborough, who had shown the temerity to defend Queen Anne; in 1743 there appeared his ponderous "Cultural History of the Administration of Sir Robert Walpole, by a Gentleman of Quality"; and in 1744 his "Use and Abuse of Parliaments" advanced the novel idea that parliamentary government must always be a failure. From 1744 to 1746 he was busy on his masterpiece, "The History of England During the Reigns of King William, Queen Anne, and King George I. By a Lover of Truth and Liberty"—a book for which the most that can be said is that it added some new material to that of its predecessors. Those two massive folios do indeed show prodigious diligence, if little else; and they were actually praised—though, alas, after their author's untimely death—by Charles James Fox, by Lord Hallam, and by the Edinburgh Review.

This history also won him the favor of Bolingbroke, chief figure in the party headed by the Prince of Wales, and in 1748 Ralph was put in control of The Remembrancer, the mouthpiece of the Prince. Apparently on the road to real political preferment at last, he became almost optimistic again; but in a short time the Prince had the bad taste to die. So Ralph, down in the depths once more, aligned himself with the opposition on a new paper; but through the services of Garrick—who had once shown some mild interest in his dramatic productions—he was bought off in 1753 by the Pelham Ministry and given a yearly allowance of £300. For the next few years his literary work consisted of a series of letters which announced his annual visits to Newcastle House for the purpose of collecting his pension.

One other work, at least, came from his pen. In 1758 he published "The Case of Authors by Profession or Trade Stated," in which the concentrated spleen of thirty years of failure burst forth. In fact the book holds some slight interest even today, as being one of the first—possibly the very first—eighteenth-century protests against the treatment of poets and dramatists by booksellers and theatrical managers. In it he wantonly attacked his benefactor, Garrick, and on every page he stoutly defended authors who wrote for money—as well he might. But he wrote now merely from habit—"as alert with my Pen as a Wasp with its Sting"—not with the hope of winning any fame for himself. Optimism of every sort, even his faith in deism itself, had completely vanished. So utterly morose had he become that he could no longer read the prince of pessimists, Ecclesiastes, without parodying him: "I throw my Bread upon the Waters without any Hope of finding it after many Days."

The logic of events would seem to demand that his life should have become more and more gloomy until the squalid, poverty-stricken end. But it was not to be so; in his case virtue, as is proper, turned out to be its own reward. He who had ruined scores of quills and reams of foolscap to win the reputation that was ever denied him departed this life in a blaze of glory, as rich and famous men should depart. Racked with incessant stabs of pain though he was during his last months, he was nevertheless supremely happy and he greeted every twinge with a smile. His triumphant decrepitude gave him more satisfaction than anything else in his life had ever done. For on January 24, 1762, he died of the gout.

An Unknown Poet

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN

A FRIEND who suspected the miracle but wasn't quite sure brought him up to our apartment in Vienna one evening in the early fall. It was, whatever the result, a difficult situation. Good literature does somehow, I said to myself, manage to get itself published. Hadn't a Viennese publisher handed me the other day a new volume of lyrics by a man in whose future he had faith? It seemed superficially to speak against Dr. Ernst Waldinger that his two collections of verse were, for the present, hopelessly in manuscript. With what polite lies was I to save my face if the stuff proved immature or conventional? If, on the other hand, we were in the presence of the miracle, how was I to endure the poet's modesty of demeanor in the presence of the foreign and supposedly arrived man of letters? For the Viennese are a modest and a gentle folk. Amid the ruin of their land and city they go on producing more beautiful things in all the arts than the dwellers in any other place on earth. Yet they are strangely humble before the representatives of the peoples whom they think of as strong and victorious.

The poet proved to be slim and unobtrusive. He was the more shrinking because he had been almost mortally wounded and shell-shocked during the war. For months he had lain unconscious and dumb. A strange lisp had remained; he still hid a shattered hand. But from beneath his shrinking demeanor there came to us something sweet and indomitable and incorruptible. It was clear to me almost at once why he worked in a kinsman's mercantile establishment to earn bread for a wife and child; why he was allied to none of the various local literary groups or circles; why he knew no one in his native city. He couldn't ply the trade of letters. Since it never occurred to him that he could subordinate his duties as a man to his success as a poet, it was equally clear that he hadn't quite literally the time to call on editors or make appointments to meet people in the Café Central or Herrenhof or ingratiate himself with those editorial powers and principalities who precisely in Vienna operate with a good deal of social elegance and formality. He was closely allied by marriage to at least one Viennese of the highest international fame and to an Austro-American family of both wealth and distinction. I had but to look into Ernst Waldinger's eyes to understand his noble inability to press his claims either upon the very great man, absorbed, old, in uncertain health, or upon the American kinsmen, who, though intelligent and kindly and generous, were thinking of everything else rather than of the severest of the Muses. . . .

I begged him to honor us by reading a few poems. He sat down on a couch, half-turned away, shading his eyes a little. His voice was low but sonorous; the lisp almost disappeared. He read, like all poets, with heavy emphasis on the musical values of his verses. Without physically raising or lowering his voice he brought to our ears the resonance of thunder:

Aus goldnem Hämmern und aus Brunnenrauschen, and the song of flutes and soft recorders:

Du Flöte des Geschicks, du schwebst als glitte
Ein zartes Vogellied durch blaue Mitte.

He read a poem called L'Antichambre—

Wie viele Zeit verbringen wir vor Türen—into which he had poured forever all the hesitancy and pain and pride and humiliation and despair and reassertion of the free self of all noble spirits who have had to be suppliants because they could never sink to the level of those outside whose doors they waited; he read a sonnet Unto Us a Son Is Born. . . .

Mayest thou have music loftier than our own,
Thou whose sweet eyes our ecstasy once bred;
Then wilt thou hear the hours' more patient tread
And with thy aspirations be at one.
Though many a flower must wither ere 'tis blown,
And many a goodly fruit unripe lie dead,
None ever came but in a savior's stead.
Mayest thou have music loftier than our own.

The somber burden which to thee we brought
Forgive thy parents and their hapless race!
Keep nothing of them but their yearning's grace
And guard it tenderly as they did not,
That or from discord or accordant tone
Thou mayest hear music loftier than their own.

Only he did not read this conventional verbiage into which I have forced his lovely spontaneity and packed significance. He read:

Dass du Musik hast über uns hinaus, Süssblickender. . . .

He read, above all:

Doch keiner kam, der nicht zum Heil geboren. . . .

He fell silent amid the shadows of his corner on the couch, still shading his eyes, still hiding his wounded hand.

He must have perceived our emotion in the hush. He explained very simply that he had written a group of poems in which he had tried to interpret the inner significance of certain great forms of analogous creative acts within his own art. Thus he read us Fugue—swift, resonant stanzas concerning a tone that, rising from the silence of deep midnights, is married to sister-tones and reaches finally the throne of ultimate mystery; he read us Arabesques—the breathless, inconceivably swift interlacement of sinuous terze rime; he read us The Tower—a magnificent paean of all the unconquerable aspirations of mankind:

> Alle Ekstasen sollst du überstürmen,
> Allen Gebeten, die seufzen, beschwören,
> Gib die Gestalt und lass sie sich türmen,
> Steinerne Orgel zu brandenden Chören!

He read us finally his epilogue and confession of faith: Of Strong Humility. He who regards the universe with true piety holds nothing to be of small account; to him who reverences all life all things yield up their secrets. True love and faith purge the wild senses of terror and identify the soul in joy with the self-contemplative creativeness of God. All men are thus at one and equal in a glow like a still fire within the heavenly crystal; they are in the shadow of a spirit that manifests itself in all phenomena alike; they are members of a community divine by its very nature and sustaining the least and most fearful of its creatures. Thus in the strength of humility the circle of creation rejoices, knowing itself and all its works obedient to the ultimate command:

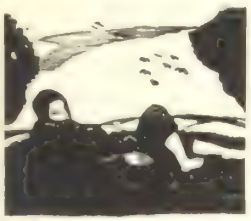
> Und in der Demut Stärke
> Frohlockt der Schöpfungskreis,
> Der sich und seine Werke
> Dem Sinn gehorsam weiss.

These poems were all from Dr. Waldinger's earlier manuscript collection: "Die Berufung." He was good enough later to give me a copy of his more recent work: "Gras Zwischen den Steinen." This is a continuous poem of forty sections or brief cantos, each section or canto consisting of seven stanzas. The form is severe and highly symmetrical, relying for variety upon the change of subject, mood, and inner music. The theme of the entire poem is the poet's boyhood and adolescence in Vienna. It shares with all first-rate literature the quality of being universal by virtue of its very concreteness. In those etched scenes of home and street and school the humblest, at times the most sordid details are—while remaining precisely what life makes them—lifted into the eternal world of the interpretative imagination. I cannot clear the barriers of language and convey any just notion of this poem. I have read it again and again in the carbon copy which Dr. Waldinger gave me. It moves me more each time, not less. I rank it in my own mind with Dehmel's "Zwei Menschen," with William Ellery Leonard's "Two Lives," with that brief series of works, beginning with "Modern Love," in which, after so long and painful a divorce, verse and life, music and reality, high imagination and concrete experience are married once again. . . .

Waldinger is barely thirty. I cannot find any influence of any older poet in his verse except perhaps a slight tinge of Rilke in his earlier poems. What distinguishes him is, I take it, a union of precise fidelity to fact with plasticity of contour and musical resonance of texture. He describes, for example, a teacher in a school who overawes his pupils. To them he seems detached, noble, a superior being. The poor man is, in fact, pursued into his very classroom by sordid and domestic cares. At night he tries to flee from life by writing shoddy verses. Waldinger makes us feel the feelings of the small boys; next he makes us see as with the eyes of the body the humble and unhappy pedagogue. And the poem is as severe as a canto of Dante and as rich in vowel-music as a sonnet of Rossetti, and yet there blows through it a bleak wind of modern life and we know the brown, stained classroom and the man and his wife and the wretched little flat and the evening-lamp there by which the teacher writes his verses. . . .

It is months ago since Ernst Waldinger did me the honor of giving me his manuscripts. I do not know whether he has found a publisher. He probably thinks that I, like others whom I begged him to approach, am afflicted with what he once called "sloth of the heart" ("Trägheit des Herzens"). The truth is that I have had many qualms of conscience. But life is imperious in its demands. I have had nearer duties than that of speaking a word, ineffectual enough, for the marvelous poet who by chance came up my stairs one day. Also the history of literature persuades me to believe that such work as his cannot go permanently unnoticed and unpraised. To which he could justly reply that he needs publication and appreciation now, that a gleam in these dim and penurious years would do more for him, more therefore for poetry, than all the possible plaudits of a future when he will be indifferent and cannot enjoy them; when he may be solitary and cannot impart them. . . . The unforgettable words of Johnson embody the recurrent tragedy of the creative artist. Mindful of those words I have written this perhaps too personal and certainly quite inadequate account of my unknown poet. Even amid the clamorous business of the world it may be seen by a few who are not wholly unmindful of things precious and permanent.

The Plastic Artist in America*



By RALPH M. PEARSON

THEODORE DREISER, Zona Gale, Sherwood Anderson, and Edgar Lee Masters say that if a literary artist does not thrive in America the fault is his, not America's. The vein of human ore runs as rich here as it has ever run, the artist as observer and teller of stories need not be rasped by unreason, instinct at play, hundred-percenters, our youth, our want of mellowness. These are our flavors. They are materials at hand to be used. "The whole story of the swift, sudden changes in life, the drive, the rush, the lost sense of values in the modern industrial world, the necessary loss of sensibilities too—is that not a story?" So, in the main, run the arguments. No conflict of standards, no definition of terms, particularly as to what is and what is not art in literature, is touched on. The artist's problem, it seems, comes down chiefly to a working adjustment between himself and his material.

Can this healthy situation, which Mr. Anderson extends to all the arts, be said to carry over to the plastic arts? Experience says, No. There may be similarities, but there are also extreme differences that change the face of things. If any "scribbler" doubts it let him paint a dozen pictures

* This is the tenth of a series of articles by American writers, answering in the light of their general experience the question: Can an artist function freely in the United States? Mary Austin, Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, Zona Gale, Edgar Lee Masters, Ludwig Lewisohn, Sinclair Lewis, Floyd Dell, and Irwin Edman have hitherto contributed.

Houghton Mifflin Company

Lord Grey's
FALLODON PAPERS

In this series of stimulating and delightful essays, England's former Foreign Minister writes of the pleasures of reading and outdoor life at Fallodon. $2.50

Clemenceau's
DEMOSTHENES

A masterly study of the great Athenian orator which is at the same time a subtle spiritual autobiography of the "Tiger" himself. $2.50

ON THE STREAM OF TRAVEL
James N. Hall
The odyssey of an adventurous young man. $3.00

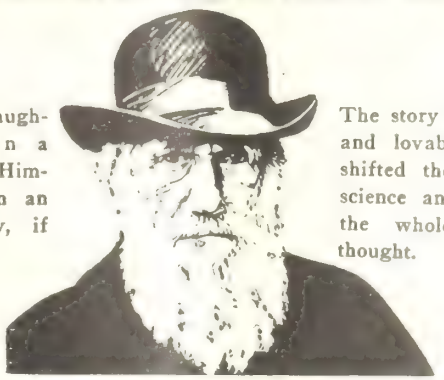
THE LOG OF THE GRAND TURKS
Robert E. Peabody
The record of four famous ships. $4.00

THE SOCIAL WORKER IN A HOSPITAL WARD
Elsie Wulkop
With comments by Dr. Cabot. $3.00

WASHINGTON'S RULES OF CIVILITY
Charles Moore
A fascinating reprint. Illustrated with facsimiles. $2.00

APOSTATE
Forrest Reid
An intensely moving spiritual autobiography. $4.00

MY ÁNTONIA
Willa Cather
A new edition of Miss Cather's masterpiece. $2.50



A BOUQUET FROM FRANCE
Wilfrid Thorley
An anthology of French poetry, with English translations. $2.25

THE MAKING OF THE MODERN MIND
By John H. Randall, Jr.

John Dewey calls this brilliant analytical survey of the intellectual backgrounds of the present age "the only history of modern thought and philosophy which puts their development in the proper perspective." $5.00

GAMALIEL BRADFORD'S

"He made hell a laughing-stock, heaven a dream, and God Himself no more than an amiable possibility, if even that."

The story of a tolerant and lovable man who shifted the attitude of science and overturned the whole world of thought. $3.50

DARWIN

MEMORIES OF A HAPPY LIFE
William Lawrence
The autobiography of Bishop Lawrence. $5.00

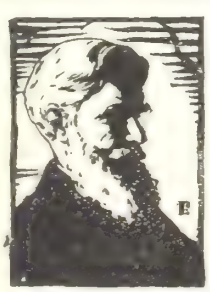
THE WHITE DEVIL'S MATE
Lewis S. Palen
Adventures in Red Russia. $2.50

NORTHERN LIGHTS AND SOUTHERN SHADE
Douglas Goldring
Vignettes of Scandinavia and Brittany. $5.00

AUTUMN FIRE
T. C. Murray
"One of the best plays of the Irish soil."—Spectator. $1.25

O GENTEEL LADY!
Esther Forbes
Sophisticated romance of crinoline days. $2.00

TAXATION OF INHERITANCE
W. J. Shultz
A comprehensive survey. $3.00



EXTENSION OF BANK CREDIT
Earl B. Schwulst
A study of the principles of sound banking. $3.00

EAST WIND
By Amy Lowell

"Thirteen poems, all dedicated passionately to New England life and character, all . . . stark and mordant and merciful, drenched with purgative pity and terror."—Joseph Auslander, New York Sun. $2.25

PALIMPSEST
By H. D.

In its snaring of the most elusive overtones and undertones of life, this book by one of the most distinguished of contemporary poets pushes forward the established boundaries of prose fiction. $3.50

THE NEW SPIRIT
THE SOUL OF SPAIN
By Havelock Ellis

These important volumes—two of the most incisive of all the Ellis books—are now available in the new Popular Edition. Each $2.25

THE HEART OF EMERSON'S JOURNALS
Edited by Bliss Perry

A vivid self-portrait of the Concord philosopher revealed with care and discrimination from the ten volumes of his Journals. $3.00 that are works of art in the modern sense and see what happens. Subject matter undoubtedly is as rich and available as it has ever been or as it is in any field of art. Forms, textures, lines, colors are raw materials, like words and notes, waiting in limitless profusion to be used for expressing the endless aspects of life and nature. Materials, then, are the same. But when we come to the problem of adjustment to materials and to the entire problem of adjustment to the public the differences are certainly dominant.

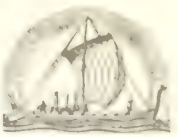
Take, for instance, the matter of a standard. That Shakespeare, Flaubert, Keats, Masters, and Anderson are artists would be generally granted by the three groups that make their public—writers, critics, and general readers. In granting this much a standard of judgment is allowed which at least places the quality of art in the creative handling of material rather than in the material itself. Not so in plastic art. Cézanne and Sargent could both be called artists only by opposed schools of criticism—the one school seeing art mainly in style or creative expression, the other seeing it mainly in skilful recording of subject, or imitation. In the plastic field, therefore, a definition of terms is the necessary first step, and moreover it is the only escape for the individual from the imitative viewpoint or from the confusion incident to conflicting standards that are not clearly understood.

Both adherence to imitation and confusion of issues, as they work on the mind of an artist trained to the academic standard of the average school, prevent significant creation; but even mightier looms the economic issue. This hungry beast lies in wait just outside the door of the mind to stop all flights of fancy—to bring an artist s thoughts back to bread and gas. The artist, of course, can "go and be a banker," as Mr. Anderson suggests, and save his skin. But such a retreat will hardly solve the issue.

This economic matter does not take its root in the selfishness of an indifferent public. It is not that there is no money for art—or support for artists. Millions are freely given, and certain so-called artists can live like bankers without the bother of being bankers. It goes deeper than that. It goes back to a state of mind—a state of mind that, in the very act of generously supporting art as it understands it, is actually blighting art by non-support according to the newer concepts of the day.

The conception that visual art is a modified form of copying has permeated the English-speaking world so thoroughly that art quality (which all history proves cannot lie in that direction) has been lost sight of to a degree almost impossible to believe. So far has it gone that the lesson of Oriental art and of the classics of all ages is largely lost. So, too, is the lesson of the modern rediscovery of the moving power of design—which gives to those classics a greatly deepened meaning. Many authorities are in the same predicament as the general public and have failed as completely to extricate themselves from their inherited bias toward skilful imitation. The National Academy, the American Federation of Art, and many art schools, museums, critics, and art magazines are cases in point. For in giving their generous support to a type of work which Oriental culture finds vulgar they fail to support creation.

The calling of museum support "generous" must be explained. John Cotton Dana, one of the few officials with a conscience in the matter of living artists, says: "Our art museums have, up to this day, used not even as much as 2 per cent of their total expenditures for the purchase of objects produced in this country." Two per cent of all museum expenditures is a lot of money—perhaps ten or twenty or more thousands of dollars—enough to allow ten or twenty or more artists to quit commercial work and turn to creation. But it is not spent with this end in view. It is mainly spent for documents describing winter ably compiled by Redfield, or for those describing prominent persons compiled by Sargent and Louis Betts; which signifies generosity—to the recording school. With 98 per cent of their money going in other directions and the "generous" 2 per cent, if these figures are right, going for "safe and sane" contemporaries, creative expression is a bit obviously "up against" the economic issue so far as museums are concerned. The antidote (and fortunately there always is an antidote) is found in a different and more adventurous state of mind as evidenced in the acts of such courageous leader-officials as Mr. Dana, who is buying contemporary American art for the Newark Public Library with the definite aim of encouraging its production. Other antidotes are the educational activities of the Barnes Foundation, the encouraging-art-in-industry activities of the Art Center of New York, the museum exhibitions of contemporary work, the purchases of such adventurous collectors as John Quinn and Duncan Phillips, the growth of creative expression among children so ably reported in the last issue of "Progressive Education," etc., all of which contribute to the attainment of the creative goal in proportion as they refuse to compromise with the prevailing public taste of the day.



The state of mind which supports imitation is surprisingly unconscious at a time when consciousness of mental processes is so much the order of the day that a village library will have more requests for books on psychology than for those on any other serious subject. Satisfaction with the familiar, fear of the new and strange, run their course as unquestioned here as ever they did in the interior of darkest Africa. Mr. Dreiser in this series makes Sargent and Whistler represent the "really important artists." Mr. Cram damns modern art because it carries abstraction beyond familiar limits. Senator Beveridge calls art "truth." The great public knows what it likes and likes what it knows. Patrons of art give their thousands and millions for magnificent museums to house borrowed art of other ages. And the creators of the day get on as best they may. All because fear of the new and strange and desire for the safety of the guaranteed judgment stop all questing for adventure in the field of visual art.

In the literary department the new, even though it must batter against the same traits of mind, does get a hearing—does meet an alert analytical criticism that at least differentiates art from material. In the plastic department art is widely confused with material because the imitative tradition is accepted without analysis or because conflicting standards confuse the issue. It is the state of mind which allows the situation to exist, working both through the artist and through the patron, that chiefly prevents the free functioning of the creative plastic artist in America.

The Nation's list of Notable Fall Books for 1926 will be found in the main section of the present issue, on pages 351-358.

VIKING PRESS BOOKS

"A work of genius."—London Morning Post.

H. E. BATES

is a twenty-one year old English novelist sponsored by Edward Garnett, the English critic, who numbers among his previous discoveries Conrad, Galsworthy and W. H. Hudson. Mr. Bates makes his bow to American readers with

THE TWO SISTERS

"An unusual and lovely book. . . . It makes its appeal to real lovers of literature, to connoisseurs."
—New York Times.

The story of Tess and Jenny, of the brooding atmosphere which surrounds their home, and of their love for the man Michael is one which only a true artist would dare to approach and could carry off successfully. With an introduction by Edward Garnett. $2.00

From

GOETHE

To

Hauptmann

by Camillo Von Klenze

"This is a study in comparative literature, a subject on which the author is as capable of speaking as any man in the world whose medium of expression is German or English, unless it be Sir Edmund Gosse." — Allen Porterfield in The New York Times. $2.50

Readers of THE NATION will welcome

The SECOND BOOK of NEGRO SPIRITUALS

James Weldon Johnson and J. Rosamond Johnson have produced a companion volume to their famous "Book of American Negro Spirituals." With a new introduction and sixty-one more songs, many of which have never been set down before, this volume is equally as fine as the first, which set a nation singing and talking of "America's greatest contribution to art."—Sinclair Lewis. Uniform with first volume. $3.50

A novel of universal appeal

POWER

by Lion Feuchtwanger

Romance lives again in this novel, hailed by European critics as one of the greatest romances of the past decade. The story of an actual historical character, a Jew of the court of Wurttemberg in the early eighteenth century, it comes to American readers in the fine translation from the German by Willa and Edwin Muir. Huge in scope and conception, Power stands out as a dignified work of art that will withstand the years. $2.50

"We unreservedly recommend

Mohammed

by R. F. Dibble

as the season's biography"
—The World. $3.00

THE TIME OF MAN

by Elizabeth Madox Roberts

A more distinguished reception could hardly be conceived than that accorded to this first novel by a new American author. Critics and readers universally hail it as a beautiful and moving story, a permanent contribution to American art. It will be read by every cultured American, by everyone sensitive to true emotion and fine writing. "A beautiful work of art."—Carl Van Doren. "Brim full of beauty."—Keith Preston. "A work of genius, beautifully written and full of light."—Edward Garnett. "A wonderful performance. I am humble before it."—Sherwood Anderson.

Biography and Criticism

JOHN GARBER PALACHE

GAUTIER

AND THE ROMANTICS

A happy blend of biography, anecdote and criticism makes this volume a treasure trove of information and entertainment—one of the few books on the subject in the English language. Mr. Palache, author of Four Novelists of the Old Régime, has successfully depicted the life of Gautier and of his circle, Flaubert, Balzac, Turgenev, the Goncourts, Baudelaire, George Sand and many other famous figures of the period. In addition he has brought to his task a keen critical appreciation and narrative art. Illustrated. $3.00

Transition

by Edwin Muir

Edwin Muir needs no introduction to the readers of The Nation. His brilliant essays on contemporary literature have, many of them, appeared in these pages. In Transition he reveals the entire tendency and direction of the present age of literature through a keen analysis of the most interesting and baffling English writers of today: Strachey, Joyce, T. S. Eliot, Stephen Hudson, Aldous Huxley, Edith Sitwell, D. H. Lawrence, Virginia Woolf and others. $2.00

30 Irving Place THE VIKING PRESS New York City

First Glance

"THE Heart of Emerson's Journals," edited by Bliss Perry (Houghton Mifflin: $3) from the now famous ten volumes published between 1909 and 1914, will probably establish itself as the best single book to which to go for a picture of the living Emerson. The "Essays" have lost a little of their vitality, though perhaps not much; the poems, which gain in strength as time passes, are nevertheless only Emerson at his highest and rarest. Here are both the essayist and the poet at their bubbling source, set in relation to the more general man who must always be interesting chiefly for the thing he spent his life in trying to become. Here is no finished product—poem or essay; here is the naked endeavoring soul.

The "Journals" are important among other reasons because they show Emerson in the act of becoming a writer. This, I fancy, was the dominant function of his life; and the process was never done. From the day when as an undergraduate he read Ben Jonson not for "edification" but for "vigorous phrases and quaint, peculiar words and expressions" until the day when at 69, wandering a little in his wits, he noted the necessity of capturing every birdlike perception before it flew away forever—from first to last he was engaged in making himself a perfect artist of the darting word. With Emerson, as with his disciple Thoreau, writing was almost a disease. He admitted that his fondness for it was "immoderate." It was the language of Carlyle, not the thought, that he respected. As much as anything else it was the speech of common people—not their manners or their characters—that made him a defender of democracy. For him the magic of poetry was the magic of verse. Always he studied expression, which for him was a mode of life quite as much as it was a mode of art. In his youth he doubted himself: "I find myself often idle, vagrant, stupid, and hollow." He was appalled at the intermittence of his intellectual power, which seemed to come and go like the inspiration of poets. The story of his progress toward self-reliance is the story of his advancing confidence in himself as a writer.

I should not like to stress this too much, or to cheapen Emerson by emphasizing only his occupation with technique. In truth, however, expression and perception were with him inseparable things. He doubtless thought of himself as one whose business it was to apprehend reality. I think of him as one who kept a Journal for the purpose of building a universe out of words. Without a notebook there would have been no world for him; at least the world he saw would not have held together without the cement of innumerable sentences. There is more to say about Emerson than this, but this is important and everything else is somehow connected with it. His distinction as an observer, for instance, was that while he observed heaven and earth ideally, saying to himself that "the world can never be learned by learning all its details," he yet was absorbed in details. Like his master Plato he denied appearances only after loving them—possibly because he loved them. He loved every fact. "A man must have aunts and cousins, must buy carrots and turnips, must have barn and woodshed, must go to market and to the blacksmith's shop, must saunter and sleep and be inferior and silly." He lived on earth as well as air; respectability, moral and intellectual, was never enough for him. But this fact is intimately connected with the fact that literary respectability bored him too. He valued all good words, fine or coarse: "What a pity that we cannot curse and swear in good society!" Of few in his class can it be said more accurately that the writer was the man. And what a writer!

MARK VAN DOREN

The Democratizing of a Civilization

Social and Economic History of the Roman Empire. By M. Rostvotzeff. Vol. I: Social and Economic Development. Oxford University Press. $15.

> But the ultimate problem remains like a ghost, ever present and ever unlaid. Is it possible to extend a higher civilization to the lower classes without debasing its standard and diluting its quality to the vanishing-point? Is not every civilization bound to decay as soon as it begins to penetrate the masses?

THIS is the problem which presents itself to Professor Rostvotzeff at the close of his remarkable study of the social and economic evolution, and devolution, of ancient pagan civilization when it had taken its ultimate form in the Roman Empire of the first three centuries of the Christian era. The total impression left by the book is that it is the most important study in the field of Roman imperial history since the appearance of the fifth volume of Mommsen's Roman history. In the wisdom of a mature and ripened scholarship Professor Rostvotzeff leaves unsolved the empirical problem to which his studies have brought him. It is a question, indeed, which the successive civilizations of history have not, as yet, adequately answered.

Professor Rostvotzeff presents his idea somewhat as follows. The Mediterranean area had developed, preceding and during the Hellenistic period, a high standard of living in all fields of human endeavor. The Roman Empire inherited these high standards. It spread them widely in Western Europe. The reasons why the world ruled by the Roman emperors failed to maintain these standards were of many kinds, psychological, social, economic, and political. All of these factors Professor Rostvotzeff recognizes. He seems to summarize them under one general observation. This is that the upper, the educated classes in the period of the empire were absorbed by the lower classes; and that this absorption resulted in a leveling of culture downward. The masses were unable to assimilate the intellectual interests and powers which had distinguished the elite leadership of the Hellenistic age and the first century of Roman imperial history. In other words, ancient society was unable to meet the problem of democratizing its culture. In the final words of his book, quoted above, Professor Rostvotzeff leaves a small loophole for optimism regarding the possibility of a successful generalizing of culture in the future. Despite that suggestion of optimism, one is left with the impression that he agrees with Eduard Meyer's dictum that the broader the stream of culture becomes the less deep must its average necessarily be.

This book is an amazing attempt to formulate and follow in their flow and their changes of directions the currents of the social and economic life of the Mediterranean lands under Roman imperial administration. The author is quite justified in his claim that this is a pioneer attempt to gather all the materials now available in these two fields of historical interest for the period which he covers, to fix clearly the ascertainable facts, and to determine from these facts the general tendencies which they indicate. Many and serious difficulties arise chiefly from the sporadic character of the evidence. Upon all fields of ancient history this is true. But it is particularly marked in the case of the economic evidence. The scholarship developed by the ancient Greeks did not distinguish economics from politics, but treated it as a subsidiary branch of

New Scribner Books

The Silver Spoon — By John Galsworthy

Now in its second hundred thousand

"Here is the very aristocracy of English prose. . . . . In the various characters with which Mr. Galsworthy has peopled his story there is enough of contrast at least to pique even the most casual of readers, and there is a trial scene into which the author has crammed almost enough of drama to make a fairly complete stage play."
—Percy Hutchinson in the New York Times. $2.00

Ignatius Loyola — By Paul Van Dyke

In much that has been written concerning Jesuitism there has been a notable lack of both truth and data. Professor Van Dyke, the impartial historian, comprehensively interprets a great order and a world figure. $3.50

Our Mobile Earth — By Reginald Daly

The head of the Department of Geology in Harvard University in this book writes an enthralling chapter in the romance of science—the story of the formation of the continents. Illustrated, $5.00

The Escape From the Primitive — By Horace Carncross

Dr. Carncross, a well-known practising psychoanalyst, applies the principles of his science liberally to mankind as a whole. He shows mankind to be far from its civilized maturity—still hedged about by hereditary fears and narrownesses. $2.50

Evolution and Religion in Education — By Henry Fairfield Osborn

This volume sets forth the reasoned and tempered views of a great evolutionist who is also a religionist. It comes at the appropriate moment, following a period of bitter controversy. $2.—

Rip Van Winkle Goes to the Play — By Brander Matthews

This lively and discerning volume discusses everything from Brander Matthews' memories of actresses, soliloquies, and the art of acting in general down to technical questions of scene and scenic devices, claptrap, "well-made" plays, and America's drama export. $2.00

Stark Young's

Heaven Trees

Ever since the publication of "The Three Fountains" Mr. Stark Young's many admirers have been wishing that he would write a novel. He has done it at last in "Heaven Trees." $2.00

Smoky
By Will James

This story of a cow-pony, with Will James' inimitable drawings, is full of romance and emotion, excitement and beauty—a book which stands by itself. $2.50

Susan Shane
By Roger Burlingame

Henry Goddard Leach, editor of "The Forum," writes:

"In 'Susan Shane' you have contributed a permanent character to American literary tradition. . . . I shall put it on the shelf with 'So Big', 'The Perennial Bachelor' and 'The Professor's House.'" $2.00

The Life of Francis Thompson — By Everard Meynell

Everard Meynell devoted the last weeks of his life to a final revision of his authoritative biography. It is the account of a rare personality—a spoiled priest, medical student, commercial traveller, boot-black, a caller of cabs—until fame overtook him. $2.50

England — By the Very Rev. W. R. Inge

A survey of England's present and a forecast of her future; in its discussion of England's relation to her empire and to the United States it is startling in its candor. $3.00

The American People: A History — By Thomas Jefferson Wertenbaker

The Edwards professor of American history in Princeton University has written a book which has long been needed—a one-volume history of the United States for the adult mind. $5.00

My Musical Life — Popular Edition — By Walter Damrosch

The memoirs of the conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra in a new, low-priced, illustrated edition which retains all the text of the original.

"A human document of absorbing interest. . . . Possesses remarkable historic value, apart from the fact that it makes entertaining reading."—Musical America. $2.00

The Portrait of Zélide — Popular Edition — By Geoffrey Scott

Here at last is a popular-priced edition of what Dr. Joseph Collins has called "the finest fictional biography that has been published in English."

"It is difficult to see why any but a great novel should be set above it for interest or charm."
—Carl Van Doren in the Century Magazine. $2.50

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS · FIFTH AVENUE AT 48TH STREET · NEW YORK

political science. Hence no Greek or Latin author ever wrote a general book upon economic history. Only a few brochures, one upon a practical and immediate problem in the field of public finance, and a number of treatises upon the practice of agriculture, attest to their understanding of the existence and the importance of the economic structure upon which their political and social life was based. For practical aid in administrative activities the Hellenistic monarchies and the Roman imperial government gathered statistics, it is true. But they had no thought of their availability for sociological purposes. The statistics which they gathered have come down to us only in shreds and spots. Statistical aids for modern research in the field of antiquity are therefore as completely lacking as is the help which one might have had from Greek scholarship had it interpreted its own economic life in its own way and with its own peculiar and brilliant gifts.

Professor Rostvotzeff is entirely conscious of these disabilities which were inherent in his task. His attitude is that of a person who projects working hypotheses and problems for solution. This is sound method. His method being sound, his results, even where he is forced to reconstruct the picture forward and backward from the evidence which is at hand, are always worthy of the greatest consideration. In the notes to the successive chapters, assembled at the end of the book, one finds references to the numerous books and research articles which Professor Rostvotzeff himself has written. In the writing of these books and articles, covering a long period of productive scholarship, the author has assembled that complete knowledge of the ancient evidence which gives his present constructive effort its authority. Perhaps the most marked feature of his method is his extensive and skilful use of modern archaeological researches. In this respect his method ranks with that found in the best of the modern studies in related fields, such as those of Eduard Meyer, Camille Jul'ian in his "Histoire de la Gaule," or Stephane Gsell in his "Histoire de l'Afrique du Nord."

The general thesis of this important volume seems to rest upon the assumption that all high civilizations are urban civilizations. After establishing the urban character of the Hellenistic civilization of the last three pre-Christian centuries he follows this urbanized life in its vicissitudes through the first three Christian centuries until it becomes congealed in the Oriental despotic governmental form of Diocletian and Constantine. The Roman citizen armies of Augustus and of the early Empire represented the solid opinion of the educated and propertied elements of the city populations. In the second century the army levies of the Roman state were made up of country people, the peasants of the less civilized provinces of the empire. In the third century there arose a social and economic maladjustment between the urban centers of civilization and the area of agricultural production, the peasantry of the Roman world. In the third century this maladjustment produced a crisis of hatred of the oppressed country population against the cities and their culture which expressed itself in the form of assaults upon the cities by the peasant armies of the state. In this period of the crisis of the third century many of the cities were destroyed. The urban civilization of the ancient pagan world was ruined; and another, a more primitive, type replaced it.

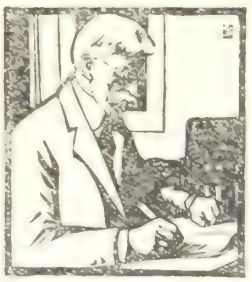
In the handling of the materials upon which this general theory is founded Professor Rostvotzeff is a master. The principal criticism of the book lies in the fact that the author has suggested explanations in too many cases. His vigorous intelligence will leave nothing at loose ends. In this effort the materials have been over-schematized. At least this is my opinion. But within this general theoretical covering there lie an amazing number of new, fresh, and penetrating ideas. The net result is a work of amazing vigor and interest—a really significant and lasting gift to historical scholarship.

WILLIAM LINN WESTERMANN

Primitive Sculpture

Primitive Negro Sculpture. By Thomas Munro and Paul Guillaume. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $6.

THE first problem with which the critic of any plastic art is faced—the problem of disengaging from one another the various kinds of appeal which the work presents, of determining how much of the delight which it affords is due to associations, literary, historic, or emotional, and how much to qualities intrinsic in the work itself—is modified and complicated in the case of an art as completely exotic as that of primitive Negro sculpture. It is true that such an art is devoid of some of those extraneous sources of interest which delude people completely anaesthetic to plastic beauty into the belief that they "like pictures." Being in an entirely unfamiliar tradition, it awakens no habitual response, like the suppressed "ah" which greets the stereopticon lecturer's pièce de résistance, to things like sunsets which have always been assumed to be beautiful. Moreover, it carries with it no reference to familiar situations surrounded by emotion, for the customs, social or religious, to which a Negro fetish relates are infinitely remote, and it cannot be enjoyed like a picture of the Crucifixion because the spectator happens to have received a Christian education, or like a picture of children at play because he happens to have been himself a parent. But if these extraneous considerations are excluded, others equally dangerous are introduced. These objects are quaint and curious; they relate to the customs of a remote, mysterious people, and they set the mind to dreaming. Here is a reminder of savagery and strength, a tangible hint of the dark forest and bloody rites. Here, in a word, is all the fascination of the curious and the full temptation to grow rhapsodic over what is merely unfamiliar and esoteric. Hence, as the authors of the present volume are well aware, any treatment of the subject which they propose is very likely to degenerate into a mere miscellany of more or less relevant ethnological fact and vague aesthetic enthusiasm. Their problem is the extremely difficult one not only of overcoming an instinctive tendency to regard the objects which they are considering as merely grotesque or hideous but also of seeing to it that any interest aroused in them is a legitimate artistic interest and not the facile enthusiasm of the conventional mystagogue who has discovered a new sensation in which only the elect can participate.



Fortunately they have followed a method which, for the brief compass which they have allowed themselves, could hardly be better. Though they freely admit that the complex appeal of African art doubtless includes—as does that of most other arts—many elements dependent upon associations, they have assumed that such associations can have no real meaning for Europeans, and hence, after the briefest possible discussion of the conditions under which this art was produced, they confine themselves to a discussion of those plastic characteristics which may be perceived by the inhabitant of New York or Paris in much the same way as by an inhabitant of the Congo. The method of analysis employed is that developed at the Barnes Foundation in Philadelphia, of which Dr. Munro is associate educational director, and already made familiar in Dr. Barnes's "The Art in Painting." Its application here to a different subject matter reveals anew its great usefulness.

It requires no more than a moment's consideration of any of the forty-one plates with which the volume is illustrated to perceive that these masks and fetishes are at least not, as an unreflective glance might lead one to suppose, merely incompetent attempts to represent the human face or figure. However incapable of accurate imitation the artists who made them may, for the sake of argument, be supposed to have been, they obviously did not intend these ovoid limbs or acutely conical and rigidly protruding breasts as copies of anything which they saw. Modification and distortion are plainly intentional and, as it requires very little further study to see, purposeful and sys-

By two of the most distinguished living historians

THE HUMAN ADVENTURE

BY JAMES HENRY BREASTED & JAMES HARVEY ROBINSON

A DYNAMIC, original and absolutely up-to-date history of our civilization, based on more than a quarter of a century's research, including the most recent discoveries about man's past, and presenting the mighty phenomenon of human progress in a graphic, lucid and absorbing narrative.

In two volumes

The CONQUEST of CIVILIZATION

BY JAMES HENRY BREASTED

Professor of Ancient History and Egyptology, and Director of the Oriental Institute, University of Chicago

The story of the achievements of the ancient world from primitive times to the fall of Rome, based on the latest discoveries and brilliantly told by one of the most eminent authorities on ancient civilization.

The ORDEAL of CIVILIZATION

BY JAMES HARVEY ROBINSON

Author of "The Mind in the Making," "The New History," "The Humanizing of Knowledge," etc.

The history of man's progress from the Dark Ages to the present day presented in the light of a revolutionary attitude toward the past and written to illuminate the bewildering problems of the modern world.

These two volumes represent the finest achievements of modern scholarship in relating the living past to the all-important present. Two vols. Boxed. Over 500 Illus. & 1,400 pages. $10.00

TOM-TOM

BY JOHN W. VANDERCOOK

A fascinating account of the civilization of the bush negroes in the remote jungles of Surinam by an accurate and sympathetic observer who has lived among them. $3.50

SUTTER'S GOLD

BY BLAISE CENDRARS

Colored woodblocks by Harry Cimino

The thrilling chronicle of Johan August Sutter, intrepid adventurer of early California and the first of America's multi-millionaires. $2.50

THROUGH MANY WINDOWS

BY HELEN WOODWARD

The reminiscences of a successful modern business woman who reviews her eventful career with refreshing candor and humor. $2.50

THE SACRED GIRAFFE

BY SALVADOR DE MADARIAGA

"As witty a bit of fooling as we have read since the ironies of Samuel Butler." — London Daily Telegraph. $2.50

MINIATURES OF FRENCH HISTORY

BY HILAIRE BELLOC

Dramatic and significant episodes from French history, displaying Mr. Belloc's understanding of the past with a sure and subtle art. $3.50

THE ART OF BEING RULED

BY WYNDHAM LEWIS

"A brilliant essay, unusual, provocative and inspiriting," writes the London Times of this audacious criticism of modern society. $4.00

MR. and MRS. HADDOCK IN PARIS, FRANCE

BY DONALD OGDEN STEWART

America's wag laureate makes a new contribution to the gayety of the nations. $2.00

HARPER & BROTHERS Publishers Since 1817 New York City

tematic. If a leg or a brow is given a form never seen in nature it is not the result of accident or momentary caprice, for it corresponds to other and similar distortions, so that the figure, while ceasing to be a copy of nature, becomes a series of related masses in which balance, repetition, rhythm, and all the fundamental features of design are clearly present. The art of African sculpture was, then, indubitably an art, whatever question may remain as to whether or not it was one of great significance for the modern man.

It is with proving this fact and with indicating the chief characteristics of several schools of African art that the authors of the present volume are chiefly concerned. Throughout, to be sure, there is their implied conviction that the phenomenon which they discuss is one of genuine aesthetic significance, and in a brief concluding chapter devoted to its relation to modern art they hail it as one of the forces destined to win for the sculptor a clearer understanding of the justification of his departures from the imitation of nature, a justification which rests, not upon the authority of certain such departures made in the past but upon his success in thus expressing a creative vision. They are, however, for the most part content to leave questions of evaluation aside; their chief purpose is merely to provide an introduction to an intelligent study of the objects which they treat from the standpoint of nothing except their plastic characteristics. This purpose they accomplish with conspicuous success.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

New Lights

The Ninth Wave. By Carl Van Doren. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

THERE is in the United States a small group of those who are neither eager to exploit the novel nor content to employ its form to imitate its past self; but who are adventurous in trying to mold it to its next equivalent. For there is new material to be included in the novel, technique to be extended, and combinations to be effected of those new techniques; and every such variation, as it emerges, seems to be a new mode, whereas it is probably but a single passage in a changing orchestration.

In "The Ninth Wave" Carl Van Doren joins this "small unhappy company," as Mr. Hergesheimer has called it—joins not spectacularly but with a detached awareness of what is happening to the novel. In a period of irritated small-town soul searchings and of complacent large-town acceptances, Mr. Van Doren tells about a man and how he lived through ten episodes of his life. Here, he seems to say, is neither Main Street nor Greenwich Village, but one of those others in the United States who are occupied with things of the mind, and who live tensely in innumerable ways of which the avowed emotionalists know nothing. Here is an area of poignant feeling, like gossamer, like needles, like bolts; and if you are battered upon by primitive choices, you are going to know nothing about such intensities; but if you have even begun to perceive that the race whirls in a circle and thus sees great suns as mere pin-wheels, then you may like to stand still and be touched by a heat and a light less than familiar.

Every novelist should begin life as a critic, in order to be thus raw to the minutest intimations of behavior, from a blow by a word to the lift of an eyelash above an utterly expressionless eye. If involution is the next word in art as in coarser fields, if, having included all that is outside, the novel is to turn inward, farther and farther, if it is to bare utter secrets with the knife of a phrase and find those secrets not in choice and the possible conscious reaction but in the field of the involuntary, or in the kind of reaction which one attracts by one's mere make-up, then the delicacies of work like this are of enormous importance. Such a book could not have been written and would not have been read twenty years ago, because people wouldn't have cared, wouldn't have been able to recognize themselves and one another.

In proceeding through these episodes in the life of a man the book, of course, discards the "line" of the novel, in the old sense. This skeleton is not new, but in its treatment is new, for the record is one of powerful and sensitized reactions to simple things. This business of the commonplace, we see, is not necessarily sordid. Between the old beautiful unrealities and the new ugly realities there stretches this middle ground of creative interpretation of every day—its gaiety, its solemnity, its question, its watchfulness, its passion. For some of the race experiences terrifically and does not explode into action, but merely flows, being fluid, in new directions and reflects, being prismatic, new lights. The book is about these. In this episodic progress the climaxes necessarily come without preparation, save in the same chapter—such as the poignant scene between Kent and Margaret following Barry's visit; and there is nothing in recent literature which grips one more fiercely than those few pages. But then the line abruptly descends again, to simpler scenes in the leisurely life of these two. You comprehend that the author is discarding weavings and preparations perhaps because he is weary unto death of "anticipatory flashes," when in life things so often go bang. But here we see the impact of the go-bang not on blood and brawn, and not even on familiar brain-paths, but on nerves and on cuticles, and on spirits experimenting on new routes; as when, without preparation, Mel is shown to be in love with Kent's wife. The episodic progress, of course, doesn't bother to weave that in either. There it is. There it would be in life. What are you going to do about it? Nothing. But you are going to be something else, it may be. For you certainly will not manifest the poverty of those amateurs at life who believe a monotonous affirmation to be tolerance. You, as protagonist, interpret, and you get somewhere inside yourself. And that is all. Interpretation does not run along like a little dog at the heels of giant happenings. Interpretation of the smallest occurrence is the happening. This, it is highly probable, will be a part of the method of the novel, whatever its next form is to be. The simple cold handling of things as they serially occur, in the knowledge that art does not consist of things fashioned and knit but of things selected and presented; and that characters need not violently act, but that they must react to and susceptibly interpret their environment. And then some day, as experimentation goes on, there will possibly emerge a new fashioning and a new knitting, one curl farther up the spiral.

Mr. Van Doren's novel is trying to move toward the freedom which in innumerable ways—from stream of consciousness to second person—this caged art form is seeking to effect. His principal audacity is in making Kent's prize dinner the summit of the "line," the ninth wave. Yet this history, laid in a college town, shows climacterically at that dinner the ghastly average that can be struck by this aristocracy concerned with things of the mind. In imparting to a reader sheer despair of the race of "educated" people, this scene is as merciless as Main Street's inducing of despair of the wealth, wit, beauty, and fashion of Gopher Prairie. The hour of triumph of this "professor," revealing to him as it does his own kind, holds an irony and a pessimism as great as the disillusionment of either small-town victim or young intellectual, no less the puppet of his period. The revelation is made, not harshly, however, but rather with the compassion of some onlooker, too mellow not to identify himself with mankind. And then in this novel life goes on, and ends on the note of going on, quite casually, and even cheerfully, as life does.

It is a triumph for the episodic method and for Mr. Van Doren that one need not have a fear of remembering scenes more sharply than the book as a whole. The point is that these —so chosen, so ordered—are of the substance of the book as a whole, for by them one walks on inner levels, on involved

Selected New Books from Beacon Hill for the Autumn

IN QUEST OF THE PERFECT BOOK

By William Dana Orcutt

A fascinating record of the author's search throughout the world for the perfect book, and of the personalities he encountered in his pilgrimage.

Fully Illustrated

$5.00

FIFTY YEARS OF BRITISH PARLIAMENT

By The Earl of Oxford and Asquith

An authoritative interpretation of an epoch-making half-century of British political life.

2 volumes

$8.00

*CAUSES AND THEIR CHAMPIONS

By M. A. DeWolfe Howe

Against a background of the history of reform Mr. Howe presents stimulating biographical studies of an amazing variety of forward looking people.

$4.00

FIGURES OF THE PAST

By Josiah Quincy

With introduction and footnotes by M. A. DeWolfe Howe

Piquant and witty reminiscences of John Adams, Lafayette, Webster and other "worthies", and of Harvard one hundred years ago.

Fully Illustrated

$4.00

Published by Little, Brown & Company Boston and for sale at all Booksellers

LABELS

By A. Hamilton Gibbs

In this dramatic new novel the author of "Soundings" (the best selling novel of 1925) again proves his ability as a novelist of wide vision and brilliant style.

$2.00

*LEAVES FROM A SECRET JOURNAL

By Jane Steger

A helpful sharing of "hidden experiences." Practical mysticism of great lyric power and literary beauty.

$2.00

"An Atlantic Monthly Press Publication"

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

levels—using "involved" in its strict sense—with which the novels of the future may well be exclusively concerned. For there are in art only seven directions. Now having gone north, south, east, west, up, and down, the only place left unvisited is in. In that direction we have traveled, after all, but a short distance. It is those who are clairvoyant to motive and to heightened perception who are destined to take us farther. To that other "small unhappy company," too, Mr. Van Doren, of course, belongs.

ZONA GALE

A Cure for Democracy

U. S.: A Second Study in Democracy. By H. E. Buchholz. Baltimore: Warwick and York. $2.20.

MR. BUCHHOLZ, it appears, still retains a certain amount of faith in the democratic theory, but democracy as it is practically encountered in this world only depresses him. More than three-fourths of his book, in fact, is given over to a bitter recital of its failures. It is, he finds, corrupt; it is ignorant and idiotic; it is wasteful; it is oppressive. He sees clearly the eternal enmity between democracy and liberty, and has two devastating chapters upon the subject. A democratic state, on his showing, has at least one fault that is not necessarily found in any other sort of state: it is impossible for it to be a gentleman. Its dominant functionaries are always such bounders as Palmer, Burleson, Bryan, Wilson, Kellogg, Wilbur, and Coolidge. It is, in the company of its fellows, always a cad, even when it is right, and perhaps especially when it is right. The difference between a democrat and a Puritan is but little more than the difference between a Baptist mullah and a Methodist dervish, or a prohibition agent and a pickpocket, or a Wall Street Democrat and a Wall Street Republican.

The exposition of these facts takes Mr. Buchholz to page 303 of his book. He then proceeds to present his remedy. There is, it quickly appears, nothing very revolutionary about it. He does not propose to overthrow the Constitution or even to change the laws. He is quite content to suffer democracy a bit longer, and even sine die. All he proposes is that it be brought under better control than in the past—that the civilized minority of men, democratic in their inclinations but not actual democrats, assume a censorship over its processes, and, above all, over its chosen agents. So far, of course, there is nothing new. Every reformer since Jefferson's time has bawled for the same thing; it is the cornerstone of every democratic Utopia. But Mr. Buchholz, after all, has something new to add to it, and that something has the merit, at least, of being simple and practicable. In brief, he proposes that the censors prepare themselves for their office by "pledging themselves unconditionally to political celibacy," i. e., to abstention from the struggle for jobs. Their whole authority is to be based on the understanding that they want nothing and will take nothing—that they are incurably citizens, and not officials.

The simplicity of the scheme will probably get it dismissed as beneath consideration. Nevertheless, it embodies a very sound idea. For one of the chief defects of democracy lies in the fact that the public servant, whatever his good-will, is not a free agent, and so can neither perform his own duties as a free and self-respecting man should nor keep an effective watch over his fellow-servants. Directly or indirectly, he is always running for office, which is to say, he is always in peril of his job. The fact inevitably makes a trimmer of him, and after he has trimmed awhile he begins to do it automatically. That is primarily what is the matter with Congress. Its members, taken one with another, are probably quite as decent as any other average Americans of their class. They want to be well regarded; there is even a certain pride of workmanship in them, or at least in some of them. But they are perpetual candidates for reelection, and so they have to make faces and leap through hoops. Being right is of no sure value to them; they must also be satisfactory to the bosses and popular with the mob. One sees the effects at every session. Not one Congressman out of a dozen can afford to state or vote his own honest convictions. He must first find out what the Anti-Saloon League wants, and then what the professional labor leaders want, and then what the Babbitts of his district want, and most of all what the bosses want. So he acquires the manners of a fashionable clergyman and the morals of a street-walker.

Mr. Buchholz proposes to liberate this poor serf by setting up a class of experts in the public business—he calls them, very clumsily, public-opiners—all of them perfectly free to state their honest opinions. It will be their function to operate upon the mob. They will bombard it with the truth, not only about public issues but also about public servants. They will blow up such absurdities as the Coolidge myth. They will expose the motives behind the World Court swindle. They will analyze and anatomize prohibition. They will keep their spotlights upon such mountebanks as the Hon. Nervous Nellie Kellogg. In brief, they will constitute a body of political police, sworn to resist the lascivious lure of office. They will keep the mob informed—and after that whatever happens will be its own fault.

Is the scheme impracticable? I don't think so. As a matter of fact, it is in operation today. The country swarms with Buchholzian public-opiners, and in so far as it has any intelligent public opinion at all they form it. Many of them are quite as chaste, politically, as Mr. Buchholz demands. They not only do not aspire to office; they would not take it if it were offered to them. But do they save democracy from its weaknesses? Do they get anywhere with their protests and warnings? In part, undoubtedly yes. God alone knows what they save us from! Imagine what Coolidge would be doing if all the articulate men in America were as naive and idiotic as the Washington correspondents! Imagine where Bryan would have got with his scheme to raise the mob against sense if he had not been challenged! Imagine Kansas without Ed Howe, or Georgia without Julian Harris! But the thing cuts two ways. There are public-opiners and public-opiners. I recall one named Wayne B. Wheeler. Some time ago the Washington correspondents, in the pursuit of their high duties, offered him the job of Prohibition Commissioner, vice Admiral General Andrews, slated for nirvana. He refused almost indignantly. He was not, he protested, a job-seeker. He was a public-opiner—and I have a great and dreadful fear that he came near meeting Mr. Buchholz's specifications precisely. So I leave "U. S." with a doubt. It listens well—but so did the Bill of Rights.

H. L. MENCKEN

The Rape of the Lock

A Bipolar Theory of Living Processes. By George W. Crile. Edited by Amy F. Rowland. The Macmillan Company. $5.

THE man of science, though he seem bounded in the narrowest of specialties, is at bottom an audacious soul, aspiring to grasp the plan of the universe and to expound the same to his fellow-men. In youth he begins his enterprise hopefully by the sure method of induction from observation and experiment; he weighs singly the facts and examines the way they are put together; he traces slowly the pattern of nature. But as age gathers him into its clutch he comes to realize that in this way between birth and death he will have explored but a tiny fragment of the pattern. He must make a short cut. He must judge the rest from what he has seen. He may have discovered in the bits that he has examined what seems the key to the whole construction; he uses this key on the rest. The observer, the experimenter, ages into the philosopher, the speculator.

So Dr. Crile, eminent surgeon and investigator of tissues, has discovered the key to the riddles of life; in this volume he unlocks them. His key is something that beyond question

The Undisputed Masterpiece of Our Time

U L Y S S E S

By JAMES JOYCE

is appearing serially in the first 12 numbers of

Two Worlds Monthly

Devoted to the Increase of the Gaiety of Nations

Edited by SAMUEL ROTH

"The Greatest, the Most Daring, and the Most Beautiful Fiction Magazine in the World"

Among the Writers

James Joyce	D. H. Lawrence	Arthur Schnitzler
A. E. Coppard	Ernest Hemingway	Arthur Machen
T. S. Eliot	Arthur Symons	Carl Sandburg

50 cents a Copy :: :: :: $5.00 a Year

The first four numbers of Two Worlds Monthly have already appeared.

All back numbers when asked for separately sell for $1.00 a copy. To make sure of getting all of ULYSSES, subscribe for a whole year immediately. As only a few copies of No. 1 remain, we cannot undertake to supply it except to those who subscribe for a whole year.

TWO WORLDS PUB. CO.
500 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C.

Gentlemen: For the enclosed $5 kindly send me the first 12 numbers of TWO WORLDS MONTHLY.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

plays a great role in physiology. A philosopher has said that if required to worship something in nature he would select the sun; so a biologist, if compelled to choose a signature to all things, might make the choice that Dr. Crile has made. His key is found in those differences of electric potential, with their antecedents and consequents, that occur within living things. Between the cells and within the cells, surrounding nuclei, vacuoles and granules, are membranes; on the opposite surfaces of these membranes are diverse electric charges which result in chemical and physical changes, inflow and outflow of materials. Altering the distribution of these potentials changes the processes that occur; reciprocally, changes in the processes alter the potentials. The bipolar theory says that all physiological processes—respiration, assimilation, excretion, secretion, storage, and release of energy—are actuated and regulated through these diversities and alterations of potential.

The cautious but not hidebound biologist may accompany Dr. Crile a long way on this path. Advance of physiological investigation discloses more and more the important role of these electrical diversities. Here is a fertile and attractive point of view; it has possibilities. Years of inductive investigation will reveal to us what realities correspond to these possibilities. While we wait we may speculatively imagine what they will be. And this, or somewhat more than this, is what Dr. Crile attempts; in a decidedly positive frame of mind he expounds biology in terms of electric potentials. Honestly persuaded that he has the master key to the biological edifice, he uses it in every compartment. Where it is not clear to him how the key fits he jams it. In places he jams it badly.

He believes that differences of electric potential similar to those found within the cells distinguish the diverse major parts of the body, and that here again their role is significant and decisive. The brain is the positive pole of the body, the liver the negative pole. Life requires the presence of both poles; this accounts for the fact that removal of brain or liver results in death (!). Other parts have diverse and intermediate potentials; these bring about their characteristic functions: circulation, respiration, muscular action, nervous action. At this point the accompanying judicious biologist begins to acquire a worried expression. Different types of organism differ essentially in the way the potentials are distributed. Colored diagrams show us the inorganic and organic series pictured in the distribution of positive and negative charges: atoms, molecules, colloids, amoeba, sponge; and so on up to man. For organisms these diagrams are obtained by the harmless device of presenting nucleus and nervous system as positive, outer surface as negative. All this is innocent and not unattractive, provided it be not looked on as a substitute for concrete and detailed knowledge. Cobb tells us that if all the world were destroyed except the thread-worms, these by their distribution would reveal to us most of its characteristic features, including the forms of the other organisms. We may envisage the world in terms of thread-worms; doubtless with less profit than in terms of electric potentials; perhaps also with less danger of going widely astray.

On this basis too, making such assumptions as seem to him fitting, the author explains other important phenomena of biology; poisoning, tetanus, infections, fever, anaesthesia, cancer, memory, behavior, development, heredity, evolution (a complete portrayal of the essentials of evolution by diversities of potentials, from the atom to man). The familiarity of the author with some of these fields enables him to make a plausible picture of the course of events, electrically considered (plausible at least to those not experts in the given subject). In others he speculates, giving rein to fancy; irresponsible, unabashed, and unrestrained; airily oblivious of the scientific knowledge available. His speculations in the field of heredity (accounting, among other things, for the inheritance of acquired characters) are a memorable example of the dreadful results of "romancing round" in scientific territory where one is a stranger. Mendel has investigated peas and Morgan fruit-flies quite in vain so forging ahead!

THE MODERN LIBRARY

Material improvements in the manufacture of Modern Library books, and the addition of a group of famous titles that have never before sold for less than two to five dollars a copy have made the first year of the Library as an independent publishing unit a striking success.

The Modern Library today is the biggest selling series of its kind in the world. It is carried by every bookstore in the United States and Canada. You will find it at railroad stations and drug stores, too. Sales agencies have been established in South America, in China, in Australia. It has just been introduced in Germany and Austria.

Full limp binding—pocket size—clear, large type—unabridged, authorized editions—authoritative introductions—125 books that rank with the very best in modern literature.

at 95c a copy

Send for our FREE illustrated catalogue!

The MODERN LIBRARY Inc.
71 West Forty-fifth Street, New York

far as Dr. Crile is concerned; twenty-five years of intensive investigation in genetics have left him untouched; he prefers his own untutored notions. To attempt to state the established data of genetics in terms of electric potentials might be a stimulating if unpromising task. But when the author substitutes his own fancies for these established data he passes near or into the lunatic fringe that hangs on every science.

This is far from being as good a book as Dr. Crile's earlier "Man an Adaptive Mechanism." His subject is significant and alluring, but it cannot yet bear the weight of so pretentious a work as has here been attempted. Certain early chapters are stimulating and attractive; later ones pass into mere extravaganza. If the author or his editor could have been prevailed upon to put forth but a sketch, leaving large parts to be filled in by the advance of research, and to avoid as they would the plague those parts of biology with which they were unacquainted, the resulting unpretentious booklet would have been appealing and suggestive. The publication of the book as it stands was ill advised. H. S. JENNINGS

"Little Golden Guinea"

Letters of Louise Imogen Guiney. Edited by Grace Guiney. With a Preface by Agnes Repplier. Harper and Brothers. Two volumes. $5.

MISS GUINEY had a delightful personality, a vivacious, original style, a shy, affectionate, humorous nature which expressed itself openly in delicate verse and exquisite essays and privately in letters to her friends and to a few fine spirits with whom she was in intellectual sympathy. Her retiring disposition combined with the impulse to express herself to the right person, and an admirable command of the means of expression made her a perfect letter writer, a master of what Mr. Lucas calls "the gentlest art." In her correspondence she let herself go with more abandon than in her rather impersonal verses and her carefully considered essays. She takes her place easily among the rare company of charming "epistolists," Howell, Madame de Sévigné, Cowper, Lamb, Stevenson, though she is not of course so important as they and has but a quiet secondary place in literature. In one way she was most nearly akin to Cowper, for she was temperamentally a recluse and even when she was traveling, physically abroad in the world, she wrote as from a retreat, coming out of her shell for a bright moment and then retiring to her books and her poetry. There resemblance ceases, for Cowper's dreams were darkened by religious melancholia, whereas Miss Guiney was sane and serene in her Catholic faith.

The practical world plays rough tricks with sensitive genius. To keep her frugal pot boiling she secured through a friend of her father (Brigadier General Guiney, killed early in the Civil War) the position of postmistress at Auburndale, Massachusetts. It is pleasant to think of Lamb as clerk in the India House, of Kenneth Graham as secretary of the Bank of England, of Austin Dobson as secretary of the Board of Trade. But Miss Guiney looking "wise as an owl over quarterly accounts" is a rather pathetic figure, and the shadow of the ledger for a while almost obliterated the book of verse. However, she did her work faithfully and with only whimsical complainings, for she had not a touch of self-pity and was always courageous, even gay, in the face of difficulties. And after her term of imprisonment she went back to her old loves, the seventeenth-century poets and the ancient riches of the Bodleian Library.

For she lived in the past. Her active career began early enough for her to have been welcomed and petted by the venerable pundits of Boston; it was Dr. Holmes who called her his "little golden guinea." And she had personal and epistolary friendships with many of the leading literary men of the Age of Stevenson. Her impromptu judgments of her contemporaries are shrewd and neatly phrased. But as for most of

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

THE FIRST CIVILIZED AMERICAN

By Phillips Russell

This book rescues a great American from the myth-makers and presents him as he was in his living dimension—mirthful, curious, careless, companionable, a hater of oppressions, a lover of mankind, song and witty women.

A complete narrative of Franklin's life and career is given, even to the publication of the so-called "Suppressed Franklin letters." $5.00

Publication Date October 1st.

THE GREAT AMERICAN ASS

AN ANONYMOUS AUTOBIOGRAPHY

Portraying an "Education of Henry Adams" from a new angle. An Adams who turned westward rather than toward European culture. Daring, frank, timely, it portrays the anguish of a soul branded with the iron of Puritan tradition. $3.50

THE BOOK WITHOUT A NAME

BEING THE 18th CENTURY JOURNAL OF AN ENGLISH LADY ADDREST TO HER NATURAL SON.

"It is a notable, memorable book; vital, subtle, grave. The family of this lawless gentlewoman is owed a debt of honor as well as gratitude by those who read her record." (Time) $2.50

A MANIFEST DESTINY

By Arthur D. Howden Smith

Author of "Porto Bello Gold"

The adventurous story of the famous filibuster, William Walker, and his epic duel with Commodore Vanderbilt. It is history blended with the rush of adventure—history that reveals the soul of the turgid period from 1855 to '61 that bred the Civil War. $2.50

WRITE FOR OUR NEW FALL CATALOGUE

BRENTANO'S

Publishers New York

the moderns, she says, "there are spacious apartments to let in my minster and tiers of unoccupied shrines. . . . I am grateful that I managed to be fairly born before Hawthorne and Thackeray died, and that I have had Tennyson, Emerson, Arnold, and Newman for contemporaries."

But her true loves were older than the nineteenth century—the Caroline poets, especially Henry Vaughan. She had Vaughan's grave renovated and edited his "Mount of Olives." Had time and circumstances been a little kinder to her she would have made the definitive study of his text and life. Within her limits she was a sound and zealous scholar, an antiquarian, longing to find refuge in some town that retained the flavor of the Middle Ages. Her own verse is timeless, untouched by modern fact, and though she commends Philip Savage for getting "into the heart of human life, as every true artist does," her poetry is less passionate, less human than her essays and her letters. Yet she now and again shows the strain of Celtic magic in her blood; she was devoted to the poet Mangan, and responded to Yeats before many people had heard of him. She was a genuine if not a great artist, as true a man of letters as any woman who ever lived.

JOHN MACY

The Religion of the State

Essays on Nationalism. By Carlton J. H. Hayes. The Macmillan Company. $3.

HERE is an exceedingly well-informed and penetrating inquiry into the most important issue of our time. For nationalism has proved itself to be the most pervasive, disturbing, and destructive force in the modern world. It is not evil in origin and nature. The process of imprisoning the spirit of nationality, or local like-mindedness, into a state is in itself innocent and useful, and, if an effective internationalism could arise out of a fair and free cooperation of such national entities, each preserving its own idiosyncrasies but uniting for the common purposes of humanity, all would be well. The struggles of subject peoples, conscious of community of stock, traditions, and interests, for national self-government win the sympathy of all liberal-minded people.

Unfortunately, as Professor Hayes shows in these illuminating essays, nationalism as an idea, a creed, an enthusiasm, has done more harm than any other "ism." It has been a cover and a breeding ground for most of the collective operations of the instincts of greed, pugnacity, intolerance, self-glory, and oppression, which are the enemies of human progress. Masquerading as patriotism, it has everywhere aimed to repress criticism and compel conformity within the nation. As irredentism it has struggled to enlarge the area of national country by enforcing obsolete historic claims or aspirations at the sword's point, regardless of the wishes or interests of the population thus inclosed. With a hyphenated "Pan" it has fed its lust for size and power by interferences with neighboring peoples under the pretension that they are blood relatives. Bloating itself out into imperialism, it has pursued a "manifest destiny" at the expense of weaker or backward peoples whose lands it has coveted for economic gain or from sheer "kilometritis." A product of modern consciousness, it has thriven upon an unscrupulous propaganda to enlist the enthusiasm of the millions for policies designed to benefit small classes within each nation at the expense of the nation's blood and treasure. Into this propagandism is pressed a variety of intellectuals, "philologists, historians, anthropologists, economists, philosophers, and litterateurs," to furnish the doctrine which the politicians and the press shall pump into the popular mind by processes of mass-suggestion.

But doctrine is not enough. Devotion is needed. Nationalism must carry mystery and worship. It must become a religion. Not a Christian, Buddhist, Mohammedan, or other religion of humanity but a patriotic loyalty, a worship of the national

OXFORD BOOKS

A DICTIONARY OF MODERN ENGLISH USAGE
By H. W. FOWLER, joint author of the Concise Oxford Dictionary. $3.00
Most extremely useful things are uninteresting. Not so this book on English Usage. Like its author, it has a sense of humor; its little paragraphs sparkle like the sunlight on the sea. Its pages compose a collection of familiar essays, discriminating and often provocative, on the genius of the English language.

PSYCHO-ANALYSIS FOR NORMAL PEOPLE
By GERALDINE COSTER $1.25
This is a short, practical handbook which sets forth in the simplest possible way the main principles of analytical psychology in its application to the ordinary, normal person. It will be particularly useful to the nurse and teacher, as well as the general reader.

AN OUTLINE INTRODUCTION TO THE HISTORY OF RELIGIONS
By T. H. ROBINSON Probable price $2.50
It is all too seldom that a fine scholar can lay aside the trappings and impedimenta of his learning, and write with the easy mastery that makes a difficult topic become crystal-clear. In this readable but authoritative book Dr. Robinson has achieved that difficult end. Impartial, plain, complete in its survey, this "Outline Introduction" will assume its merited niche as the primer par excellence in the layman's History of Religions.

PREACHING IN THEORY AND PRACTICE
By the REV. SAMUEL MCCOMB, D. D. $2.00
With an Introduction by the REV. HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK, D. D.
Stimulating lectures which encourage preaching as a fine art, an indispensable social function, and a sacred entrustment of influence. A book of popular demand to answer the needs of the modern world.

THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE
Some Opinions on International Gratitude, selected with a Foreword by JAMES BROWN SCOTT $2.75
In the light of recent interesting developments in the relations of America and France, the appearance of Dr. Scott's book is particularly timely. What are and have been our true relations with the sister republic, and what, sanely and historically considered, is our debt to France and her debt to us? Dr. Scott offers here an authoritative summary which should profoundly affect American public opinion.

THE SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC HISTORY OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE
By M. ROSTOVTZEFF $15.00
M. Rostovtzeff is a brilliant scholar, who combines daring with erudition. In this first serious attempt to connect the social and economic evolution of the Roman Empire with its constitutional and administrative development, the author makes successful use of his combination of talents.

EVERYBODY'S GUIDE TO RADIO MUSIC
By PERCY A. SCHOLES $2.00
A book for the increasingly large new musical public, giving a brief but complete and simple explanation of the forms which music takes, the instruments of the orchestra, and the history of the art of music.

NEW VERSE
By ROBERT BRIDGES $2.00
A collection of verse written in 1921 by Robert Bridges, poet laureate of England, with other poems of that year and a few earlier pieces. A delightful volume of verse, beautifully printed, and bound in imitation vellum.

A NATION PLAN
A Basis for Co-Ordinated Physical Development of the United States of America. With a Suggestion for a World Plan.
By CYRUS KEHR Probable price $5.00
The aim of this book is to point the way to the carrying on of public or civic work, starting with the larger area and planning progressively downward to smaller and smaller features or factors.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS American Branch
35 WEST 32nd STREET, NEW YORK state. The weakening of belief in the older religions and their churches has favored this substitution. State churches are no longer wanted, when state is itself a church.

> On his own national god the modern religious nationalist is conscious of dependence. Of His powerful help he feels the need. In Him he recognizes the sources of his own perfection and happiness. To Him, in a strictly religious sense, he subjects himself.

A ritual of homage and adoration is devised. School-children are inculcated in worship of the national flag and celebration of national saints' days, and taught patriotic psalms. Our country has a sacred mission, to extend its civilization among heathen peoples, to "bear the white man's burden." Each nation sincerely believes this tribal religion. This national god is, as Professor Hayes indicates, a reversion to the Jewish Yahweh, "the god of a chosen people, a jealous God, and preeminently a god of battles." The secret offspring of aggressive egoism, it naturally needs militarism for its mission and war for its instrument. The essential vice of nationalism is that it divides nations and breeds hate, jealousy, suspicion, and fear. Thus reason, justice, and sociality are banished from the combats of nations.

But the subtlest poison of this perverted nationalism is its inculcation of intolerance within the nation, its repressive crusades against minority beliefs, practices, and groupings. Whenever any institution transcends the nation in its membership or appeal, whether it be a church, a trade union, a League of Nations, anything that appears to challenge the all-sufficiency of the national state, and to get up another wider or narrower loyalty, such an institution is anathema. So in various nations we find as the definite fruits of nationalism an anti-clericalism, anti-alienism, anti-pacifism, anti-socialism, anti-racialism. The obscurantist nature of this faith and its ultimate futility are exposed when we realize how the main forces of the industrial revolution, with its world commerce and finance, more and more transcend the political barriers and lay more and more solid foundations for an international merger of activities, interests, and ambitions. Professor Hayes ends an exceedingly profitable inquiry with an appeal for a popular education directed to the making of an international mind. "A great race even now is beginning, a race that will be run throughout the next generation or two, between the forces of nationalism and the forces of humanity, toward two respective goals of destruction and salvation."

J. A. Hobson

The Yankees

New England in the Republic. By James Truslow Adams. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

THE appearance of a new volume by Mr. Adams is always a delight to me. It is so provocative. I have many a chuckle as I watch in imagination the faces of some fellow-historians of the Yankee school perusing the pages of this flapper of modernism foxtrotting so shamelessly upon the noble and holy traditions. I wonder if many will not regard the volume as another sign of these degenerate days of irreverence and immorality. Unfortunately those who would so class it won't read it, and the cultivated story reader will only be pained by the exposure of the weaknesses of the fathers. Much safer to live under the shadow of illusions.

As befits a good exponent of the "new history," Mr. Adams attempts to probe more deeply than did his predecessors into the recesses of the social soul for the hidden motives. Not sufficient for him is the reproduction of the contemporary propaganda, conscious or unconscious, in which the more prominent and more prosperous of the community have preserved their petty fictions of good and evil in the passing show. In the historical fold sheep are not always sheep, nor are goats goats. Hence the perplexities of the social anatomist. In

Outstanding Books on the List of
Henry Holt & Company

Mitya's Love . . . . by IVAN BUNIN
With an introduction by Ernest Boyd
"Proof that real masterpieces can still be written in the Russian tongue."—New York Times. $2.00

Custody Children by EVERETT YOUNG
Author of "A Gentleman of Sorts"
The story of a splendid girl born to wealth but hampered by scandalous parentage and the dilemma of divorce. A brilliant picture of New York society. $2.50

Hilda Ware . . by J. ALLEN HARKER
In which a wronged wife assists her husband in eloping with another. "An entertaining novel, involving delightful people placed in a charming setting."—Saturday Review of Literature. $2.00

The American in England
DURING THE FIRST HALF CENTURY OF INDEPENDENCE
by ROBERT E. SPILLER
A gossipy, yet reliable study of the activities of thousands of Americans in England for one purpose or another during the half century after the Revolution. Rich in anecdote, gossip and history. Illus. $4.00

Issues of European Statesmanship
by B. G. DE MONTGOMERY
Author of "British and Continental Labor Policy," etc.
An informing study of the Modern State, based on the problems of present-day Europe. The author develops a theory of constructive relief, pointing out the chief dangers threatening European civilization. $3.50

Visions and Jewels . . by MOYSHEH OYVED
A work of real charm and literary art—the life story of the quaint Russian proprietor of "Cameo Corner," London. $2.00

Literature in the Theatre
by W. A. DARLINGTON
A noteworthy group of essays on dramatic themes by a London playwright, novelist and dramatic critic of note. "An exceedingly stimulating book."—Theatre Arts Monthly. $3.50

Critical Essays . by OSBERT BURDETT
Essays on life and literature by a brilliant English critic ranging widely, from the Passion Play Players to Charlie Chaplin, from Vers Libre to Frank Harris. $2.00

Meditations of a Profane Man by "H"
Audacious, invigorating essays, full of humour. "H" has astonishing flashes of insight into puzzling problems of heart and head. $1.50

Elements of Child Training
by R. J. GALE
Diet, discipline, hygiene, and the vital elements in the lives of growing children are discussed in a practical way with suggestions for the aid of parents. Menus are listed for several weeks. $2.25

One Park Avenue . . . New York City

the best of all possible worlds, i. e., New England as described by the saints, Mr. Adams finds many evidences of civic disease resulting from avarice and egotism, qualities characteristic of Puritanism and of every society which overrates business success.

Mr. Adams's method is well exhibited in his account of Shay's Rebellion, to which he devotes a chapter. Far too frequently this episode has been stressed as a justification for the drastic reform of the national constitutions which was undertaken by the best and noblest of men to protect society from the ravages of social pestilence. Hence the pestilence has been described in the terms of the black death. This subordination of an important event in the history of Massachusetts to a subsequent, momentous coup d'etat has distorted the perspective of the so-called "critical period." Mr. Adams approaches the subject from a different angle. To him the rebellion is the symptom of a social disease to be diagnosed. He finds it illuminating that democratically ruled Vermont escaped the evil, whereas her aristocratic neighbors to the south suffered from a widely distributed unrest and discontent among the debtor class. Mr. Adams finds that the cause was the greed, the stupidity, and the lack of foresight of the ruling oligarchies. The best minds of the Puritans had failed.

The Revolution itself does not belong to Mr. Adams's theme, but the influence of the war upon the New England States is thoroughly discussed in four chapters, wherein the economic and moral effects of the struggle and the revolutionary governments are the main topics. Concerning war taxation Mr. Adams writes as if he were describing more recent events. "There is no question but that great injustice was wrought by such taxation as there was. There is ample evidence to show that this bore more heavily on the poorer classes." As is well known from the work of many recent historians, the practice of graft was prevalent. The author presents a vivid picture of the Otises "figuring whether they should make one or two hundred per cent out of the soldiers' winter clothes," when those soldiers were enduring the hardships of Valley Forge.

The story really ends with the War of 1812 and its immediate consequences. To this the author has chosen to add four chapters bringing the narrative down to the year 1850. These chapters take the form of essays on certain phases of New England civilization and appear to me to be somewhat superficial, being less firmly based on a knowledge of the historical sources and the nature of man than the rest of the book. So much praise has been given to the author that it will be best to close on a note of criticism. Like other historians, not excepting the reviewer, Mr. Adams is too sure of the correctness of his conclusions, too certain of his judgments. After the last trump has sounded and the Great Accountant has unrolled the Book of Life, I fear that Mr. Adams will discover that he has not copied in all cases verbatim et literatim. Still he has made an interesting guess at the transcript.

CLARENCE WALWORTH ALVORD

God as History

The Attributes of God. By Lewis Richard Farnell. Oxford University Press. $4.25.

IF it is true, as a Biblical writer affirms, that no one has ever seen God at any time, the "attributes of God" would seem necessarily to be an elusive theme. Empirical science cannot hope to discover truth in an area that cannot be subjected to observation. But while God is invisible, the characteristics that different peoples at one or another period in their history have attributed to their deities are observable phenomena and often constitute important data for the student of society. It may be of relatively slight importance for our knowledge of Greek theology to hear Sophocles declare that "nothing to which the gods lead men is base," while Euripides affirms that "if the gods do aught that's base they are not

CENTURY LEADERS

FACING EUROPE By Frederick Bausman
Discloses the causes of growing European envy, the propaganda for repudiation of debts, and the diplomatic and military net which is being woven about us. $3.00

EUROPE SINCE WATERLOO: A HISTORY By William Stearns Davis
From Napoleon's defeat to date, in a readable and authoritative survey and scholarly reference book. Illus. and maps. $5.00

OUTWITTING MIDDLE AGE By Dr. Carl Ramus
Science explains how to keep young. "Aging is a preventable disease and can be cured," says the author. $2.00

WHITE WATERS AND BLACK By Gordon MacCreagh
A humorous narrative of scientific adventurings into the miasmic jungles of the upper Amazon. Illus. $4.00

EAST OF SIAM By Harry A. Franck
The "Prince of Vagabonds" dwells in ancient cities and with primitive peoples of French Indo-China. Illus. $3.50

IN BARBARY By E. Alexander Powell
Authoritative on historical, religious, racial and political questions, travel routes and living conditions of Northern Africa. Illus. $4.00

PORTS OF FRANCE By Herbert Adams Gibbons
The sea-faring French and their ancient havens. Illus. $4.00

SAILING ACROSS EUROPE By Negley Farson
Across Europe by water. Intimate pictures of out-of-the-way places and peoples who have not changed for a thousand years. Illus. $3.50

PALESTINE AWAKE: THE REBIRTH OF A NATION By Sophie Irene Loeb
History in the making; the work of establishing a homeland for the Jews; the greatest social experiment of the century. Illus. $2.50

TRAILS OF THE TROUBADOURS By Raimon de Loi
Romantic lovers of the Dark Ages, with their ladies fair and frail. Illus. $3.00

WHALING NORTH AND SOUTH By F. V. Morley and J. S. Hodgson
Gallant adventures in Arctic and Antarctic Oceans, and a history of whalers. Illus. $3.00

THE GREAT ISLAND By Don C. Seitz
An intimate narrative of the history and personality of Newfoundland, a land of magic and adventurous glamor. Illus. $3.00

LINCOLN'S PARENTAGE AND CHILDHOOD By Louis A. Warren
Newly discovered information answers the riddle of Lincoln's heredity. An informative book, portraying a generation of American pioneers. Illus. $3.50

BILL NYE: HIS OWN LIFE STORY Continuity by Frank Wilson Nye
A rarely colorful autobiography arranged by the great humorist's son. Caricatures and illus. $4.00

TURGENEV: THE MAN, HIS ART AND HIS AGE By Avrahm Yarmolinsky
The only biography of the great Russian novelist. A notable life reconstructed with movement and drama, with shrewd psychological insight. Illus. $4.00

THE NEGRO IN AMERICAN LIFE By Jerome Dowd
A scholarly study of the black race, its history, present status, and probable future. $5.00

SHORT TURNS By Barry Benefield, author of "The Chicken-Wagon Family"
Fourteen human interest tales by a master of American style. $2.00

DAYS OF THEIR YOUTH By Alan Sullivan, author of "The Jade God"
A spiritual and understanding study of a modern English family. $2.00

AND THEN CAME SPRING By John Hargrave
Middle-aged wild oats in an amusing and sympathetic novel. $2.00

THE CENTURY CO.* Publishers of Enduring Books

gods." But these statements are significant facts for the history of moral thinking among the Greeks. The character which men ascribe to their gods surely reveals the state of the human mind, however obscure the deities may remain.

This fact is fully appreciated by Professor Farnell, the veteran Oxford scholar, whose masterly acquaintance with the history of religions in general and Greek religions in particular constitutes his equipment for his present task. He threads his way unerringly through the mazes of many mythologies, rituals, and creeds in quest of pertinent information. True, he touches Christianity rather gingerly, but the implication of his remarks in this area is usually apparent.

The attributes of God, as the author clearly shows, vary widely among different peoples or even among the same people in different periods, as social and individual experiences create a demand for one or another quality in the godhead. But once an attribute has established itself in tradition, it becomes a deterrent force restraining thinking when new experiences would demand revisions in the character of the deity. Thus the evolution of theologies, when historically surveyed, sheds a significant light on the history of a culture—on its art, its social customs, its politics, its moral ideals, and its intellectualism. The way in which a people think of their gods is an index to human character, for the deities are but replicas of mortals.

Though this book is a first-rate work of scholarship, it is free from technicalities and is fascinating reading even for the uninitiated. SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE

Books in Brief

If I Were a Labour Leader. By Ernest J. P. Benn. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75.

When those who called the British strike come to read this book, they may wonder whether the strike was such a failure, after all. Here is Sir Ernest Benn declaring not only that "politically, the Britisher is in a better position than any other citizen of any other state in the world," which perhaps was to be expected, but that the trade-union movement is "clean, honest, and obviously good," and that it "possesses the support of the whole of the working world and the respect and sympathy of the employers," which sounds a bit strange after the denunciation of British trade-union restrictions with which we are so familiar. Sir Ernest's present book has a decided flavor of "Good doggy! Don't bite!" The good trade unionists, who really want good wages and short hours, and nothing more or worse, have been deceived, like everybody else, by the wicked socialists and communists in our midst, who want political action by labor, the overthrow of the constitution, and an omnipotent bureaucratic state à la Moscow. Specially obnoxious are the intellectuals of the British labor movement. Let all British workers, employers and employees alike, get back to honest hard work, taking a leaf out of the book of the United States in the matter of improving methods, let the trade unions (and everybody else) eschew politics and stick to industrial production—and then what? "We could transform the surface of the earth, and poverty would fly like chaff before the wind. America would take a back seat." Sir Ernest is always interesting.

Last Essays. By Joseph Conrad. Doubleday, Page & Company. $2.

With the exception of the sensitive memoir of Stephen Crane, these literary and maritime sketches betray a vapidity rather surprising in the artist who wrote "Heart of Darkness" and "The End of the Tether." It is in the short critical essay that Conrad's sheer paucity of ideas manifests itself with a painful frankness; and it is here also that the atmospheric magic which vitalizes his novel style becomes singularly irrelevant. There is something too easy and unpenetrating, for

FROM THE McBRIDE LIST

BACKYARD

By Gloria Goddard

A woman's viewpoint on small town life—a tale of the crushing of illusion by reality. "It is the most distinguished first novel I have ever encountered," says Clement Wood. "Its objectivity and fresh imagery are delightful."—N. Y. Times. $2.00

THE FIDDLER IN BARLY

By Robert Nathan

The most mature work of a distinguished American novelist—the story of a whimsical old fiddler. A compound of wisdom, tenderness and fantasy leavened with a dash of high comedy. $2.00

EUGENE O'NEILL

By Barrett H. Clark

The first book on America's greatest dramatist, containing, in addition to a complete record of O'Neill's life and work, full bibliographies of his writings and productions. $1.00

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON

By Ben Ray Redman

An authoritative study of our most considerable contemporary poet. Wisely and sanely Mr. Redman discusses those qualities wherein the poet's greatness lies but at the same time he takes full account of the qualities he lacks. $1.00

TRANSFIGURATION

By Sergeev Tzensky

With an Introduction by Maxim Gorky. No more typical picture of modern peasant life has come out of Russia. Translated into English for the first time. $2.50

THE ARGONAUT SERIES

Authentic Narratives of Travel, Adventure and Exploration. Edited by Arthur D. Howden Smith.

I. THE NARRATIVE OF SAMUEL HANCOCK being a description of his overland journey to Oregon in 1845. $2.50

II. A VOYAGE TO THE SOUTH SEAS IN THE YEARS 1740-1741.
By John Bulkeley and John Cummins
A faithful narrative of the loss of his Majesty's ship, the Wager, on a desolate island in latitude 47 south. $2.50

At all bookstores

ROBERT M. McBRIDE & COMPANY
7 West 16th Street New York

example, about the critical apparatus which, in appraising the genius of W. H. Hudson, selects an ability to render the externals of natural objects as his chief claim to artistic eminence. To the unhysterical reader of Conrad (we assume that there are some, despite the full-page advertisements) it is becoming clear that he works with complete success within a limited realm of concrete situations dealing with the sentiments of esprit de corps, fidelity to one's calling, and stoicism in the face of disaster. Is it entirely impossible that Joseph Conrad will be the Walter Scott of the next generation?

The Physiology of Taste. By Jean Anthelme Brillat-Savarin. Boni and Liveright. $3.50.

A handsome centenary edition of the magnum opus of this great French bon vivant. Half serious and half jocose, "The Physiology of Taste" is neither solid enough to be science nor quite specific enough to serve as a cookbook; but it possesses the full flavor of that eighteenth-century France in which the youth of its author fell. Gay, "enlightened," and worldly wise, it is one of the fine flowers of drawing-room society, and some of its anecdotes—notably, for example, that story of a drinking bout called a National Victory—deserve a place in any possible anthology of perfect examples of the raconteur's art. The present edition is provided with an amusing and appropriately high-hat introduction by Frank Crowninshield.

Music

Music and the External World

MUSIC differs from other arts in its material and its use of this material. It makes use of a class of sounds that are used nowhere else, and it uses them, not to express the relations between physical objects or mental concepts but to express what must be called purely musical relations, relations that exist only and precisely between musical sounds; in other words, not to convey intellectual meanings, or emotional meanings, but to convey what must be called a purely musical significance, a significance sui generis. This significance, these relations, are, then, themselves the sole and final object of a type of apprehension which is no more than a specific aural adaptation for the purpose.

It is nevertheless true that music often does convey an emotional or intellectual meaning; but this is an additional meaning that it acquires by association. It is true, for example, that a tempo, a mode, a timbre, or a combination of these, often conveys to the listener a mood or feeling, and usually one particular mood or feeling; but it does this in the same way as thick lips convey sensuality, namely, by an association that is purely conventional—since the correlations between styles of music and specific emotions differ throughout the world—and ultimately, therefore, arbitrary. Again, music can be described in terms of time and space—a theme is said, for example, to rise or fall in pitch, slowly or rapidly; and such a description can be linked with analogous physical or intellectual activity—a descending theme, to make the example extreme, with actual descent of an object or a person. In either case, it is clear that to apprehend the secondary, the emotional or intellectual, meaning of music—as, for that matter, to apprehend even the element of purely formal design—one must first apprehend its primary, its purely musical significance. That is, one cannot apprehend the external correlation of a bit of music with sadness—the sadness of a character in Goethe's "Faust," let us say—unless one can apprehend, in and for themselves, the internal musical relations that are so externally correlated.

It is true, then, that music is a language of emotions, that it can be made to express them in the sense in which words express thoughts; but this is only part of the truth.

For the Inquiring Reader

Publications of the University of Chicago Press that give an up-to-date picture of what is happening year by year in science, education, literature, art, and religion.

The Nature of the World and of Man

By Sixteen Members of the University of Chicago Faculties

A co-operative survey of all science. Harry Hansen says in Harpers that "the average reader who is thirsting for knowledge about men and the universe will be able to get the fundamentals of modern science in The Nature of the World and of Man." $4.00

The Outlook for American Prose

By Joseph Warren Beach

Here is a book about many of the American writers whose novels will be read this Fall. Dreiser, Lewis, Mencken, Hergesheimer, Cabell, Sandburg, all are attracting attention today. Mr. Beach knows much about them, their style, and their works. His new volume of criticism is an expert appraisal as well as a collection of essays that are engaging in themselves. $2.50

The Panchatantra

Translated from the Sanskrit by Arthur W. Ryder

There are many wise and witty books to read, but few so delightful as this collection of prose and poetry from old India. Here is the first adequate English translation of the famous folktales of the old Hindus. $4.00

The Democratic Way of Life

By Thomas Vernor Smith

A democratic credo, a profession of the social faith of a modern man. $1.75

Brains of Rats and Men

By C. Judson Herrick

Dr. Morris Fishbein says, "He preaches the true gospel of science with enthusiasm and human understanding." $3.00

At all bookstores, or with ten cents extra for postage from

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

5807 Ellis Avenue Chicago, Illinois

The more important part is, in my opinion, that primarily music expresses only itself; that while a composer may occasionally have as his object the delineation in musical terms of an emotion, his problem normally is a purely musical one, in that he is concerned with tonal, and of course with formal, relations. "You find yourself," says Stravinsky, "you don't know how, in possession of, say, four bars of music. Well, the real musician is the one who knows what there is to be done with these four bars, knows what he can make of them. . . . What interests me most of all is construction. What gives me pleasure is to see how much of my material I can get into line. I want to see what is coming. I am interested first in the melody, and the volumes, and the instrumental sounds, and the rhythm. . . ."

It is clearly not true, then, that music is a language of emotions in the sense in which this is usually intended, namely, that it transmits the composer's own emotions to the listener, who apprehends them through emotional sensitiveness. The composer's emotions are the impetus behind his writing, not the content of the music when written; and the listener, therefore, when he apprehends the content, does not thereby penetrate to the impetus. His own emotions as he listens are certainly not those of the composer as he wrote; nor are they, any more than the composer's, the emotions delineated by the music. For, as the composer's emotions were only an impetus, so the listener's are only a result: in any case, then, as a quantity which depends on and varies with him, the listener's response may be quite irrelevant or inappropriate to what he has heard; and if he starts with emotions—such as are implied in the term "emotional sensitiveness"—there is no telling what he will end with: it may even be a totally different piece of music. Instead, then, of penetrating to the truth behind the art, emotional sensitiveness only obscures music with personal associations that are obviously beyond enumeration or definition.

What is true of the composition of music is no less true of its interpretation, so-called, by the executive artist. The variations in speed and loudness begin by setting off phrase against phrase, section against section, conveying in this way what the artist takes to be the structure of the music. Becoming associated with emotional meanings, they now begin to convey an emotional content, not merely of music intended to convey such content but of music intended to be purely formal. In either case, so far, the emotions are objective, the content of the music. But now interpretation begins to live its own life, to be governed by its own logic; and nuance breeds nuance, until we arrive at extreme, eccentric nuances which for no good reason impress us as conveying the emotions of the interpreter himself. At first, therefore, they appear in the styles of performance of solo instruments; only recently have they been introduced into orchestral performance. Whereas, then, formerly, though we heard a symphony or tone-poem through the ears of a Muck or a Mengelberg, what we heard was a structure of the symphony or a mood of the tone-poem, today what we get through the ears of Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Stokowski, and what is so alluring is, we think, the personal elan and romantic spirit of Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Stokowski. I say "we think" because it is an illusion. We may not infer that an artist feels the particular emotions associated with his performance; that Mr. Stokowski, for example, shares the moods conveyed by a piece of music, or is himself the Siegfried conveyed by his performances. The fact is that, by whichever handle he has grasped it—and one cannot tell, for though exposition of structure is the primary, the musical aspect of the result, emotion always appears by association as the other aspect—he has done no more than acquire and use a conventional and objective technique of musical manipulation, no less objective for having a twofold emotional connotation attached to the result. His own emotions, then, are again only a stimulus; the listener's again only a result.

LIPPINCOTT BOOKS

By JOSEPH LOUIS VANCE

A Galloping Tale of Love, Intrigue and Breathless Adventure

THE DEAD RIDE HARD

The ghostly clatter of hoofs that resounds through these tales is that of the dead—riding hard for their revenge for those ghastly days and nights of Budapest under the Red Terror. Not since "The Lone Wolf" has Mr. Vance written a novel so athrill with excitement and terror, with swift, forceful characterizations and glamorous romance. $2.00

PERSONAL REMINISCENCES OF AUGUSTE RODIN

By ANTHONY M. LUDOVICI
In these reminiscences Mr. Ludovici gives not only a portrait of the artist at the most interesting period of his career, but also a clear and searching criticism of his work and aims. As secretary he was in closest touch with Rodin and his work is trenchant with the personality of the sculptor. 8 Illustrations. $3.00

RAMBLES WITH ANATOLE FRANCE

By SANDOR KEMERI
On his rambles through old Paris, Naples, Milan, Rome, the Master talks of art and men and ideas. "Anatole France to the life."—Emile Herriot in Le Temps. Translated from the Hungarian by Emil Lengyel and illustrated with hitherto unpublished photographs and facsimile letters. $5.00

REMINISCENCES OF TRANSATLANTIC TRAVELLERS

By CHARLES T. SPEDDING. For many years Purser of the Aquitania. A book lively with prominent people and their doings, disclosed in all the informality of ocean travel. Illustrated from photographs. $5.00

FORGOTTEN SHRINES OF SPAIN

By MILDRED STAPELY BYNE
A volume that throws Spain open like a great museum to the art-lovers of the world. 65 Beautiful illustrations, quaintly drawn frontispiece and map. $5.00

NOVELISTS WE ARE SEVEN

By PATRICK BRAY-BROOKE, Author of "Kipling and His Soldiers," etc.
Analysis of the work and personal glimpses of seven contemporary novelists by a well-known English critic. $2.50

A LITERARY MAN'S LONDON

By CHARLES G. HARPER, Author of "London, Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow," etc.
Here are those corners of the great city her men of letters have known and loved. 22 Pen and ink sketches by the author. $4.50

JOSEPH PENNELL'S PICTURES OF PHILADELPHIA

Reproductions of 61 lithographs. Introduction by ELIZABETH ROBINS PENNELL. Joseph Pennell will ever remain a dominating figure in art. Here is a gift book of permanent value, a collection that will become increasingly valuable with the passing of time. $2.50

CHAMBERS'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

Revised Edition of a Standard Reference Work. By DAVID PATRICK, LL.D., and F. HINDES GROOME. Over 1,010 Pages. Over 10,000 Biographies. Three-quarters Morocco. $6.00

THE PRACTICAL BOOK OF LEARNING DECORATION AND FURNITURE

By EDWARD STRATTON HOLLOWAY
A book of more than just information. For the first time the reader who aspires to a knowledge of decoration is taught how to learn. To be used in connection with "The Practical Book of Interior Decoration." 180 Illustrations. $4.50

At All Bookstores

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

PHILADELPHIA LONDON

Still less is it true that music conveys the personality or character of the composer, or such externals as the period in which he lives and its entire non-musical culture. All these are to music as oil to water; but, besides this special reason for the special case of music, the notion that an art expresses a period and its entire culture complex is false. The plastic arts, for example, might be expected to reflect matters external, yet nowhere else, I am assured, is the fallacy so easily detected and refuted: identical cycles have repeated themselves at different times, in different places, under different systems of philosophy. And even of European music, which has had only one development, I think it can be shown that this development has been entirely self-determined, that the entire sequence might be shifted backward or forward parallel to the fixed series of non-musical events without requiring change, and that apparent correlations, therefore, are only apparent. To say, then, that a man must write music of the present generation is sense only if it means that he must use musical materials in their present state of development; it is nonsense if it directs him, when he is dealing with tonal and formal relations, to take into account skyscrapers and taxicabs.

It is nonsense, then, also, to link Brahms with a so-called German temperament, Debussy with a French, Gershwin with an American; they must instead be linked with different styles of composition. Nor, I must add, should "German," "French," and "American" be used or understood to mean that the musical style, any more than the temperament, is racial or innate. The beginning of a style, whether in slight divergence or in independent discovery, is quite accidental; and thereafter not only is its development self-determined but its perpetuation is automatic. Its force, in other words, is that of a tradition: an American composes in the American manner, as he acts and thinks in the American manner, because it is the manner of his earliest and most prolonged experience. For this, obviously, geographical and political isolation are responsible to a large extent; whence the term "American," which—and this is its sole significance—locates the tradition geographically.

B. H. Haggin

Drama

Alloy

PLAYS like "Sandalwood" (Gaiety Theater) constitute the real tragedies of the stage. One may dismiss the mere vulgarities of the popular drama as things with which one has no real concern, and one may even learn to endure the faux bon, the cheap imitation of the real thing, with a certain equanimity; but greatness miscarried, genius stricken with impotence, tortures the spectator with something of the same sense of frustration which affects the baffled creator himself.

The present play, which Owen Davis has skilfully fashioned from the materials afforded by a novel of the same name by Fulton Oursler, is such a work—something near a masterpiece struggling to be born, gold alloyed with metals which are base indeed. There are passages of dialogue so flat, so banal, and so cheap as to make the auditor writhe from very shame; but there are, by way of compensation, scenes which, especially as acted with a perfection beyond praise by Pauline Lord, are as powerful and as poignant as any which have come from an American playwright. Certain moments like that, for example, when the wife makes way at her husband's bedside for the ministrations of "the other woman," or like that toward the end when she clings to him with an unreasonable, ineluctable tenacity which does not attempt to justify itself but is made infinitely pathetic by a desperation not even trying to understand, are genuinely memorable. But unfortunately there are other moments, notably those in which the lovers call one another Pan and Melisande, which are equally memorable for

Columbia Fall Books

ANNALS OF THE NEW YORK STAGE
By George C. D. Odell, Professor of Dramatic Literature in Columbia University.
This work will be the first complete history of the New York stage. It will be illustrated with rare photographs of famous players and printed in a style that will appeal to collectors of fine books. Ready October 20th.
First two volumes probably $7.50 each.

FEDERAL WATER POWER LEGISLATION
By Jerome G. Kerwin, Assistant Professor of Political Science in the University of Chicago.
A study of the great fifteen-year struggle for water power legislation in the United States. $6.00

FOOD COSTS AND CITY CONSUMERS
By Charles E. Artman.
A study of the factors in the extent and distribution of perishable fruits and vegetables in New York City. Ready October 20. $2.25

THE SEE OF PETER
By James T. Shotwell, Professor of History in Columbia University; and Louise Ropes Loomis, Professor of History in Wells College.
A scholarly study of the doctrinal basis for the primacy of Rome in the universal church.

PRESENT DAY JAPAN
By Dr. Yusuke Tsurumi.
Public lectures delivered at Columbia University by the Japanese publicist and author. $1.75

Send for our New Catalogue.

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS
2960 BROADWAY NEW YORK

Can a Man Be a Christian Today?
By William Louis Poteat (Second edition, out October 1)
Is religion still possible? Are the victories of intelligence insecure? Is the Christian experience alien and illogical in a world of science? "There are hundreds of thousands of honest young people who are in perplexity, and who would like to have an intellectually respectable religion. They will find illumination in this little book."—William Lyon Phelps in Scribner's Magazine. ". . . the most cogent and winning statement ever made on the religion of a scientist who adheres to the dynamic of Christ's own conduct."—The New York World. "A blessed little book it is—to be read in hours of doubting leadership, to be given to those whom the inquisitors have frightened, to be slipped into the suitcase of the lad going off to college."—The Richmond News Leader. Cloth, $1.50

Law and Morals (Second edition, out September 20)
By Roscoe Pound Cloth, $2.00

The Country Newspaper
By Malcolm M. Willey (Published September 15) Cloth, $1.50

An Approach to Public Welfare and Social Work (Publication date, November 1)
By Howard W. Odum Cloth, $1.50

A Working Faith (Publication date, November 15)
By Charles R. Brown Cloth, $1.50

Social Differentiation
By Cecil Clare North (Publication date, December 15) Cloth, $2.50

At all bookstores or from
The UNIVERSITY of NORTH CAROLINA PRESS CHAPEL HILL, N. C.

the opposite reason. No flapper and her sheik, no desperately "pagan" pair in a Greenwich Village tearoom, ever spouted passion more utterly unconvincing. One is tempted to imagine that Miss Lord merely manages to make certain parts seem good, but such I think is not the case. "Sandalwood" is a play so good in some spots that its badness in others is all but incredible.

The theme—the unsuccessful revolt of a rather commonplace man against the dulness of his life and the banality of his family—is sufficiently familiar, but it has been seized upon here by an imagination bold enough to body it forth in new and powerful forms. When the play opens the hero has taken to his bed in a sort of insane surrender to the life which he hates, and from it he is able, like Hamlet in his madness, to gibe at those whom his malady bewilders. To the sickroom comes the woman from the outside world whom he has loved; she nurses him back to convalescence and then, when she realizes that he can never tear up the roots which hold him fast in the suburb where he lives, she leaves him to the tender mercies of the rich brother who is "not sold on this proposition," the clergyman who promises to pray for him, and the dumb, tenacious wife who brushes back the hair from his forehead "so that he will look more like other people." Though cast in conventional dramatic form, the heightened, hectic tone of the play suggests constantly that of the more radical experiments from Strindberg to John Howard Lawson; and throughout both the longueurs and the crudities which mar it one sits in an expectation rewarded again and again by scenes of vividness and power. Why is it, then, that "Sandalwood" as a whole fails definitely to achieve that serene completeness which is the mark of artistic aspiration fulfilled?

The reason is to be sought, I think, not in any mere lack of technical skill nor even in any failure in the power of the author to express the things at which he aims, but rather in the incompleteness of his own soul. His work, wherever it deals with mere rebellion, wherever it is concerned with the things from which he would escape, is passionate and real, but whenever he spreads the wings of aspiration those wings are pitifully ineffectual. Dulness, stupidity, and the disgust which they can provoke are realized from intimate experience and bodied forth with powerful imagination, but their opposites—freedom, joy, and beauty—are but tinseled words bandied about by people incapable of understanding their meaning. The wife, so hideous and so pitiful, is real; the mistress is a lay figure, tawdry and unconvincing. Weary of the world which he knows, the author is impotent to conceive a better one, and he takes refuge in proud empty words. Hence it is that the play is a symptom of a tragedy, somewhat different from the one which it aims to set forth, of a tragedy which is, perhaps, the greatest of modern society. Thanks to education and enlightenment, discontent is cheap. Thousands condemned to mediocrity and dulness are aware that they are mediocre and dull. Vast armies whose forefathers accepted routine with complacency have now heard of and now long for the freedom and the joy of the artist and the creator. But if aspiration has become the property of the many, it is still, unfortunately, only the few who can fashion a life beyond dulness and platitude.

"Fanny" (Lyceum Theater) is a melodrama devised by David Belasco and Willard Mack for the display of Fanny Brice. Miss Brice's talents are undeniable, but the piece is mere carpentry and pretty bad carpentry at that. "Yellow" (National Theater) is also melodrama of a sort nearer to that once made familiar by traveling stock companies than is often seen in these days. The very scenery—for all its obviously fresh paint—is curiously reminiscent of the general utility set, and if the villain is very black indeed his villainy is neutralized by a more copious flow of virtuous sentiments from all the other male members of the cast than has been heard in the theater in a long while. Says the hero to the seducer: "I didn't know that a man could sink so low."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

exit chivalry!

IN her new novel, just published, the author of "Barren Ground" tells the story of man eternal and quietly laughs the sentimental tradition of Southern chivalry off the stage.

This season's wittiest, most brilliant book is

The Romantic Comedians

BY ELLEN GLASGOW

At Bookstores, $2.50 Doubleday, Page & Co.

A NEW VOLUME IN

THE MUSICIANS LIBRARY

Seventy Negro Spirituals

Arranged for Voice and Piano

Edited by William Arms Fisher

Issued in two editions

For High Voice For Low Voice

THE most authoritative and complete collection of these picturesque and appealing folksongs yet issued. The arrangements are the work of the editor, together with nine other well-known American musicians, all of whom have approached their task with enthusiasm, sympathy and skill. Mr. Fisher's prefatory essay on Spirituals is an exhaustive and illuminating treatment of an engrossing subject.

Price: Paper, cloth back.....$2.50 net
Full cloth, gilt..... 3.50 net

A brochure giving portraits of editors and tables of contents of all the volumes of the Musicians Library will be sent free on request.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY
178-179 Tremont St., Boston

Chas. H. Ditson & Co.
8-10-12 East 34th St., New York

Order of your local dealer

DORAN BOOKS

George H. Doran Company offers for the delectation of The Nation:

The great novel of our time
H. G. WELLS
The World of William Clissold
Published 2 vols. $5.00

By the author of "Porgy"
DU BOSE HEYWARD
Angel
Published $2.00

A Cathedral novel
HUGH WALPOLE
Harmer John
October 15 $2.00

Brilliant romantic characterization
FLOYD DELL
An Old Man's Folly
Published $2.00

Six stories—six real novels
W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM
The Casuarina Tree
Published $2.00

The great literary biography
HERVEY ALLEN
Israfel: The Life and Times of Edgar Allan Poe
November 6 $10.00

In the manner of "Nocturne"
FRANK SWINNERTON
Summer Storm
Published $2.00

Her best loved character
MARY ROBERTS RINEHART
Tish Plays the Game
October $2.00

Peer of "The Old Wives' Tale"
ARNOLD BENNETT
Lord Raingo
Published $2.00

Author of "Wife of the Centaur"
CYRIL HUME
The Golden Dancer
Published $2.00

By the author of "Limehouse Nights"
THOMAS BURKE
The Sun in Splendour
Published $2.00

Illustrated by Edmond Dulac
HELEN BEAUCLERK
The Green Lacquer Pavilion
Published $2.50

A doughboy's novel of the war
LEONARD NASON
Chevrons
Published $2.00

The facts about sex
JOSEPH COLLINS
The Doctor Looks at Love and Life
Published $3.00

A stimulating aperitif for epicures
JOHN THOMAS
Dry Martini
Published $2.50

The great human biography
HERBERT GORMAN
A Victorian American: Henry Wadsworth Longfellow
October 15 $5.00

Guide, philosopher and friend
E. V. LUCAS
A Wanderer in Rome
Published $5.00

An Intellectual Holiday
ALDOUS HUXLEY
Jesting Pilate
October $3.50

DORAN BOOKS The autumn list of George H. Doran Company, from which the foregoing are selected, has been described by such competent and critical observers as Edward Björkman, Charles Hanson Towne and others as the most distinguished array of books and authors ever assembled into one publisher's catalogue in any one season. An illustrated catalogue on request. DORAN BOOKS

244 Madison Avenue GEORGE H. DORAN COMPANY New York

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1926 No. 3198

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS ... 441

EDITORIALS:

Dear Old Private Individual ... 443

What Every Child Knows ... 444

A Little Poetry ... 445

Watch Massachusetts ... 446

WASHINGTON'S SMOKE NUISANCE. By Harry S. Bressler ... 447

IS GERMANY DISARMED? By Lord Parmoor ... 449

FRANCE AND HER POLITICIANS. By Oswald Garrison Villard ... 451

IDOLS BEHIND ALTARS. By Anita Brenner ... 454

THE SOCIALIZATION OF MEDICINE. By Joseph Kaplan ... 456

ARE FARM-LAND SPECULATORS ENTITLED TO PROFIT? By Benjamin C. Marsh ... 460

SILENCE. By Hal Saunders White ... 461

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter ... 462

CORRESPONDENCE ... 463

BOOKS AND PLAYS

New Skies. By Mark Van Doren ... 465

Courage. By Jacob Zeitlin ... 466

Meredith. By Louise Bogan ... 467

Rome Simplified. By Forrest Frank ... 467

For Independence. By William MacDonald ... 468

Books in Brief ... 468

Drama: "The Last Mile" by Joseph Wood Krutch ... 469

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Russia, the Land of Contradictions. By Sherwood Eddy ... 470

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Possessions, Canada, Mexico, Spain, Spanish Colonies, Cuba, and countries of the Postal Union. Six dollars foreign.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office, Room 1, 30 North Dearborn Street. Branch Agency of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London W. C. 1, England.

IS THIS COUNTRY at last waking up? There are signs. In Illinois the candidacy of Hugh S. Magill, at first laughed at by professional politicians, is beginning to disturb their nights' sleep. Mr. Magill is fighting for the Senatorship as an honest Dry. Against him are George E. Brennan, the wringing Wet Democratic boss of Chicago, and Frank L. Smith, more or less Dry, both of whom accepted checks in their primary campaigns from the public-utilities magnate, Samuel Insull. And—almost surprisingly in these days of complacent corruption—there are people in Illinois who take this issue of honesty seriously.

IT IS IN INDIANA, however, that the great revolt is visible. There a group of fighting Republican newspaper editors is defying the Klan-named officials of the State. D. C. Stephenson, former Grand Dragon of the Klan and boss of Indiana, is in jail, convicted of second-degree murder. His prison meditations have apparently moved him to confession. But all the power of the State government has been set against exposure of the facts of Klan control. Stephenson got a few letters out to Thomas W. Adams, the Vincennes editor who today represents the conscience of his State, and Adams has Stephenson's documents in a safe outside the boundaries of Indiana. But the governor and his prison board have refused to permit Adams or his attorneys to see Stephenson; at first refusing any investigation of his charges, they finally moved toward an investigation under their own auspices. The governor was Stephenson's man, the attorney general, too; the mayor of Indianapolis is said to have signed a preelection pledge to consult the Grand Dragon about all appointments. Adams has had to fight against the entire machinery which ought to have exposed the corruption itself. It has been a magnificent fight. The Indiana Republican Editorial Association has supported him, with a few pusillanimous exceptions, in a manner that gives hope that the press of America will earn again the prestige that it has been losing.

MR. C. B. VAN DUSEN is general manager of the S. S. Kresge Company of Detroit; he is also president of the Detroit Y. M. C. A. The Kresge Company, according to Senator Couzens, pays its girl employees $7.50 a week. And the Y. M. C. A., through Mr. Van Dusen, withdrew, while the American Federation of Labor was in session in Detroit, the invitation which it had in July extended to William Green, president of the federation, to address its members. Simultaneously the Christian churches of Detroit withdrew the invitations they had, in accordance with the seven-year-old custom of the federation's convention cities, extended to labor leaders to speak from their pulpits. Two churches were honorable exceptions to this dishonorable retreat—the Bethel Evangelical Church, Rev. Reinhold Niebuhr, pastor; and the First Unitarian Church, Augustus P. Record, pastor—and a Congregational church, after wiggling and wabbling, finally opened its doors for a joint labor-church protest meeting. One or two other facts are pertinent in this episode in the history of Detroit Christianity: The Y. M. C. A. is conducting a $5,000,000-building campaign in Detroit, toward which the non-union Ford firm had pledged $1,500,000, the non-union Fisher Body Corporation $500,000, and the non-union S. S. Kresge Company, which pays its girls $7.50 a week, $300,000. Among the directors and officers of the Detroit Y. M. C. A. are Truman H. Newberry, who was forced to resign from the United States Senate because of campaign-fund scandals; and Charles Beecher Warren, whom the Senate refused to confirm as Attorney General; and other bankers, merchants, and automobile manufacturers. And it was a circular letter from the Detroit Board of Commerce which frightened the churches into their retreat.

THE PROTESTANT PASTORS of Detroit obviously are not in the habit of choosing their texts from the nineteenth chapter of Matthew. When a young man enters the Y. M. C. A. he is in no danger of hearing a secretary quote: "Go, sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor": nor, probably, does it often occur to the directors that it might be easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. Yet, as a matter of fact, we are not surprised by the cowering of the Detroit churches when the non-union employers cracked their whips. It is part and parcel of a long, long history. Let those who accused Upton Sinclair of wild exaggeration when he wrote his "Profits of Religion," let those who had no understanding for the anti-church feeling in Russia and in Mexico study the story of Detroit. Despite hundreds of stirring individual exceptions, the Protestant church in America is the ally of the interests which feed it. Detroit was no novelty. Protestant cathedrals, million-dollar Y. M. C. A. buildings are not built with the pennies of the millions, but with the substantial contributions of the "substantial" section of the community. And these men do not make out checks in six figures to organizations which are at all likely to interfere with their profits.

NEW YORK STATE'S Water Power Commission (Republican) has recently given the public two more slaps in the face. It has evolved a plan for disposing of the St. Lawrence to private interests, and invited the Frontier Corporation and others to step up and bid; it has tried to give away the Salmon River in the Adirondacks. The St. Lawrence plan includes the unusual and usurious provision that if the State ever desires to buy the private company out, it must pay cost plus 15 per cent; it provides a loophole for "good-will" and other intangibles in valuation; the higher interest rate on private bonds as compared with public bonds would in fifty years add $100,000,000 to the cost of the project, and the commission asks the corporations to complete only half of the job by 1934. A more ruinous compact for the citizens of New York it would be difficult to imagine. The Salmon River project, according to the Association for the Protection of the Adirondacks, would bring to the State just $720 a year in revenue, although it would be the opening wedge for $50,000,000 in enhanced values for private power corporations. The commission deigned to grant the protesting organizations a hearing, but when they reached Albany they found the hearing postponed without notice until after election! Such are the gentry who have our natural resources in charge.

LATER REPORTS on the abolition of compulsory military drill from the College of the City of New York show that the authorities were not without guile in the matter. First reports in the newspapers sounded so well; the incoming freshman class was to have the choice of military training or "civilian drill"—which latter might not be so very pleasant but was at least an alternative. Then, to the surprise of those who had admired last year's protests against the R. O. T. C., the freshman class voted four to one for military training. There was something strange about this; several students in the college have been kind enough to furnish us with the explanation. There was, it appears, nothing about the new course in the catalogue of studies from which the freshmen made up their schedule of classes. Anyone who has ever performed the feat of fitting courses in where they do not want to go, will realize what a mathematical triumph a completed program is. It was days after college opened when the acting president announced the new "civilian-drill" course; the student programs of studies had already been made up. It is always hard and sometimes impossible to change them. In addition, a fee of six dollars was required for the privilege of wearing gray-striped "civilian" trousers while drilling, and at the same time it was carefully announced that military uniforms would be furnished gratis by the Government. In spite of the difficulties of changing their programs, in spite of the six dollars which is important enough to most students of City College, in spite, one may even think, of the gray striped trousers, 144 freshmen out of some seven hundred made the choice. Student opposition to military training, then, is by no means dead; the authorities have capitulated only where they felt obliged to, and are still doing their best to discredit the rising tide of protest.

"NEVER IN MY EXPERIENCE have the editors of any State so outspokenly, unanimously, and vigorously condemned a lynching outrage as have the Virginia editors the mob murder at Wytheville," writes James Weldon Johnson of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to the Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch. "Colored people throughout the United States," he adds, "have been much heartened by the attitude of the white press of Virginia." Nor does the Virginia press stand alone. We have seldom seen a more effective editorial upon the Ku Klux Klan than a recent comment of the Greensboro (N. C.) Daily News upon the reply of President Chandler of William and Mary College "to the Kluckers who presented the college with a flagpole and an American flag." Dr. Chandler, it seems, smilingly expressed his appreciation of patriotic circulars issued by the Klan in which it announced its support of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution. He quoted and elaborated upon the Declaration's assurance that all men have an inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, each in his own way, and the Constitution's guaranty of religious freedom, while five thousand brethren headed by the Imperial Wizard, listened. Dr. Chandler, in sum, used Klan texts to prove to the Klan that it should make of itself a sort of American Civil Liberties Union, and the Greensboro newspaper praised him for "the neatest, smoothest, and most gently subtle performance of the season." We should like to know what Northern college president or Northern newspaper editor could—and would—be at once as bold and as subtle.

YET THE OLD STORY repeats itself: the sheriff is "overpowered"; the prisoners are "whisked away"; the mob is "masked" or has blackened faces; high-powered automobiles bear the victims to the outskirts of town. Result: in Aiken, South Carolina, two men and a woman, Negroes, of course, were shot to death; and in Dover, Tennessee, one Negro met the same fate. Thus lynchings to date for 1926 reach the grand total of 24, or six more than the total for twelve months in 1925. The prisoners in South Carolina were standing trial for the murder of a sheriff a year or so ago, a murder that grew out of a raid on the Negroes' home in the course of which a Negro woman was killed. They had been convicted once; the case was appealed and the judge directed that one of the three be acquitted on the murder charge; he was then rearrested on a charge of assault with intent to kill. The "mob" that took them from the jail could not wait for ordinary justice. In this case, as in so many others, the sheriff from whom the prisoners were taken had not thought it necessary to order a special guard for them or even to remain at his post to protect them. And in spite of a fine show of determination to discover and punish the lynchers in both States, a coroner's jury in each case has already returned a verdict of death at the hands of "unknown parties." It is something if Southern newspapers now ring with fiery denunciations of lawlessness and mob action; in the old days they said nothing. But Southern editors and Southern legislators are still blind to the need for a federal anti-lynching law.

POOR MR. EVAN WILLIAMS! As spokesman for the coal-owners in the British mine strike he has occasion almost daily to expatiate on the unprofitableness of the coal industry. The owners cannot pay another penny in wages; look at their books—they are losing money as it is; and so on. The disrespectful Glasgow Forward, with fine disregard for Mr. Williams's protestations, prints certain interesting items in the financing of the Tredegar Iron and Coal Company, Ltd., the strongest combination of the fifteen different companies of which Mr. Williams is a director. The Tredegar company's capital consists of £616,000 in A ordinary and £1,115,103 in B ordinary shares. The owners of the B ordinary shares received £412,167 bonus shares in 1918 and £494,601 bonus shares in 1923. This, explains the Forward, means that they have subscribed only £208,335 in actual cash, but are drawing dividends on £1,115,103; for every two pounds invested they receive income on eleven. This, of course, is a not unfamiliar tale in high finance. But in view of the fattening of profits from this section of the industry, it ill becomes Mr. Williams to be quite so adamant about what the owners must and will have from the men. To an ordinary miner, trying to get along on two pounds a week, figures like these are appalling. The other day the wife of one of the striking miners fainted in the line that was waiting for food relief—fainted because of starvation; certain miners' families are reported to be obliged to live two days of every week without anything to eat; the relief committee is pleading every day for boots and clothing for the children, for food for the children. Mr. Williams would probably hint that the children would be fed if their fathers would go back to the mines. He can afford to wait.

FORTY PER CENT of all sickness in the United States could be prevented by the application of existing medical knowledge. One-half of the losses incurred in industrial accidents could be prevented through the use of known laws governing the operation of fatigue. The machinery of democratic government would not jam so often if politicians knew what political scientists know. "Engineers have asserted that technical knowledge is now available which if put to work would practically banish poverty, more than double the standard of living, turn ugly cities into noble ones, and bring the culture of the town to the countryside. Yet science for the great bulk of the population is still largely a new mysticism. Mountains of knowledge are created; mole hills of it are actually used." Thus the American Library Association in a pamphlet recently issued. The Association wonders how all this knowledge, lying quietly on the shelves of our libraries, may be awakened and put to work. The answer probably is, by advertising and propaganda. Those are ugly words chiefly because they have been used in connection with efforts to tell us things we do not need or want to know. They might become words of power in connection with a program of diffusion paid for by the government, the purpose of which would be to give all human beings under the flag the information which a few human beings have. Such a purpose would seem to be an obvious one. It is so simple and obvious, indeed, that it probably will never be conceived by any government. But we should love to see the thing tried—noting as time went on how much second-class mail still went unopened into waste-baskets.

WHEN, WE RISE TO ASK, is the San Joaquin Valley of California going to erect a statue to Andrew Volstead and establish an annual festival in commemoration of the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution? Of all the paradoxical results of prohibition certainly the effect upon the growers of wine grapes is among the most curious—and possibly instructive. Black clouds were thought to hang over California vineyards when Mr. Volstead got his famous law through Congress, but by 1920 it was evident that the clouds had a silver lining and by now it is apparent that they are raining prosperity upon California and home-made wine on the rest of the country. In 1918 California shipped 12,000 carloads of table grapes and 6,000 carloads of the wine-producing varieties; last year it shipped 15,000 carloads of table grapes and 60,000 carloads of wine grapes. This year the shipments of wine grapes are estimated at 75,000 carloads. A carload of grapes makes from 1,500 to 2,000 gallons of wine; New York City alone is thought to have made at least 25,000,000 gallons last year, or some four gallons per capita. For some time California feared that the saturation-point had been reached, but, as a writer in the Independent says, "it takes a vast deal of wine to saturate these United States"! The modern parable of the vineyard seems to be that nothing succeeds like prohibition.

SUPPOSE THAT YOU ARE Calvin Coolidge, the honest son of a toiling father, an American citizen devoid of artifice or elegance. You also happen to be President of the United States. That's nothing. You have found an ability to sign your name and close your mouth about all the equipment necessary for that job. Shaking hands is also important, and you have learned to do it when occasion demands. Then all of a sudden Queen Marie decides to call upon you. There is no getting out of it. She has fifty new dresses and a permanent wave, and she is arriving in Washington on October 19. She cannot call on anyone else until she has dropped around at the White House, so you might as well admit that something more than your present social equipment is demanded. You call up the State Department and ask for the chief etiquettician of the Social Usages Bureau. It's his first alarm for several years, but he springs into action at once. He puts his staff to work on their books of manners and Almanachs de Gotha, and produces for you a complete tabular report of proper clothes, gestures, order of precedence, modes of address, and procedure in the face of impending royalty. He outlines, with rare imagination, a typical day in the life of a tourist queen, including the special train, the arrival at the station, the reception committee's costume, the queen's carriage, the dress of the receiving ladies. You are advised in regard to the proper method of receiving and returning the queen's call; you discover that you had better invite her to dinner. It will be hard, but the honor of Vermont is at stake. After all, it is merely a matter of practice. Are the social customs of the court more intricate or more binding than those of the village? Probably not. They are only different. Any President can learn—with a little help from his Department of State. Let the queen come on.

Dear Old Private Initiative

HOW many miles to the gallon are you getting? Twenty-three carbureters of standard makes were recently tested in the laboratories of Purdue University. Of these twenty-three only four could be said to adhere closely to the specifications of a scientifically satisfactory carbureter, involving suitable mixtures for idling, level-road operation, and hill-climbing. Some furnished satisfactory mixtures for only one of these classes and at only one limited range or speed; "a few of the carbureters had characteristics exactly the opposite of those which a reasonable specification would require." Forty per cent could not be depended upon to reproduce their performance on different occasions. Only six permitted the engine to develop its full power; eight caused a large curtailment of engine-power through unnecessary pressure-losses. "Some automobile manufacturers purchase their carbureters more on the basis of price than performance. . . . This causes not only a waste of money but unnecessarily depletes our natural fuel resources. The difference in price between the more efficient and the other carbureters tested is so small as to be negligible."

To this evidence the Federal Oil Conservation Board, in its recent report, adds that 25 per cent of the nation's gasoline consumption "could be saved and the same mileage of movement provided if there were more adequate designs of carbureters and engines." The report of the Conservation Board, composed of Secretaries Work, Hoover, Wilbur, and Davis, is a preliminary one, but it is sufficiently arresting. It supports all the principal charges which engineers have made from time to time covering the appalling waste of a priceless natural resource—and in certain particulars goes the engineers one better. On the present basis of production and consumption, with no new discoveries of oil lands, and without considering foreign fields, the United States has just six years of joy-riding left. Other estimates vary from ten to twenty years—none of which reckonings leave much hope for our gasoline civilization.

In 1859 the first oil well was drilled in Pennsylvania. To the close of 1925 a total of 680,000 wells had been sunk —20 per cent of which turned out to be dry holes. From the producing wells 9,000,000,000 barrels of oil have been taken—3,000,000,000 of them in the last five years. The 1925 production was no less than 750,000,000 barrels. The board estimates that there is a total underground supply, in the present producing fields, of 4,500,000,000 barrels. Which, divided by 750,000,000, works out to just six years. We have had new discoveries in the past, and under the law of probabilities we will get them in the future. The board expects new discoveries, but is by no means confident that they will be sufficient to maintain a production of 750,000,000 barrels annually for an unlimited period. The continental United States has already been intensively explored for oil, although science has not yet made itself completely master of the oil-divining rod. The vast South California fields were a surprise, and it is possible that other surprises lurk beneath the strata. Yet certainly we are much nearer the end of new discoveries than we were a generation ago. The range becomes increasingly limited. It is a very dubious question how much longer our luck will hold.

We produce and consume approximately 70 per cent of the world's traffic in oil. Our exports of 94,000,000 barrels are largely balanced by imports of 62,000,000 barrels—chiefly from Mexico. The total investment in the American industry is $9,500,000,000, while sales at wholesale prices last year were nearly $2,000,000,000. Despite its lordly size the industry treats its oil as a drunken sailor treats his money. Oil is found in conjunction with natural gas in deeply buried beds of sand. When the well-pipe reaches the sand, the pressure of the gas blows the oil up to the light of day. If it blows hard enough we have a "gusher," which may spout hundreds of feet in the air. If the gas can be released gradually rather than in one grand rush a very much larger fraction of the oil can ultimately be reclaimed from the sand. American practice, however, animated by the sturdy principles of self-help and free competition, favors throwing out the baby with the bath and getting all the oil it can as fast as it can, while letting the upper atmosphere take care of the gas. The board gives us Cushing Field, Oklahoma, as a case in point. For a time, the average daily waste of gas was 300,000,000 cubic feet, more than 100 billion feet of gas a year—the equivalent of 5,500,000 tons of coal. The same situation held at Cromwell, at Burkburnet, Texas, at Eldorado and Smackover, Arkansas, at fields in the Los Angeles basin.

For every barrel which reaches the pipe-line, from four to six remain irrevocably lost below ground. The board estimates that only 25 per cent of oil underground is recovered "by ordinary methods," and notes that some authorities claim only 18 per cent—one-sixth. Yet under proper engineering control nearly all could be reclaimed. The money loss for a single field due to competitive drilling—two wells side by side where only one, properly spaced, should be sunk—is assessed by the board at $200,000,000. This is at Santa Fe Springs, California, where forty-five competing companies feverishly sunk wells along each other's property-lines, blew off the gas, and "let loose an unneeded flood of oil on the market with resultant disaster to the price structure, and creating conditions of increased operating costs."

With inconceivable wastes in production, and with very great and needless losses in consumption—of which the carbureter example is but one; with a supply, so far as is now known, only good for six years in America; with our greatest neighbor-fields in Mexico approaching exhaustion and the South American fields utterly uncertain in yield; with the other foreign fields—Persia, Mesopotamia, and the rest —of the most inflammable character politically—in these grave, if not desperate circumstances, what does the board recommend?

The Federal Oil Conservation Board, composed of Secretaries Work, Hoover, Wilbur, and Davis—after making certain sensible suggestions as to the conservation of oil in the public domain during time of war—recommends that the future "must rest upon the normal commercial initiative of private enterprise." Before such passionate devotion to an outworn creed one can but remove one's hat—and think twice about ordering that new oil-burner for the furnace.

What Every Coolie Knows

WHILE the eyes of that portion of the world which cares about China are fixed upon the squabbles and battles of her military chiefs, while the diplomats complain of her dissensions, China is acting with impressive if chaotic unity. Something real is happening—China is throwing off, one by one, the foreign shackles which have bound her. The tupans and tuchuns, generals and marshals, prime ministers and presidents who rule various parts of the ancient empire hate one another, but toward the foreigners they feel alike.

Canton ceased turning over the salt taxes of that province for the service of the foreign debt, to which they are pledged, away back in 1918. Local chieftains have occasionally done as much, and the warlord of Tientsin, favorite of the foreigners though he was, followed suit a few months ago. And now even Sun Chuang-fong, the last hope of those who fear the progress of the Southern "Red" armies, has announced that the salt revenues of his provinces will be needed for his military campaign. Canton has gone further still, issuing a new schedule of domestic taxes which the foreigners say is a violation of the treaties; and the Peking Government has announced that it will not renew its treaty with Belgium, which the foreigners also say it has no right to do. But foreign complaints are unavailing. China's very chaos is an asset in this crisis. An old Chinese proverb says that you cannot hang a jellyfish upon a nail. The foreign Powers had their chance to modify the treaties by mutual agreement; but instead they hemmed and hawed, and agreed to move a single step if the Chinese would move miles, and out of all the conferences came—except for the rendition of the Shanghai Mixed Court, where even the treaties gave the foreigners no excuse for their action—just exactly nothing.

A diplomatic training, it happens, is a poor background for dealing with a continental revolution. It prepares men to study texts and precedents, to live by the letter of the law—and in China today an ancient civilization is slipping over a precipice, and the rules by which the West had learned to deal with it are sliding too. The old treaties still exist on paper; but the conditions out of which they were born have gone forever, and there is no Western-minded government in China to devise forms to bridge the gap. The diplomats know that the old status is gone—that the regime under which foreigners dictate China's customs schedules, collect her taxes, police her rivers with their foreign navies, and govern her greatest commercial cities can at best hardly survive another decade—but they do not know enough to make concessions gracefully. Instead, they protest every violation of the old code, stand on rights that cannot be enforced, and end by making themselves as futilely ridiculous as the puppet governments which, unnoticed, succeed one another at Peking. Every tuchun in China knows that he can afford to ignore their warnings, and step by step, without concert but with striking unanimity, they act accordingly.

Some of the backward-looking business men of the treaty ports persist in demanding that the Powers follow a "strong" policy, and there is always danger that Great Britain, Japan, or France may heed the demand, and drag the United States with it into what may well become an inter-race or inter-continental war. (Japan, in such matters, still identifies herself with the white race.) The "incident" at Wanhsien, 1,200 miles up the Yangtze, where British warships bombarded the city, killing thousands, would with any people but the Chinese have been the signal for massacres in revenge—and the West, which demands both blood and money revenge when its own nationals are killed in Eastern countries, should realize that such massacres would be only application by the mob of what it applies as the ethics of diplomacy. A correspondent in Hankow, 600 miles up the Yangtze, opposite Wuchang, which the Canton troops are still besieging, sends us a clipping listing the foreign warships then in port. These include one Italian, two French, and four British gunboats; a Japanese gunboat and a destroyer; an American gunboat and two American destroyers. This in the heart of China, six hundred miles from the sea. And reinforcements have since been sent. Mr. Butts of the Chicago Daily News reports that "the anti-foreign wave is sweeping down the Yangtze toward Shanghai"; Mr. Millard of the New York Times notes a new popularity for the Cantonese, who thumb their noses at the foreigners. Wherever a foreign gunboat sits in Chinese waters the Chinese coolie begins to see another irritating symbol of the treaties which claim for the white men superior rights and privileges. At any moment a spark may light in the international powder-magazine. Yet the newspapers of October 10 report the arrival of more American warships in Chinese waters, bringing our total to fifty-two!

Do the people of America, who annually send ten million dollars to support Christian missionaries in China, care for the people whom they seek to "save"? Do they want "Christianity" to be identified in Chinese eyes with the guns and shells of foreign warships? If they do not want their years of work to go for naught, it behooves them to make their influence felt in Washington and to force our Government to abandon its unholy alliance with the Powers which do not know that China in 1926 is not the China of Boxer days. China, for all its civil wars, knows what it wants of the foreigners; does America know what it wants of China?

A Little Poetry

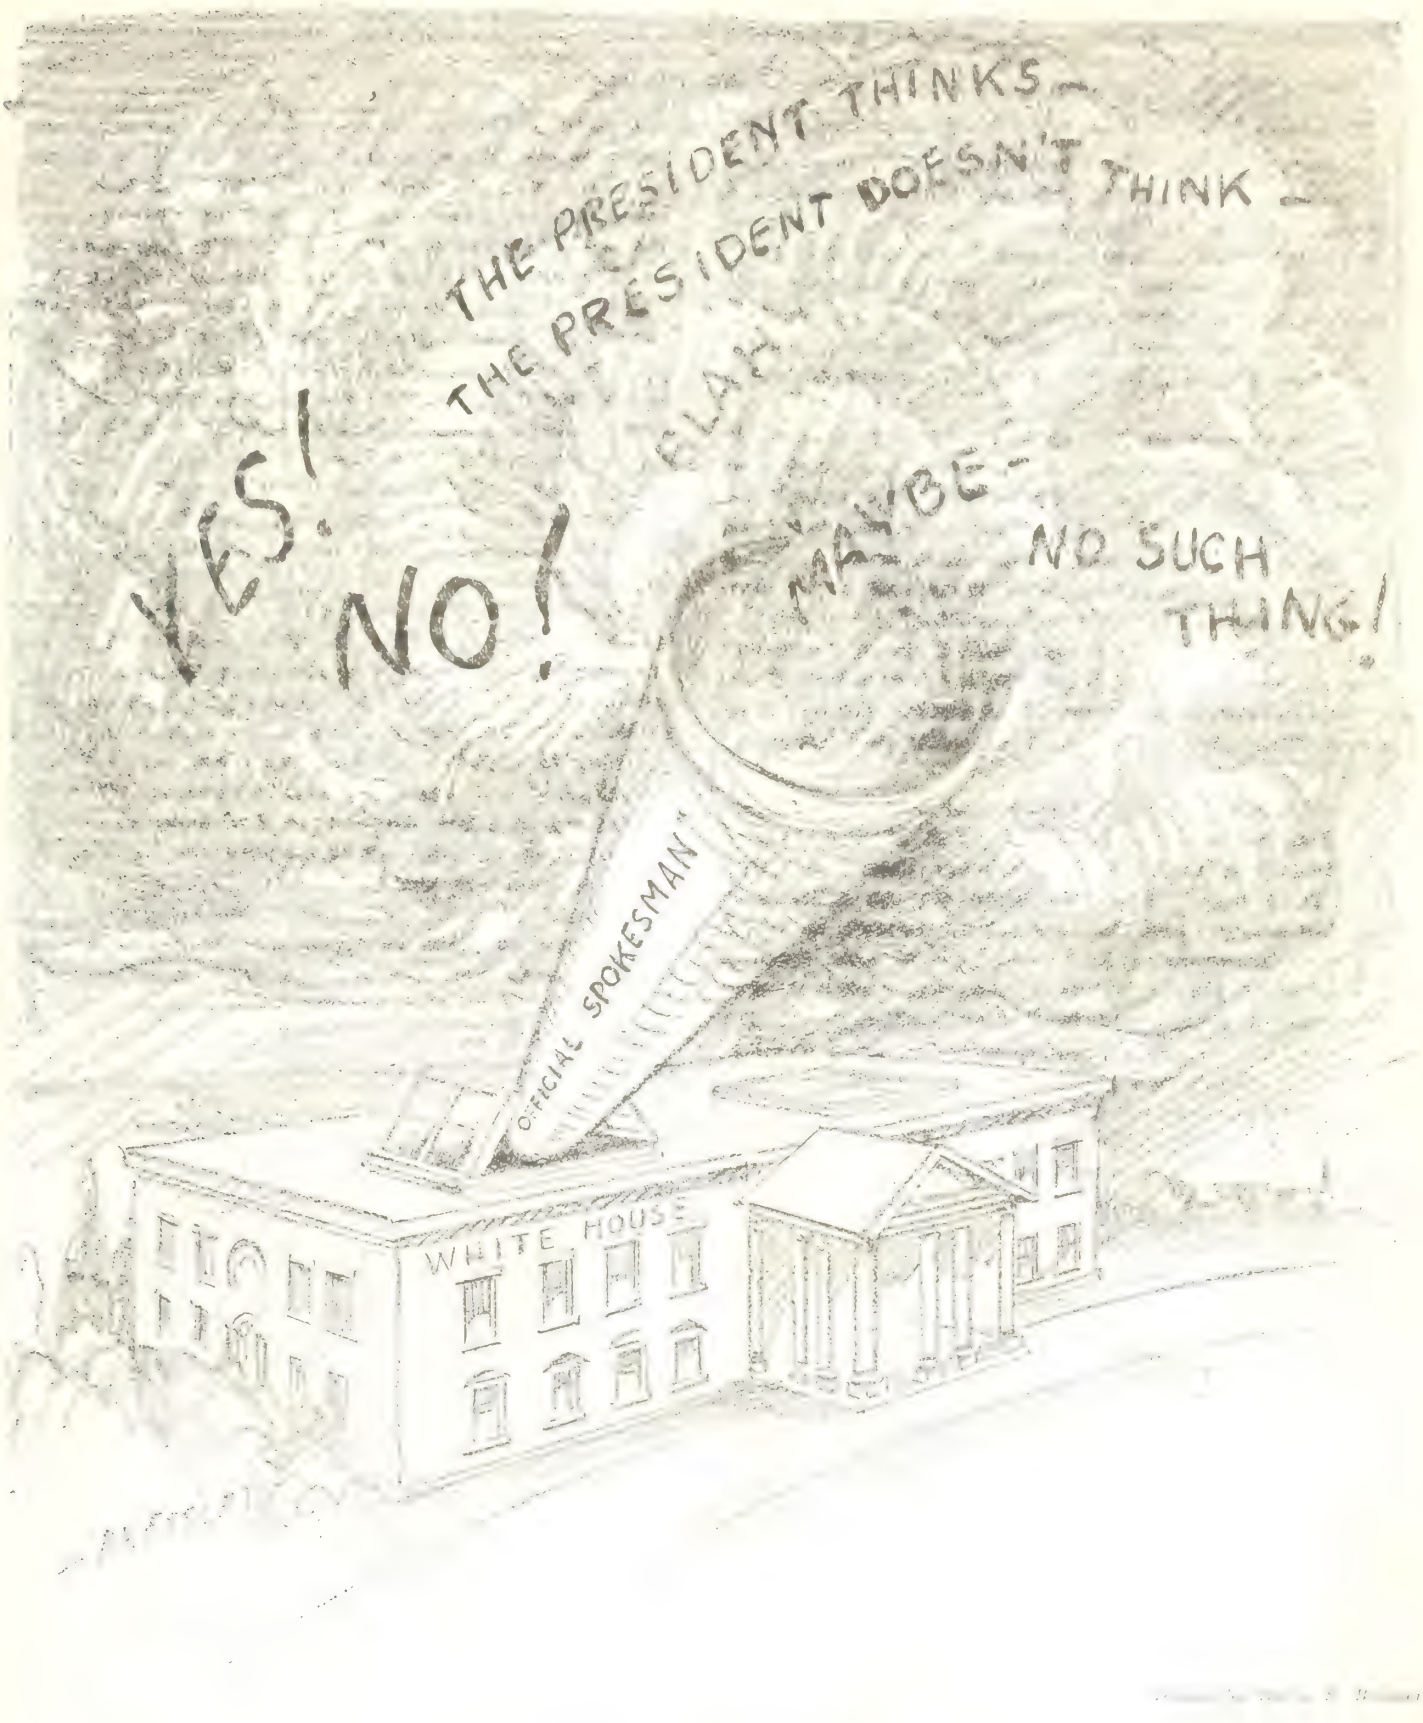
PUBLISHERS have been heard to say, when they said anything about poetry at all, that a little of it goes farther with the public than a lot of it goes. Some of them would like to stop issuing it altogether, for, except in rare cases, it pays badly. A sale of five hundred copies of even an excellent volume is considered a decent sale, and many good volumes, it seems, get nowhere. Reviewers who wish to clear their shelves of books which it is not necessary to keep will toss books of verse into the ashcan rather than waste steps to carry them to the second-hand dealer—who shrugs his shoulders at sight of the thin things and, if for some reason he has to accept them in order to get the reviewer's surplus novels or biographies too, either stacks them in front of his store at ten cents apiece or shovels them back into the alley for the refuse-man next morning to take away.

But publishers have been heard to say that a little poetry may go far. They urge the poet who comes with his manuscript to reduce its size by half. The public, they know, reads poetry; it does not, they believe, read poets.

It will absorb almost any number of anthologies wherein each poet is represented by half a dozen pieces or fewer; it clips apt bits of verse out of newspapers or magazines and pastes them in scrapbooks; it memorizes what it comes upon by chance; it keeps some of the more likable things astonishingly alive. It does not care, however, say the publishers, for the poet as a person, as an artist, as an entity. So the man with the manuscript must ride home and trim the hoofs of his Pegasus. Poetry which does not step lightly takes very few steps.

Two publishing-houses in the United States hope to make something of this situation by issuing poetry in paper-bound pamphlets selling at twenty-five cents each. "The Augustan Books of Modern Poetry" (Stokes) have so far given us portions of Shelley, Keats, Tagore, Chesterton, Belloc, and Robert Bridges; "The Pamphlet Poets" (Simon and Schuster) begin with Carl Sandburg, Elinor Wylie, Whitman, Emerson, Nathalia Crane, and "H. D.," and intend to go on with Edna Millay, Longfellow, Poe, Emily Dickinson, Witter Bynner, and Conrad Aiken. Eight or ten pamphlets in each series are expected to appear each year, so that a good deal of ground, if all goes well, will be surveyed. We look forward with interest to the outcome of both enterprises, and hope that the publishers involved will tell us frankly, at the end of three years, how business is. There are numerous possibilities. The total number of persons who buy and read poetry may be increased. Acquaintance with thirty pages of Shelley, Marvell, Sandburg, or Emily Dickinson may stimulate an appetite for the poet's collected works. What would be more interesting still, changes may be forced in the marketing of new verse. The author who goes to the publisher with his manuscript may henceforth be met with a request for thirty pages only—and if that sample of his poetry sells, perhaps more later.

We shall see, then, how far a little poetry will go. But there is a sense in which a little poetry can be a dangerous thing. The scheme we have described falls perilously into line with Poe's famous definition of the poem as something which is short. One of the troubles with modern poetry is that it grows painfully concentrated—whereas much of the good poetry of the world has been easy and ample. Even today we are not without our ample poets. We wonder, for instance, just how much thirty pages of Whitman will accomplish. Whitman needed space, and there will hardly be enough room in the "Pamphlet Poets" for him to turn around in. Emily Dickinson can be sampled, of course, within the compass of her allotment; but only sampled. Though she wrote brief things, she wrote many of them; and all of them, or nearly all of them, are necessary for a comprehension of what she was getting at, for there were many things she had to utter with her short breath. And nothing could be more absurd than a state of mind which would refuse a hearing to writers with the dimension of Robinson Jeffers and William Ellery Leonard. "Tamar" and "Two Lives," the outstanding volumes of poetry published here last year, were not pamphlet stuff; they had length of body and height of reach such as only unlimited space can encourage. But we need not grow serious. The fortunes of poetry are singularly even, year in and year out. When the major poet of his decade comes along we undoubtedly shall make provision for him. Meanwhile we may welcome any new vehicle, even though it be a small one, for the communication of song.



Watch Massachusetts

MASSACHUSETTS, on January 1, will begin an experiment in compulsory automobile-liability insurance. More than a score of State legislatures toyed with the idea last year, and it will come up again in most of them this winter; Massachusetts leads the way.

The word "compulsory" is in disrepute these days, but in a traffic jam compulsion becomes necessary. Automobile-drivers do not ask freedom to travel on the left side of the road on a bad curve; license-plates, horns, headlights, tail-lights, brakes are only a part of the compulsion to which they freely submit.

Massachusetts' new law makes the protection of a car by liability insurance or bond a prerequisite to the granting of a license. It recognizes that society gives the car-owner a special privilege in permitting him to roam the streets with a dangerous machine, and in exchange for this franchise the owner must guarantee to replace life or property values injured by careless operation of his machine. Most motorists have hitherto considered liability insurance a luxury. Less than a third of American car-owners have thought it of sufficient importance to purchase. Yet millions of the cars which crowd our streets are operated by owners or instalment-buyers with no financial resources whatever. When any boy with $50 or $100 can purchase some wreck on wheels and proceed to enjoy life the problem is important. American automobiles kill twenty thousand people every year, and the record of injuries looks like a war report. When the car-owner has tangible resources or an insurance policy the sufferers may get some compensation, but the only satisfaction to be gained from a bankrupt or unprotected driver is the debtor's cell, poor recompense for an injured worker's family. Why should one man, enjoying a luxury beyond his means—and an automobile is certainly that to a man who cannot pay for the damage he may do with it—be allowed to wander dangerously over the good roads and streets for which even pedestrian taxpayers have to pay?

The only effective protest against compulsory-liability insurance comes from the insurance companies. They send forth volumes of propaganda against it, chiefly inspired by their fear of state insurance. Their only argument, apart from cheap talk about paternalism, is the claim that when automobile-owners are protected by insurance they will dash about the streets like reckless maniacs, filling the hospitals with the dead and wounded. If fear of financial responsibility were really all that kept automobile drivers in leash the drivers might better abolish these four-wheeled weapons altogether. As a matter of fact, universal automobile insurance is more likely to make the roads safer. The insurance companies will be stimulated to work for more careful licensing of drivers; and automobile-owners, fearful lest their own premiums mount, will have an added interest in supporting such a campaign. Careful investigation by the Massachusetts officials, indeed, has led them to work out a rate schedule somewhat lower than the prevailing rates for liability insurance. And when the Massachusetts experiment is well under way we may expect the insurance companies to turn somersaults as they have done before—the companies which fought compulsory workmen's-compensation insurance most bitterly are now campaigning for its adoption in the few States which are still without it.

Washington's Smoke Nuisance

Is Germany Disarmed?

By LOUIS FISCHER

Berlin, August 31

IS Germany disarmed? Professor Quidde, well-known German pacifist, answers Yes, and a moment later No. "Germany," he writes, "is disarmed, completely disarmed for the purposes of a European war." On the other hand, "The political organizations of the Right are in possession of munitions, and these munitions, however unimportant they be as far as the outside world is concerned, present a serious menace to domestic peace. They are a danger to the republic."

But Franz Carl Endres, a German officer attached to the Turkish G. H. Q. during the war, who has written on military strategy for the "Encyclopædia Britannica," demands to know "why the Königsberg fortress has been reinforced with fifty-three concrete buttresses. . . . A strongly fortified Königsberg is of value only for a German attack through the Polish corridor." And F. W. Foerster, a German pacifist who finds it more convenient to live in Switzerland, declares bluntly that when Count Bernstorff announced in Geneva that Germany was totally disarmed "the German diplomat was the mouthpiece of a gigantic lie."

Dr. Foerster insists that there has been no "psychological disarmament" in Germany. But in this respect his Vaterland is certainly no different than any other country in Europe. The new name for an alliance is "neutrality treaty," and the race for armaments, in which talk about disarmament is becoming a chronic feature, continues as of yore. "When is the next war coming?" is being asked everywhere in Europe, and although the Powers may not be sufficiently recuperated from the last fracas nor well-enough equipped with newly invented weapons for the next, we are marching toward a war as directly and as blindly as in the first decade of the century.

Passing from psychology to practical armaments, and discussing the Reichswehr—the German standing army—Dr. Foerster says:

> General von Seeckt and his friends know quite definitely that their organization conforms to the newest conditions of war. They know that the neighboring states, still burdened with an expensive outmoded military apparatus, are far behind Germany, which has not disarmed. But she has armed herself in a different way; she possesses an elite army of unusually high training [the term of service in the Reichswehr is twelve years] which, with the aid of civil Fascist organizations, gains ever greater control over the entire population and can therefore elastically adapt the mass of the people to new war methods.

Many of Foerster's assertions find support in a detailed study of the Reichswehr's organization issued by the German League of the Rights of Man. Compiled by E. J. Gumbel, of the philosophical faculty of Heidelberg, and by Major General Schoenaich, who turned pacifist after twenty-seven years in the old German army, the publication arrives at the conclusion that Germany's present armed force is a "shadow" of the pre-1914 imperial army in that its subdivisions and distribution throughout the country are a replica in miniature of the ante-bellum arrangement. The Reichswehr, moreover, is analyzed as a cadre so constituted as to enable it easily to accept into its ranks many times its own number of men. The recruits are available—Quidde puts their strength at 2,000,000—and have received training either surreptitiously in the Reichswehr at government expense or in Racialist-Nationalist associations such as the Consul, Stahlhelm, Werwolf, Viking, Olympia, Young German Order, etc.

The authors of this brochure admit that the "shadow" which they have detected would be of no significance in a large European war. Here they differ with Foerster and one is inclined to credit their judgment rather than his. "But," they add, "it is important first for small developments (against Poland, say, or Czecho-Slovakia), and then for the suppression of every political opposition in Germany."

The Reichswehr, the nucleus of the "shadow," is limited by the Versailles Treaty to a strength of 100,000. It counts more officers and non-commissioned officers than privates. And it is anti-republican. Dr. Gessler, Minister of National Defense, admitted in a speech in the Reichstag on May 28, 1925, that his army was not "an army of republicans" and intimated that the reason lay in the circumstance that the Reichswehr had been constructed on the basis of the old, pre-war officer corps. The German army of today is the haven of refuge of the remnants of imperial Prussian militarism.[1] We have direct and circumstantial evidence to prove that before being enrolled in the Reichswehr men are examined as to their political views. The final decision as to the fate of the applicant lies with the regimental, sometimes with the company, commanders. Outspoken friends of the republic find the door closed.

Theodor Wolff, the editor of the Berliner Tageblatt, has even advocated the abolition of the Reichswehr "as unsuitable to a republican state" and the substitution of a popular militia in place of an ominous military caste. But the professional army system is imposed by the Versailles Treaty. This Versailles-born Reichswehr is an expensive affair. Its budget figures are: as compared with 984 millions for the Kaiser's army in 1913. If it be necessary to remember that the present mark is worth only 60 pre-war pfennigs we must also consider that one-fifth of the Germany of 1913 is now either ceded to the Allies or occupied by Allied troops, and that many sectors of the German frontier may not be fortified. And when Dr. Gessler argues that "the Versailles Treaty provides for three cavalry divisions, we would be happy to have less," he mistakes the fact. The treaty merely says that Germany may not have more than seven infantry and three cavalry divisions.

1924	251	million marks,
1925	410	" "
1926	481	" "

An impartial expert would say that the German army could defeat Poland in a war if no other Power intervened. There are, in fact, nationalistic circles who would feel their life's mission fulfilled on the day such a struggle broke out. The age of localized, two-nation conflicts, however, is probably gone forever. The European organism is so delicately attuned, its several parts are so closely interlaced by economic interests and political pacts, that the slightest disorder in one section would throw the whole body out of gear. And armies will be mere auxiliaries in the war of the future. Have we not been told that the chemical laboratory, the wireless station, the airplane, and industrial capacity and economic resistance will play the chief roles in coming struggles among nations? Even that most efficient nuisance and busybody, the Allied Military Control Commission, can no more prevent Germany from making preparations in such fields than it can induce the German national mind to accept the idea of general disarmament while the whole world continues to arm. Germany, then, is an important factor in the problem of European disarmament.

[1] In September Prince William, son of the ex-Crown Prince, illegally participated in the Reichswehr maneuvers. Minister Geßler and the entire Cabinet demanded and, on October 5, obtained that President Hindenburg accept the proffered resignation of General von Seeckt, who was responsible. —Editor The Nation.

All Europe is arming, many nations with greater speed and intensity than Germany. None is privileged to begin casting stones. But whereas the war closed on a ruined German army, and subsequently Germany lost her navy; whereas a corps of detectives, operating under the name of Allied Control Commission, sought to unearth secret stores of arms and ammunition, and to dismantle all factories fitted for armament manufacture, this most ambitious international effort to reduce a state to military impotency has failed.

The foisting of a Reichswehr instead of a militia on Germany helped toward the failure; the Ruhr invasion was an impetus toward the formation and strengthening of illegal, chauvinist, semi-military formations; the humiliating tactics of the Entente kept alive the spirit of hate; the failure of the Allies to destroy Germany's chemical and steel industries contributed; but, finally, no nation living in the armed camp which is Europe today could fail to want to arm itself.

If Europe had wished to disarm, it might have seized the opportunity in 1919 or 1920 when Germany was practically a military zero and when she could not dream of rearming herself. Nothing was done then, and now it may be too late.

France and Her Politicians

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Baden-Baden, September 20

"POINCARÉ can save the franc, but he won't." This is the verdict of competent Englishmen, Americans, Frenchmen, and Germans with whom I have talked since Poincaré formed his cabinet of ex-premiers. They point out that France's financial situation is not hopeless; that her debt is not nearly so large, if reckoned in pre-war francs, as people suppose; that there is still practically no unemployment; that American tourists alone left $220,000,000 in France last year and will leave more this year; again that the depreciation of the franc has helped France's export trade and has made foreign competition less to be feared; that the practical ending of the Moroccan war has curtailed that drain upon the budget. Yet the verdict still is that Poincaré will not save the franc.

Why? Primarily, it is said, because he has not pegged the franc, because he has deprived himself of foreign banker aid by failing to put through the ratification of the American and British debt agreements, and because the new taxes will not result in materially larger collections—many Frenchmen say that if they paid the taxes for which they are liable they would have nothing left, and they will not consent to suffer. It is held that the immediate announcement of a pegging of the franc at 25 or 36 or 40 to the dollar would have gone far to stabilize it, particularly if it were known that the gold reserve of the Bank of France would be drawn upon. But the eminent financiers with whom I and other journalists have talked are convinced that Poincaré has overstayed his hour, has lost the psychological and financial moment. His economies in the various government departments, his cutting the corps of army officers by 4,000 temporary and permanent men, his abolition of 176 sub-prefecture officials, his orders as to food restriction—all of these impress no one as serious or likely to make any considerable dent in the budget.

Despite the marked improvement in the franc's position the best-informed financiers believe that this is only a temporary phenomenon and that by November Poincaré will be once more face to face with a serious exchange situation despite the fact that he has no large internal debt payments to meet until the new year. There is a rumor that a life-line will be thrown to him in the form of a loan by Dutch bankers, privately indorsed by some distinguished American financial firms, with the cognizance and approval of the Treasury Department in Washington, but as yet there is nothing to confirm this. It is known, too, that the Germans would like to help stabilize the franc—upon profitable terms—not only because of the prestige it would give them but because the collapse is the most serious danger now confronting the reparations officials and the German Government. It is, of course, quite possible that the conversation between Briand and Stresemann at Thoiry will result in Germany's paying to France for the things she wishes most such a price—the freeing of Germany from all foreign garrisons, abandonment of the Saar plebiscite, the return of Eupen and Malmedy, a colonial mandate, etc., etc.—that the result will be a tremendous gain for French finance. Yet even that will not save her.

If Poincaré wins some financial stability and a further delay in facing the inevitable in this way, his will be a lucky star. The truth is that on his actual record he does not deserve such help. He has not followed the program of the Economic Commission; he has adopted only some of the Caillaux reforms. With every day there is increasing doubt as to his Parliament's accepting either the British or American debt agreements; the latter stands no chance of acceptance without reservations. The tables are to be turned on the United States Senate—the American device of reservations is to be utilized, with what result in Washington anyone can guess for himself.

But by all means let us give even a Poincaré his due. In June men in high official positions were privately saying that September would be a good month for tourists to keep out of France. They talked of another dictatorship in Europe—one of the best known of the English war statesmen said the other day that within two years there would be only one democracy left on the Continent as the net result of the war to safeguard democracy. They even speculated as to how the French dictator would appear, and refused to alter their opinions when you asked them to name anyone who could assume the role. "A dictator walks in as unexpectedly as did Primo de Rivera," was their usual reply. But September has come and France is as peaceful as Delaware or Ohio—one could as soon expect a rising in the streets of New York or Philadelphia. As the summer flood of English and American tourists recedes, such friction as there was decreases—how, by the way, would New Yorkers like to have about 500,000 foreigners overrun their streets so as to make French and German more often heard on Fifth Avenue than English? France at the middle of September is quiet, hard-working, minding its own business. Doubtless the French do not like to notice that the franc has begun to fall again, but they are happy that it is no worse. The summer breathing spell has been welcome. The tremendous crowd which greeted with cheers Briand's arrival in Paris from Geneva shows that the public is not indifferent to what has happened, that it is ready to bury the hatchet with its oldest and once most dangerous enemy.

When the French Parliament meets there will again be heard the demand that the national legislature be done away with or hamstrung as Mussolini has done to the Italian. We shall hear echoes of this in the United States. It is the fashion to say that parliamentary government has everywhere broken down. Has it really? Or are the parliamentarians rather than the system to blame?

Idols Behind Altars

By ANITA BRENNER

I

THE old conflict between church and state in Mexico having come to a head, much foolish babble has been emitted about a "religious uprising" in consequence of "religious persecution." But, aside from the economic consequences of an economic-political struggle, nothing has occurred beyond some rioting in places where the church or chapel of some locally revered image has been garrisoned with soldiers to prevent thievery during the absence of the striking priests. The apathy of the millions of native Roman Catholics to arm themselves and fight the battle of the church excites comment only outside of Mexico, where church and Catholicism often seem identical and the doubtful orthodoxy of the Indians a sensational revelation. This is not, however, the suddenly discovered and cheaply mystic "return of Quetzalcoatl." For Quetzalcoatl, like the Mexican Indian, is in no need of resurrection; he has always enjoyed fairly good health.

Quetzalcoatl, Jesus Christ, Coatlicue, the Lady of Guadalupe, Huitzilopochtli, Tlaloc, St. James—they are all blurred together and often identified with one another. Consciously and unconsciously, they are all accepted with equal reverence. No one can say just where the line of differentiation is to be drawn. There is many a secret temple that no Christian priest has ever penetrated; in the yearning Catholic soul of the Indian worshiper many a secret corner remains unbaptized. The idols squat upon their altars, in mountain caves, inside of churches, under and within the very crucifixes, with their placid, enigmatic smiles, and tributes at their feet. Flowers, fruit, bright ribbons and papers, incense, hot food, the hearts of animals, and, it is whispered, the hearts of men. Dances, ceremonies, religious pilgrimages, performed in the name of Christ and also to Texcatlipoca—these are things any discreet stranger who has eyes may see.

On the top of an out-of-the-way mountain, not far from the capital of Mexico, two or three of us out for a gallop discovered a little stone chapel. It was made entirely of pieces of volcanic rock, heaped on top of one another. Across the door hung a white fringe of the tender strips from the heart of maguey leaves. Inside there was a stone cross with a most unorthodox face carved in the middle. All around, on the rocks, were little pools of thickish water, full of lumps of copal, the native incense; bunches of dried flowers, and, on the edges, candle grease and burned-out wicks. The bushes were looped to one another with streamers of white lace or muslin, and there were similar streamers on the cross. At a little distance from the chapel we found a wide, cleared space, just like a fairy-story witches' ring. On the surface of the earth were fragments of clay sculptures, all alike and of apparently contemporary clay. They were torsos and sexual symbols of the goddess of fertility. We were interrupted in our work of exploration by a mumbling Indian charcoal-burner, who told us that the neighborhood was dangerous.

"A soldier," he stated, "who came up here once fell down at the foot of the hill and broke his neck."

In the patio of a church in an Indian village, also not far from the capital, I found a fairly large stone idol. Its head had once been broken off and placed on again. Around the base of its pedestal grew calabazas, the plant identified in Indian folk-tales as especially the property of the rain or nature gods. On the calabaza leaves I found traces of dried candle grease, of copal, and, scattered around, bunches of red flowers tied with red and green yarn, the colors of the nature gods. In the courtyard itself was a deep, square pool, stagnant. This was a village in which there is no water. I asked one of the Indians if the pool were a reservoir. He said No; nobody drank water out of it. They went to a spring in the mountains, about a mile away, or got it from a shallow pool in the plaza. I asked him what the stone figure was, and he said it was an idol. He also said it belonged to the priest, who had it there "just for curiosity, to look at on Sundays when he came to say mass."

During the celebration of the Virgen de Guadalupe, whose shrine occupies the same place as did that of Tinonantzin, the mother of the gods and whose fiesta is made in the same season as was that of Tinonantzin and some of the nature gods, who also haunted those particular hills, the Indians dance not only in the churchyard but at the very foot of the Lady's altar. I once asked them why they stopped at sundown. "In order to let the Little Mother sleep," was the answer.

There is a village near the city of Queretaro where idols are still made, a friend of mine assures me. The place is famous for its witch-doctors. This same friend tells me that once a native woman of that place had an idol, and she wanted the priest to bless it. My friend is a devout Catholic.

"She knew the priest would not be likely to approve of the idol," he explains, "so this woman put the idol, which was not very large, in a vase of flowers and took the flowers to have the priest bless them. Which he did."

II

"The Indians are not Christians," says Dr. Nicolás Leon, head of the department of anthropology in the National Museum of Mexico, who has spent many years among the native peoples. "They do not understand what the priests say, and they do not want to understand."

But an Aztec woman, whose village and family preserve to an unusual extent the old traditions, told me it was this way: "Before the conquest the idols were adored. They were worshiped with offerings and were given to eat the hearts of children. This was done whenever they wanted to ask for a miracle. The idols would then do their miracles. They worshiped them as much as if they were God. As if they were all God. They took them many things, and fruits, and incense, and copal, and they prayed to them like we do to the saints.

"The saints came in," she continued, "with the conquest. They destroyed the idols, and the belief in images and saints began to be used. The Popocatepetl made a great eruption because he was jealous. But he is contented now, and asleep. This explosion killed many decent people." ("Decent" is the Indian description of a man in city clothes.)

Her version is significant. Today the feasts that were made to the wind and rain gods are made to the wind and rain saints; the dances of the harvest goddess have become the dances of the miraculous harvest Virgen. One miraculous Christ is the patron of the conjurers. It is all very simple, done with the simplicity of long habit; for the Indian has no need of comic-opera gesture to reassure himself. It is habit perhaps fearful, perhaps meaningless, to many. Of the meaning there is no proof. There are only tales.

I heard a few in Milpa Alta. Milpa Alta is a tiny village in the Valley of Mexico. It kneels at the foot of a series of mountains the nearest of which is the volcanic Teutli, revered as the lord spirit who watches over the village. A gray, harsh, sorrowful place. The narrow rock streets stumble toward the maize-fields, stoop back to themselves and down. And with the night Milpa Alta becomes a thick, uncompromising, menacing gray, with splotches of black. There is no water. After two days—picturesque, fascinating, but uncomfortable and surely unhygienic days—my courtesy weakened and I asked Manuela-Tzin, my old Indian hostess, why there was no water. She finished lighting her daily candle to the Holy Virgin, who occupied the niche above my straw sleeping-mat, and came and squatted very close to me.

"There is no water because the lord Teutli will not permit it," she said slowly. "We have only the small amount to drink that we keep in the fountain in the plaza after the rains. This comes from the country of the Virgen. But neither she nor the Old Man Teutli will allow water, because they say that if we have it we will prosper, and that means that strangers will come to Milpa Alta and cause it damages." (A stranger is any man who is not an Indian. A city Mexican is quite as much a foreigner as is an American.) "They will cause damages," said Manuela-Tzin, "with their money and their machines, and the Virgen and the Old Man Teutli have agreed that they do not want noise or automobile accidents here."

Manuela-Tzin, fumbling at the fire with her bony arm, dropped suddenly from her erratic Spanish into the native Nahuea: "You may not have heard about the three men who came to Milpa Alta. They asked, like you, where the water was. We said, There is no water.

" 'How, there is no water? Certainly there is water!' and they lifted up that heavy rock over there in the plaza, and the water came out and ran in the streets. We drank of it and took some home. They said to us and they said to the witches: 'If you want water always, you must take two little boys and two little girls, four bastard children, and give them to the water. Throw them in his mouth and he will swallow them, and he will then give you water.'

"But the lord Teutli forbids it," insisted Manuela-Tzin. "He says that he will erupt if strangers come to Milpa Alta. The Virgen, Tinonantzin, our Little Mother of Jesus, she says also she won't have it. She says she would go away to her own country behind the Popocatepetl. And she would not come back. And, anyway, we couldn't find four bastard children."

III

I told the story, faithfully as it is here, to Dr. Beyer, one of the leading archaeologists of Mexico, and he quoted the scientist Lumholtz, writing in 1905: "Father Hunt Cortes, who has lived many years among these Indians [he refers to the Nahuas or Aztecs around Mexico City, in the same district where is Milpa Alta], told me that still today children are sacrificed to Tlaloc, that they throw them in the lake of Texcoco, and that the same custom is observed in Xochimilco and in Chalco."

"And I wish," said Dr. Beyer, soberly, "I wish I knew how much truth there is in the Tlaloc stories I have been hearing lately." I heard them too. Tlaloc was the chief of the rain gods, and the season of his sacrifices and those of the Tlaloque, his brothers and sisters, began in late December, just before the rains, and lasted until the rains were well in—January, February, March, April. Then began sacrifices so that they might not send too much. The great shrine of this god and his sister, Macuil Xochitl, the goddess of spring, was near the village of Tlaloc, also on the high central plateau. "I have found," said Dr. Beyer, "in the woods and caves around there curious heaps of stones, newly built, with wreaths of flowers and ribbons, sometimes with small animals on them."

I went with the same story to Dr. Leon, and he said, warningly: "Folk-lore is not a healthy amateur sport for unoccupied young ladies."

But nothing has ever happened. The Indians are naive, gentle people. They will share their last corn-cake with you, they will give you a place to sleep. You are safe, as safe as in your metropolitan apartment. And almost as powerless as if you were in your metropolitan apartment, if you are looking to learn the things strangers do not know. The Indians do not welcome literary or scientific investigation. To them it is bare of pompous title and becomes impolite prying. They will speak little about themselves, rarely about their beliefs. If they like you, they will want to feed you all the time. That is their only effort at communication. Their attitude, if persistently or stupidly questioned, becomes one of passive, suave idiocy. Occasionally they grow sullen. And when they are goaded into action their justice is swift, smooth, silent, terrible.

Not long ago, Dr. Beyer told me, it was rumored that a German youth went to Tlaloc, accompanied by two guides, on the scent of the Tlaloc and Macuil Xochitl suspicions.

"What is in the caves?" the Indians repeated his questions easily. "Oh, nothing, señor. Pretty flowers."

"What do we do in the caves?" They blinked slowly and scratched at the backs of their heads. "Why, nothing, señor. We are poor and must make corn grow in the fields. We cannot play in the caves."

"What is the big rock in the shape of a man? Why, señor, we don't know. Only the white people, educated like you, know about these things. They know everything. They in the United States, I have heard, are all educated and all rich. They eat white bread. There are so many people that, I have heard, soon the United States will go over into its neighbor, Russia, and take her lands."

"Russia is not next to the United States? Why, señor, truly I wish we had schools so we might know as much as you. But we are poor and ignorant little Indians, your servants, señor."

"Feasts in those caves? Oh, no," they all laughed together at the idea. "Those are things of the ancients. All of that passed with the revolution."

The young man procured a horse and went alone to the Tlaloc mountain, at whose foot lies the great stone monolith of that god. He gauged the time for the sacrifices accurately, basing himself on the chronicles of the early friars. He never returned.

"A young fellow with pale eyes, señor?" they said to inquiries. "Why, yes, señor, he passed our way. He told us that the United States are very rich and that soon they would take Russia to make more room." An old fellow snuffled wonderingly.

"Where did he go, señor? Pues, we do not know. Over there . . . " An arm gestured a vague half-circle. "Over the mountains . . . "

"Do you think, señor, that the Americanos from the United States will come to take our lands too?"

The Socialization of Medicine

By JOSEPH KRIMSKY

A TOPIC of constant and serious discussion wherever medical men foregather is the prevalent and fast-growing abuse of dispensaries and hospitals by patients of means. Hospital authorities seek to impress their donors with the tremendous volume of work accomplished in their institutions and they do not bother seriously with investigating the financial status of their applicants. The patients follow the human instinct of getting something for nothing and the doctors fall over one another in the scramble for hospital and dispensary appointments. Meanwhile, as more and more new institutions are erected, the situation is becoming aggravated from year to year.

What is the remedy?

I have studied, talked, and written about this matter for years and I have come to the following conclusion: Hospitals and dispensaries must be redeemed from the thraldom of charity and placed on the same basis as public schools, high schools, and State-controlled universities. Institutional treatment of disease is becoming more and more the dominant factor in modern medicine. There we have the scientifically equipped laboratories, the splendid operating rooms, the costly and complicated X-ray and other equipment, the spacious and sanitary wards, the system and facilities of the modern clinic, the cooperation and team-work of the various special departments.

Take the rapidly spreading custom of undergoing periodic examinations as a means of preventing the insidious onset of disease. The wealthy patient runs the gantlet of internist, oculist, neurologist, X-rayologist, dentist, laryngologist, and other specialists; the pyramiding accumulation of bills works no hardship on his purse. The very poor patient goes to the clinic and gets the same series of examinations, frequently by the same or similar experts, and it does not cost him a penny. The middle-class patient, and he constitutes the vast bulk of our clientele, either sacrifices some of his bank account and is referred from specialist to specialist, paying as he goes along, or he sacrifices some of his self-respect and patronizes the charity clinic.

More and more as time goes on you find the middle-class citizen in the latter category. His answer is that private treatment, which today means treatment by different specialists, is getting beyond his means. Formerly his wife was delivered of her babies by the family doctor for a very moderate fee. Now she must have a specialist, an obstetrician, who charges a royal ransom. So she goes into the hospital ward and has her specialist for nothing or for a merely nominal fee, besides receiving the benefits of modern hospital care and highly trained nursing for herself and her new-born baby.

When the middle-class citizen was a boy he had his tonsils taken out by the old reliable family doctor for a mere pittance, but now Jimmy's tonsils and adenoids require the services of a specialist whose fee is a month's income. So Jimmy goes to the hospital, pays for a night's lodging, and the same specialist does the work for him and for fifteen other children in one afternoon without charging a cent.

The specialist is thrusting the family physician into desuetude. He is making him as obsolete as the one-hoss shay. But the specialist has had to pay heavily for his training. He has a high office-overhead. The private patient must pay for all that. The hospital patient in the wards pays a nominal fee or nothing. The dispensary patient, and his name is legion, pays nothing also. The private patient must foot the bill. The rich man does it easily, if not gladly. The salaried man, the pater familias of moderate income, the decent wage-earner—they also do it until an unusually prolonged or serious illness, or a spell of unemployment or business depression or perhaps a strike drives them to the doors of the charity dispensary or hospital. After that they become regular patrons. They get the best service for nothing and no questions asked. So they send their friends and neighbors.

Cases like diphtheria, scarlet fever, measles, and other contagious diseases are best taken care of in hospitals. Operations, even of a minor nature, are coming to be performed almost exclusively in hospitals. The field of the private office is being more and more encroached upon. The progress and development of medicine and surgery and the numerous specialties lay stress on preventive measures and accentuate the institutional study and treatment of disease.

It is almost impossible nowadays to make a scientific diagnosis without the aid of the bacteriological and serological laboratory to be found in every well-equipped hospital. If you go into a ward and study the chart of the average patient you will be astounded at the large number of special examination reports incorporated in that chart. There is the X-ray and the blood test and the urine analysis and numerous other microscopical and chemical examinations, not to mention the long line of specialists who have investigated the patient's heart, lungs, kidneys, liver, eyes, and so on. All that is essential in the modern scientific diagnosis and treatment of disease. And all that can best and most thoroughly be accomplished in the well-equipped hospital and clinic.

I return to my original premise. The hospital and clinic must be transferred from the realm of charity and placed under the control and support of the community. An objection will be raised that this will involve politics, that it will mean paternalism. It happens that the same objection is raised and the same cry is sounded whenever public and private interests clash. The end that I seek to advocate is the socialization of medical institutions which means ultimately and inevitably the socialization of medicine, the dedication of the medical profession to public service as an agency of the community, the members of the profession serving as public officials into whose care is intrusted not alone the cure of the sick but the far vaster function of teaching health, preventing disease, and guiding the community from childhood to advanced old age in the path of right and healthy living.

I am aware that my colleagues will oppose this plan. So did Canute oppose the onward sweep of the tide. You cannot check the rush of your patients to the clinics and hospitals. You are giving them better and more efficient service there than you can in your private offices.

Why not make the community pay you for your services in decent salaries rather than try to take it out of a rapidly dwindling private clientele? Is it beneath your dignity to be officers and employees of the public? Some of you are timid about the influence of politics on such a plan. An organized medical profession aiming at scientific advancement and having the public interests as its goal will always have the public backing against any sinister political influences.

Will such a plan entail material sacrifices on the part of the medical profession? Recently I received a confidential report of a physicians' loan society and I was appalled at the number of needy doctors who, after many years of active and faithful practice, found it necessary to apply for loans in order to tide themselves over financial difficulties. Another report gives startling figures on the number of applicants to a home for aged physicians. The average income of the average doctor is hardly anything to boast of. He surely does not shine in the income-tax reports. He would be far better off with a regular and assured income, with the chance of promotion after certain periods of service, and with a commensurate pension on retirement.

I am not speaking for the high-priced practitioner. There will always be plenty of wealthy patients to support him in the luxury to which he and his wife have become accustomed. But you and I, representing 95 per cent of the medical fraternity, have nothing to lose and everything to gain by swapping the present competitive system of medical practice for a public-health service in which competition will be purely that of merit, in which our scientific work will not be hampered by the growing spirit of commercialism. Competition may be the life of trade, but medicine is a scientific pursuit that should be set free from the pursuit of the dollar. That can only be attained by doing for the health of the community what we have already partly done for its education. Hospitals and clinics should be civic, not charity institutions. The physicians working in these institutions should receive ample salaries, commensurate with their training and years of service. The right to specialize should be accorded only to those who have passed satisfactory tests and should not carry with it the privilege of more than a proportionate increase of income.

The domain of public health is gradually and irresistibly extending its scope and influence. Years ago it limited itself to vaccination and to the isolation of contagious cases. Today it cares for the teeth, eyes, and throats of our school-children. It opens cardiac clinics to stem the advance of heart disease. It carries on a successful warfare against consumption. It establishes centers for the treatment of venereal disease and other centers for the care and feeding of infants. It has entered the lists in the fight against cancer and diabetes.

The public is awakening to the realization that the great problems of preventive medicine can only be solved by the State, using the individual physician as its officer, its agent, its employee. And, furthermore, the public is learning that in order to fight and vanquish disease you require a great number of well-equipped research laboratories, you need the combined efforts of radiologist, diagnostician, clinician, surgeon, and trained nurse. You need team-work and competent supervision. All these essentials can be secured not in the office of the average, competitive, private practitioner, struggling against odds for a livelihood, but in the modern, efficient, thoroughly equipped hospital and clinic. That is the natural outgrowth of industrial, mechanical, and scientific advancement.

The public health is the foundation underlying the happiness and power of the people. Every man, woman, and child, poor or rich, is entitled and should be free to secure the very best care and treatment that medical science can administer. I am my brother's keeper, and his illness, his incapacity affects me and affects the entire community in a hundred different ways.

What about the cost of this system of socialized medicine which I am advocating? Can the State shoulder the burden? Well, the State is paying much more dearly now. Figure it all up in dollars and health. Add up the millions spent on quackery, on tons of health-undermining patent medicines, the hosts of victims of preventable diseases or of diseases curable if nipped in the bud by timely and scientific diagnosis and treatment. Count up the cost of reduplication and waste in private practice, in charity drives and charity management.

Philanthropy in the field of medical practice has had its innings. It has rendered wonderful humanitarian work. It has created institutions of incalculable public value. It has brought us to the era of state-control and state-maintenance. The pasteurized-milk stations started by a philanthropist years ago have now become the public-health centers of the community.

So shall it be with the charity clinics and hospitals. They shall become public-health centers dedicated to rich and poor alike for the maintenance of health and for the prevention and cure of disease. Today this will be decried as extremely radical. Twenty-five years hence it will be orthodox creed.

Are Farm-Land Speculators Entitled to Pity?

By BENJAMIN C. MARSH

THE agricultural plant of the nation is not only overdeveloped but grossly overcapitalized and most inefficiently run. This is not exclusively the fault of the individual farmers, and it is not the purpose of this article to assess blame but to appraise causes and suggest remedies.

There cannot be prosperity for agriculture so long as farmers continue to operate the present agricultural plant, even as inefficiently as at present, and with so relatively small a yield compared to the possibilities.

The McNary-Haugen bill, designed to enable farmers to dump the surplus of certain products abroad and apportion the losses pro rata on the producers so as to make the tariff effective on domestic consumption, would—if it worked—cause such a surplus of the crops involved as to break the market. It was quite natural that representatives of our great industrial competitor nations favored it, for the obvious reason that it would reduce materially the living costs of their factory workers.

L. C. Gray and O. E. Baker of the Agricultural Department, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, and Raphael Zon of the Forestry Service, after a most exhaustive study, reported in a publication of the department, "The Utilization of Our Lands for Crops, Pasture, and Forage," that with our present methods of production the maximum domestic population that can be maintained by the products of American soil is 350,000,000, "while on the basis of the German requirements in per capita acreage it would be about 519,000,000." Our present population is about 117,000,000. Representative William R. Wood of Indiana bluntly stated on the floor of the House this spring, after referring to the cheap land and generally cheaper money costs of production in Canada, Australia, the Argentine, and New Zealand: "Students of the agricultural economic situation have no hesitation in predicting that the American farmers' foreign markets are rapidly and surely reaching the vanishing-point because of these conditions." With present costs of production of most farm products that is true except as to cotton.

During the year ended June 30, 1925, the value of crude foodstuffs, food animals, and manufactured foodstuffs exported was 22.2 per cent of the value of all exports, but it dropped this last year to 16.8 per cent. Incidentally the value of semi-manufactures and manufactures exported was last year 54.6 per cent of the value of all exports, as compared with 38.5 per cent in 1925. Farmers are told to wait till the population of the United States grows, i. e., that agricultural prosperity depends upon immigration and a speeding up of the activities of the American stork. Labor is strong enough to prevent any marked increase of immigration and the slogan "Fewer and better babies" seems to have a wider appeal than the plight of the farmer.

In 1923 the cotton crop was 45.5 per cent below full yield per acre; 14.7 per cent of the wheat acreage was abandoned and the yield was 29.2 per cent below full, while the yield of potatoes was 22 per cent below a full yield. A full or "normal" crop would have ruined every producer. The Department of Agriculture estimated the annual crop loss from drought, flood, pest, etc., at over $2,500,000,000 on the basis of the prices of the reduced harvest. It is only calamity to many farmers which permits any profit for the rest.

The farm plant is nearly as much overcapitalized as it is excessive in acreage. Much emphasis has been laid upon the distress of agriculture due to the deflation in the selling price of farm lands since 1920. What are the facts about the inflation of the selling price of farm lands from 1900 to 1920 to which little reference is made? In the decade 1900 to 1910 the value of farm lands (including irrigation, ditching, orchards, and all farm real estate except buildings) increased by $15,417,566,000, or 118.1 per cent. In the decade 1910 to 1920 this value of farm lands increased by $26,353,880,000, or 92.5 per cent, and was in 1920 $54,829,563,000. During this same decade the assessed value of taxable land in New York City, known as the Paradise of Land Speculators, increased by $1,701,019,000, or only 58.6 per cent, and was in 1920 $4,606,220,000.

In other words, the so-called "value" of farm lands in 1920 was nearly twelve times the value of taxable land in the richest city in the world, while the actual farm population was only about five times the population of New York City. There was more "watered stock" in the "value" of farm lands in 1920 than in the railroads and all other public utilities combined, and there still is billions of dollars' worth of "watered stock" in the valuation of farm lands. Of course the "value" of farm lands fell after 1920—the amount was $17,069,463,000, or 31.1 per cent. In spite of this reduction the 1925 value of farm lands, $37,769,099,000, was $9,284,424,000, or 32.6 per cent higher than the value in 1910, an average increase of $1,459 for every farm in the United States.

Consider the tragic plight of the Corn Belt land speculators of Iowa, Illinois, and Nebraska. In 1925 35.1 per cent of the 566,825 farms in these three States were operated by tenants. In 1910 the value of farm land was $7,506,924,000. It jumped to $15,259,539,000 in 1920, and dropped to $9,523,835,000 in 1925. In spite of the drop the average of land value per farm in 1925 was $16,802, which was $3,558 more than in 1910, while the average value of all land in farms was $89.97 per acre in these three States, compared with $40.80 per acre for the United States.

The United States Department of Agriculture reports that in 1925 land rent was 23 per cent of the cost of producing corn, 26.9 per cent of the cost of producing wheat, and 27.5 per cent of the cost of producing oats. It also reports that in 1925 $1,127,000,000, or 9.1 per cent of the gross income of all farmers, was paid by tenant farmers as rent to non-operators. That year 38.1 per cent of all farms were operated by tenants and the value of such farms was a little over one-third of the total, so on the most conservative estimate about $3,400,000,000 was the rent charge for farms in 1925, or 28.2 per cent of the gross income of all farmers. Land values were 76.2 per cent of all farm real estate.

An almost superfluous evidence of our national stupidity with respect to agriculture was the entry of about 150,000,000 acres of homestead lands from 1911 to 1924, chiefly in Montana, Colorado, Wyoming, New Mexico, and Idaho. The federal Government has done its best—or worst—to make agriculture unprofitable.

Mr. Bean [The Nation, September 8] is quite justified in designating the farmers' recovery as "temporary." But why call it "recovery"? Every domestic and nearly every foreign cause which produced the recent agricultural slump is effective now. Most owner farmers are as desirous for another land boom as ever. This very year vast additional tracts are being opened up to production through the completion of irrigation projects, which means more domestic competition for the domestic market. It was the too rapid paralleling of railroads to the Pacific Coast, with our land policy and a plentiful supply of low-subsistence immigrants for industry, which was largely responsible for the development of our agricultural plant at least half a century too early. The railroads still want large crops near their lines and the feeders thereof to increase their tonnage.

Will the American people consent to guarantee a return upon present farm-land "values" without limiting prices of farm products? A large part of these "values" do not represent "actual prudent investment." Some are not actual investment at all, and much of the actual investment was highly imprudent and equally improvident. Under our present taxing system for State and local purposes every increase in the selling price of farm products is capitalized into the selling price of farm lands and makes the lot of the farmer at least that much harder, but a movement is now under way in the West and Northwest to persuade the Government to stabilize farm values and pay off part of the mortgage debt on farms, amounting to about eight billion dollars.

The underlying determinant of our farm policy, however, is that we are becoming an industrialist nation, and manufacturers and bankers are determined to secure raw material cheap. The industrial vote is much greater than the purely agricultural and will keep on increasing. The "farm bloc" has disintegrated. Under the leadership of Senator Capper the locks of that Samson have been shorn. The most significant fact about agriculture is that the war and postwar deflation have shown that it can't be conducted profitably as an individual speculation.

The National Grange and the American Farm Bureau Federation, hitherto strongly individualistic and "agin" the Government's doing anything more than police duty and giving advice and credit to farmers, actually indorsed the McNary-Haugen principle of a government farm export corporation. That is the most significant thing in American agricultural history. The tears of farm deflation have washed away the slogan of laissez-faire from the portals of the American Temple of Agriculture, and farmers have asked—of course, the impossible—that agriculture have "equal tariff protection" with other industries and that something be done to make it work.

A national policy must be worked out for agriculture. Farm landowners have secured close to one and three-quarter billions of dollars in mortgage loans at non-commercial rates through the Federal and Joint Stock Land Banks. Do the American people want to subsidize farm landowners still more with tariffs on farm products? Such tariffs will injure both producing farmers and consumers. If farmers are refused the place in the sun of Privilege which some land-owning farmers are asking, it is quite probable that in a few years they will turn their attention to reducing costs of farm production and ending special privilege. This will involve ending speculation in farm lands, farm credit, and farm products, and real government control of freight rates and of great business combinations. Senator Norris in his article [The Nation, September 1] referred to the bill creating a government farm-marketing corporation, which with his characteristic modesty he failed to mention he introduced. Such a corporation is essential to make the farmers' cooperative movement most effective.

Probably a few years will see the development of large farming corporations, because it is exceedingly doubtful whether the majority of farmers will continue to take the inherent risks of agriculture. From the standpoint of the children on the farms it is exceedingly important that they should not. John D. Black, professor of economics at the University of Minnesota, correctly summarized the farm situation when he said: "So far as the present is concerned, it will be highly desirable if a few hundred thousand more farms are abandoned."

As a corollary, immigration should be stopped for a series of years and an intelligent and concerted government effort made to place superfluous farmers in industry with the minimum danger to standards of living.

Silence

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

There is no thing so innocent as silence
Which all men fear.
Awe is in mountains;
They listen always to no sound.
They are so little fevered
Desiring nothing but themselves;
Men are afraid
In their high green glacial meadows,
Timid of unintending silence
And of what waits to listen to no sound.

In the Driftway

THE exile of Abd-el-Krim, defeated chieftain of the Riff, to a tiny island in the Indian Ocean has raised again in the Drifter's mind a question to which—like all important problems—he has devoted considerable thought. The question is this: If you, dear reader, were told that you must live for the rest of your life in one spot, but might have your pick, what place would you choose? Of course this is not precisely the situation of the Drifter's old college chum Krim. The French Government has not consulted him in regard to his destination; it has told him merely where he gets off. This simplifies Krim's thinking, but it spoils the discussion, and the Drifter prefers a good discussion—preferably ending in a row—to simplified thinking.

* * * * *

AN English skipper on whose steamship the Drifter once came up the West Coast—and at sea that means not the United States but South America—confessed that when he retired it was his ambition to pass the rest of his days in Calcutta. An odd choice, many will say—hot, dirty, crowded; why Calcutta? Yet there's a reason. In considering a place of permanent exile the Drifter is supposing, of course, that, like Abd-el-Krim, the exilee would be provided with a pension sufficient to enable him to live in the station to which he had become accustomed. A steamship captain, Heaven knows, has never been accustomed to much money, but he has been used to a position of eminence and command, with a lot of persons to wait on him and obey his orders. After such a life it would be poor pickings to settle down in London or rural England on a small income. A retired steamship captain would be a nobody lost in nowhere.

* * * * *

ON the other hand, he could be a real personage in Calcutta. With a steamship captain's income he could have a pleasant villa—if that's what they have in India—with a sufficient retinue of servants so that there would always be one to shoo the flies off and another to bow to him every time he turned around. He could belong to the British club and would be a figure wherever he went in the little aristocracy of Occidental administrators and adventurers in this Eastern port. Altogether, the Drifter thinks the skipper's choice a wise one and hopes for its realization some day.

* * * * *

BUT naturally such a solution would not suit the Drifter. He wonders first whether he would choose a city or a place in the country. He is sure of one thing—that he would not live in a suburb. He recalls the story of the man who moved to a suburb on Monday and, asked on Friday how he liked it, replied that he didn't know—he wouldn't have a chance to see it until Sunday. But instead of pitying the man because he had to toil long hours in the city, the Drifter—having seen many suburbs—feels that the poor fellow was unfortunate in that he didn't have to work seven days a week. A city is almost as terrible a place in which to live as a suburb, but it has this advantage, that it offers means whereby one may sometimes forget those terrors.

THE Drifter likes to believe that he would choose a spot in the country rather than a home in a city—it would be more wholesome—but he fears he wouldn't. He can say with certainty that if he chose the country it would be somewhere in the United States, for we have the most beautiful and the most varied rural landscape of which the Drifter knows. On the other hand, the Drifter doesn't know of an American city in which he could be induced to live more than three months out of twelve if it were a matter of choice. He thinks that if he had to live in one single city for the rest of his days he would choose Paris or one of the Italian seaports, probably Naples, but possibly Palermo. Of Paris it is not necessary to speak, but one would be called upon to justify Naples or Palermo. To the Drifter Naples is the most beautifully situated and the most exhilaratingly human city in the world. To roam its streets, listening to the songs of those at work or at play; to enter into its love of life and its love of love; to live on the glorious hill of Posilipo looking out at dawn and sunset over the Bay of Naples . . . Palermo is not so gay and communicative as Naples; it has the Sicilian somberness and taciturnity. But for sheer loveliness the Conca d'Oro (the Shell of Gold), that upward-sloping valley which rises from the city to the mountain top behind it, has no peer in the Drifter's recollection. He recalls an outdoor cafe with a view across the waving lemon groves, over the glistening city, to the profound purple of the Mediterranean beyond. . . . He failed to stop there because the last tram for an hour was just leaving. . . . He regrets his folly to this day. . . .

* * * * *

HO, hum! Enticing day-dreams, aren't they? But (Holy mackerel and fried codfish!) both the Posilipo and the Conca d'Oro are probably to be classified as suburbs! The Drifter has got into a jam again. Perhaps he'd better not try to settle anywhere for life, but just keep on drifting . . . and drifting. . . . THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

For Mr. Mellon to Answer

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: According to official returns from the United States Treasury internal-revenue collections for the fiscal year ended June 30 last show an item of $1,679,434.38 for "still or sparkling wines, cordials, etc." Can you obtain a detailed analysis of this item?

How much was diverted to "sacramental" use? How much was imported for "medicinal purposes only"? Are sparkling wines and cordials imported for the one or the other purpose?

There is also an item called "grape brandy used in fortifying sweet wines," which brought the Treasury $535,261. Is that brandy used for making the "sacramental" wine strong enough to come up to the various religious standards?

Rockville Center, N. Y., September 27 H. EDWARDS

Higher Education in California

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In assembly at San José State Teachers' College yesterday the faculty member in charge of the program announced that the radio set of the college was at the disposal of the entire student body on that afternoon so that they might follow the course and learn the verdict of the scrap between Champion Jack Dempsey and His Honor, Gene Tunney. More cheering and applause in appreciation of this announcement was given the speaker than any other part of the program drew forth that day, or in many past days. "Youth will be served."

San Jose, California, September 24 FRANK L. MARTIN

Something Eerie on the Erie

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Friday, September 17, was the anniversary of the completion of the Constitution, a document which says something about guaranteeing the rights of freedom of speech and assemblage. All the railroad ferry-boats on the North River were celebrating the occasion with their flags afloat.

It was a beautiful and impressive sight to see this honor to the Constitution on the part of these corporations. But on one of the Erie boats, the Passaic, the flag was upside down! Is it possible that the company recognized the incongruity of having that particular boat acclaim the Constitution, and therefore put up the signal of distress? Or was the captain a Bolshevik? Or may the strikers in Passaic have planted an under-cover agent among the crew?

New York, September 20 PAUL JONES

High Sign and Low Sign

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In Los Angeles the police must now salute their superiors and betters and go-getters in the approved military fashion, strictly according to the rules laid down in the war—the hand held rigid, frozen for a moment over the right eye, and then jerked down with a snap to the ground.

In the good old days the "high sign" used to be to hold up one's hand as the Indians did, or as clergymen sometimes do, as a symbol of peace, pointing up to the sky, the sun, the stars, to the infinite heavens above, greeting one's neighbor, as it were, with a sort of a "God bless you." This saluting is different. A man, instead of being free and easy and naturally courteous and well intentioned about it, does it under compulsion, like a machine or a dummy; and instead of pointing above we are teaching and forcing upon our children and our policemen the undemocratic and unbiblical (see Proverbs 28:21) habit of respecting persons who differ but little from ourselves, making a snappy, mechanical gesture downward, pointing below instead of above, just as much as to say to the other fellow: "Go to ——!"

Los Angeles, September 25 KARL SPIESS ROBINSON

War, Inc.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Dempsey received $700,000 and Tunney $200,000 for fighting ten rounds. Since the dear people like to see blood flow and heads knocked off, why not put war on the same basis as pugilism?

When nations go to war, have places of safety built on the sidelines where the onlookers can safely view the battle through field-glasses. Large admission fees should be charged, and the winner should receive the bulk of this gate-money. The fighters in past wars have received only their board and clothes, but since this kind of fighting is much more dangerous than fighting in the ring, each combatant should get a good share of the gate-money. If killed his share should go to the widow and orphans, if he has such, or be donated to some theological school for the purpose of graduating young ministers of the gospel who will preach that the Lord hates a coward and commands us to get our automatics and poison gas. People who lack funds to pay admission to witness this commercialized warfare can go to the radio and listen in the returns of the battle.

Guthrie, Oklahoma, October 1 GUY WILLIAMSON

Prison Beauty

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Some time ago, while engaged in social work, I had occasion to notice the attractive, often remarkably beautiful articles that inmates of various prisons make in their spare time from materials purchased with their own money. In a number of prisons the men are permitted to sell these articles, but they find it hard to market them. The sale of their goods inspires them with courage, gives them renewed self-confidence, and, most important of all, gives them an added interest in life. I have taken the work of some of these prisoners and offered to sell it for them. I have some lovely bead necklaces and bags, neckties, scarfs, toys, handsome laces, cushion covers, rag rugs (some intend making hooked rugs), beautifully inlaid jewel and cigarette boxes, horse-hair belts, German silver paper-cutters with pearl inlays, etc. These articles are all conscientiously made and reasonable in price.

I would be glad to send consignments of the goods to anyone who could sell them. (MRS.) O. WIDMAYER

Edgewater, Colo., Box 638A, Rt. 2, September 18

"As Swinish as the Owners"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I inclose several clippings reporting attacks by union carpenters on non-union carpenters in San Francisco. In some instances the victims have been severely injured—skulls fractured or arms broken. There has also been a molders' war going on in the bay region for several years, and intermittently violence flares up. Several times the union forces have shot and killed non-union workers, using the gangster technique of shooting from a moving closed car.

Since your journal describes the brutality of policemen and the callousness of factory-owners, might I inquire why you give no publicity to the lawlessness and violence of the labor unions? As far as my observations go, they are fully as swinish and disgusting as the factory- and mine-owners.

I prefer that you do not mention my name.

Berkeley, California, September 24 J. L.

Fred H. Moore

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In discussing the first conviction of Vanzetti on a charge of attempted hold-up Arthur Warner declares in The Nation that "Even Fred H. Moore, when he took up the murder case, . . . failed to move for a new trial for Vanzetti on the Bridgewater [hold-up] charges within the one-year limit prescribed by law, thus making it impossible to reopen the case." Moore did not appeal the Bridgewater case because he had nothing on which he could take action. The attorney who had been hired to represent Vanzetti at his first trial failed to take exception to a single ruling of the court or even to ask that certain lines of examination be ruled on by the court. He was out of sympathy with the views of Vanzetti on social questions and failed to represent his interests adequately. Without having exceptions in the record Moore was powerless to appeal, for the Massachusetts courts require that all exceptions be made at the time of trial.

Moore for several years worked hard and unremittingly on the Sacco-Vanzetti case. He often went for long periods without being paid for his services. At other times he took his fees and advanced them to the defense committee to carry on investigational work. It is for that reason I wish to correct the impression that Moore failed to take every possible step to protect the interests of both Sacco and of Vanzetti.

Decatur, Illinois, October 4 KARL PRETSHOLD

Class-Prosecution—Class-Defense

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Sacco-Vanzetti case seems in serious danger of becoming respectable. If it does it will not matter much how the affair ends. So far as Sacco and Vanzetti themselves are concerned, nothing the Massachusetts or federal courts can do will give them back their lost years or the fine young physical and mental vigor with which they started. The crime against them is irreparable. The only thing they have left to comfort them is the class-character of their ordeal. When that is obliterated by well-meaning persons who see in it only an exception to the rule of justice rather than the example and type of class-justice, the case will be dismally lost—even if the victims should eventually be released.

It is natural for the New York World, in its belated concern for Massachusetts justice, to center attention upon William G. Thompson. Thompson is not only a crackerjack lawyer but excellent window-dressing for an unpopular popular cause. It is perfectly natural for the World to dismiss with a shrug the five years before Thompson awoke to the case. Back in 1921 the World showed how little it was equipped to understand a case of class-prosecution in a series of smart-aleck articles sensationalizing and distorting the Sacco-Vanzetti case as the work of three super-propagandists!

That the labor and liberal press should follow this lead so readily is pathetic. They gave enough space during those years to recording every step in the exposure of the conspiracy to know better. It was during those first five years that the essential class-character of the persecution was laid bare and the black atmosphere of hatred and ignorance in which the conviction was staged were made manifest. It was slow uphill work, Fred H. Moore doing the bulk of it.

Moore's "long black hair, his somewhat dark visage, his dour manner," and his "unfamiliarity with Massachusetts practice" did not prevent him from saving Ettore, Giovannitti, and Caruso from the electric chair when he was their counsel in the famous case—a Massachusetts case, incidentally, in which he learned more about court practices in that State than 90 per cent of the bourgeois native lawyers will ever know. It did not prevent him from wrenching a hundred "wobblies" from the grip of "justice" in the famous Everett, Washington, cases. Or from clearing Charlie Krieger of the Standard Oil frame-up in Tulsa, Oklahoma. Or from taking the lead in the San Diego free-speech fight. His ignorance of Massachusetts practice is a journalistic euphemism for the court's frantic efforts to deprive Sacco and Vanzetti of a brilliant and fearless defender. Thompson can testify to that, having come splendidly to Moore's assistance at that time.

Just before Moore came to the scene a New York newspaperman was induced to go to Boston to investigate the arrest of the two Italian workers. He returned to report that there was "no story" in it, not even for the New York Call—just a "couple of wops in a jam." Several months later, with Moore on the job, it became not merely a story but the biggest story of its kind internationally. Of course, being human and fallible, he made mistakes. Five years is a long time for any human being to go without mistakes.

The prosecution of Sacco and Vanzetti is a class-prosecution. Their defense should be a class-defense, in which the services of kind-hearted bourgeois attorneys and philanthropists are merely necessary evils.

New York, October 5 EUGENE LYONS

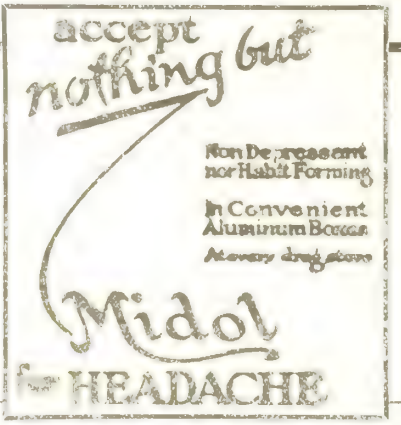
The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of graduate study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

For further information, address the Director,

THE TRAINING SCHOOL
for
JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

(Initiated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)

210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY



JOHN MASEFIELD
will give
SIX READINGS

October 18—Stories, early poems and plays.
October 21—Narrative poems: Everlasting Mercy and Widow in Bye Street; Dauber and Daffodil Fields.
October 25—First Plays: Nan; Pompey; Faithful. Plays in Verse: Philip; Good Friday.
October 28—Later Poems of the Countryside; Reynard and Right Royal.
November 1—King Cole; Enslaved.
November 4—Miscellaneous poems. Later plays: Trial of Jesus; A King's Daughter.

Fee for the course, $10

Readings to be given at 5:20 P. M. at the
NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH
465 West 23rd Street New York City

accept nothing but

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

The TODAY AND TOMORROW Series
Just Published Each $1.00

PLATO'S AMERICAN REPUBLIC
By J. D. Wheelwright
A deliciously funny imitation of a Platonic dialogue in which Socrates answers questions concerning his American lecture tour.

THINKING ABOUT THINKING
By Cassius J. Keyser
How many of us do it? "Autonomous Thinking" is Prof. Keyser's solution of most of our troubles!

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK

Books and Plays

Now the Sky

By MARK VAN DOREN

How long have standing men—by such a stone
As this I watch from on this windless night—
Beheld Arcturus, golden and alone,
Guiding Antares and the Snake aright.

The Scales were up when not an Arab walked
On sand that soon was paved with names of stars;
Boötes herded, and the Giant stalked
Past the curved Dragon, contemplating wars.

How many an open eye, bedight with dew,
Over the sleeping flowers has drawn them down—
Andromeda, and Berenice's few
Dim tresses that shall ever flee the Crown.

From such a rock whence graybeards long ago,
Forgetting it beneath them, heard the Lyre,
I watch. But there is something now we know
Confusing all they saw with misty fire.

For them a hundred pictures on a slate.
For us no slate, and not a hand that draws.
For them a pasture-dome wherefrom the gate
Of Cancer led the Lion through its claws;

For them a frosty window, painted over,
Nightly, with flower faces in a ring—
Daisies dancing up, and clouds of clover
Scenting the after way, and phlox to fling

Thin petals left and right till morning lifted.
For us no shapely flame in all the dark;
For us a million embers that have drifted
Since the first fire, and not a sign to mark

Where anything shall end, or which shall go
With which until they both shall die to gray.
For watchers once a changeless face to know;
For us cold eyes that turn henceforth away.

They saw each constellation take its hour
Of triumph overhead, before it started
Down the broad West, whereon the death of power
Was written by the Ram, and nightly charted.

The Eagle and the Swan, that sailed so long,
Floating upon white wings the Arrow missed,
Tilted at midnight, plunging with a song
Earthward, and—as they sank—deep Hydra hissed.

Leo had long been growling in his lair
When Pegasus neighed softly in the East,
Rising upon a wind that blew his hair
Freshly, until Aquarius increased

The stream he aimed against the Fish's mouth,
And all the stars were wet with silent rain.

The Hyades came weeping, and the Wain
Sent mist to soothe the Sisters in their pain.

These things they witnessed, and Orion slumbering
Fiercely with those two Dogs announcing Fall;
Then Winter, with Aldebaran loud-chiming,
Baiting the frozen Bull, that turned to call

The Bears to warm his anger. These they know
And knew the seasons with them, Spring and Spring—
Counting the dozen Signs the finger drew
That swung the inconstant Sun around the Ring.

Slow Jupiter proceeded as they planned,
Lingering among the Twelve in stately turn;
They touched the breasts of Venus where the hand
Of Mars's fiery love had been to burn.

The sky was then a room, with people going
Faithfully to and fro, and beasts enchained.
The sky was then a midnight wastrel, throwing
Riches away; and still the purse remained.

But now the sky is broken, door by door.
Strangers in the room obscure the hosts.
The meadow is not guarded any more
By watchers coming lonely to their posts.

The animals are never to be named
That swarm beyond our company of old—
Stragglers from the herd, that we had tamed
Unknowing the recesses of the fold.

Those were no heroes whom we once addressed—
Hercules, Orion, and the Twins.
Unwounded, they were running from the rest
Far there where only now the war begins.

There is a game for players still to play,
Pretending that the board was never lost.
But still the painted counters will decay,
And knowledge sit along to count the cost.

Coleridge

Samuel Taylor Coleridge. By Hugh I'Anson Fausset. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

MR. FAUSSET'S is one of the most tragically absorbing stories ever written of the life of a man of genius. And yet pathetic might better describe the drama of Coleridge's life than tragic, for it shows no struggle of resolute will against a hostile fate, but a great mind doomed to frustration almost at birth by a congenital maladjustment to the practical conditions of existence and helpless to oppose the faintest resistance to its doom. The truly melancholy thing in Coleridge's situation was that his extraordinarily subtle understanding enabled him to see his weakness and that the excuses which throughout his life he kept making for himself never effectually allayed the gnawings of his moral sense. The key to Coleridge's failure, according to Mr. Fausset, is not so much that absence of will power to which it is generally attributed as inability to cope with objective reality. "A being splendidly endowed with genius, sensibility, and intellect, large in comprehension, elemental in instinct, generous, affectionate, and enthusiastic, broke himself on the rocks of a world which he could not see."

Mr. Fausset presses his analysis with a relentless scrutiny. He cannot be entirely acquitted of his besetting sin of oversimplification, but he does no essential injustice to the subject of his biography such as the present reviewers quarreled with in his study of John Donne. The material in this case is full to the point of oppressiveness and lends itself unresistingly to the support of the thesis. It shows the absorption of Coleridge as a child in the realm of the Arabian Nights, during manhood in unearthly metaphysical speculation, and in old age in a fine-spun theology somehow reconciled with the conventional code of morals. It is painful to follow the disintegration of mind and character as it is unfolded in Mr. Fausset's account, unsparingly but without vindictiveness. Thinking of Coleridge as the poet who brought enchantment into the literature of the nineteenth century, we are likely to forget how much of his verse is diffuse sentimentality and how early his creative power was checked. Admiring him as the author of the profoundest critical remarks on Shakespeare and Wordsworth, we do not consider that these remarks were the product of a brief period of spasmodic exertion. Knowing him as the protagonist of idealism in philosophy and religion, we disregard his serious lapses into cant and hypocrisy.

The student of literature may do well to judge Coleridge only by the positive fruits of his activity (it is an indulgence for which Coleridge himself would have been very grateful), but the biographer cannot avoid dwelling on the waste and disappointment as well. There may even be the intimate connection between the two aspects which Mr. Fausset refers to. Possibly we owe the miracles of the "Ancient Mariner" and "Christabel" and "Kubla Khan" to the same feverish sensibility which led Coleridge to the laudanum bottle and the piety of Archbishop Leighton. But under any circumstances, no excuses need be made for a study like Mr. Fausset's. It somewhat discredits the thinker, but it does full justice to the genius of the poet and critic; and if it leaves the man destitute of esteem, it does not obscure the qualities which won so much mitigating sympathy and protection for him during his lifetime. There are few writers who could have handled with similar competence a subject calling for the appraisal of such a variety of faculties and activities. By virtue of its psychological penetration and its grasp of literary and philosophic values the book takes precedence over all that has so far been written about Coleridge.

JACOB ZEITLIN

Meredith

George Meredith. By J. B. Priestly. English Men of Letters, New Series. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

The Writings and Life of George Meredith, A Centenary Study. By Mary Sturge Gretton. Harvard University Press. $2.50.

A LOVER of Meredith's novels asked to review biographies of him feels like the old scholar who growled: "There is no good edition of Shakespeare. I have been too busy for the past few years." Mindful of your huge debt to Meredith you hate to speak of his human frailties. Until three years ago these were largely conjectural. Then Mr. S. B. Ellis's biography took out the stopple. Meredith's family skeleton was a paternal tailor shop. He began by being ashamed of it. He ended by being ashamed of it. He ended by being ashamed of having been ashamed. This smarting sensitiveness colored his whole work. Through his novels like a Wagnerian leit-motif runs this theme of some extraordinary personality battling for social recognition—in plain United States, trying to horn in. Evan Harrington, Richmond Roy, Diana, Aminta, Nesta, Alvan, Carinthia, even Beauchamp—the theme persistently recurs.

Mr. Priestly declares that Meredith was a great writer but not a great man. Mrs. Gretton is more reticent. Her centenary study is a succinct introduction to Meredith's work, biographical material at the beginning of her chapters, summaries of novels and poems in the middle, and comment at the end. Her advantage of personal friendship with the author, while warming and mellowing her study, is never obtruded, and her writing has uniform, smooth excellence.

Mr. Priestly is more outspoken and severely critical. Of Meredith's faults as a story-teller he makes mince meat. The privilege of being allowed to associate with such superb human beings as Meredith's characters is such a bracer to one's own best standards that it would never occur to me to crab about faulty plot construction. For a well-tinkered Chinese puzzle of a plot I go to Sophocles or Ibsen. But Nevil Beauchamp, Vernon Whitford, and Matey Weyburn are not characters in fiction. They are old, dear, and intimate friends; they are comrade young men who have stood by me in many a hard tussle.

On the other hand, Mr. Priestly's grasp of the novelist's intellectual range is extraordinary. Meredith, he says, is in the nineteenth century but not of it. He escapes the strain and lop-sidedness of the other great Victorians painfully trying to adjust themselves to the property-poverty struggle and the theologico-scientific shindy. "He is pure pagan." The agonizing of Christian theology he treats like an "inspired prophet of sanity." He simply walks away and leaves it running. He recognizes that man's animal instincts are not to be effaced but to be used. "He seems to breathe Hellenic air and turns on the body the clear unshadowed eyes of the nobler pagans."

Justly severe though Mr. Priestly may be—and his study is a notable addition to a notable series—he sets one pondering the biographer's plight. A biographer's pitfall is usually to set up his private Ellis Island at the gate of the Eternal City. That biographers should be more or less encouraged to do this is far from flattering revelation of the estate of prevailing opinion. Mediocrity must be revenged on excellence, and conventional morals are the backstairs to it. A smaller man with step-ladder and tape-measure undertakes to measure a greater. Then occurs our Comedy of Bad Manners. Here is some valiant soul who struggled manfully his life long to enrich the human spirit. And we expect his biographer, rueing his lapses, to tell us: "He really ought to have spent that Saturday night differently." This would apply to Goethe, Beethoven, Michelangelo, Leonardo, Walt Whitman, Wagner, Shelley, George Eliot, Tolstoi, and most others of the best. Were you to turn on the average life the X-ray of biographical research, what would you have? Exactly the same faults as those of genius—without its great contribution. The rebuke to gabble about the human frailties of greatness is: "Do you value the product? You do? Very well. Then don't complain of the process." Meredith (I will allow no one to abuse him but myself) was vain, self-conscious, unforgiving, and sadly lacking in simplicity. But when we glory in a superb artist's superb complexity, why damn him for not being simple? Try some other shop.

Our mistake is in expecting artists to have lived perpetually up to the heroic pitch of the supreme moments in their works. The Ninth Symphony and "Beauchamp's Career" are heroic worlds. But that is no reason for expecting Beethoven's lodgings and Meredith's crochets to have been the same. Let us cease to damn the artist for not having been also a saint. The two are different careers and none too compatible. In Tolstoi the saint slew the artist and some people prefer the artist Tolstoi to Tolstoi the saint. Confronted with the human weaknesses of George Meredith or of any other mighty spirit, I would steadily remind myself of Lincoln's reply to the people who complained that General Grant was addicted to drink: "Find out what brand of whiskey he uses so I can give some to my other generals."

LUCIEN PRICE

Rome Simplified

The Roman Spirit in Religion, Thought, and Art. By A. Grenier. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

GRENIER'S book, written for M. Berr's historical series called L'Evolution de l'Humanité, has been translated by M. R. Dobie to serve as one of the two hundred volumes of the great "History of Civilization," edited by C. K. Ogden. Grenier is a mature scholar, favorably known for several careful studies in the field of Roman archaeology and religion. The subject is here restricted to "religion, thought, and art" because other books in the series treat of circumstances of the political history. This needs to be kept in mind by the reader since he will several times discover that in interpreting "the Roman spirit" the author is drawing upon certain preconceptions that are not allowed to appear on the stage.

The sketch of Rome's religious journey from a primitive animism, through Etruscan and Greek anthropomorphism, to Oriental mysticism is reliable and tellingly written, though not quite with the sympathetic vividness of Warde Fowler's inimitable book. In the survey of Roman art Grenier has without exaggeration emphasized the interest of the Roman artist in realistic humanism expressed within the forms borrowed from Greece, and we may be especially grateful for the pages devoted to Etrusco-Roman art, which the author places in its correct historical perspective. The chapters on literature are perhaps less adequate, for here he seems especially to feel the necessity of illustrating his main theme. Somehow it becomes difficult to subsume the qualities of historians as diverse as Caesar, Livy, and Tacitus under a single formula and to classify as illustrations of typical Romans Lucretius and Catullus as well as Horace and Virgil.

Here, in fact, we meet the only serious defect of the book —a flaw inherent in much of our historical writing—that is, the assumption of consistency and unity where none exists. The people of Rome were ever changing groups of different individuals, constantly facing new experiences, meeting new influences, and consequently assuming new modes of expression for their shifting moods. A title like The Spirit of Rome is as misleading as would be The Spirit of the State of New York. The innate mental habit of classifying incoherent phenomena under cogent formulae and of organizing haphazard events into a consistent drama has received too much encouragement in continental historians from Hegelian traditions and nationalistic antipathies. Honest history is not popular because it usually lacks a plot. If the historian can with Hegel or H. G. Wells select his material so as to evolve a story leading consistently up to the glorious now, or if with Spengler he can shape a cathartic tragedy from "Apollonian" through "Magian" scenes to the catastrophic Untergang, he becomes a prophet. But we have been surfeited with such fare. We are ready now to extend greetings to a "History of Civilization" written by two hundred specialists, if only because it promises to break up the eternal schematization. But we hope that we shall not have two hundred dramas for one. In fact, some of us prefer the confusion of the "Cambridge History," which ties each contributor down to such narrow limits that he dare not dramatize lest the author of the sequel will tack a farcical ending to his tragedy.

In justice to Grenier it must be said that he avoids preoccupation successfully through half the book and that when finally he discovers that he has fallen under the spell of his title he ends with a warning against his own schematized conclusions. There are a few slight mistakes (the Baracco head is not Caesar, the restoration of the Etruscan temple on page 22 is incorrect, and Catullus's mistress was not Clodia Metella). In essentials the book is reliable, and fully deserves its place in the ambitious series. The translation is generally adequate, though on page 226 it exchanges the roles of Clodius and Milo.

TENNEY FRANK

For Independence

The Conquest of the Philippines by the United States, 1898-1925. By Moorfield Storey and Marcial P. Lichauco. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.

"THIS book has been prepared," its authors tell us, "in order to lay before the people of the United States the facts relating to the conquest of the Philippines." The ulterior purpose in presenting the facts, however, as the reader eventually discovers, is to urge independence for the Islands and their people. With all respect for the high intentions of Mr. Storey and Mr. Lichauco, the second object is not necessarily the logical accompaniment of the first. It would not be so even if governments acted logically, as in most circumstances they do not, and the attempt to write a quod erat demonstrandum in place of a non sequitur is likely to cause the book to be dismissed by many as inconclusive special pleading, when in fact it ought to be widely read and solemnly pondered.

What Mr. Storey and Mr. Lichauco have done is to frame a powerful indictment against the United States for its treatment of the Filipinos. The story is a repellent one of conquest and cruelty, of pious pretense and official arrogance, and of "uplift" and "civilization" used as smoke-screens to cover mercenary and unenlightened plans. The incidents, of course, are peculiar to the occasion, but the principles run on all-fours with those which all the expansionist nations, Great Britain, France, Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands, have developed to propagate imperialism and bring weaker peoples under the flag. Mr. Storey and Mr. Lichauco appear to think that if the facts had been fully known in this country something different might have happened. No doubt some of the facts have been withheld, or at least have been made somewhat difficult of access, but the essential truth of what was going on has been well enough known all along to those who cared, and while the book marshals the material skilfully, it adds extremely little to what was common property before.

What weakens the book as an argument for Philippine independence is its failure to recognize, or at all events to present with sufficient clearness, the fundamental change which was worked by the Spanish-American War in the temper of the American people. Thanks to that war, the United States became for the first time conscious of world power, and the consciousness set it by the ears. From minding its own business and leaving other nations to mind theirs, it took to meddling, first, of course, with a remote Asiatic business with which it had no vital concern, and later, in the World War, with a vast European quarrel from which it saw a possibility of deriving some prestige. Under the stress of international meddling, transformed by the Great American Hypnotist into a campaign for global democracy, the question of what the Constitution intended or what former generations had deemed wise gave place to the call of power, dominion, a voice in world affairs, international suspicion and fear, and money, and under the delusion of this new-styled greatness the nation has continued to live.

This is why the independence of the Philippines, which Messrs. Storey and Lichauco regard as a kind of moral obligation of the nation, has virtually ceased to be regarded as either necessary or desirable. The issue remained, but it was academic. What has been said by Presidents and Congressmen and politicians generally about independence as an ultimate aim is now seen to have been only a thin garment of gauze to hide the nakedness of "practical" policies, but it meant nothing at the time and has no value now. It is refreshing to find two able men who still think that politics and ethics have some inherent relation one to the other, but the situation which they deplore will not change until the nation shall have got rid of the kind of politics that now controls it, and adopted more rational standards than it now favors in dealing with the relations of peoples.

WILLIAM MCDONALD

Books in Brief

The Writing of History. By Jean Jusserand, Wilbur Cortez Abbott, Charles W. Colby, and John Spencer Bassett. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

The authors of this book, acting as a committee of the American Historical Association, have been set the task of discovering what is the matter with historical writing in America, and of suggesting remedies for the situation. The decline, if not the virtual disappearance, of such interest as greeted the works of Bancroft, Prescott, Motley, or Parkman seems to be a fact beyond question, and the ravages of popular neglect appear to have continued unchecked during the very period in which the association has been organizing and promoting historical research and publication. The main trouble, apparently, is that most American historical scholars do not know how to write, and are not really cultured persons to begin with. They are learned in a narrow way, they turn out monographs of portentous number and bulk, and their methods are scientific to the extent that history can be treated as a science, but what they write is neither easy nor delightful to read. Most of our writers of history, moreover, are professors, and American university life does not encourage, in students or teachers, a generous reading of classical works in history or any other subject. The scientific method, in other words, has all but done to death historical writing as literature, at the same time that our quantitative intellectual standards have left small place for broad outlook, artistry of style, and the leisure that permits of taking pains. About all that the committee have to offer by way of remedy is the suggestion that students of history would do well to read more, and that in any event they should write better. There would be hope for American culture if, in the face of our unreformed universities and multiplying endowments for research, one might expect that such a suggestion would, in the course of a hundred years or so, be seriously taken to heart.

1825-1925—A Century of Stupendous Progress. Joseph McCabe. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

This book was written to prove that the last century has witnessed more progress in every respect than all the other centuries combined, and that this progress is solely due to science. It is not uninteresting, but subtle minds will search it vainly for a satisfying definition of progress, and in the overwhelming array of statistics they will find another proof that statistics, like the Scriptures, can be quoted to prove anything.

Social Struggles and Modern Socialism. By M. Beer. Boston: Small, Maynard and Company. $2.

This last and least valuable of Beer's five-volume "General History of Socialism and Social Struggles" is little more than a syllabus on Socialist agitation in Germany since 1800, with side-references to similar agitation in a few other countries. Briefly, pithily, and dryly it covers the Paris Commune in six small pages, the recent Russian Revolution in three. Of some possible use to the historical student of socialist struggles, it is uninteresting to the general reader and worthless as propaganda. It should be added, however, that the entire set of five volumes presents an authoritative outline of the struggle of classes in both ancient and modern times.

Four Years Beneath the Crescent. By Rafael de Nogales. Translated from the Spanish by Muna Lee. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

More than a mere account of the adventures of a Venezuelan soldier of fortune as a high officer with the Turkish army during the late war. It is a travel book as well as a gruesome adventure story; its analysis of conditions in the Ottoman Empire and its comments on the Young Turkey movement and the Armenian massacres make it an addition to that "authentic" history of the war which is painfully emerging from a mass of propaganda. Written with absolute candor by a man who regarded the war as a job and brought no bias or patriotism to bear on his work, it reveals its author's personality as nothing short of amazing. General Nogales combines the ideals of medieval chivalry with a mind that displays the keenest penetration as well as a refreshing naivete.

Four Novelists of the Old Régime. By John Garber Palache. The Viking Press. $3.

A story of the life and works of Crébillon fils, Choderlos de Laclos, Restif de la Bretonne, and Diderot, the latter considered purely as a novelist. Inasmuch as the eighteenth-century French novel is a field very inadequately surveyed in English literature, this is a valuable study. Mr. Palache's summary of Restif's autobiography, "The Story of Monsieur Nicholas," forms the most interesting section of the book. The introductory chapter on the eighteenth-century French novel is disjointed; the style in general is sophomoric; and the plenitude of footnotes will probably prove annoying to the general reader. But the book as a whole is extremely creditable spadework, if nothing more.

Economic History of Europe to the End of the Middle Ages. By M. M. Knight. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

This is a readable narrative of European economic development from the beginnings to the close of the Middle Ages, the first of two volumes edited by Professor A. A. Young which will complete the account to date. Mr. Knight disclaims originality and uses little illustrative material. The background of local and world politics is given with relatively abundant detail, geographic factors, variations in economic technique, and consumers' economics get scant attention. General readers who know modern business terminology will approve the constant use of the patois. The editor declares this book the best introduction to economic history. There is, indeed, no better.

Drama

"The Lion Tamer"

THE form—artificial characters moving against a stylicized background—which Alfred Savoir has chosen for his fantastic comedy, "The Lion Tamer" (Neighborhood Playhouse), is one beloved by insurgents of the theater. Its possibilities have been argued with a wearisome copiousness by enthusiastic theorists, and we have had not a few well-intentioned efforts to realize them upon the stage. Thus some years ago the pretentious vacuity of "He Who Gets Slapped" was endured for the sake of its form, and only last season the insignificant merits of "The Chief Thing" were at least seriously weighed for the same reason. Never before, however, in America at least, have we seen the genre attempted by anyone as technically adroit as Savoir, and it must in fairness be said that no unadulterated exponent of Art has done so much as he to demonstrate its merits. One may distrust a cleverness as unflagging as his; one may doubt if so adroit a juggler can do more than juggle; but the fact remains that "The Lion Tamer" is a delight from beginning to end—original, witty, unflagging, and picturesque.

The conception upon which the author has founded his play—a conception of the struggle, eternal and inconclusive, between the logical idealist and the brutal master of things as they are—is not inevitably profound. Even the fantastic characters which he has chosen to embody it—the lion tamer of a traveling circus and the English lord who follows him from town to town in the religious hope that sometime, somewhere the lions will realize their superiority and devour their master—are not so obviously apt as to foredoom the play to success. But, from the moment when the curtain rises upon the Lord performing his nightly vigil at the circus bar until it descends upon his son, come to take his father's place and in every respect undistinguishable from him, the invention of the author never falters. With all the skill of a playwright, both born to the theater and made master of its secrets by long practice, he keeps the ball rolling in an always unexpected direction. The idea plays hide and seek with the farcical situations; it winds in and out of the fabric, appearing unexpectedly in the midst of the most amusing situations; and, though it is never far away, it is never intruded. As the lion tamer, so blusteringly sure that the world is ruled by force and fear, matches wits with the idealist who clings with such desperation to his faith in the ultimate triumph of reason and justice, the whole fantastic proceedings take on the relevance of a dream. The conflict spreads to involve the love of the premiere equestrienne and the balance swings now this way, now that. Farcical though it all is and dextrously though it avoids even a moment of heavy solemnity, it nevertheless seems poignant and true for the very reason that neither cynicism nor faith ever wins a decisive victory. It is the idealist himself whom the lions finally devour because, though he once consented to attempt the task, he never really wanted to conquer with a whip; but no sooner is he gone than his son is there to take up the battle where his father had left it, and he too is destined to his victories and his defeats. Since the beginning of history, so the playwright seems to say, men have been both good enough and bad enough, wise enough and foolish enough, to furnish a very respectable case for the cynic and the idealist alike, and doubtless it is temperament, not evidence, which makes either.

Those who have followed the development of the company at the Neighborhood need hardly be told that the play is one which they are peculiarly fitted to perform. Nowhere else in America, I think, has the tradition which insists that acting depends, not upon the exploitation of personality but upon the conscious control of the voice and body, been so consistently followed. Nowhere else do we find actors who so nearly realize Gordon Craig's ideal of the marvelously articulated puppet, who so firmly grasp the principle that a role is something to be created by a mind which uses the body as a sculptor uses clay, not something to be approximated as near as may be by giving rein to the temperament of the performer. Hence it is that they play better than the members of any other company, can grasp and maintain a style of consistent, significant artificiality such as this play requires. Ian Maclaren, Otto Hulicius, and Albert Carroll, as well as those who undertake minor roles, are admirable, but the performance of Dorothy Sands in the extraordinarily difficult part of the equestrienne Arabella is the outstanding achievement of the production. Her suppleness, variety, and never-failing expressiveness are not less than superb, and they have, withal, no direct relation to her individual personality. Here, for one, is an actress who is not parading a somewhat glorified version of herself upon the stage but one who has actually created a role.

"Deep River" (Imperial Theater), for which Laurence Stallings furnished the libretto and Frank Harling the music, constitutes not merely an interesting experiment but a very considerable achievement in beauty and interest as well. The scene is old New Orleans upon the occasion of the annual Creole Ball, and Mr. Stallings, for his part, contributes a play in which he reveals again as he revealed in "Spring Flight" a fresh and vigorous feeling for the picturesque contrasts of early American culture. The scene in which the three Kentuckians, come down the river for the ball, clash with the representatives of the French aristocracy is as vivid as anything in "What Price Glory?" and though the requirements of the libretto prevent the development of more than the sketch of a play, that sketch is enough to indicate that the author is capable, sooner or later, of realizing the dramatic possibilities of certain American materials that have never yet been used in drama. In the first and last acts Mr. Harling's music is hardly more than a pleasant accompaniment to the play, but in the second act, left largely in his hands, he rises to his opportunities and creates, through the music alone, a thrilling half hour in the primitive of the Voodoo cult.

"The Captive" (Empire Theater) is a play considerably less sensational than its theme. It deals clearly and interestingly with a life of a Lesbian who succeeded in the love of thus conquering her abnormality, but it is, after the fashion of the school of French drama to which it belongs, more full of logic than of life. Its high moment, the moment when the husband of the heroine's inamorata recounts the horrors of his marriage to a woman who is somehow not a woman, depends upon declamation rather than drama, and I, at least, never failed to feel that the characters of the piece were more elements of a syllogism than living personages. "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes" (Times Square Theater), like the book from which it was taken, is as sketchy as a comic strip, but it is hilariously funny and, within the limits of its form, shrewdly penetrating. "The Immortal Thief," with which Walter Hampden opens his season at the Hampden Theater, is an unfortunate work which undertakes to tell a story woven about one of those crucified with Christ, but it never succeeds in being more than pompously feeble. In "The Good Fellow" (Playhouse) George Kaufman and Herman Mankiewicz manage to extract a good deal of fun out of Mr. Mencken's favorite character, the inveterate joiner of lodges and marcher in parades.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

The Neighborhood Playhouse, 466 Grand Street, N. Y. Telephone Drydock 7516
First play of the new Repertory Season
A Satirical Comedy by Alfred Savoir
THE LION TAMER
Every evening (except Monday) at 8:30. Matinees Wednesday & Saturday at 2:30
SUBSCRIBE NOW TO OUR 13TH SEASON
Address Subscription Secretary, 466 Grand St., for information

LECTURES

At the RAND SCHOOL 7 E. 15th St.

V. F. CALVERTON
"THE WORK OF JACOB WASSERMANN"
Friday, Oct. 15, 8:30 p. m.

VERNON LOGGINS
"THE ARCHITECTS OF THE NINETIES"
Saturday, Oct. 16, 4 p. m.
At Mr. Loggins' session Genevieve Taggard will read from her own poems.

"THE THEATRICALIZATION OF LIFE"
First lecture in America on Russia by A. N. Pertsoff, author of "The Chief Thing", "The Ship of Satan", etc.
General discussion by Russian writers and artists.
Sunday, October 17th, 8:30 P. M.
RAND SCHOOL AUDITORIUM, 7 E. 15th Street
Part of the Proceeds to go to Homeless Children in Russia.
Admission 50c and $1.00
Advance tickets from L. L. A. Russian Children's Fund
64 EAST 7TH STREET ORCHARD 1617

JOHN COWPER POWYS
AT LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL
Fridays at 8:30 P. M.
"THE PSYCHOLOGY OF PEOPLES"
Oct. 15—The French People
" 22—The German People
" 29—The English People
Admission 50c 244 East 14th St., N.Y.C.

Russia, the Land of Contradictions*

By SHERWOOD EDDY

II

IN the light of these basic facts, may I evaluate some elements in the present situation in Russia that are evil and some that are good, certain things that seem to be a menace and others a possible contribution to the rest of the world. Among the evils I would list:

1. The severe abridgment of liberty. As the sympathetic British Trade Union delegation admits, "in practice there is a complete control not only of the press, the platform, and the political machinery but of the schools, the universities, and army." There is little liberty of the press, though a wide range of criticism of the Government is permitted provided it is not seditious. For the present, the Soviet officials frankly profess dictatorship rather than democracy. They believe that other countries have a veiled dictatorship of the privileged one-tenth, while they claim a frank dictatorship on behalf of the hitherto unprivileged nine-tenths who constitute the working masses. Their state control of life at almost every point is exceedingly irksome to any liberty-loving Anglo-Saxon, and one feels a weight has been suddenly lifted as he leaves the Russian frontier.

2. The Communist Party is frankly materialistic, atheistic, and anti-religious in its policy. This is not surprising when it is remembered that, despite the deep mystical religious piety of many of the Russian people, the revolution was not only against a corrupt state but against a reactionary church that often presented a sad caricature of religion, and at times was an adjunct of the police department and the spy system. Although the teaching of religion in the home is not forbidden, nor is preaching in the church, the organized religious instruction of youth under eighteen is. The churches seemed almost as well filled as before the war, but there was a conspicuous absence of youth.

The philosophy of the Communist Party is based upon force and their avowed policy is world revolution. This party has a membership in fifty-two countries and its plan of revolution is a frank challenge to our whole social order. The policy at this point is undoubtedly serious, but it need be feared only where rank injustice or misery leads the workers to despair or where liberty is denied. Mohammedanism has just such a program in theory, where according to the sacred Book all "infidels" are to be offered their choice between Islam, tribute, or the sword. But although this is their authoritative pronouncement, we do not feel ourselves in any real danger from Islam, either by its propaganda or by the sword. Our security is in the measure of our organized intelligence, justice, and liberty. It is so in the case of Russia. Our danger, if there is any, lies not in the strength of the Soviet system but in whatever weaknesses there may be in our own. These Soviet evils, however, are very real—the restriction of liberty, atheistic materialism, and a program of world revolution by violence.

An impartial standpoint calls for the appreciation of the good as well as condemnation of the evil in Russia. The following points may be noted:

1. There are elements of value in their ideal which play a powerful part in the shaping of the life of the people, even though they have not always lived up to them, as we have not to the principles of our own Declaration of Independence. "With the fundamental aim of suppressing all exploitation of man by man, of abolishing forever the division of society into classes, of suppressing all exploiters, . . . in order to exterminate all parasitic elements of society, . . . to deliver humanity from the grip of financial capital and imperialism . . . the Third All-Russian Congress . . . associated itself with the policy of the present Soviet administration in its repudiation of secret treaties . . . and in its efforts to attain at all costs a democratic workers' peace, . . . a peace without annexations or indemnities, on the basis of the free self-determination of nations." It aims "to end the domination of capitalism, make war impossible, wipe out state boundaries, transform the whole world into a cooperative commonwealth, and bring about real human brotherhood and freedom." All these things are to be accomplished not by a selfish scramble for special privileges but by cooperative endeavor, seeking equal justice for all.

Of all the Soviet ideals none is more remarkable than that the leaders of the largest united republic in the world should endeavor to rise above personal profit and sordid private gain to the standard of unselfish social service for the common good. It was a noteworthy advance in cooperation when the early Christians had all things in common and shared with all who were in need. It is praiseworthy when the missionary, the minister, the doctor, and the teacher accept a profession where public service and not private profit is the measure of worth. But what shall we say when the political and economic leaders of an entire nation rise to this height? No member of the Communist Party is permitted to receive an income of more than $112.50 a month, or $3.75 a day, or less than the wage of many day laborers in America, although writers may earn a little extra. The man who goes in for profiteering for himself is scorned almost as a moral leper as in no other country in the world, and if he is a member of the Communist Party, after a fair trial, he is executed or expelled. All but two of Lenin's cabinet had shared with him nearly twenty years in exile, poverty, or imprisonment. Whatever its name or label, many of these elements in their ideal are closely akin to the Christian virtues.

2. Russia provides a vast laboratory for social experiment. In a world often petrified in tradition and custom it may be of value to have at least one country free to test certain theories by a system of trial and error. Apart from a few high-minded intellectuals or men of noble birth and good family, like Lenin, who weathered the revolution and were seasoned in suffering, the Soviet system is on a vast scale a government of humble workingmen and peasants trained in the school of adversity in practical life. Many of them had no more schooling than Lincoln. Russia presents the first complete revolution in history in the entire political, economic, and social life of a people. Here for the first time on such a scale is attempted the full sharing of all privileges with the poorest. Here the best that can

*This is the concluding instalment of the report issued by the commission which Sherwood Eddy headed and which visited Russia in August of this year on an unofficial investigation of conditions there. The first instalment was published in the International Relations Section for October 13.

"AFTER 44 YEARS," says Hendrik Van Loon, "of plowing through unreadable stuff I got hold of The Story of Philosophy by Will Durant, and hasten to recommend it. Here at last is a book that has told me what I always wanted to know and never quite could discover."

What Others Say

HENRY HAZLITT in The New York Sun: I fear this volume will never be used as a textbook. It is too fascinating, too brilliant, too clear, too human.

JOHN DEWEY: Dr. Durant has humanized rather than merely popularized the story of philosophy.

FREDERICK NELSON in The Hartford Times: A brilliant piece of exposition, so swiftly moving and so exciting that we found the usual quota of novels dull in comparison.

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES in The Saturday Review: Here is a book to delight the heart. The character of the philosophers' problems and their answers have been presented with a persuasive clarity rarely equalled.

The Story of Philosophy is now available in a New Republic Edition. Like its predecessors in this special series, the Wells' Outline, Van Loon's History, Strachey's Queen Victoria, etc., it is an expensive book made inexpensive to our readers through a special printing of a large order. Our edition is identical with the regular $5.00 edition, except that the New Republic's ship emblem appears in blank on the cover.

With a year's subscription (regularly $5.00) the joint price is $7.50

Explanatory Comment

George A. Dorsey:
MAGNIFICENT!

Heywood Broun: EXCITING!

John Macy:
PROFOUND!

John Haynes Holmes:
PURE GOLD!

Stuart P. Sherman: FASCINATING!

Philadelphia Record:
BRILLIANT!

American Mercury:
EXCELLENT!

IN the past few years several shrewd thrusts have all but unseated the ancient idea that a non-fiction book, to be considered worthy, must be as dull as the doldrums. And now comes Will Durant with proof indisputable that even philosophy—that bashful ghost who is supposed to haunt only the darker nooks of stately lecture halls—can be made real, intelligible, and stirring to the lay reader. It's a book adapted as if by special design to the tastes of New Republic readers.

REPUBLIC
421 West 21st Street
New York City

For the enclosed $7.50 please enter my subscription to The New Republic for one year and send me postpaid "The Story of Philosophy."

NAME _____ STREET _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ N-10-20-26

be provided in science, art, music, the theater, the educational film, physical culture, recreation, and enjoyment, not for the favored few but for all the poor. Although only a third of the children are in school, because the country is so poor, yet the Government has determined that education shall be compulsory and free for all. Although too poor to carry all the new laws into immediate effect, Russia has the most advanced labor legislation in the world. In spite of its admitted bitter poverty it provides such relief for the poor, such social insurance for unemployment, for sickness, accident, old age, and every other disability that it puts America to shame with her often-neglected poor and her unscientific and unnecessary unemployment.

3. Finally, with all its own glaring evils and mixed motives, it may be a good thing to have a nation that stands as a challenge to all the rest of the world, wherever capitalism is ruthless, wherever imperialism has long exploited the weak, the poor, and the helpless nations and darker races, to free from "enslavement millions of laborers in Asia, in the colonies, and in the small nations." It may be a good thing to challenge the thought of the world as to how far China, Korea, the Philippines, India, Egypt, and Africa have a claim to autonomy in their own right, or how far they are merely a means for exploitation for the profit of the stronger imperialist nations.

Here stands a nation like an "Adversary," an instrument, a weapon against injustice everywhere, even though it has itself been most cruelly unjust to its own former exploiters. Does impoverished Russia challenge rich America for its backwardness in many of the most elemental forms of social insurance, in its frequent denial of the most elemental right of collective bargaining and the claims of labor unions to representatives of their own choosing; in its failure to regulate inordinate and excessive wealth and income when found side by side with poverty unrelieved; in its failure adequately to protect the farmer from exploitation and to extend the cooperative movement as has been done in Russia, England, Germany, Denmark, and other lands; and in the gradual extension of social control wherever it can be efficiently operated without graft and disgraceful party politics? No favor should make us unmindful of the glaring evils in Russia nor should Pharisaic hypocrisy blind us to the evils in our own land.

Practically all the American party favored recognition of the present Russian Government without in any way committing themselves to the approval of the Soviet system. I personally favor recognition on the basis of President Coolidge's message to Congress of December 6, 1923. It has not been the policy of the United States to base recognition of other governments upon approval of their practices. Did we approve of all the evils of the Romanoffs, the Hohenzollerns, the Hapsburgs, or the Sultans of Turkey? The present Government has proved itself a stable and enduring government of the Russian people. There is no alternative in sight. All the other leading nations of the world have recognized the Soviet Government and established trade relations with it. Our American party believes it is not compatible with our economic interests or our moral ideals further to withhold recognition. To refuse recognition will breed growing suspicion, hostility, and hatred. Logically the ultimate alternatives are either trade and cooperation or the possibility of war.

No policy of peace or world disarmament, no plan for the economic recovery of Europe and of the world can succeed which ignores the crucial position of Russia. Is it better to drive Russia into opposition as an outcast Ishmael among the nations, to stir up trouble in every discontented nation and class, or to bind her hand and foot with trade agreements, treaties, and relationships into the cooperative life of the world? Was it better to outlaw Germany as an enemy or bring her as a cooperating friend into the League of Nations? Positively, in proportion as the present Government of Russia is stabilized and bound by trade agreements and political obligations the whole policy of the Third International for world revolution is defeated. And conversely, in proportion as the Government of Russia is driven into the position of an enemy outlaw we unwittingly further the cause of world revolution.

President Coolidge in his message to Congress said: "I am willing to make very large concessions for the purpose of rescuing the Russian people. . . . Whenever there appears any disposition to compensate our citizens who were despoiled, and to recognize that debt contracted with our Government, not by the Czar but by the newly formed Republic of Russia; whenever the active spirit of enmity to our institutions is abated, . . . our country ought to be the first to go to the economic and moral rescue of Russia." These three conditions the Russian Government is ready to fulfil, and through its Foreign Minister in his note to the President of December 16, 1923, has "announced its readiness to enter into negotiations with the American Government and to remove all misunderstandings and differences between the two countries." Yet for three years we have refused even to confer with them as to their readiness to meet our own conditions. Mr. Hughes put his finger on the crucial point at issue between the two countries when he said: "Most serious is the continued propaganda to overthrow the institutions of this country." There is evidence to show that since Lenin, Stalin, and Chicherin won the day for the policy of the fulfilment of economic and political agreements the present Government of Russia does not and will not interfere with our Government by propaganda or otherwise, but the Third International, composed of the Communists of fifty-two nations, has and will continue to work for revolution by propaganda and all other means. This they can do with much greater freedom if the Soviet Government is not recognized by the United States than if the foreign ministers and representatives of both governments were present in Moscow and Washington to stand watch over any agreements made between the two countries.

To realize this dual relationship let us take an illustration. Suppose the people of India had protested to Mr. Hughes against the propaganda of foreign missions which was attempting to overthrow Hinduism and establish Christianity in India. He could truthfully have replied that our Government financially does not and never would support such propaganda, but that it neither would nor could prevent voluntary missionary societies from so doing. As an individual churchman Mr. Hughes might have contributed to this missionary propaganda. Now the Russian Government is much too busy at home fighting for its very life to interfere with our government in America. But individual Communists cannot, will not, and do not desire to prevent the activities of the fifty-two nations in the Third International from so doing.

At two points the illustration of India is not parallel. The missionary propaganda is one of moral suasion, while

BONDS

Mexican Government & Railroad Bonds

These bonds at prevailing prices offer attractive investment and speculative possibilities.

Detailed information furnished on request. Correspondence invited.

J. SANTILHANO
Specialist in Mexican Issues
50 Broad Street Tel. Han. 4419

THEATER

Modjacot Shpeel
Yiddish Marionette Theatre
95 Second Ave. Orchard 7162
Playing every evening except Saturday and Sunday matinees
THE DYBUK, and other
Puppet plays

FOR RENT

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL, N. Y.

LIVE in a modern, fireproof hotel by the seashore for less than in the crowded city. Homelike comforts, moderate priced restaurant, maid, valet and telephone service. Winter rates: $12 per week for two. 37 minutes from Times Square, B.M.T. Phone Esplanade 3000.

POSITIONS WANTED

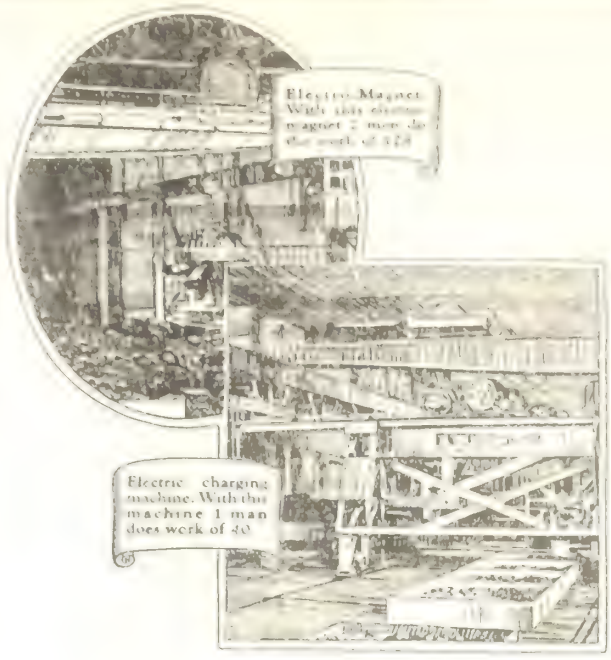
PRIVATE [illegible] Research. Ph.D., German, French, English Literature. Preparatory, college subjects. Translations. Research. Librarian. Travel [illegible]. Mary 5947 or Box 561, care The Nation.

SENIOR [illegible] wants [illegible] work. Box [illegible], care The Nation.

BOOKS

THAT BOOK YOU WANT!

We hold 1,250,000 vols., second hand and new, every conceivable subject. Books on approval. Also Rare Books, Out-of-Print Books, and sets of Authors. Catalogues free (20 issued). Outline requirements and interests.



FOYLES, 121 Charing Cross Road, LONDON, ENGLAND

PUPPIES FOR SALE

COLLIE Puppies that will bring joy to the kiddies and the grown-ups as well. Handsome, pedigreed dogs with character, disposition and intelligence bred in them. Not kennel dogs. On approval anywhere. Newtown Square 75-W. W. N. Van Dyck, Broomall, Delaware Co., Pa.

MISCELLANEOUS

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One Policy, One System, Universal Service

"Nobody lifts anything—nobody sweats" said Sir Ernest Benn, an eminent British publicist, after a tour of America's industrial plants. He was deeply impressed with our vast investment in labor-saving machines.

American industry employs hundreds of ingenious machines to save men from grueling tasks. And, wherever electricity is broadly applied, the worker's day is shorter, he is well paid, and he accomplishes much.

There are in America industries so vast that each would need the man-power of half the nation if there were no machines such as these with their General Electric motors. In every step of manufacture, mining and forestry, through mill and factory, motors do the manual tasks with great saving of men and money.

GENERAL ELECTRIC

AURORA HEALTH FARM Mendham Road MORRISTOWN NEW JERSEY
Not a sanitarium; not a boarding-house
Beautiful country: elevation 700 ft.: only one hour from New York. Open all year. Suitable for those requiring diet, electro- and hydro-therapy. Ideal for rest and convalescence. Personal medical [illegible]. Homelike atmosphere. No bed-ridden, contagious or [illegible] cases.
ROBERT SCHULMAN, M. D., Medical Director.
ADOLPH [illegible], M. D., Associate Physician.
Telephone—MORRISTOWN 1 8 2 0.

Your Fall Problems

If you want to rent a house or an apartment or if you have one to rent—or sell, advertise in the classified section of The Nation, read by honest landlords and desirable tenants. Rates on application. Special three-time rate. Dept. F. P., The Nation.

True food is the foundation of Good health
Fresh Vegetables
Whole Wheat Products
Satisfying Diet for Diabetics
No animal fat used
Trufood VEGETARIAN RESTAURANT
153 W. 44th St., East of Broadway

IDEALISTS, THINKERS, TRUTH SEEKERS:—
The Creed of Natural Religion (a folder) is FREE to you. Elements of Honest Law sells for one dollar and every cent realized goes to help Honest Law and Natural Religion. [illegible]
Lever 700 N. 43rd Street Philadelphia, Pa.

the Communists rely upon force; and the organized Communist Party stands behind and dominates both the present Russian Government and the Third International. Facing these same factors, however, and hating Bolshevism as much as we do, the governments of Britain, Germany, and France have recognized the present Government of Russia, have entered into trade agreements which are scrupulously fulfilled, and believe that they are better able to fight the Third International with Russia bound than with an outlaw free whom they cannot control or defeat. We, therefore, advocate the recognition of the Soviet Government on the basis of President Coolidge's proposals. We would absolutely oppose the Third International, not by violence or by falsehood but by putting our own house in order. We would remove all just causes of discontent on the part of labor, and establish such a system of justice, freedom, enlightenment, and prosperity that labor will no more want revolution and Russian poverty than it will want either the sword or propaganda of Islam, much as it may respect the devotees of that or any other religion.

Upon returning from Russia I was sorry to see garbled sentences of a sensational character misquoting remarks made by me in Moscow and associating the American group with the Y. M. C. A., with which, of course, it had not the remotest connection. While in Russia I spoke three times. The first was in response to an address of welcome by the Society of Cultural Relations. While not whitewashing Russia nor making a sweeping condemnation of other countries as represented, I did say that Russia would, with all her own faults, stand as a challenge wherever capitalism or imperialism were ruthless. As I said repeatedly in Russia, I am not a Communist or a Socialist; I am in a modest way a capitalist; and with all the shortcomings of our own social order, I believe we can best work out a solution by an evolutionary, educational, constructive program, based upon Christian principles and not by the revolutionary, destructive program of Communism.

My second address was at a meeting where we frankly laid before the Russian leaders our criticisms of all the evil of their system, including their abridgment of liberty, their policy of world revolution, the lack of security for trade if based upon a revolutionary policy, and the unjust and unscientific teaching of dogmatic atheism to their youth under eighteen, while they forbid the organized teaching of religion to them. The third meeting was in an open debate upon religion in Moscow. During my visit there I said to a friend: "Fourteen years ago I was conducting religious meetings in this city under the Czar's rule. I venture the prophecy that within five years I shall do so again with the full approval of the present Government." The most enlightened member of our party said it would never take place. That prophecy was fulfilled not within five years but within five days.

During our meeting for criticism when I asked the Soviet leaders why Russia was the only important country in the world where I was not permitted to hold religious meetings the editor of the Atheist replied that I had liberty for such meetings. To test his statement I challenged him to a public debate on the following Sunday, upon whether or not there was a God and a rational ground for religion. At three days' notice the hall was filled, all of the thousand seats were sold, the proceeds being donated to a children's home. The debate lasted for nearly five hours, when the hall had to be cleared for another meeting. There was apparent the same deep heart hunger, the same vital interest in religion that audiences had shown fourteen years before, when without police permits we were holding meetings in the students' rooms during an epidemic of suicide under the Czars. This was the first time in nine years such a debate had been held by a foreigner, but I believe it will not be the last. A considerable measure of liberty, as guaranteed by the constitution, will probably be consistently maintained.

On my last day in Moscow at eight o'clock in the evening I joined the company of two thousand waiting each night in the long line for the doors to be opened at Lenin's tomb. From eight to nine each evening, six nights a week, some thousands of the youth of Russia file by, year in and year out, in silence before the body of a man who they believe lived with a passion for humanity, after twenty years in poverty, prison, and exile, only to fall from the final effects of an assassin's bullet after a life-long struggle against a system that he believed was one of fundamental economic injustice. The great writer Gorki could not picture Lenin "without the beautiful dream of the future happiness of all mankind, the dream of a bright and joyful life." He speaks of "his almost womanly tenderness for his fellows"; and writes "an ode to the sacred frenzy of heroes, among whom Lenin is the most heroic and most frenzied of all." With almost passionate devotion a Lenin cult is developing among the youth of Russia. Near by Lenin's tomb stood the shrine of the Iberian Virgin with peasants crossing themselves and praying for miraculous healing and blessing. Just above it was the inscription "Religion the opium of the people."

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER is a European correspondent of The Nation.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, editor of The Nation, spent last summer in Europe.

ANITA BRENNER wrote The Jew in Mexico in The Nation of August 27, 1924.

JOSEPH KRIMSKY is a practicing physician of New York City.

BENJAMIN C. MARSH is the managing director of the Farmers' National Council.

JACOB ZEITLIN is professor of English at the University of Illinois.

LUCIEN PRICE wrote Witchcraft: Then and Now in The [illegible] April 1922.

TENNEY FRANK is the author of "Roman Imperialism" and "Economic History of Rome."

WILLIAM MACDONALD is the author of "Three Centuries of Democracy in America."

SHERWOOD EDDY has just returned from Russia.

SENATOR R. F. PETTIGREW wrote not long before his death a remarkable book entitled IMPERIAL WASHINGTON, of which The Nation said:

"Twelve years a South Dakota representative in the Senate gave him first-hand knowledge of politico-economic currents, of intrigues, 'deals', steals, of the interplay of forces behind the scenes. He knew personally ten presidents. He speaks therefore with unexceptionable authority. . . . It is a stirring human document, irresistible in many of its facts and in its fervor."

Cloth, xxi pages, $1.25 postpaid.

Charles H. Kerr & Company, 347 E. Ohio Street, Chicago

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1926 No. 3[illegible]

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 415

EDITORIALS

Twelfth and Twenty-first 417

Closing Up the Shops 418

Dumping Europe 419

Peace in the Encyclopedia 420

AMERICA, OVERLORD OF EUROPE. By Oswald Garrison Villard 421

THE SAINTS ON STAINED GLASS. By Hildegarde Melville 423

DAUBERTY AT THE BAR. By Elmer Meis 425

SILENT CAL'S SILENT PARTNER. By A Former Journalist 426

THE IMMIGRANT PRESS AT ELECTION TIME. By Albert Parry 428

TWENTY YEARS OF ADOLESCENCE. By Marion Bachrach 428

IN THE DEADWAY. By the Drifter 429

CORRESPONDENCE 430

BOOKS AND PLAYS:

Rome. By Virginia Moore 431

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 431

Washington at Last? By Claude G. Bowers 432

Proof of the Pudding. By Joseph Wood Krutch 432

New Ways with an Old Formality. By Alice Beal Parsons 433

Primitive Mentality. By Joseph Jastrow 434

Books in Brief 434

Opera: The Maid of Werfel. By Joseph Wood Krutch 435

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Japan Returns to Feudalism. By Harry Emerson Wildes 436

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR
FREDA KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR
MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: No. 38 South Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London W. C. 1, England.

THE FAILURE OF THE JURY to convict the ex-Attorney General, Harry M. Daugherty, and the Alien Property Custodian, Thomas W. Miller, is not as disheartening as it appears. It was an extremely difficult case because, the statute of limitations having run, these men could not be tried on the direct charge of bribery, but only on the charge of having conspired to accept bribes. That rendered the task of the prosecuting officer extremely difficult and this particular jury could not be convinced. We sincerely hope that the District Attorney, Emory R. Buckner, will not be deterred from moving for an early retrial. If so, we trust he will this time follow the suggestions made from time to time in these columns as set forth in the article by Mr. Mels elsewhere in this issue. No stone must be left unturned to bring these men to justice, or to establish their innocence. They should be eager for a retrial. If the case is dropped now it will simply strengthen the prevailing popular belief that there is one kind of justice for men who can pay their lawyers $50,000 or $60,000 and another for the poor men who fall into the clutches of the law. It is admitted that Daugherty destroyed bank records to cover up his actions and that some of Merton's Liberty bonds passed to Mr. Miller's account. Shall people say that Republican politics prevented the bringing out of the truth and convicting these men?

ONE OF MUSSOLINI'S COLLEAGUES, after denying assorted reports that Mussolini was about to undergo an operation and to declare war on Turkey, that the chief of the Fascisti had resigned and that he was buying up Portuguese colonies cheap, continued

> I am just about tired of denying reports such as these. If things continue in this way I shall have to establish a special office for denying falsehoods.

His Excellency might find it cheaper to let the opposition press and the foreign correspondents function freely. As it is, with the responsible unfriendly press suppressed no one takes any denial at face value and any hostile rumor is taken seriously abroad. If Mussolini wants the friendly truth believed he must set the unfriendly truth free too. Censorship of a nation's news is an admission of weakness and an invitation to liars.

RUSSIA in these days is not so much censoring the news as trying to censor the production of news. The statement of the opposition leaders within the Communist Party, repudiating their manner of opposition, is an extraordinary document.

> We disagreed with the majority of the Central Committee [it said] on a number of principal problems. These views we still retain. But we categorically repudiate the theory and practice of the freedom of forming groups and fractions. . . . We declare that we definitely give up fractional methods of defense of our views because of the danger of such methods for the unity of the party.

Here is the doctrine of party discipline frank and unlovely. These men have fought for principles in which they still believe but, for the sake of party unity, they renounce the struggle. They would make of the party an inhuman supermachine and of its members mere mechanical units. In a time of crisis such a doctrine can be understood; in the long run it can only lead to a deadening uniformity. As a matter of fact these men deny their own interpretation of history. Their opposition is not born out of their own heads; it grew out of the changing social structure of the soviet state, and the same economic forces which have thrust them into opposition in the past (as Louis Fischer will show in an early issue of The Nation) will throw them or others into a new workers' opposition in the future. Economics and personality have thrown Stalin and Trotzky into conflict before, and will again. Lenin foresaw their personal incompatibility with uncanny accuracy. Max Eastman has just revealed Lenin's long-concealed "testament." Trotzky, he said, was "the most able man" in the Central Committee, but suffered by his "too far-reaching self-confidence" and absorption in administration. Stalin, he thought, suffered from "administrative impulsiveness," lacked patience, and was too much a nationalist. Stalin now holds the reins, and Trotzky's second revolt has failed in its first attack. But permanent peace cannot be built upon the cornerstone of bureaucratic autocracy.

THE WAR IS OVER in Czecho-Slovakia. Germans have been admitted to the Cabinet. Hitherto ministries have been composed as nationalist coalitions—Czech Socialists, agrarians, and conservatives uniting against similar assortments of Germans and Slovaks. It was ridiculous; it was war. German schools and theaters were closed; the use of the German language was proscribed. The years have dampened resentments born of Austrian rule and minimized racial self-consciousness. The new Czech Cabinet is a bourgeois coalition; and Czech and German Socialists will fight arm in arm against it. This is common sense. Nearly a third of the young republic's population is German; under any normal regime its interests are as divided as those of the warring parties that make up Germany. If the new coalition means that the Czechs have given up their hope of turning German children into little Bohemians, they may end by finding themselves nearer their goal of national unity than they had dreamed. Czecho-Slovakia's declaration of peace has a meaning far outside its borders. The Versailles provisions for the protection of national minorities have not worked; Poland and Rumania still find dissonant groups of persecuted races at odds with the nationalist powers that be. The Czechs point the way out.

CANTON'S CONQUERING ARMIES are sweeping on in Central China, to the consternation of those treaty-port foreigners who have cheerfully minimized the nationalist movement. Their successes, indeed, have reached the danger-point. Lesser militarists are tumbling out of opposition into alliance with them. This produces immediate victories; but it dilutes the spirit which has made Canton. Have these patriotic Southerners leaders enough to train in Sun Yat-sen's principles all the brigand armies that are falling into their arms? Feng Yu-hsiang's difficulties were partly due to similar successes in the North; the Christian general found that allies who came to him in moments of triumph could not be counted upon in the hour of trial. Chiang Kai-shek, the Canton general, after leveling the ancient walls of Wuchang, opposite Hankow on the Yangtze in the heart of China, has moved down the great river and threatens Shanghai, the metropolis at its mouth. Revolts have weakened Sun Chuan-fong's rear, and the students, always fervent nationalists, are organizing in the centers of opposition to Canton. This tactic, learned from the Russians, of winning civilian support to an army, is peculiarly effective in China.

NAVY DAY is celebrated in the United States on October 27, the birthday of Theodore Roosevelt, one of the navy's staunchest friends. And while the Navy League urges an America "strong enough to gain respect for its ideals" the Reserve Officers Association of the United States pleads for action against the subversive organizations which are so unpatriotic as to be working for peace. The Association to Abolish War, the Association for Peace Education, the Intercollegiate Peace Association, the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Woman's International League for Peace and Freedom, the Woman's Peace Society—these are among the fierce and predatory organizations from which the Reserve Officers are trying to protect the country. Of course they have mellifluous and soft-sounding names; but the dangerous fact is that these societies are really opposed to war; they want war to be abolished! Probably if these groups of wrong-headed persons had their way they would eradicate the army root and branch. "As a Reserve Officer," pleads the president of the association, "don't you believe it is your obligation to be informed of the forces constantly working against preparedness?" Indeed, and indeed. And in order to stop this dangerous trend in our modern society, why not follow the suggestion of Major General Mark L. Hersey? The General wants military training for girls as well as boys; not rough, manly drill, of course, but bugle bands or fife-and-drum corps. If you catch the female young enough and subject her to the advantage of military discipline almost from the cradle, will you not have fewer women's societies working for peace, that un-American goal?

THE BOTTOM HAS FALLEN out of cotton prices, due to the anticipated over-production of this year's crop. Government surveys show from two to four million more bales than world markets can absorb at prices which net the farmer a reasonable return. At the ruinous prices forecast, a slump of $500,000,000 in the purchasing power of the South is inevitable, with a resulting backwash in the automobile, radio, furniture, textile, and other manufacturing industries. In these desperate circumstances a meeting was called in Memphis of governors, heads of cooperatives, bankers, United States Senators, and business men. At the ominous hour of midnight, October 12, resolutions were passed demanding that 4,000,000 bales of this year's crop be held in storage. This was to be financed by the Federal Intermediate Land Banks, the last days of October being set aside as "acreage reduction week," in which a drive for a 25 per cent reduction in acreage next year should be made. The Government is being petitioned from all sides to aid both in financing and in acreage reduction. All of this puts the Administration in a most uncomfortable situation because of the strong line which Mr. Hoover and his friends have taken in respect to acreage reduction of rubber by the British Government. Rubber and cotton are not far from the same basic cost per pound to produce, but at the present writing the former sells for about four times as much, and the clamor of the cotton-grower for some of the same medicine is understandable. Restriction of production to meet requirements is rudimentary common sense. We hope it can displace, in cotton and many other things, the tragic chaos and waste of laissez-faire—provided always that ample requirements are allowed for in the budget, and that an artificial shortage is not created, raising prices against the ultimate consumer.

WHEN WHITE MEETS YELLOW on the Pacific Coast it is usually the latter who is the victim. Hence one sits up and takes notice when it appears that the tables have been turned in Oakland, California. At least we read in the newspaper of the University of California, the Daily Californian, of September 30 that > Parents of the striking students of the John Swett School in Oakland were threatened with arrest yesterday by Fred M. Hunter, superintendent of schools. The charge would be the violation of the State compulsory-education law.

>
> All but thirty-seven of the white students of the school have been removed by their parents as a protest against the continued refusal of the school authorities to deny the eighteen Chinese pupils entrance to the regular classes.
>
> A committee of the mothers of the striking students, armed with affidavits that the superintendent had promised the removal of the Chinese, have canvassed the district in an attempt to have the parents of the remaining thirty-seven white children withdraw them from the school.

The school authorities are entitled to all praise for standing up so unflinchingly in behalf of the Chinese pupils, but are they wise in attempting to punish the outraged white parents? A little studious neglect might serve better. The parents and their children are enough punished through deprivation of school privileges. Leave them alone, and, like Little Bo Peep, they will come home, probably not wagging their tails but carrying them discreetly between their legs.

IN THE OLD DAYS the railroads openly gave rebates to politicians and pressmen and others whose favors they desired. Nowadays they do it only a little less crudely. The Daily Worker (Chicago) quotes from a circular sent by the secretary of the Illinois Press Association, before its annual meeting at the University of Illinois, to editors and publishers in the home State of Mr. Insull:

> Those who would like to do so can write to the railroads for transportation the same as they have done in the past. In other words, you go to the ticket agent and buy your ticket, take a receipt for the money paid for this ticket, send the receipt to the railroad company passing through your city and they will give you enough advertising to pay for the amount of the ticket. This applies to yourself, all members of your family, and any members of your newspaper staff. The number is not limited.

The Worker calls this "plain and open bribery of the press arranged so as to evade the laws which prohibit the issuance of passes by railroads to others than their employees." We would like to know what the Committee on Ethics of the Illinois Press Association calls it.

ALL HAIL THE MORALS of Indiana—of Jeffersonville, Indiana, to be precise. And all hail the pupils of the Jeffersonville school who are protected from subversive influences by the forthright action of their principal. The latter gentleman knows a pair of legs when he sees one; he knows that legs are improper when they are female; consequently, when a nine-year-old schoolgirl comes to school in knickers, revealing the fact that she is bifurcated above the knees, he knows that his duty bids him send her home, thus sparing the rest of the pupils the horrid sight. For three weeks Virginia Aleen's mother, who seems to have decided that there was something not quite sound in the principal's attitude, has sent Virginia, attired in knickers, to school in the morning and after lunch. And for three weeks, twice a day, the principal, strong in his righteousness, has sent her home. Right-thinking persons in this great nation who agree that a nine-year-old girl in knickers is a corrupting and dangerous spectacle will rejoice that our youth is to be kept pure in Jeffersonville at least, and that education progresses apace—but not on two legs. Never that.

OUR ESTEEMED CONTEMPORARY, the Philadelphia Public Ledger, has, or thinks it has, or thinks it might have a considerable number of Roman Catholic readers. Naturally, therefore, it takes no chances on hurting their feelings. During the World Series between the New York and St. Louis baseball teams a high panjandrum in the office of the Public Ledger noticed that the players of the latter city were referred to in a 48-point head as "Cardinals." Never again, said he. It might offend some pious churchman, and orders were issued throughout the office accordingly. The next day, therefore, dispatches from St. Louis were edited so as to eliminate the dread word. The city was said to be gay with "Card colors" and "Red Bird posters." The article continued: "One large poster called the Card 'Our National Bird.'" But somehow the cartoonist was forgotten. Innocently he made a drawing showing two figures, New York and St. Louis, in a race. St. Louis was distinguished by—a cardinal's hat! The cartoon got into one edition. Then a hurricane swept through the office [illegible] which the late blow at Miami was a zephyr. The next edition contained another cartoon—by another cartoonist. It depicted a gnome sitting on the branch of a tree painting the autumn foliage. The caption was "Jack Frost." We wonder if Philadelphia's Roman Catholics are duly appreciative of the tender way in which their feelings have been coddled.

A PLOT OF GROUND five feet by ten is not much for a garden. But to the children of New York's East Side, where crowded tenements spill their contents of humans and animals and general house-furnishings all over the street, it can be a little paradise. Five feet by ten: but fifty square feet of earth uncontaminated by glass bottles and old shoes; fifty square feet of dirt—good dirt, not nasty dirt; fifty square feet of property in the confines of which the temporary owner is his own master. He may plant radishes to eke out the family larder or American Beauty roses to soothe his own soul. He puts the seed in the ground and before his eyes the miracle is enacted; the seeds sprout, the sprouts rise, the leaves open, the buds appear, the flower and fruit follow in their time. This cycle of the year, ignored as commonplace by more fortunate ones, is brought into the slums of New York under the auspices of the New York Plant, Flower, and Fruit Guild; the gardens are on Rockefeller Institute land, in Avenue A. Twelve years ago, when the plan was first tried out, eighty children responded; this year a thousand came and two hundred had to be turned away. But there are other empty lots and vacant corners in the city. Surely this is the most intelligent, the most far-sighted, and the most profitable use to which such places, ordinarily the repository for every sort of refuse, could be put.

WE HAVE WELCOMED the Crown Prince of Sweden, and Trudy, and Mother Corson, and Suzanne, and Queen Marie. Broadway has cheered, and ticker tape has feathered the air; the khaki boys have marched, the bands have played, and Mayor Walker has welcomed the national guests with appropriate—brief—speeches. If only the Mayor could solve the subway problem as well as he solves the problem of welcoming speeches! An historian might interpret American popular psychology by studying the Sunday-supplement photographs of these crowds. As a matter of fact, Queen Marie, despite the enormous blare of newspaper publicity that foreshadowed her coming, did not get a tithe of the welcome that greeted Trudy, and not as much as did Suzanne. We have a fondness for tinsel crowns in these days, but we love the laurel wreaths of athletic championship still more. There was a time when America would have hissed a king or queen; that, doubtless, was silly, but linked with it was a passion for the men who fought tyranny in Europe which we might regain. We named streets after Kosciuszko; we sent a ship down the harbor to greet Kossuth; but in 1924 we refused to let Karolyi speak, and in 1926 we do not even know that behind Marie's fifty Paris dresses are the groans of thousands of political prisoners clapped into jail without trial, and the cruelty of Europe's rottenest "aristocracy."

Tweedledum and Tweedledee

THE indications are that the Coolidge Republicans will lose control of the Senate and probably of the House. We are strengthened in this belief by the tips being sent out from Washington from news sources favorable to Mr. Coolidge that, if the election goes against him, he will interpret it as having no possible meaning in regard to national policies. The various elections, it is being explained on behalf of the President, have degenerated into purely local contests and, therefore, have no bearing whatever upon any national issue. Nevertheless, knowing the ways of politicians, we are perfectly certain that if the election should result as Mr. Coolidge wishes it to, the heavens would ring with Republican assertions that the people have overwhelmingly sustained the President, his every wish, his every utterance, his every act, his every policy. That it is necessary now to discount defeat through the avenues of Coolidge publicity is proof that the White House expects the worst.

Yet we, too, believe that the election, however it goes, cannot be interpreted as a mandate on any single issue, any more than could most of the recent primaries. This is not so much because the elections have degenerated into local contests as because the opposition stands for nothing, offers nothing, and affords no hope of any constructive reforms. We do not doubt that those are correct who, like Mark Sullivan, declare that the Democrats do not wish to control Congress. If they did they would be called upon to think, to act, to be consistent, and to plan; and Heaven knows they are totally incapable of these things. Never did Congressional leadership so collapse as did that of the Democrats during the last session of Congress. The session seemed to begin brilliantly for the opposition. There were any number of openings in the armor of the Administration. The farm issue was at hand as if made to order, particularly in its relationship to the tariff. Nothing happened. What leadership there was passed to, or rather remained with, the insurgent Republicans. A couple of skilful, vigorous debaters on the Democratic side, such as are to be found by the dozen in the British Parliament, could have made the Administration as sick and sorry-looking as it deserved to be, providing, of course, that they were backed up by their party. But their party was without harmony as it is without guidance or principle. It not only upheld Mellon, it sought to outdo him in tax benefits to the rich. It had no policy of its own in regard to the war debts—or anything else. It is so shot to pieces on the question of the tariff that it is impossible to conceive of its drafting an honest or radical tariff-reform bill if it should control Congress. Why should there be a rush to vote for it?

It is fortunate, therefore, that there are at least local issues in some States; that here and there a colorful personality like that of "Al" Smith should stir public interest, and that in three States, at least, Indiana, Illinois, and Pennsylvania, questions of civic righteousness should be presented to the electorate. So confused is the situation as to the Wets and Drys that there will be no possibility of either side's claiming a decisive victory. In some cases, too, the choice between the candidates is so poor that one should not be surprised if the vote should prove to be the smallest in years. Why, for instance, should anyone care whether Senator Willis, or his opponent, ex-Senator Atlee W. Pomerene, is chosen to represent Ohio? Both are windbags of incredible dulness. In New York, on the other hand, the contest is between Senator James W. Wadsworth, Jr., and Justice Robert F. Wagner, a Tammany man of German ancestry, of the same type as "Al" Smith. Senator Wadsworth is a militarist to the backbone, an imperialist, a devout upholder of the present order. He carries on the narrowest Republican traditions, but we must add that he does it with a boldness and directness most unusual in politicians, and we cannot withhold from him our praise for his courage in taking an unequivocal stand on the liquor issue. When it comes to the details of legislation he is useful in the Senate, yet his defeat is, we believe, most desirable.

In Illinois, in Indiana, in Pennsylvania the issue is one of corruption in political life. Since the prospects are for the election both of Congressman Vare in Pennsylvania and of Colonel Frank G. Smith in Illinois, it is at least satisfactory to note that there is small chance of their being allowed to take their seats. The voting in those States and in Indiana where the Republican Party has been a mere tool of the Ku Klux Klan will be significant only as it indicates whether or not the American electorate is beginning to turn against the wholesale corruption in our public life.

In Colorado there is a most interesting contest for the Senatorship between ex-Governor Sweet, a good liberal, and Charles W. Waterman, with the chances favoring Mr. Sweet. In Oregon there is a three-cornered fight, variously depicted as turning upon the Administration of President Coolidge and as not having anything to do with it. Senator Stanfield's independent candidacy in defiance of his party leaders makes the Democrats hopeful that they may obtain a seat in that State. In Maryland Representative Tydings is certain to defeat his Republican opponent, Senator Weller. In far-away Arizona and Nevada the sitting members, Senators Cameron and Oddie, are opposed by able and vigorous Democrats whose election is much to be desired. As for Massachusetts, every possible effort is being made to reelect Senator Butler, whose candidacy is treated at length elsewhere in this issue of The Nation. However one may rate the statesmanship of David I. Walsh, no one who believes in the old-fashioned principles of liberty and free speech in America can vote for Senator Butler, who has demanded that there shall not only be no criticism of a President in war time, but that no unfavorable comment shall be permitted in time of peace.

For the present the hope of political progress in America continues to lie in the independent Senators of Republican faith, headed by the veteran George W. Norris of Nebraska, who has again shown his high-minded patriotism by campaigning in Pennsylvania against Congressman Vare, the candidate of his own party. It is heartening, indeed, that this group will be reinforced by Governor Blaine of Wisconsin, by the reelection of ex-Senator Brookhart in Iowa, and of Senator Nye in North Dakota. If in their hands should lie the balance of power in the Senate the country might rejoice. Meanwhile, this election merely emphasizes anew the need for an honest and able third party, for lack of which our whole political life languishes.

Cleaning Up the Slums

HENRY FORD set sail with the magnificent assurance to get the boys out of the trenches by Christmas. Now comes Mr. August Heckscher sailing back to get the men and women out of the slums of New York by Easter—or thereabouts. The impulse in each case was, and is as decent and generous as the practical realization is dubious. But perhaps Mr. Heckscher has a better fighting chance. His proposal certainly deserves more than the shrug of the shoulders which the embattled realtors will give it.

August Heckscher, as all the world knows, is one of those super-philanthropists indigenous to the American scene. His $4,000,000 Children's Foundation, his parks and his playgrounds, have given him no little front-page space, and have done no little good. When he proposed a $40,000,000 farm for educating slum children, New York City officials said that the money could be spent to better effect in the slums themselves. Whereupon, as a "special emissary" of Mayor Walker, Mr. Heckscher went abroad and proceeded to make a study of slum-reclamation projects in Europe—particularly in London, Berlin, and Hamburg. He found Berlin, for all the financial pressure she was under, putting $40,000,000 into housing for the poor last year, while London appropriated $34,000,000 for the same purpose. Both were municipal, not private-charity, enterprises. Meanwhile, he points out, tenements in New York which were condemned in 1885 as unfit for human habitation are still good rent-producers, with forty years' depreciation added to their unspeakable wretchedness. He finds that 70 per cent of New York families have incomes of less than $2,500 per year, thus utterly barring them from adequate housing facilities.

In this impasse he proposes—take a deep breath—that "500 wealthy and public-spirited citizens each promise a contribution of $100,000 annually for five years." The State and city of New York shall jointly contribute a like sum over the same period. This will provide $500,000,000 "to get away to a real start on New York's most pressing and immediate problem." The total cost of eliminating the city's slums he places at $1,500,000,000. "The job could be completed in from ten to fifteen years."

He plans five-story "walk-ups," with perhaps some ten-story model tenements equipped with fool-proof automatic elevators. He plans buildings more attractive than the English type, with shade trees, playgrounds, and plenty of air-space between. For himself, Mr. Heckscher is said to have promised many millions of his personal fortune.

Now, this is an honest and altogether generous proposal. The difficulties are practical ones, and reflect no discredit on Mr. Heckscher's praiseworthy revolt from an intolerable and degrading situation. He speaks the utter truth when he says: "New York's slums are a disgrace to the city and the nation. So are those of other great American cities." Better a thousand times that his plan be carried out, whatever its shortcomings, than that nothing should be done at all.

The first difficulty is to find 500 millionaires with even a tithe of Mr. Heckscher's sense of social obligation. Granting that they can be found, the next difficulty is to yoke them in double harness with the city and State governments. Governor Smith last spring proposed a housing law in which public authority should take the lead, with no philanthropy in the enterprise at all. The bill received very wide and very favorable attention, including that of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. The Republicans blocked certain cardinal provisions as a matter of practical politics, but who doubts that Governor Smith will return to the engagement? To this proposal Mr. Heckscher pays not the slightest attention, if indeed he has heard of it at all. Granted that the two plans have equal chances of ultimate realization, there is no question that a straightforward job on the part of the State is infinitely to be preferred to a quasi-charitable enterprise in which control falls between three stools. If undertaken by public legislation, furthermore, all housing improvement would fall under some rough conception of regional planning; care would be taken, with the power to enforce it, that the elimination of slums in Manhattan should not mean their prompt development in Brooklyn and the Bronx. Under the Heckscher plan this might readily prove to be the case.

The task is too great, and the ramifications too widespread, to be solved successfully by private charity—even in nine figures. The Smith program is indeed the reverse of the shield of private charity. That the man on horseback should fling a saddlebag of gold to the crowd still remains something less than justice. Free citizens should build their own houses, and should finance them by such levies as will tend to keep land speculators and bankers permanently off their horses. Until this day of reckoning comes, we must perforce welcome all honest slumming-parties.

Investors, Beware!

THE Supreme Court has just rendered a decision which marks an epoch in American history. It has confirmed the confiscation by the Alien Property Custodian of some 4,500 patents, worth perhaps half a billion dollars, for which the nominal sum of $50 each was deposited in the Treasury. The Supreme Court admits that this is confiscation, but states that the confiscation of private enemy property is not unconstitutional, that the procedure did not violate the criminal law or commit fraud, and that the confirmation of the deal by President Wilson placed the sanction of validity upon it. The Supreme Court did not say, as indeed it could not say, that the transaction was not grossly violative of international law.

The patents thus acquired were distributed by the Chemical Foundation to the owners of the chemical industry of the United States, who were thus more than repaid for the propaganda money they had spent to mesmerize the public conscience. This propaganda has continued throughout the years since 1919. The confiscation was perpetrated not for the benefit of the United States but for the benefit of private monopolists. Justice Stone, as Attorney General, in seeking to set aside as illegal so outrageous a piece of confiscation, remarked "It will be a dark day for this republic when public officials, charged with public duties and responsibilities, can do the acts disclosed by this record without any consequences to them and to those who claim under them."

For the first time in American history the Supreme Court has upheld the confiscation of private property—as it assumes, in time of war. For one hundred and fifty years the United States has upheld the immunity from confiscation of private property in time of war. It must be said that Congress in 1917 and 1918 did not dream of departing from this tradition. But, persuaded and deceived by A. Mitchell Palmer, that arch-enemy of Bolshevism, and supported by Senator Underwood, it passed an amendment in 1918 (on the allegation that Palmer should not be making profits for absent owners), conferring on the Alien Property Custodian the power of sale, "in like manner as though he were the absolute owner." This was loose language, and Messrs. Palmer and Garvan took advantage of it to perpetrate a raid on the private property intrusted to them as trustees. International law was smashed. The consequences will be borne by the owners of private property, both foreigners in the United States and Americans abroad, for generations to come. When they are robbed of their property in future wars, they may thank Messrs. Palmer and Garvan, who established the precedent which will be applied. Nor will it be necessary to wait for the outbreak of war. Mere political differences may lead to reprisals between nations and to the confiscation of private property without war. This patent confiscation took place several months after the armistice. It was done, therefore, purely in the interests of spoliation and greed, not for the purpose of winning the war. It is but a short step from the post-armistice confiscation of German and Austrian patents to the confiscation of patents of all other aliens, and from the confiscation of foreign private property to the confiscation of domestic private property.

The transaction is but another sign of the disintegration of the foundations of capitalistic society. Those who have participated in the deal do not realize that they have created a precedent which undermines the security of all private property in the United States and of every American investment abroad. That legal safeguard against confiscation which such investors had is now taken from them, and they are exposed to the whims and accidents of international politics in a way never heretofore contemplated. Americans now have 11 billions invested abroad, increasing at the rate of perhaps a billion a year. Foreign governments confiscating any part of this property need only refer a protesting United States government to the decision of our Supreme Court in the Chemical Foundation case. We have made Russia and Mexico look like amateurs in the arts of confiscation.

Peace in the Encyclopaedia

OLD-TIME readers of the "Encyclopaedia Britannica" (we suspect there are many such) have long regarded any one of the twenty-nine volumes of the Eleventh Edition as both the ideal hammock-book and far more satisfactory for the passing of a winter evening by the fire than any of the detective stories or romances commonly recommended for such purposes. They will greet with glad accord the three new volumes which have just been issued and which seem to mark a return to the great traditions of the work.

It is now sixteen years since the Encyclopaedia was completely revised and reprinted. During that time the proprietors have issued two sets of volumes before the present ones; and neither was satisfactory. "These Eventful Years" was hardly more than a collection of competent magazine articles, and the volumes which constituted the so-called Twelfth Edition, prepared amid the hazes of wartime myopias, were not up to the standard of those which they were intended to supplement. Americanized advertising methods and an appeal to a wider audience than the old Encyclopaedia had ever contemplated also exerted an unfortunate influence. The planning was done from a slightly journalistic angle; in the allotment of space there were obvious concessions to popular interest in matters of no more than temporary importance; in general the Britannica seemed to be abandoning its position of undisputable supremacy as a summary of the world's knowledge from the scholar's viewpoint in order to compete in the already overcrowded field of merely popular education.

Fortunately no such criticism can be successfully urged against the new volumes. One might, to be sure, pick some quarrels—though far fewer than formerly—with the proportionate space allotted to certain topics. Thus it is obviously absurd, sub specie aeternitatis, to allot four pages to recent developments in biochemistry and more than ten pages to the battle of Jutland; war-shadows still cloud many pages; but the work as a whole, judged by first tastes and tests, seems to be once more worthy of its great predecessors. The scholar in search of either a specific fact or that sense of refreshment which comes from the contemplation of any subject treated with competent knowledge and detachment may turn to it feeling reasonably sure that in its pages he may, for the time being at least, leave the idols of the market-place far away. Occasionally, to be sure, he will be disappointed. Only a blind partisanship, completely out of place in a work of reference, could have led J. C. Squire to leave James Joyce unmentioned in his article on recent English fiction or caused another curiously selected editor of the London Mercury, the author of the notice of Bertrand Russell, to devote the major part of the small space allowed him to a sneering attack upon Mr. Russell's intellectual integrity. Such lapses are rare and the majority of the articles are marvels of clarity, condensation, and objective presentation.

The very titles of these articles reveal succinctly the direction of contemporary discovery, taste, and achievement. In the Thirteenth Edition, Freud was unmentioned, the Quantum Theory unheard of; today the latter gets three pages and the psychological system of the former two. Even in smaller things changes are recorded with minutest exactitude. Thus even in the last former supplementary volumes Theodore Dreiser was accorded only one line at the end of a paragraph which spoke in high praise of the novels of William Sydnor Harrison; in the present he has an article to himself, and that fact alone is more significant than anything which a critic or scholar can say of the novelist's reputation. The Britannica is a sort of Hall of Fame for men, for ideas, and for sciences. To win in it a niche is to have achieved a distinction as significant as any which either the degrees of a college or the acclaim of the populace can give. Whatever is there has had a certain significance in the world; whatever is not there lacks that special meaning.

Curiously enough, the gigantic work begins by making itself ridiculous. This majestic panorama of the world's knowledge, this grand survey of the terrestrial globe from the Aaland Islands to the Zuyder Zee, this great cooperative effort of the patience and learning of our civilization is dedicated, humbly and "by permission," to a pair of amiable gentlemen neither majestic nor learned—George of England and Calvin of America. Not since the present Prince of Wales assumed his presidency of the Royal Society has any such cosmic joke been solemnly perpetrated.

America, Overlord of Europe

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Paris, October 3

THE mess into which the United States has got as a result of throwing over its wisest national policy in 1917 and entering the World War grows worse and not better. The dislike, yes, hatred, of Americans increases,* and not merely because of the debt problems. Even among Europeans who believe in the League of Nations and its future there are many who bitterly resent what they term America's forcing the League upon them and then withdrawing from it. That the League in their opinion is a great instrument for good does not prevent their sense of indignation as to the way in which it was given to them by Woodrow Wilson's insistence and because of the subsequent refusal of America to share in its benefits. But that is perhaps the least of their grievances, for, paradoxically enough, the longer the United States officially refuses to join the League the more is it forced by economic causes into playing a leading role in European life, which must inevitably lead to further entanglements and further friction.

Thus our financiers have become the arbiters of the financial fortunes of half of Europe, and since our Government practically compels our bankers (though disclaiming the actual use of its power) to obtain its sanction for any foreign loans, Washington is really in the position of saying when or whether help shall be extended to Germany, France, Italy, Belgium, and other countries. Even when permission is given by Washington, our Wall Street leaders arouse bitter antagonisms, as in Belgium, by insisting on the balancing of the budget and even, perhaps, indicating where the cuts should be made. That they are within their rights in so doing and are merely applying sound financial principles in the making of loans does not decrease the anger of the Belgians that the fortunes of war have made America the only market for surplus money and the only place in which they can obtain adequate aid. They resent foreigners becoming the financial dictators of their country, and for those foreigners, namely, ourselves, the position into which they are thus forced becomes one of increasing difficulty. The result is that Europe is slowly but surely being driven into an anti-American union which may yet have grave consequences if we continue trying to compel foreign nations to pay us their war debts and insisting that we will not reduce the tariff walls which prevent out debtors from paying us in goods—their only means of payment.

Now, by another turn of the wheel of fate, the United States is being placed in the position of becoming the arbiter of perhaps the most important proposal for the peace of Europe ever made—the proposed Franco-German alliance, discussed at Thoiry by Messrs. Briand and Stresemann. It is an open journalistic secret that these two gentlemen had no difficulty whatever in stating their respective points of view and reaching a general agreement. The difficulty was that when they came to discuss ways of accomplishing their program they invariably came up against the United States, usually in the form of the American Commissioner General of Reparations, Parker Gilbert. France needs money; Germany is willing to pay. But the German railroad bonds cannot be mobilized and sold without Mr. Gilbert's consent. More than that, they cannot be offered for sale in America, even if Mr. Gilbert should consent, unless our Government approves. Mr. Coolidge has already, in his official role of spokesman for himself—that is, in his Mr. Hyde role—declared that while, of course, the Government would not think, oh, dear no, of compelling the American bankers to its point of view, it would still look with disfavor upon the floating of the German railroad securities in America until the French Government has ratified the Franco-American debt agreement.

This is nothing else than a deliberate effort to make use of France's plight to blackjack her into approval of the debt agreement. "You can't have this unexpected relief from Germany," says Mr. Coolidge, "unless you satisfy us first." Now, this may or may not be good tactics in obtaining what the American Government wishes, but one thing is certain: it is bound enormously to increase the dislike of America and its government in France, if not in Germany. Moreover, it has put the United States into the position, for the moment, of blocking steps toward the stabilization of French finance and also of holding up what is, as already said, the most important move for real Franco-German peace in the memory of man. Nor does it minimize the situation to say that by hurrying the debt ratification the French can clear the way for their bargain with Germany, or that it will be only a couple of months at most before the agreement will be ratified. A delay of even a week is a bad thing, for the psychology of Thoiry may vanish. It is, moreover, quite serious to allow the United States, at the very moment when it asserts its desire to keep out of all European politics, to be put into the position of passing upon what in the first instance is a strictly Franco-German matter. On the other hand, there is the danger that the sale of these bonds in the United States will transfer from France to America the onus of making Germany pay.

What makes our position seem more hypocritical to Europeans is the fact that Mr. Coolidge has repeatedly stated that if Europe showed the will to peace the United States would help in every possible way. Thus, speaking at Cambridge on July 3, 1925, he said:

> If there be differences which cannot be adjusted at the moment, if there be conditions which cannot be foreseen, let them be resolved in the future by methods of arbitration and by the forms of judicial determination. While our own country should refrain from making political commitments where it does not have political interests, such covenants would always have the moral support of our Government and could not fail to have the commendation of the public opinion of the world. Such a course would be sure to endow the participating nations with abundant material and spiritual reward. On what other basis can there be any encouragement for a disposition to attempt to finance a revival of Europe? The world has tried war with force and has utterly failed. The only hope of success lies in peace with justice.

Yet when a marvelous opportunity for this very thing offers, he says: Just wait until I take advantage of your fix to grind a pet ax of my own before I help. Dr. Stresemann has already appealed to Mr. Coolidge. Speaking at Cologne on October 2 (since Thoiry) he declared that the words quoted above from Mr. Coolidge's speech of July 3, 1925, were, in his opinion, as applicable to the Thoiry program as to the Locarno treaties or the Dawes plan. No, replies Mr. Coolidge, France must sign on the dotted line first.

* See Mr. Villard's America's Crop of Hate in The Nation for August 11, 1926.

So we get in deeper and deeper, always offending, usually blundering, leaving Europe more mystified and more vexed and finding ourselves more and more in the position of autocrat of the financial world. A sensible government would set to work at once to obtain a conference of all the nations involved. Here it is only fair to say that Mr. Coolidge faces an almost united sentiment in Congress, irrespective of party, in favor of exacting the last penny from our former Allies. Rarely in the last thirty years, during which I have been observing our politics, has Congress been as united on any issue. To ascertain what the reason for it is would repay the most careful inquiry. Are the members reflecting home sentiment? If so, what makes their constituents so insistent? Is it due to the fact that they realize that we failed to win a single one of our objectives in the war, and that since the 77,000 dead cannot be recalled to life, they have a determination at least to get back the only remaining thing—the money?

Well, of course, under the settlements as they stand America is not getting the whole of the money—nothing like it. And whether it takes two years or ten years Congress and the country will have to be made to see that they can never recover the total; that the idea that nations will continue to pay us for sixty-two years for a war which ended in 1918 is utterly preposterous. No man or woman of real common sense and fair knowledge can believe anything of the kind. As to that, sentiment among Americans abroad and Europeans of influence is united. If Mr. Mellon did not learn that on his trip to Europe then he is hopelessly dull. He was told it by every banker and public man he met. Thomas W. Lamont sees it and so, it is safe to say do most of his colleagues in the big-business world. It is idle to point out that these bankers get their 7 and 8 per cent on the European loans they are now making, and to say that if they get such good terms the American Government could have obtained better rates in the settlements. It would have had to insist upon them. But whether the Allied nations should have given us better terms or not, the fact remains that we shall never see any considerable amount of the principal. Let us face that fact, however disagreeable it may be!

Meanwhile the thing remains a constant irritant and constant obstacle to good relations. I do not mean to say that if we were to cancel our debts tomorrow we should immediately have the love and gratitude of all our European debtors. Far from it. From France I should expect no gratitude whatever. Hopes who ask favors, whether individuals or nations, are the same. Nothing ruins friendships so quickly and thoroughly and if you write the debt off as a bad one, because your friend cannot pay, he has an unhappy feeling that he has not done the right thing; or that anyway you owed it to him to help him out. That this sort of thing would result from our intervention into the war ought to have been foreseen because there are precedents in plenty. I am told that John Morley said that the day America entered the war was the saddest of his life. I don't know if this is so, but it may well have been. Not, of course, that he wanted the Germans to win but that, great statesman that he was, he foresaw some of the inevitable consequences of America's crossing the ocean. There are written words of his which express his reprobation of the Treaty of Versailles and the way the Allied leaders were swept into situations they never dreamed of when they entered the war. No one can yet surely tell where we shall all land if this debt situation continues; how deep the bitternesses will go, how lasting and harmful the animosities. It is at present a mess, utter and complete, and no exit from it can please all or satisfy abstract justice.

The money is not worth it if it could be got. Nor would a thousand times as much gold compensate us for the hate being engendered, for it may take generations and generations to overcome what is already there. The cancer will grow. It is not benign. Even in England our best friends feel increasingly hurt that we ask so much more of them than of the other Allies. They are too good sports, most of them, to say so, but the hurt is there. Capacity to pay! They laugh at it. How can capacity to pay be fixed in 1926 to measure capacity to pay in 1936, or 1946, or 1956, or 1966? No, no! Those Americans who want to safeguard what remains of good-will toward us in a war-wracked and war-cursed world must gird up their loins and go to work. No matter where abstract justice or technical rights may be, the debts have got to go. They will in time by the acts of others, if we do not move. But when we move, let us demand and get in return such things as disarmament, the abolition of poison gas, the submarine, the war airplane, and other things we have a right to ask, since in these inventions of the devil lie not only the seeds of other wars but the genuine possibility of the complete destruction of our modern civilization.

The Saints on Stained Glass

By HELENE MULLINS

The saints on stained glass windows have an air
Of charming affectation, for they seem
To have endured strange sorrows in a dream,
To have in dreams had lovely griefs to bear.

Theirs is pious, formal and sincere,
They cultivate no wit nor subtlety
To cloud themselves in any mystery,
They are as passionless as they appear.

Each with a halo and a willful face,
They bow before a cross or lift their eyes
Above an empty cross to empty skies,
And all their attitudes are full of grace.

The saints on stained glass windows are like old
And vivid legends; time is powerless
To leave on them one mark of its caress,
To disarrange their garments by one fold.

Each with a pride as if about to pass
Into some other world, each with amazing
Credulity, perpetually gazing
On some bright vision just beyond the glass.

Daugherty at the Bar

By EDGAR MELS

THE aroma of politics hung heavily over the trial of Harry M. Daugherty and Thomas W. Miller for conspiracy in connection with the return of $7,000,000 in stock of the American Metals Company to the German owners, the Mertons.

The ghost of a former President, Warren Gamaliel Harding, stalked into the juryroom and listened to the deliberations of twelve more or less good men and true. The awe of a name, the fear of hurting a political party, the "what-of-it" feeling which has followed every exposé of the Ohio Gang—all these combined are responsible for the disagreement of the jury after sixty-six hours of wrangling, debating, and—sleeping at the Hotel McAlpin at government expense!

The trial was a record breaker in many ways—some not pleasant to contemplate. Presided over by a learned judge, prosecuted by Emory R. Buckner and six young men who had reputations to make, defended by a brilliant criminal lawyer and a learned but cautious barrister, the trial was one of the most expensive recorded in the southern district of New York. It cost the Government a full $100,000. It cost Daugherty $50,000, at least. It cost Colonel Miller more than $50,000.

Buckner had labored long, perhaps even lovingly, over the evidence. He had gathered it from the four quarters of the world: from Germany, from Switzerland, from Ohio and Boston and Washington and New York. It was documentary evidence, verbal evidence, but mainly circumstantial evidence. And circumstantial evidence is apparently hard to grasp and harder to digest so far as juries are concerned. So far as the direct evidence was concerned, it resolved itself into assertions that Colonel Miller had done this and had not done that; that Daugherty was an utter ignoramus; that Senator Goff was the villain in the play; and that John T. King was a shrewd yet generous person of the Republican persuasion.

The Government showed clearly that King had asked a percentage for getting the claim through the Alien Custodian's office. In this he was within the law. He had asked Jesse Smith to use his influence with Daugherty. Certain moneys were paid; certain Liberty bonds were turned over to King, some to turn up at Daugherty's bank in Washington Courthouse, others in brokerage accounts of Miller. It came out that Daugherty had destroyed certain ledger-sheets and other documentary evidence.

The most damaging evidence was that which traced some of the Liberty bonds to Miller. Apparently this made the case for the Government a certainty. That it did not is a wonder, for here was about the only direct and uncontroverted evidence of the whole trial. It is at this juncture that subconscious politics and the memory of Harding appeared on the scene—to remain to the very end of the trial.

It is known that two of the jurors refused to vote for the conviction of Miller on the ground that they knew or surmised they knew that the bonds in question had been used to pay a Republican campaign deficit and that Miller came by them honestly. The same held true of Daugherty's destruction of the ledger-sheets of his bank. Here again the G. O. P. legend came into being. Mal Daugherty admitted, almost sotto voce, that the bonds his brother obtained were given for a political purpose. So the jury decided that a dead President's good name was at stake, and they gave the defendant the benefit of the doubt.

The preparation of the case for the Government has been called brilliant. The presentation was not—very. Why did Buckner not follow up the trail opened by Mal Daugherty? Why did he not ask a few leading questions about Harry Daugherty's amazing written statement, when he at first refused to appear before a grand jury—that by speaking he might have to drag in the name of Harding, whose lawyer, he, Daugherty, had been? Why did not Buckner ask from whom Miller received the bonds, and why?

Was Buckner afraid? Did he fear that perchance the Administration which named him Federal District Attorney might be smirched? Had he asked a few leading questions he would have opened up a flood-gate, the public would have had a real sensation.

The Nation, in a series of two articles on the Alien Custodian scandal, on April 14 and 21, and again on May 19 in an article on Daugherty, pointed the way to Buckner. The Nation stated among other things that Colonel Miller had obtained the incriminating Liberty bonds from Vincent A. Carroll, city prosecutor of Philadelphia. Carroll sat in the courtroom for two days. Buckner could have placed him on the witness stand. He could have asked Carroll from whom he received the bonds he afterward delivered to Miller.

Why did Buckner not follow such a course? He might have brought to light the story told in The Nation last April—that Ned Thurston, of the Republican State Committee of Massachusetts, a friend of King, had left the bonds in Carroll's office for Miller. Buckner might have ascertained that the bonds were given to pay a deficit in the Senatorial campaign of T. Coleman du Pont. Why did not Buckner summon J. J. Roskob, head of the General Motors, a Du Pont concern? Buckner might then have corroborated the Carroll-Miller story. Was the name Du Pont the stumbling-block?

Now as to Daugherty. Did Daugherty destroy the ledger-sheets to save himself? Did he destroy them to save Harding's good name? Or did he invent the Harding legend as a camouflage—as a master-stroke of cleverness—to explain the otherwise unexplainable?

I have Daugherty's own word for it that Jesse Smith, his "collector," to quote the former Attorney General, defaulted in $300,000 he had gathered for Daugherty. Mal Daugherty confirmed this indirectly when he stated on the witness stand that he and his brother had tried for some time to get Smith to give an accounting of moneys due them. What moneys? Smith had no income outside that which he gathered in devious ways in Washington. Smith got bonds from King—that was proved in court. He delivered them at the Washington Courthouse bank. That was proved.

But why should he have turned them over to Daugherty's bank when he could have sold them elsewhere?

Was Smith's "special account," which was destroyed with the ledger-sheets, a blind? And if so, for whom or what? That Mr. Harding had any connection with this account in any form, I will not believe.

The alternative is that the account was used to pay off the one-million-dollar deficit of the Harding-Coolidge campaign of 1920. A Republican Senator of the highest reputation for honesty, who stands high in the counsels of his party, told me last spring that the graft of the Ohio Gang paid this deficit. Did Buckner know this? If he did, why did he not call Will Hays, who at the time of the campaign was Republican National Chairman? If he did not, why did he not follow the lead opened by Mal Daugherty's testimony?

The greatest disappointment from a governmental viewpoint was Richard Merton, its principal witness. Buckner undoubtedly expected him to tell much that Merton did not, or would not, relate. Merton was a badly scared witness, despite his mental brilliancy. There were many reasons for this. Perhaps he feared Steuer's cross-examination would bring into the limelight that he was not Merton at all but Richard Moses, son of an orthodox Jew who left his millions to his children with the strict provision that they could have the money only if they remained orthodox. As the children had social aspirations, they transferred the millions to incorporated business organizations, thus voiding the provision of their father's will, and then changed their name. A London Jewish paper summed up the situation thus:

> You may change your name to Merton from Moses,
> But heaven knows, you can't change your noses.

At any rate, Merton undoubtedly was a happy man when he was permitted to sail. That he will return in case there is a retrial can be answered in the negative. The world does not like a squealer—and Merton squealed.

Should there be a retrial there may be a new development. Miller was desperately anxious to take the stand. He wanted to tell where and why he got the bonds, but his counsel would not let him. If he is placed in jeopardy again he will probably take the witness stand. Then watch the political fur fly.

Silent Cal's Silent Partner

By A BOSTON JOURNALIST

SENATOR WILLIAM M. BUTLER of Massachusetts, Silent Cal's silent partner, is petitioning the people of his State to renew his lease on the Senate seat which was vacated two years ago by Lodge's death and given to Butler by a follower who then occupied the Governor's chair.

Butler has none of the sporting blood in his veins that frequently rushes to the heads of his distinguished namesakes, Smedley D. and Nicholas Murray. Fertility of intellect, glibness of tongue, and an ingratiating manner are a few of the qualities which this successful lobbyist and mill master lacks, but as the cause is a noble one, to spare President Coolidge the humiliation of being repudiated in his home State and to perpetuate the grip now held by the New England textile interests on the United States government, Butler is carrying his yoke manfully and piously.

Hitherto, Senator Butler's political career has been under cover. A lobbyist by instinct and training, Butler is in his own element when he is pussyfooting among ambitious legislators, in pursuit of privately negotiated favors for public-service corporations and the textile interests. In emerging into the murky daylight of American politics, Butler probably reasons that if Calvin Coolidge can run the gantlet of public scrutiny, anybody can.

In this, Butler's first trial as a campaigner, the opposition is annoying. David I. Walsh, Democrat, is an earnest and vivid spellbinder who expounds the benign principles of Thomas Jefferson with rather blunt and disconcerting references to page and paragraph in the record of the corporation-controlled Administration at Washington. Walsh has a phenomenal record as a vote-getter. Thousands of Republicans indorse him whenever he enters the field. In 1918, in the contest for the United States Senate, he defeated the late John W. Weeks. Walsh made his most amazing run two years ago, though he was beaten for the Senate by the venerable Frederick H. Gillett.

Butler had then been threatening to oppose Walsh. But Harding died and Calvin Coolidge, who like Butler received his political training and advancement under the political banner of the late Senator W. Murray Crane, millionaire manufacturer and political boss, was elevated to the Presidency. Butler was immediately called to Washington to steady the strong Presidential right arm. Subsequently, Butler proved his political ineptness as director of the Cleveland convention which nominated Coolidge, and as a reward for his clumsiness was made chairman of the Republican National Committee. He had to postpone his Senatorial career, and in 1924 the President drafted Gillett, then Speaker of the national House, for the Massachusetts fight.

How dangerous Walsh turned out to be, even in that year, may be judged by the balloting for Senator which resulted as follows: Gillett, 566,188; Walsh, 547,600; Gillett's plurality, 18,588. As there were 12,716 votes cast for the Socialist candidate, and 22 scattering, Gillett's plurality over all was a slim total of 5,850 in an aggregate of more than a million ballots—this in the year when Coolidge's plurality over Davis in Massachusetts was more than 400,000.

Butler asks his constituents to observe the wave of prosperity which has descended on the land, as reported to the White House spokesman by eminent bankers and trust magnates and faithfully recorded in the faithful press. A slightly discordant note is apparent from the New England textile centers, including Senator Butler's home town of New Bedford, where the workers in Mr. Butler's four cotton mills have been out on the pavements much of the time for the past year. In order to improve the condition of his mill employees, Mr. Butler was one of those who strongly urged that the cotton schedule in the Fordney-McCumber Tariff be raised to 45 per cent. The immediate benefits of this measure were reflected in the extra and stock dividends declared by Mr. Butler's companies, until the buying public went on strike against high prices, when it became necessary to curtail production. In intimate talks to the unemployed textile workers, the Senator is assuring them that everything will be all right as soon as he is elected and can induce to use his executive control over the tariff to jack the cotton rates up still higher.

Assembling the incidents in Mr. Butler's life story in an orderly way, beginning with his birth on "Johnny Cake Hill," New Bedford, sixty-five years ago, the biographer finds nothing remarkable from the time, at the age of five, he sat on the knee of U. S. Grant, whose Administration held all records for corruption prior to Harding, until our hero arrived on Beacon Hill, Boston, a youthful member of the legislature.

Butler was a success from the start. In early youth, he was a bookkeeper. A cashbook and ledger were the primer of the preacher's son in the struggle for fortune and fame. Later, he studied law—and hung out his shingle in the old whaling town of New Bedford. It was as a fledgling lawyer that he went to the legislature. He played the game, and so ingratiated himself into the esteem of the public-service corporation and big industrial interests, with private axes to grind, that they moved heaven and earth to elect him to the State Senate, and soon had him installed as presiding officer of that body.

It is on the upper branch of the Massachusetts Legislature that the interests depend to kill all legislation which the House passes that they regard as inimical to their pocketbooks. The corporations have always controlled the upper body and have used great discretion in the selection of its presidents. William M. Butler proved eminently satisfactory, and so later did Calvin Coolidge, who also once presided over the Massachusetts Senate.

In time Butler, though unknown to the general public, came to be regarded among the gentry who make politics their business as the most powerful under-cover politician in the State. For more than thirty years he did not aspire to public office. But Butler, whose corporation-law practice grew more and more remunerative, had a finger in the political pie all the time. If "Uncle" Murray wanted a politician's head, Butler saw to it that the decapitation was neatly performed. If there was a Speaker of the House, or a President of the Senate to be chosen, "Uncle" Murray made the selection, and Butler saw that it was accepted.

Upon the death of Murray Crane, Butler became the recognized under-cover leader of the Crane forces. The Crane crowd never liked Lodge, with whom for many years it had to divide control of the party in Massachusetts. In their later years, Crane and Lodge were often out of step, notably on the League of Nations issue. Nobody denies that, in his own furtive sphere, backstage State politics, Butler was a skilful worker. He was introduced to national politics as soon as Coolidge, following the death of Harding, returned to the Willard Hotel as a temporary White House. Butler flitted in and out of the Presidential suite for a few weeks, then retired to his private yacht and awaited his appointment as the Coolidge convention manager for the approaching campaign.

Coolidge had no opposition for the nomination. Corraling enough delegates to assure this required no special sagacity or aptitude. In his first real test as a political manager on a national scale Butler was a total loss. He tried to boss the job of nominating Coolidge's running mate by the domineering methods in vogue in his New England cotton mills. After working himself into a nervous frenzy in abortive attempts to nominate first Borah, then Lowden, for the Vice-Presidency, with both men refusing to accept, Butler then trotted out the aged keynoter of the convention, Representative Theodore L. Burton, and he was rejected. When finally the White House telephoned the suggestion that Dawes be nominated as the only way out of the dilemma Butler accepted with bad grace. The delegates named Dawes. Butler grabbed his hat, turned his back on the convention, and left the hall. In only one objective did Butler succeed at the Cleveland convention, and this was by virtue of his influence as the new party boss in his home State. He showed his vindictiveness against Lodge, inherited from Crane, by handpicking the Massachusetts delegation and relegating the senior Senator from Massachusetts to the background, thus humiliating a better man.

Echoes of the Butler-Lodge feud are heard in the present campaign. Wilfred W. Lufkin, Collector of the Port of Boston, was appointed through Lodge. The collectorship is the biggest political plum in New England. Lufkin was begrudgingly reappointed by the present Administration because Butler feared to antagonize the remnant of the Lodge following on the eve of election. The story is that if Butler is elected, every Lodge man will walk the plank.

The death of Lodge occurred a few days after the last Presidential election. Prominent Republicans of the State and nation turned out for the obsequies. One of the cynics among them was heard to remark: "It looks like another landslide for Lodge." Among the professional mourners was Brother William M. Butler, sworn enemy of Lodge in life but very friendly toward him in death. Services were held in the old Unitarian Church facing Harvard College. Butler and Governor "Cunning" Cox were caught by a photographer of the Boston Post emerging from the edifice. The Governor was smiling happily. The two hurried back to Boston together, Butler going to his business office, the Governor to the State House. And almost before the undertaker had time to arrange the floral tributes on the grave of Lodge at Mt. Auburn Cox had announced his appointment of Butler as Senator. Upon Cox's subsequent retirement from public office he was made a vice-president of the biggest national bank in New England, although the outstanding failure of the Cox administration on Beacon Hill was in the management of the State finances.

Butler is sharp enough not to run on his own record. This is a rimless doughnut in the matter of constructive legislative achievements. As a young legislator on Beacon Hill thirty years ago he opposed every progressive bill that came his way. He twice voted against giving women the vote in municipal elections. He voted against the direct election of United States Senators. He voted against a bill to reduce the hours of street-railway employees from twelve hours to ten.

No bill that Butler has ever introduced in the United States Senate has been acted upon, nor have there been many serious enough to merit consideration. Among the Butler bills and resolutions were one "To purchase painting entitled, 'Our Glory—the Battleship Oregon' "; another "to survey Inner Oak Bluffs," where he has his summer home; another "to authorize an appropriation for reconditioning the U. S. S. Nantucket." He also introduced resolutions "for the participation of the United States in the Third World's Poultry Congress" and "for display of our national flag in United States courts."

This is the positive side of the Butler record in the Senate. The negative side is somewhat more imposing. He voted against the Walsh report on the oil scandal and in favor of whitewashing Teapot Dome. He voted against the motion for a Senate investigation of Mellon's aluminum company. He voted against a resolution for investigation of the alleged monopolization of electric energy by the General Electric Company. When the President nominated Charles Beecher Warren, one of the chief agents and promoters of the beet-sugar trust, then under investigation by the Federal Trade Commission, for Attorney General, Senator Butler not only voted for confirmation but made a feeble and futile effort to lead the Administration fight to save Warren on the floor of the Senate.

Butler voted to untax wealth right down the line when the revenue bill was under consideration. He voted to lease the Government's $150,000,000 plant at Muscle Shoals to private interests; in other words, for selling out to the power trust.

When the resolution was first introduced to consider appointment of a Senate committee to investigate campaign expenditures, Senator Butler voted against it, but switched later, when it was obvious that the measure would pass, reluctantly giving his indorsement to the investigation in view.

Later, when Senator Neely, West Virginia, introduced a resolution denouncing the primary scandals in Pennsylvania and Illinois and proposing to put the Senate on record against campaign expenditures of more than $25,000 by a candidate for the Senate, Senator Cameron, Old Guardsman, talked this measure to death, orating on the Verde River irrigation scheme until the gavel fell. The New York World reported next day that the first Senator to grasp the hand of Cameron and to congratulate him on his noble effort was Senator Butler of Massachusetts.

But reactionary Senators no longer make their records an issue. If the opposition asks Butler about his record, he solemnly warns the people of Massachusetts to stand by Coolidge like the God-fearing men and women they are. As Butler remarked in the Methodist Tabernacle at Oak Bluffs: "Now is the time to show that righteousness exalteth a nation."

The Immigrant Press at Election Time

By ALBERT PARRY

I

GLENN FRANK has remarked: "The time will probably never come when English will be the one language spoken and written in the United States."

These words were uttered in 1920, when the quota barrier for the immigrants was not yet invented. Five years of the Johnson atrocities, launched in 1921, failed, however, to diminish the use of foreign languages in the United States and did not affect to any noticeable extent the powers of the foreign-language press in America.

One-tenth of the population of the United States is still served by the foreign-language press. The latest statistics show over 900 newspapers and magazines, published daily, weekly, semi-weekly, monthly, and semi-monthly in thirty-seven different languages, other than English, in various cities and towns of the United States. This fact has great political significance, for there are millions of voters among the readers of these papers and magazines. The two major American parties are aware of this. When dates of general or local elections draw near, the press serving the strangers is favored by the hungry glances of the party campaign managers no less than the great American dailies serving the natives.

Strange to say, there still are naive campaign managers in both camps, Republican and Democratic, who imagine that they will get all the space in the foreign-language press they need (and of course all the votes of its readers) by merely sending to the editors glowing circulars with candidates' biographies and speeches marked: "For Immediate Release." When an editor comes across a bulky envelope of such nature in his mail he is not likely to call upon anyone of his small and overburdened staff to translate the item from English into the language of his paper. True, most of the immigrant sheets are fed with translations from English. For almost all of their news they depend on the American dailies. I knew a case where a New York Russian daily waited for the next morning's Times to translate the news of a slight rain! The foreign-language journalists will translate weather, murders, fires, cases of rape, and news about their home countries, but not American politics. Speaking of the Czecho-Slovakian press in this country, Edward Hale Bierstadt lamented:

> Small space is devoted to American politics. The immigrant does not quite understand, and little effort has been made to help him. Even a Presidential election takes third or fourth place in the news matter. This is due rather to the neglect of the immigrant by the native-born than to any constitutional apathy on the part of the immigrant himself.

The case of the Czecho-Slovakian press holds for the papers of other nationalities in America, with a few exceptions. As to the causes of it, the immigrant's apathy, in our opinion, has more to do with the phenomena than the native-born's neglect, and this apathy is quite plausible and forgivable, even to an American eye of more or less intelligence: the foreign editors, like any editors, look for news; weather, murder, fire, and rape are news, but American politics is machine made and therefore not news. The American public itself is coming slowly to a realization of this; the foreign population of the country realized it much earlier, with the help and encouragement of their editors. But the party campaign managers still believe in the irresistible powers of their circulars. Some of them still do not know that foreign editors are not always as dumb as they sound when they speak English. They also do not know that an average foreign journalist in America hates the sight of typewritten news—he would rather translate two columns of dry material from a newspaper than a short paragraph of most lively and amazing happenings from a typewritten or mimeographed sheet. The campaign manager should see the bored expression with which the average foreign editor views his "For Immediate Release" and with which he releases the circular into his waste-basket.

Few campaign managers, either of the Republican creed or of the Democratic variety, realize how far away many foreign-language editors and their subordinates keep themselves from American life, and how crude their knowledge of the native language, customs, and politics is. Abraham Mitrie Rihbany, the editor of Kowkab America, a Syrian newspaper in New York, confesses in his autobiography that at the time of the Presidential elections in 1892 he, hearing cries of Democrats that Harrison was beaten because "he is in the hands of the monopolists, who grab the people's money and put it in their own pockets," thought that since there was a city of Minneapolis "the Minneapolists were the highway robbers." Yet this editor showed more interest in American politics than the average foreign-language journalist before or since. He prided himself on being a staunch Republican and he enlightened from time to time his Syrian audience with "learned" editorials on all the sides and questions of American politics!

Some years ago there was a Russian editor in New York who directed bitter attacks against "the dirty hireling of capitalists, the Presidential nominee Mr. Scattering." He thus understood the reports of a Republican convention, where, during one of the ballots, two or three candidates received fewer than half of the total votes, while the rest of the ballots were recorded as "Scattering."

II

Fortunately for themselves the campaign managers do not restrict their efforts to the editorial departments of immigrant newspapers. They attack the advertising departments as well, and here they do get some results, first, because they distribute dollars and cents along with the eloquence, and, secondly, because the men who run the publishing and advertising departments are of a more businesslike and more Americanized type than the men of the editorial departments. Consequently the campaign managers' eloquence finds its way into the foreign print, mostly in the form of advertisements and sometimes in the form of editorials and news items dictated to men on the editorial staff by men from the advertising department.

On the whole, campaign managers get their dollars' worth from the advertising departments of foreign newspapers, but even here mistakes were and are rampant. Politicians feel that the foreign-language press is a considerable power, which can be used by them to a very good advantage, but they do not know how to use it. The foreign publishers in their turn do not know much about American politics, their acquaintances among politicians not ranking above petty district leaders and other small fry. State and national committees (and these plan and distribute advertising) are entirely out of their reach. Consequently, intermediaries early appeared in the field, men who could easily, if they wished to, take advantage of the ignorance of each other of the two sides.

The most notorious type of such a go-between was found in Louis N. Hammerling, head of what was formerly the American Association of Foreign Language Newspapers. This imposing title condoned nothing more than an advertising agency, which started with no newspapers under its control but soon had several hundreds of them in its fold.

Hammerling, a poor Austrian immigrant, was formerly connected with a small Polish newspaper in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, and was also employed as a solicitor of advertisements for the United Mine Workers' Journal. Local politicians cast an appreciative eye upon him, and Mr. Hammerling did not let the opportunity slip by. Soon we find him in New York, where in 1904 he took charge of the foreign-language press for the Republican Party in the campaign of that year. Apparently he delivered the goods expected, for he continued to serve the party through the year of 1916.

In 1908 he decided to settle in New York permanently in order to milk the fat cow of the Republican Party and to bully the simple calves of the foreign-language press in a more efficient way. He bought the so-called Italian-American Advertising Agency, changed its name to the high-sounding one of the American Association of Foreign Language Newspapers, and began his work.

In 1912 the Republican National Committee distributed through him over $100,000 worth of advertising. In 1916 the Republicans bought through Hammerling 30,000 lines in the dailies, and 40,000 lines in various other publications, 70,000 in all, for which Hammerling paid to the foreign publishers $52,500, but for which he charged the G. O. P. over $100,000. We must add that Hammerling made the foreign publishers accept a good part of the $52,500 in stock issued by his organization, and they never saw either dividends or their investment back.

Frank Zotti, the editor of the Narodni List, a Croatian newspaper, related of Hammerling's ways with small papers:

> As soon as they would get the 30-inch advertisement for the second insertion they would receive a letter from Hammerling stating that their paper has no circulation and that the company wants to withdraw, but that he will use his influence so that the company will keep the advertisement, but that he cannot pay the rate. He would pay him a little less rate, if he gets the advertisement again, but he would advise the publisher to keep the "ad" for the time being, and show his good-will. In this way a good many of those poor fellows kept the "ad" for fifty-two weeks and got paid for two weeks.

This particular instance is cited in connection with the commercial advertising distributed by Hammerling, but he used similar methods with equal success in his efforts to make the foreigners vote for the Grand Old Party. These methods helped Hammerling to amass a great fortune, and when, under fire for his alleged pro-German propaganda, he was compelled to leave this country, he returned to the land of his humble birth as a much-respected millionaire. In his dealings with the press he acquired a taste for journalism, and now, with the money of the fooled Republicans and cheated immigrant publishers, he runs his own newspaper, the New Reform, in Krakow, Poland, with a circulation of 100,000.

Yet he was seldom cursed by his victims. The banquets arranged by him at the heyday of his glory were attended by distinguished Republicans, a few Cabinet members among them, who eulogized Hammerling as "president of 500 or 600 foreign newspapers," one who never failed to deliver the goods at elections. The foreign-language publishers appreciated the advertisements, which without him they would never get and for which, instead of the paltry twenty-five or fifty cents of other agents, he paid them sometimes as high as seventy-five cents per inch. Foreign publishers tell me that their rates stand now at the point to which Hammerling brought them, and they mention Hammerling's name in warm voice. When a few months ago Hammerling arrived in New York on one of his mysterious trips he was greeted by most appreciative articles by most of the foreign-language newspapers—with a few exceptions.

III

These few exceptions warrant a special chapter. Indeed, if not for them, the situation of the foreign press in its relations with American politics would be wholly unbearable. The intelligent minority consists largely of the German and Yiddish newspapers.

We note that German newspapers, almost the only national group of all the foreign papers in America, did not become clients and vassals of the almighty Hammerling, a German by nativity and mother tongue! The German editors and publishers of long and well-established papers are, as a rule, well versed in the politics and business methods of America, and neither campaign managers nor advertising agents can prey on them as easily as on editors and publishers of the more recent immigration.

The German newspapers can be classed with the native American press in the way they treat American politics. American politics is news to the German editors. The chief of the New York Foreign Language Information Bureau said in a newspaper interview on the eve of the Presidential campaign of 1920: "Germans have been here so long that they are in local politics. The average reader of a German paper is much more interested in Bill Miller's chance for the town council than he is in the fate of the Kaiser."

The Jewish editors appeared in this country much later than their German confreres, but what they lack in years of American experience they make up by their racial intelligence and inborn shrewdness. The Yiddish papers display some independence in their dealings with campaign managers. The newspaper with the greatest circulation—the Socialist Vorwaerts—is entirely out of their reach. The rapidly growing Communist Freiheit is closed to their endeavors too. The other smaller papers, while open to traffic with the Republican and Democratic parties, are rapidly waning in influence. Yet even with them the campaign managers and advertising brokers are obliged to be decent.

Twenty Years of Adolescence

By MARION BACHRACH

RECENTLY I heard a lecture alluringly entitled The Problem of the Adolescent—Can the Parent Understand? The amiable professor spoke with calm assurance of the milestones which must be passed in the "normal" adolescent period. That was the time for testing one's wings, for leaving the home nest, for fitting oneself for a mate. Through rebellion against authority one came to achieve independence; through tentative loves one freed the libido from its home moorings. Even a little dabbling in radicalism was pardonable for adolescents. If one got burned sending off intellectual fireworks, one had all the more respect for Rotarians when the adolescent fever had passed.

There never was a doubt in the professor's mind that the fever would pass. The impression he gave was that the passing would be swift and sudden. In movie phrasing there would "come a day" when from a welter of drunken orgies and socialistic meetings sedate men and women would emerge, as the professor put it, "psychically independent, emotionally free, capable of leading normal, heterosexual lives."

As I left the lecture room my own image suddenly confronted me in a mirror. I was pleased with that glimpse of myself. I looked like the person I like to think myself—an intelligent and mature woman of forty with no nonsense about her. My clothes were smart and modish, but they were also suitable. My hair lay soft and well-groomed under my becoming hat. There was dignity in my bearing and a pleasant repose in my face. "Middle-age isn't so bad," I thought. "It's fighting against it that makes it ugly." Until suddenly I realized with a start what a pitiful fake this image was. For all my brave show of maturity was I really anything more than a bewildered girl, tricked out in her mother's clothes; that pitiful, wretched, and yet vivid creature testing herself against the mysterious forces of the real world; that adolescent whose stormy inner life had been so neatly laid bare by the lecturer's scalpel? I might be an anomaly—but what I knew of my friends made me doubt it.

Certainly I put up as good a bluff as any of them. It was fifteen years since I married my lovable and sympathetic husband. Our marriage had been a happy one. Our home was comfortable and well-ordered; our children were robust and jolly. I had a job. And I managed to conduct myself on most occasions with dignity and sense. But—I kept right on adolescing.

The lecturer had a real feeling for adolescents—at least for young ones. He said, in substance, that their impulses were healthy and growth-promoting. It wasn't that they particularly wanted to get drunk or stay out all night or row with their families. Those things were only abortive, irrelevant symbols of their vigorous urge to cut loose, to stand on their own feet. That seems to me to fit old-time adolescents like myself, as well as the novices to whom his statements were confined. Basically my desires are the same as they were when I was eighteen, and as conflicting. They are only more sharply defined, more poignant, and they have perhaps found new "abortive and irrelevant symbols." I do not very often drink or stay out on wild parties, and my rows with my family are models of civilized reasonableness. But am I any less rebellious now that I have a husband helping my parents direct my welfare? Am I more independent since I have two children? Have I been "emotionally freed" because I love three people, besides those I already loved at eighteen? My impulses are as healthy and as growth-promoting as they ever were. And their expression, though different, is just as absurd and inadequate as when I sauntered hatless on the campus, cut classes to moon by the lake, or smoked forbidden cigarettes in the dormitory bathroom.

Take first of all that matter of rebelliousness which is so universal and so accredited a part of adolescence. As a licensed adolescent of eighteen I rebelled against my parents. They were unusually intelligent and understanding folk. But they were my parents. It was therefore naturally imperative that I put them in their place by threatening to leave home and work in a sweatshop, by joining the Socialist Party, and by filling the house with radicals and tobacco smoke. Mild enough manifestations of revolt, you must agree. But according to the experts in adolescent psychology, even such mild juvenilities should be over by the time one is—say—twenty.

Yet, under my impressive mask of matronliness, there are days when I seethe with a revolt the intensity of which shames my wildest student upheavals. For look: I must revolt against my parents still, because to them I am still a child. My mother complains that my clothes are impractical or unbecoming—unless she has chosen them herself. My father thinks my political opinions childish and immature. They agree in criticizing the way I bring up my children. And to the old reasons for revolt is added a new one. I must rebel against my husband because to him I am not a child but (absurd!) a woman. And as a woman he expects me to pay my bills promptly and to accept all sorts of social and domestic responsibilities which I find irksome and irrelevant. So I fume and boil inwardly because my parents would deny me the privileges and my husband would demand of me the obligations of adulthood.

You will already have classified me as a psychoneurotic of the worst sort. But before I proceed to even darker revelations, let me remind you of one thing—no one suspects my infantilism. The admirable person I saw in the mirror of the lecture hall is the person my family and friends know. My mother has never guessed that I persist in wearing purple merely because she dislikes it. My husband doesn't know how I long to thumb my nose and put out my tongue when his partner dines at our impeccable table.

"And capable of leading normal, heterosexual lives." The ultimate achievement of adolescence! I'm not sure that I know what a "normal" heterosexual life is. Judged by the usual standards I am neither prudish nor morbid and unpleasant. My parents revealed "the facts of life" to me at the approved time and in an approved manner. I believed them, and marriage and the birth of my children justified my confidence in their veracity. Yet do you think that my curiosity is satisfied? Or that, because I have been happily married for fifteen years, I have never had a vagrant fancy or never cast a longing eye on romance? True, I am a respectable woman and I do not underestimate the value of security. But surely I am not the first matron who has secretly believed herself a Pompadour wasting by a suburban hearth.

"Psychically independent and emotionally free." Emotionally free! Well, so far as I know, I was never in love with an uncle or debauched by a nurse-maid. At the age of twenty I was free enough to fall in love with my husband and eventually to accept marriage and two children. It seems to me that with the proper adolescent period I left emotional freedom behind. I am an ambitious woman. But last year I gave up a chance for advancement and a trip to Europe because I could not bear the thought of a year's separation from my husband and children. Emotional freedom—bosh! I do not think it would be worth much to us if we had it. But I am sure that I at least am tied as tight as a hangman's knot and that freedom, and in fact maturity itself are but mirages that elude us through a lifetime of adolescing.

In the Driftway

RECENTLY the Drifter had occasion to look for some papers in a rarely visited cubbyhole and, much to his surprise, pulled out a bulky pile of envelopes, sealed, stamped, and addressed in his own handwriting to various friends. Except for a slight layer of dust, it was an imposing pile of stationery, but the Drifter was completely baffled as to what it might be. One by one he turned over the letters in a daze until gradually the cold, clammy truth began to seep into his noddle. It all came back to him, not with the quick, clarifying flash with which a drowning man's past is said to disclose itself, but with an oozy, uncomfortable sensation like that by which, when hunting through the pantry in the dark for an odd piece of apple pie, one realizes he has dipped his fingers by mistake in a bowl of cold chicken gravy.

* * * * *

THE Drifter stumbled backward into a chair and, reconstructing the events of the past year, recalled that early in December, 1925, he had resolved to do his Christmas mailing early. He had bought a fine assortment of Christmas cards, made up a list of persons to whom they were to go, and sat down one night fully three weeks before the 25th to prepare them for the mails. He did not stop until all the cards were safely inclosed in their envelopes and the latter were sealed, stamped, and addressed. Then, as it was still too early to send out Christmas cards, the Drifter piled them neatly together, stuck them away in a cubbyhole—and never thought of them again.

* * * * *

WHAT to do? The Drifter's first thought was to write a little note of explanation, have it manifolded or printed, and then pop all these slightly belated Christmas cards off in fresh envelopes containing also the story of the delay. But this seemed like considerable work, besides which it would involve the purchase of a large batch of new stamps unless the Drifter undertook to pull off those already stuck on the sealed envelopes. This is all right in the case of one or two letters, but it is tiresome beyond that point and besides it leaves the envelopes looking a bit mussy. So the Drifter reflected further and decided simply to mail the envelopes as they were. His friends would blame the post office for the delay and would get a good bit of kick out of telling the story or by writing indignant letters to the newspapers denouncing the slowness of the mails.

* * * * *

BUT, thinking further and more craftily, it occurred to the Drifter that next Christmas was not so far away. Why not conserve the labor he had expended last December by carrying it forward to the coming holiday season? Fortunately, Christmas cards are not dated. The dealers are too wary for that—it would spoil the sale for any stock they had left over. So the Drifter put his pile of envelopes back in their cubbyhole. His friends will receive them for Christmas, 1926—if he does not forget again.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Americanized China

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Evidently the novelists are wrong on this point of the gracious manners of the Chinese. There is, however, another explanation of the bad manners of the Chinese delegates at Geneva [Nation 123:312]. It is just one more instance of the Americanization of China, which Mr. Gannett pointed out some time ago: Charleston, Ford, chewing gum, and now—bad manners.

The chief Chinese delegate to the League is called Chao-Hsin Chu. Chu is his last name and the hyphen comes between his first and his middle names. The Nation, after all, is an American periodical!

Cambridge, Mass., October 5 CHAO YING SHIH

An Army That Liberates

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Chinese people have been the most peace-loving and law-abiding people since the beginning of history. They hate particularly the type of militarism practiced by the Northern selfish militarists who, since the revolution of 1911 which made China a democracy, have stationed all over the spiritual as well as physical provinces of the South. Chief among these provinces are Hunan and Hupeh. These militarists taxed, squeezed, and [illegible] of people who live in this rich river valley of the Yangtze. The soldiers robbed the merchants, storekeepers, and even peddlers wherever they went. They were feared and hated. This hatred has thus penetrated and soaked deep and thoroughly into the hearts and bones of the people who inhabit a territory of the South run by the North. For fifteen long years the people have suffered and waited. Today their dreams have come true. The Southern forces have come to the rescue; everywhere are signs of mutual friendship between the soldiers from the South and the local people of all classes and walks of life. Their ideals and their aims are the same: Down with Militarism and Imperialism, Uphold the Rights and Privileges of Citizenship. Not until they have succeeded with their march toward Peking and there wiped off the rotten root of imperialistic manipulations and set up a representative New China will they cease the present operations.

I do not care whether the noble foreigners now living among us call these people of the South "Reds," "Bolsheviks," or "Rascals." They certainly do not rob the people, and the people are definitely with them. The Canton, or Southern, Government is not Communistic, Bolsheviki, Soviet, Red, Blue, or Yellow; it is Chinese pure and simple.

Hankow, China, September 8 FRANK HSINGCHI LIU

He Likes Us

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: [illegible] do without The Nation.

Just about the time I decide that the search for truth and decency is a waste of time, and I resolve my universe to Hot Dog or True Confessions, you come out with something like Stephen Benét's King David or Harry Hervey's The Young Men Go Down. Now you print My Black Brother Mafeking. I have no language to express my enjoyment of it. If that isn't great writing, then I'm even a bigger idiot than I have suspected. Furthermore Harry Kemp's poem is magnificent.

You should be careful. We are not used to fare of this [illegible]

Shiner, Texas, October 6 HARTLEY H. HEPLER

DORAN BOOKS

Certain Books of Importance

HERVEY ALLEN

Israfel:
The Life and Times of Edgar Allan Poe

The most notable biography of our year. For the first time the complete story of the most lonely, mysterious, and romantic figure in American literature is given a memorable and convincing [illegible] research has produced a most original book and one which shows the biographer as a powerful narrator of dramatic events as well as a critic and scholar. Illustrated. 2 Vols. November 5. $10.00.

ALDOUS HUXLEY

Jesting Pilate:
An Intellectual Holiday

Rarer than a good travel book, this is a book of great personality, the adventures of the brilliant English writer round the world. The romantic color evoked from strange corners of the globe matches the author's zest for new sights, customs and ideas. $3.50.

JOSEPH COLLINS

The Doctor Looks at Love and Life

The famous doctor-critic speaks openly of the delicate problems of sex as they confront men and women, and the whole fabric of society, today. Modern problems, the course and fate of love, the relative values in American life, these are [illegible] discussion whose viewpoint and conclusions are as unusual and up-to-date as the problems themselves. $3.00.

CHARLES STELZLE

A Son of the Bowery:
The Life Story of an East Side American

Born of immigrant parents on New York's East [illegible] Stelzle is known today from coast [illegible]. The dramatic story of his rise is told [illegible] his days as a machinist, his [illegible] constructive work for the Labor Movement, his development of new methods of social welfare. $3.50.

HERBERT GORMAN

A Victorian American—
Henry Wadsworth Longfellow

[illegible] life of Longfellow not only [illegible] but it details richly a period in [illegible] with color. Mr. Gorman [illegible] excellent use of new material and has [illegible] and vastly entertaining study. Illustrated. $5.00.

JOHN DRINKWATER

Mr. Charles King of England

The absurdities, vices and beauties of a fascinating and disgraceful period form the background for an unusual study of the facile Charles II. Illustrated, octavo. $5.00.

DORAN BOOKS

Books and Plays

Race

By VIRGINIA MOORE

A wild necessity to run
Disturbs my body, day and night:
I think the race is never won.

Mine is an undiminished flight
Up any hill. I sternly press
To goals forever lost to sight.

What zeal is this that grows no less?
I understand the body's heat,
But not the spiritual excess.

Perhaps the spirit, beat on beat,
Rarer than flesh, and greatly thinned,
Is running races with my feet.

Perhaps these two are closely-kinned:
I and the disembodied wind.

First Glance

WILLIAM HADLEY, whose pleasant task it has been to edit selections from the correspondence of Horace Walpole and William Cowper for two new volumes of Everyman's Library (Dutton: 80 cents each), implies in his brace of prefaces that the distinction of being the best letter-writer in the eighteenth century, and therefore in all of English time, must belong either to Walpole or to Cowper. I do not question the honor thus paid to the eighteenth century; indeed, I would pay it greater honor by increasing its number of candidates. Pope, as Mr. Hadley makes clear, is out of the question. But there is Swift, among whose letters would have to be numbered the ones he wrote to Stella and Mrs. Dingley, and there is the more recently discovered Mr. Boswell. There are others too. It was a wonderful century. Yet there is reason for confining the argument to Mr. Hadley's pair.

Not only are Walpole and Cowper perfect within their respective bounds, not only are they exhaustive of all the possibilities offered to men of their respective temperaments; they also, when taken together, come as near as two men could come to giving a perfect and exhaustive picture of the eighteenth century as it appeared to persons of genius. Walpole gives us the half we know better—the half inhabited busily and gaily by persons of the great world. In Walpole we get politics, gossip, "taste," dilettantism, and antiquarianism. Cowper, however, gives us something equally important and representative, for in him we get the solitary, the soul in retirement among little things, the mind beset with doubts and ecstasies and despairs. Walpole went skipping over Europe after this or that, and when he was in England administered a castle built to his taste and crammed with curiosities; Cowper crept early into the hole at Olney where most of his life he hid with the Unwins from the distractions of a world he could not discipline himself to endure. For Strawberry Hill there is the tiny study where Cowper went in the morning to versify and forget his troubles; for the whirl of politics which so constantly interested the son of the first Prime Minister there is Mr. Grenville the candidate, who one afternoon visited Cowper—of all persons—with a view to securing his "influence." For Walpole's exotic pets—goldfish with Chinese names and fancy bantams—there are Cowper's plain cats and hares and birds. For Walpole's ticket of admission to the halls of his castle there is Cowper's shrinking fear lest strangers find him out, there is his hope year in and year out that Lady Austen will become so angry with him at last that she will move away.

I must confess that I cannot decide for myself between these two. Mr. Hadley makes more of Cowper's "artlessness" and "simplicity" than I can; surely they are not virtues in themselves, and over against them at any rate could be set the equally simple passion in Walpole for satisfying his curiosity. Neither was artless, and both had nimbleness of mind in a degree hardly anywhere else to be met with in the world of letter-writers. Probably they are not to be compared at all, since they never meet and compete.

"A Selection from the Letters of Horace Walpole, with Many Illustrations and Facsimiles from Old Prints and Contemporary Sources," edited by W. S. Lewis (Harper, 2 vols.: $10), might have tipped the scales in favor of Walpole, since it is a beautiful work most competently produced—though it actually contains fewer letters, I believe, than the Everyman volume does. But it did not. I still cannot say which fellow is the more fascinating.

MARK VAN DOREN

Washington at Last?

George Washington: The Image and the Man. By W. E. Woodward. Boni and Liveright. $5.

George Washington, 1732-1762. By Rupert Hughes. William Morrow and Company. $4.

The Family Life of George Washington. By Charles Moore. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

IT was an ill service that Washington did the image-makers when he kept a diary; otherwise W. E. Woodward could be lightly dismissed as a flippant slanderer. The most uncompromising realist is prone to cringe as Mr. Woodward in almost every chapter plucks the gaudy feathers with which worshiping or partisan biographers have bedecked and disguised the hero of the Revolution. But out of these brilliant pages—and they are brilliant—emerges the man—of the "Diaries."

Mr. Woodward's Washington is a modern captain of industry in the making—unimaginative, eternally pessimistic, a little grasping, honest but hard in business dealings, dynamic, cunning in trade, a little snobbish, contemptuous of the common and courteous to the sacred herd. It is really a painting made from the homely tin-type of the "Diaries," and done with fidelity. Here, too, is the man of scrupulous integrity, fine courtesy in society, good intentions, and some vision. Here, also, we have the motif of his political career—hatred of democracy, indifference to the masses, a belief in government "by the well born and the wealthy." He was more interested in property than in human rights, which explains his alignment in the Hamilton-Jefferson controversy. Both Mr. Woodward and Mr. Hughes throw a white light on Washington's impatience with the Jeffersonians' plan for discrimination in favor of the original holders of securities in the funding fight, and on the story of his own profiting from the necessities of poverty-crippled soldiers sent out by the Ohio Company years before.

Thus Mr. Woodward unfolds the wrappings and gets down to flesh. Inevitably he gives us a man who was essentially a business man—a materialist. An unpleasant story, that of the eviction of the squatters who had settled in good faith on his Pennsylvania grant, when he got the benefit of their improvements; but that is taken from the "Diaries." However, Mr. Woodward does justice to Washington's business character, for he had the constructive even more than the speculative instinct, and executive genius. He farmed profitably, because scientifically, and in his distillery made the best liquor in Virginia. Some may resent the reference to liquor, wine, gin, rum, brandy, but the steel engravings of a myth are less appealing than these pictures of a hearty human being sitting down to a heavy dinner washed down with beer and wine.

Thus the wrappings fall. The "Diaries" were devastating to Parson Weems's perfect boy, and Mr. Woodward has irreparably damaged that picture of Washington on his knees at Valley Forge. He even summons good Dr. Abercrombie to smash the legend of his religious fervor. Thus, too, the perfect slave-owner of Lodge's imagining, who would neither buy nor sell slaves, turns out to be a myth. He did buy, and he did sell, and in the case of the ungovernable he sold them to the West Indies—the slave's literal hell. He did nothing to improve his slaves' minds or morals, and was apparently unconcerned with the promiscuous sexual relations on his plantation—except among his dogs. But he fed and clothed his slaves well, and forbade brutal treatment by the lash. These plucked feathers will suffice to show wherein the book is iconoclastic.

But it is more than that, for we have here the development of the economic basis of the Revolution. Sprinkled throughout are vivid little word pictures, like that of Patrick Henry delivering his immortal speech. (But how does Mr. Woodward get the impression that Henry "believed in democracy to the bottom of his soul"?) Mr. Woodward has a knack for characterizations in a sentence. Thus, "Jefferson's ideas have the subtle permanence of a cameo"; "Richard Henry Lee was the kind of man who, early in life, begins to look like a family portrait"; Sir William Howe "walked through the Revolution like a slow-paced cardinal walking through the dim corridors of the Vatican"; Paine "wrote homely words" that "march across his pages like muscular freckle-faced men crossing a field."

Quite a different book is Rupert Hughes's, which takes an almost virgin field and plows it thoroughly, cultivates it intensively, and brings forth much harvest. It is confined to the first thirty years. No one has delved so deeply and probed so patiently into this comparatively neglected period. Mr. Hughes has redeemed it. They were years of slow accumulation of acres, of soldiering and love-making, and here, too, many loved traditions of the school books meet with challenge, and some unpleasant stories are featured, albeit not without justification. The soldier rather suffers in the story of Fort Necessity, and while he of Braddock's defeat remains superhumanly courageous, he is not so superlatively wise; and the much-maligned Braddock, of whom an attractive portrait is given, emerges from these pages a rather brilliant, altogether lovable roué of fine soldierly qualities. A splendid, stirring story, this of Braddock's expedition, its gay camp with fashionable ladies competing for the favor of the commander, the army stumbling and struggling onward over bogs, gullies, rocks, creeks, tortured by woodticks and a lack of liquor as they carve their way with axes through primeval forests.

Mr. Hughes has gone deeply into the most unfortunate incident in Washington's career—the killing of Jumonville and a company of Frenchmen claiming to be emissaries with a message. Few Americans realize that this was an international incident of the time, resulting in the publication of pamphlets, poems, official reports in France, baldly accusing Washington of "assassination." Mr. Hughes has examined the records, the pamphlets, the poems, the reply of Washington, and he presents them all for what they are worth. He evidently does not believe —who could?—that Washington knowingly ordered his men to fire on emissaries. He had reasons to assume them something else. It is possible of course that a mistake was made; the reader, having both sides fully stated, will judge for himself.

More entertaining perhaps is Mr. Hughes's elaborate argument to prove that Washington loved his friend's wife, Sally Fairfax. Mr. Woodward agrees. Mr. Charles Moore in "The Family Life of George Washington" scouts the idea, but touches the topic gingerly. Mr. Hughes, we think, makes good his case up to the point where he would have this coldly cautious man of convention and broad acres ready to elope—and there he overleaps the mark.

Mr. Moore's book is an intimate, charmingly gossipy, and thoroughly authentic chronicle of the family, including Martha's grandchildren. He shows conclusively that they shared in Martha's snobbery and her poor opinion of "the filthy democrats."

All three books are worth while. Mr. Woodward has given us the most brilliant, cynical, and clever portrait; Mr. Hughes has taken the youthful Washington, a fading myth, and made him a red-blooded, lusty, gusty human being for the first time; and Mr. Moore has given us the most satisfactory family history we have yet had.

CLAUDE G. BOWERS

Proof of the Pudding

Far End. By May Sinclair. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

"FAR END" is the commonplace story of the efforts of a wife to hold the love of her novelist husband. Whatever subtleties it may be supposed to involve are deeply hid. The tale, after wandering uncertainly in various directions, finally expires in tender sentiment upon the hearthstone of a cottage which, if not precisely rose-embowered, is at least beclustered with equally appropriate flowers, and a conclusion more commonplace or less satisfactory it would be difficult to find. If May Sinclair were an unknown writer one would not be inclined to ponder over it for long; one might feel, perhaps, a certain surprise at the discovery of so banal a tale recounted in so crisp and competent a style, but one would hardly feel more.

Miss Sinclair being, however, the person she is, one is bound to suppose that some subtlety, at least of technique, was intended, and one is bound to seek it out. Moreover she herself seems to offer a clue, for in a chapter which does not appear to have any function at all unless it be to supply a key she represents her novelist discussing his craft. He is determined, he says, to discard the conventional novelistic device of the omniscient spectator and to represent instead events as they appear in the consciousness of a particular character, even though he must, in so doing, rest content with the fact that his reader can never be sure that he is getting the truth about persons or things as distinguished from the way in which they appear to a single fallible person. To this a critic friend replies that it would be even more remarkable to have a piece of fiction in which events and characters were seen, not through the personality of one character, but through that of all those involved; and though the novelist rejects this method as one too hard to hit, it is apparently the one which Miss Sinclair has endeavored to follow.

Now one might reasonably object that a story as perceived by three different persons would be simply three stories and that it would carry one no further than "The Ring and the Book," but Miss Sinclair has endeavored to forestall that objection also by introducing a passage from one of her hero's other novels in which is represented the humorous argument of a philosopher, passionately devoted to the idealistic conception of the universe, who endeavors to maintain that though each of the three slices of pudding eaten by three guests exists separately only in the mind of the eater there also exists a pudding which consists of the ideas of all the perceivers put together. Perhaps, then, Miss Sinclair has endeavored to tell her story in such a way that its intellectual and moral background shall nowhere transcend the limitations of the collective intelligence of her characters. They see their problem and evaluate the worth of the conclusion not as she but as they would see it, and they solve it not as she but as they would fancy it solved. If they fall into banal sentiment and arrive at a haven less secure than they suppose, then the fault is theirs and she, a mere outside person, has no obligation to offer any comment upon their deficiencies.

Unfortunately, however, the result of so intricate a scheme —if this, indeed, be it—is, in the present instance at least, a novel which can only with difficulty be distinguished from the product of a second-rate mind, and it is not easy to see just what has been gained—although the losses are clear enough. The irony, if irony is, indeed, intended, is never very pointed, and whatever insight into the situation the author may have had is carefully hid. Miss Sinclair has traveled through a wide circle and returned to something which, even in technique, is barrenly simple and which fails to convey anything whatever. She has surrendered the opportunity which the more usual manner of writing novels affords, and she has gained nothing in vivid objective presentation. No matter what realm of being puddings may inhabit the proof of them is still in the eating, and "Far End" is not good pudding.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

New Ways with an Old Perplexity

Strangers. By Dorothy Van Doren. George H. Doran Company. $2.

THE subjects most interesting to man, love and death and birth, hunger and pain and truth and beauty and power, proceed directly from his own nature and the effect on his nature of the world in which he lives. After these primary interests come others produced by arbitrary regulations which he or society has imposed upon his nature. Among these adultery is perhaps the most universally interesting today, because we are emerging from a period in which it was pretty generally considered a sin, at least when openly indulged, though prostitution always afforded an escape for the man from too stifling monogamy, into a period when prostitution seems more hateful than decorum seems desirable, and men question an institution that has never been maintained except in name. Because we are in such a transition period, adultery arrogates to itself an importance that for the moment almost seems to exceed that of the primary interests, since great masses of people think not at all of truth and beauty, and many to whom love is a stranger can still get excited for and against adultery. And of course to the extent that it is, as in this book, an individual matter of conflicting emotions, and not a social matter of broken commandments, it is also a primary interest.

Love is not a stranger to the husbands and wives in Mrs. Van Doren's frank treatment of this ancient and yet peculiarly modern difficulty. Her title is concerned with the inevitable separateness of the individual soul. And this may possibly give some clue to her convictions on the subject, though whatever these may be she keeps them to herself. It is indicative of the impersonality of her treatment that she permits only one of her characters to use the word adultery, since the word expresses a preconceived attitude about what may be a natural and desirable course of action. Not that Mrs. Van Doren says it is this. But she watches her characters' experiments impartially. Men change their minds from time to time as to what actions constitute sins, and the number of so-called crimes has vastly decreased with civilization. And so she does not call by a name that has been synonymous with the blackest sin and crime a course of action that may be about to enter a more respectable category. The crime after all may have been a social crime perpetrated against individual human nature. We are beginning to suspect today that the one unforgivable thing is to sin against life. And possibly society has sinned grievously against life when it has decreed that each man and woman shall love only once in a lifetime, unless his or her life partner chances to die. Individuals have always reacted differently to this social law. Some have heeded it and some have gone their way. National customs have grown up by which people were able decorously to evade it. So Mrs. Van Doren does not stack the cards against Ann's love affair with Stephen by giving it a dark name. But, on the other hand, Rachel and Paul, who in their young passion can't conceive of loving anyone else, seem to be her favorite pair of lovers.

The engaging Ann is the disturbing factor in the book. For Ann quite frankly questions the desirability of monogamy, and if woman questions it as well as man, the whole house may fall about our ears. There have always been light women, of course. If there weren't, many a solemn young man tells his wife, monogamy wouldn't last a day. But Ann can't be dismissed as a light woman. She is as self-respecting and genuine and independent a personality as any man. And when one spring of joy and zest in life grows flaccid, she tastes another.

Of course it is true, as the wife of Ann's lover points out, that two people seldom begin and stop loving each other at the same time, and this is often considered an overwhelming argument in favor of monogamy. It may be another proof rather that life isn't particularly simple than that a woman should try to kill her love for one man because another still loves her. I am not quite sure how it eventually seems to Ann. Mrs. Van Doren wisely knows that it will seem many different things to her as she is tossed from one emotion to another, and leaves the decision open. She doesn't try to ram any conclusion down Ann's throat, or ours. Instead she contents herself with telling, with a quite unusual impartiality and respect for different sorts of persons, the story of one of those very real entanglements that confront all ardent and generous and intelligent people who have ceased to guide their conduct by any arbitrary set of rules.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Primitive Mentality

How Natives Think. By Lucien Lévy-Bruhl. Authorized Translation by Lillian A. Clare. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

PROFESSOR LÉVY-BRUHL, of Paris, at the moment the guest of Johns Hopkins University, is a distinguished scholar in several fields. He has made a distinctive and important study of the early stages of human thinking. Unfortunately his works remained long untranslated. His "Primitive Mentality," which appeared in English three years ago, is in reality the second part of the present work, which in the original bears the more exact title: "Mental Processes in Undeveloped Societies." He has advanced the problem which Tylor established in the evolutionary movement half a century ago. Tylor found the solution in the concept of animism, the attempt to project the universe and interpret natural forces on the pattern of human motives and ways of thinking, and furthermore in the doctrine of survival, the tendency to continue outgrown habits of thought especially when embodied in the cultural products of customs, myths, beliefs, rites, and folklore generally. The monumental work of Fraser has refined and extended this anthropological phase of psychology to a vast array of cultural phenomena, vital to the story of the human psyche and its varied development—the whole an impressive panorama of the human past. Now that man's anthropological past has come to be incorporated into the schoolboy's knowledge and the popular consciousness of the meaning of history, it is a source of gratification that the more scholarly reader has ready access to the approach and findings of Lévy-Bruhl.

Lévy-Bruhl's correction of the Tylor view has all the significance of an original discovery. The psychology of Tylor's day was most inadequate. Brilliant as was his mind, he shared the limitations of the day and looked upon the primitive man as an undeveloped modern European, just as the child psychology of that and even of a later day regarded the child as an immature adult. What Lévy-Bruhl makes clear is that the primitive mind is quite a different type of psychic instrument; it is in the pre-logical stage, and is differently oriented toward the world of things and spirits. It works in a different medium and milieu. It is not so much that it lacks what we possess in our mental heritage as that its animus is differently directed, differently inspired, differently interested. We work with concepts; the pre-logical stage of the concept Lévy-Bruhl calls "collective representation"—not a good term but not easy to improve upon. Its essential characteristics are that it arises and derives its force from the collective social life, and that it has a deep emotional source and sway. Furthermore, its psychic nature is saturated in something which we call mystical or occult, but which really operates by the "law of participation." It is the concept "in the making."

Though Lévy-Bruhl calls it by the same name, he seems not to have been influenced by the Freudian "concept" but to have recognized independently the inherent traits that characterize the Freudian psychology; its strong emotional tone, derived from the social pressure and conferring the pleasure of belief—the fantasy trend which in early psychic stages dominates reality and replaces it. The illuminating power of the Lévy-Bruhl concept of primitive mentality is far-reaching, though not easily indicated in brief compass. When we recall the story of the Indians who told Catlin that since he had put buffaloes in pictures in a book, they had none to eat; when we remember that after a primitive man dreams he has been bitten by a snake he goes through the treatment suitable for a real bite; that what the wife does when her husband warrior or hunter is on the war-path is believed to influence his fate, we are touching upon various phases of the law of participation. The picture, the name, the dream, the wife, the husband, the parts of the body, the clothing, the instruments of war or chase, the totemic animal, the luck, all participate in the qualities and action of what to us is real only in the object; the rites that grow about these collective representations are true "communion" ceremonies. The virtue, the principle, the power by which the rite works, is real with the reality of the mystic and occult. What to us is superstition thus acquires a deeper meaning and a more authentic warrant; and the lore of names, numbers, shadows, dreams, ghosts, images, effigies, omens, amulets, charms, fetishes, lots, fortunes, auguries, takes its proper part in the story of how the human mind cut its teeth, from those of infancy to those of (alleged) wisdom. To call primitive people heathens who worship idols becomes a crudity worse than any confusion or error. Whatever we may think of his conclusions, the primitive man's thinking is worthy of respect.

The Lévy-Bruhl thesis is well supported by application; the details are interesting. In illustrating how natives think, he studies their language, their systems of counting, their notions of disease and treatment, their nature-lore, their kinship relations, their magic, their priest-craft and their "mediums" with unusual gifts as seers and prophets, their elaborate notions of death and birth, their property and authority regulations; and he uses the same key to unlock all the mysterious storerooms of the primitive mind. In due course he sets forth that the logical claimant, the assertion of the life of reason in Santayana's convenient phrase, makes terms with the older orientations; and the transition occurs to a higher type—as the new stone age replaces the old stone age. Yet this is done with none of the steady progress that later ensues when the logic which lays the foundations of science reorients the human mind. Nor does the analysis and its lessons for our own psychology end here; there are other habits of the undeveloped mind, some of them discoverable in the intelligence tests, such as strong sensory observation and memory, the particularizing tendency, the feebleness of abstractions and generalizations, the satisfaction of the imaginary and the security of the familiar. The study of Lévy-Bruhl covers an important chapter in primitive psychology, rich in interest, significant in its bearings upon the persistent problem: why we behave like human beings, and why we do so so imperfectly.

JOSEPH JASTROW

Books in Brief

Mr. and Mrs. Haddock in Paris, France. By Donald Ogden Stewart. Harper and Brothers. $2.

There is no formula for being funny, but any number of formulas for creating comic effects. The trouble with these formulas is that they are formulas, and though by all the laws of logic they ought to be as good one time as another, they never are. Mr. Stewart employed a formula with marked success in "A Parody Outline of History" and "Aunt Polly's Story of Mankind," but recently the law of diminishing returns has begun its deadly work; the laughs in "Mr. and Mrs. Haddock in Paris, France" are padlocked. Slapstick and satire are poor bedfellows, and here the scattered ventures of the latter remind one of the trick canes made of rubber which comedians use for laughs in vaudeville. The book is quaintly illustrated by Herb Roth; particularly one notices the presence of double-decked buses in Paris and the absence of saucers on cafe tables. Both these innovations of the artist have merit and no doubt will be installed in Paris as soon as a copy of Mr. Stewart's book falls into the hands of the prefect of police.

The Chronicle of Clemendy. By Arthur Machen. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This youthful libation to Chaucer and Boccaccio and Rabelais was first published when its author was twenty-three. It is fashioned in mannered prose and steeped in archaic elegance. Mr. Machen does not think so much of it now, but reading in the light of the bitter, lonely, semi-starved days in which it was created, one must rank it as a decided achievement.

Our Doctors. By Maurice Duplay. Harper and Brothers. $2.

This novel, translated from the French by Dr. Joseph Collins, divides its interest with French candor and impartiality between medicine and mating. Its amours carry clinical implications and its scientific researches are conducted with passion. The lay reader will be apt to wish that its action did not hover quite so persistently around operating rooms, but it is undoubtedly a vivid study of doctors with their masks off.

A Brittle Heaven. By Babette Deutsch. Greenberg, Publisher. $2.50.

As a study of the mental development of a girl in a contemporary environment this story has so much discernment that its lack of illumination is quite inexplicable. It is faithfully and sympathetically written; it is filled with characters which one has no difficulty in believing; but the narrative distinctly fails to come to a focus. "A Brittle Heaven" is too thick for a slice of life, and not meaty enough for a soul-searching sandwich.

Sanctuary! Sanctuary! By Dallas Lore Sharp. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

The Hingham naturalist wanders afield—to the bird sanctuary on Three Arch Rocks off the coast of Oregon, to Santa Barbara, to the pass where the yellow-billed magpies still nest, and returns to his native Jersey swamps and his beloved Massachusetts hills, preaching conservation as he roams.

Drama

The Mind of Werfel

NO artist, I take it, writes history for history's sake. If he borrows his fable from record or legend it is only because he sees in the ready-made story some relevance to the thing he is trying to say, and the first duty of interpretative criticism becomes, in such a case, to see the events through the author's eyes. Thus if Franz Werfel has chosen for his latest tragedy the familiar story of the unfortunate Maximilian, its meaning is to be sought not in history but in Werfel.

His characters, historic though they may be, are for him types and symbols. The play "Juarez and Maximilian" (Guild Theater) moves ponderously though not dully through thirteen scenes. Its technique is not remarkable, for it is, indeed, rather old-fashionedly episodic and there is nothing in either the selection of incident or the interpretation of character which is superficially original; yet original it nevertheless is. Maximilian, essentially a romanticist, comes to Mexico as a tool of the lesser Napoleon, whose cynical littleness he is incapable of even suspecting. Inspired by the old faded dream of kindly despotism and vain at least to the extent of vastly misjudging his own weakness, he goes down in utter ruin before the implacable Juarez, conceived here as a type of that iron, unemotional Christ or anti-Christ of whom Lenin is the most conspicuous contemporary embodiment and whose virtues and vices are alike incomprehensible to those softer idealists who found their philosophy upon kindliness and scruples. For Maximilian there remains nothing except a death, heroic according to the old romantic tradition, and the conviction that, quixotic though he may be, "there are times when a decent man cannot be anything else." Juarez remains for him and for the author an inscrutable mystery to be admired and to be feared.

The mind of Werfel, if one may judge from his works, is mastered by a weary pessimism. From his age he inherited a disgust with the futilities of the old order, but knowledge of modern revolution has left him fearful of that too, and if through his plays there runs no thread of definite partisanship, no clear note of assertion, but only a perpetual balancing of principle against principle which ends with a despairing question, it is because this mirrors accurately his own perplexed and hesitant soul. The world as he sees it is not a struggle between good and evil, between two sides one of which may be espoused with clear faith, but between two principles inscrutably complex; even, perhaps, between two evils—evils which triumph, now in the futile injustice of the old order, now in the bloody anarchy of social upheaval. Temperamentally he is the romantic idealist, much less near to Juarez than to Maximilian, but, like the latter, he has been compelled to realize that it is in the Juarezes, relentless and unscrupulous, rather than in him or his like, that there resides the power capable of triumphing over the ugliness of the past—even though it be destined to do no more than supplant it with a new ugliness.

Thus "Juarez and Maximilian" is essentially only "Goat Song" rewritten, with the Monster of the one become the Juarez of the other. In neither does this embodiment of the real subject of the play appear upon the stage. The idealism and the weakness of Maximilian, the intrigues of Church and Empire—these are familiar phenomena to be analyzed and displayed; but the irresistible force, ambiguously compounded of passionate purpose alloyed with the mere lust of revengeful destruction which is embodied in Juarez and the Monster, is as yet too inscrutable to be apprehended as anything more definite than a power moving mysteriously behind the scenes. It pulls all the strings, determines all the action, but no one sees its face clearly enough to read its inner meaning.

It is the only efficient social force; destiny is in its hands—power to destroy, power perhaps to rebuild, but only destruction is sure. And so, as the curtain falls, three who have loved Maximilian turn from a glimpse of Juarez with fear and question in their eyes. What is it they have seen go by? The redeemer of mankind or only the old Lust in a new form?

As a play "Juarez and Maximilian" can hardly be destined to any wide popularity. It is too complicated, too involved, and, above all, too little explicit to entertain merely as a colorful spectacle, and it demands of its audience a willingness to ponder its implications greater than most audiences will accord. Easy it certainly is not, but it has a monumental impressiveness and the Theater Guild exhibits a genuine courage in undertaking so difficult a task. It has mounted the piece lavishly and it is acted well, both by Alfred Lunt, upon whom by far the greatest burden falls, and by the large number of those playing minor roles. Many will question the wisdom of the choice, but to me the play was both interesting and moving.

"They All Want Something" (Wallack's Theater) is a not very distinguished farce offered as a vehicle for William Tilden; "The Jeweled Tree" (Forty-eighth Street Theater) is a ponderous and unimaginative spectacle purporting to deal with events in Egypt just after the death of our latest lamented Emperor Tutankhamen. "Black Boy" (Comedy Theater), by Jim Tully and Frank Dazey, presents Paul Robeson in the role of a Negro heavyweight champion. The language is often forceful, and Mr. Robeson both sings and acts superbly, but the play is without value.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

The Neighborhood Playhouse, 466 Grand Street, N. Y. Telephone Drydock 7516
First play of the new Repertory Season
A Satirical Comedy by Alfred Savoir
THE LION TAMER
Every evening (except Monday) at 8:30. Matinees Wednesday & Saturday at 2:30
SUBSCRIBE NOW TO OUR 10TH SEASON
Address Subscription Secretary, 466 Grand St., for information

Longacre Theatre, 48th St., West of Broadway. Evenings 8:30. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30
AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY
THEODORE DREISER'S
"A PLAY WHICH IS BOUND TO WRENCH A MILLION HEARTS" Journal
DRAMATIZED BY PATRICK KEARNEY.

Dostoievsky's "Crime and Punishment" Vividly Portrayed by a Flawless Cast in an Excellent Adaptation BASIL SYDNEY & MARY ELLIS ACHIEVE A SUPERB TRIUMPH IN "THE HUMBLE"
By Lawrence Irving
Greenwich VILLAGE THEATRE, 7th Avenue and Fourth Street
Matinee Thursday—Best Seats $1

LECTURES—COURSES

THE WORKERS SCHOOL
106-108 EAST 14th STREET
Courses in Labor Journalism, Modern Literature, Russian Literature, Proletarian Writers' Workshop, Marxism-Leninism, Imperialism, Negro Problem, and other subjects.
Instructors—Scott Nearing, Arthur Calhoun, Michael Gold, Robert Dunn, Moissaye Olgin, Alexander Trachtenberg and others.
Bertram D. Wolfe, Director. Classes begin November 1.
Write for complete catalog

International Relations Section

Japan Returns to Feudalism

By HARRY EMERSON WILDES

STEADILY Japan reverts to the intellectual seclusion of her feudal days. Sixty years of rapid surging forward give way to retrogression, particularly in fields where Western culture has been hitherto most influential. Free thought, free religion, and freedom of scientific research are now to be eradicated. The students in the colleges are bound hand and foot by bureaucratic bonds.

A year ago, in April, 1925, the so-called Peace Preservation Bill clamped down a rigid censorship upon all those who might wish to change the constitution. The Founding Fathers of our own land are fallible indeed in contrast to the putative author of the Japanese constitution, the Emperor Meiji, who was himself a god. Suggestions to amend the document which Prince Ito penned for him partake therefore of treason and of sacrilege.

Anarchists and Communists were, of course, the enemies ostensibly avowed when the Peace Preservation Bill was passed, but, under its operation, liberals, democrats, and unionists have been cowed into quiet. A Farmer-Labor Party was suppressed within three hours after birth, in December, 1925, because it had debated resolutions of a faintly pinkish tone. That the resolutions were badly beaten by the delegates and that the proponents were excluded from the party was not accepted as a warranty of Farmer-Labor righteousness, and that Home Minister Wakatsuki's interpretation was approved is indicated by his elevation to the Premiership within two months after his decision to suppress the party.

To the rulers of a society based, as is Japan's, upon a scandalously corrupt political system, and upon an unfair economic grouping, where restive tenant-farmers, an underpaid urban proletariat, and an unemployed intelligentsia are suffering depression, too close a scrutiny of the foundations is disquieting. The danger is intensified because of a growing consciousness that the cost of maintaining such a social system is greater than its worth. Japan's gains since the war with Russia have by no means been impressive. In medicine and in some fields of science Japan has remained abreast of the world, but in literature, music, and sculpture her efforts of late years have been barren. In her art, her architecture, and her drama the mingling of Oriental and Occidental traditions has stifled her old excellence without an equivalent assistance to old forms. By her diplomacy Japan has been plunged into an orgy of militarism without a real necessity. Her incursions into Asia, like Plantagenet England's into France, have enormously increased the military budget without yielding any great advantages which might not have been more cheaply won in peaceful ways. Although herself poor and lacking in such essential raw materials as iron, oil, cotton, wool, and rubber—even lacking food itself—she has followed the mercantile ideas of wealthy nations rich in natural resources. The almost inevitable result has been a falling off of her prosperity and the rise of unemployment.

Small wonder therefore that Japan's native inferiority complex has been nourished, and that among the masses "dangerous thoughts" are rife. Perhaps their influence is neither as widespread nor as potent as might be indicated by the fears expressed in the talk of bankers, politicians, and newspapermen, but that beneath the lid the pot boils briskly cannot be denied. But leaders are missing for a democratic movement. Japanese liberals are aging men, and few are rising to replace them. Yukio Ozaki, the radical of forty years ago, is still the only leading figure now. In fact the older men are deserting the cause. Ozaki's lifetime friend, his "Twin God of the Constitution," has succumbed, to quote the Osaka Mainichi, to the "lure of gold." Another leader has been in prison charged with receiving bribes from white-slave interests. Hirelings and gunmen terrorize the minor liberals and are officially ignored. Press laws and "peace-preservation bills" stifle free expression.

At the close of the Great War hopes were being entertained that the colleges in Japan might take the lead in democratic thought. Within the past three years the New Man Societies led by Professor Yoshino of Tokio Imperial and Dr. Isoo Abe of Waseda were flourishing. Today these groups are dead. The Student Federation of the Social Sciences is now dispersed after a long martyrdom by police raids and imprisonment. Nor may new groups spring up to fill the places of these pioneers. Such subjects as might provide munitions to challenge the reaction continued to enjoy much popularity with students. The bulletin boards of all the universities were filled with notices of new societies to study sociology and economics. Many of these, no doubt, were coverts to conceal socialists and other "dangerous thinkers," but all of them were viewed with grave suspicion. In consequence the study of sociology is now denied, not only to the students, but also to the private reader. An official order from Minister of Education Okada, issued in April, 1926, addressed to all colleges and schools, reads:

> 1. Any society or association in which dangerous thoughts are either to be read or studied is absolutely prohibited irrespective of whatever form or name it takes.
> 2. Private studies are also prohibited if the studies concern dangerous thoughts.
> 3. Students are barred from reading books and periodicals specially named by the authorities.
> 4. No matter whether they be scientific or not speeches delivered by students outside the classrooms are prohibited even if the subject matter is suggested by school authorities and professors.
> 5. A joint program of speeches in which students of several different schools take part is prohibited.

The time of issuing this gag order was well-judged. Dr. Okada had weathered storms resulting from his introduction of military training, and from his prohibition of dramatic performances where the school uniform was not to be worn. He had no desire to cause a repetition of the "Hamlet-in-brass-buttons" controversy. He chose a time therefore in which the fewest possible students would be moved to protest. Commencements in Japan usually occur in the latter part of March. A holiday of two or three weeks then ensues until the opening of the new semester. During this interval, while many of the students have returned to their homes, the Diet adjourns its sessions. Okada, of course, had no desire to face interpellations in the House. His first order, applying only to the technical schools, appeared soon after the Diet's adjournment. Extensions then were announced to cover all educational institutions under government control. Private universities and schools were not forbidden to teach the social sciences, but were notified that failure to comply with the rules of the official schools would involve the loss of all their privileges. Protests flamed from both principals and student bodies. The former were soon silenced, according to the Hochi, by Okada's threat to dismiss any principal who persisted in objection. Students of Tokio Imperial, Waseda, and thirty colleges of the Kobe-Osaka-Kyoto region who held mass meetings to condemn the plan were met by threats to enforce the Peace Preservation Bill. Prime Minister Wakatsuki, Minister of Justice Egi, Procurator General Koyama, and Dr. Okada took pains to impress upon the annual Gubernatorial Conference, early in May, that more strictness should be exercised over student life and thought. The agitations thereupon ceased with remarkable celerity.

Espionage and delation systems reaching into every corner of the colleges probably played a most important role toward the collapse of student protests. Vice-Minister of Education Kawasaki disclosed that, as late as June, 1926, the Home Office and the educational authorities were cooperating in the maintenance of a black-list containing the names of more than 1,500 students suspected of left-wing tendencies. Over all these students, Kawasaki boasted, the closest surveillance was being kept. The Yomiuri and the Hochi, two of the smaller papers, could not indorse these czarist methods and protested that Okada and Kawasaki ought to be obliged to resign at once, but the Yamato was effusive in praise of the vigilance displayed by the officials.

Chugai Shogyo, Tokio's equivalent of the New York Journal of Commerce, urged the Ministry to investigate professors. "We think students are involuntarily captivated by radicalism because of the influence of their lecturers. Not a few professors advocate radical principles. Let the fountainhead be purified and the stream will become pure." The idea proved immediately popular. Other papers hastened to elaborate the thesis, and Kokumin—whose editor receives high honor from the Emperor—embarked upon a series of editorials designed to show that foreign teachers in Japan are particularly inefficient and untrustworthy. An outcome of this agitation is the proposal, which will be considered by the Diet in December, of establishing a thought-control bureau in the Department of Justice, an idea which ought to win instant approbation from certain of our own officials.

Foreign missionaries were also specified as sources of contamination. Christianity, which after sixty years of effort has converted less than one-half of one per cent of the empire's population, is now the special target for abuse. Its tenets are believed "subversive of public peace and order and of public morals" and the duties which Christianity entails upon its members are held "contrary to the obligations of Japanese subjects." Men like Motosada Zumoto, spokesman for Japan at the 1925 Williamstown Conference, Count Aisuke Kabayama, president of the Japan Steel Company and former head of the semi-official news agency, "Kanzo" Uchimura a leading publicist, and Toyohiko Kagawa, the foremost Christian social worker have all, within recent months, given testimony to show that Christianity falls under such criticisms. Okada's department, working under this instigation, is drafting a bill for submission to the next Diet whereby Christianity and all other religions as may be similar in tendency can be suppressed if, in the opinion of the authorities, they endanger peace, order, and good morals. Shinto, the official worship, is explicity excluded from the operations of the proposed legislation, according to the explanations given by the framers

Viking Books

M. R. WERNER
Author of "Brigham Young," says in The Sun of

Mohammed
by R. F. Dibble

"A fascinating account of a man's life . . . which Mr. Dibble tells vividly and entertainingly." The Boston Transcript calls it "a live, interesting, human biography . . . a contribution of value to religious history." $3.00

The SECOND BOOK of NEGRO SPIRITUALS

John Haynes Holmes writes: "I never believed that anything could repeat the joy and satisfaction that I found in your first collection (The Book of American Negro Spirituals), but this second collection has done the trick." With a new introduction and 61 more songs. $3.50

GAUTIER
AND THE ROMANTICS
by John Garber Palache

The author of "Mlle. de Maupin," devotee of beauty and literary innovator, is here vividly set forth with the celebrities and eccentrics of his circle: Balzac, Flaubert, Baudelaire, Turgenev, George Sand, the Goncourts, etc. $3.00

TRANSITION
by Edwin Muir

Illuminating and wise essays on the most baffling and interesting figures in contemporary literature: Joyce, Lawrence, Strachey, Huxley, and many more. $2.00

SATIRICAL POEMS
by Siegfried Sassoon

A long awaited volume of poems from the pen of one of the most popular of modern poets. $1.50 of the measure. Representatives of virtually all religions, Christians, Buddhists, and the rest, unite in opposition to the legislation, and though several months have been devoted to the study of means whereby a religion-control bill may be safely drawn, the clauses are not yet perfected.

30 Irving Place THE VIKING PRESS New York

Discussion of the measure has, however, served to concentrate attention on the evils brought by foreigners. Within the present year the press has blossomed with innuendoes against the licentiousness and vice alleged to exist in the foreign communities. A tale of naked orgies at which foreigners are present for "assuring themselves entrance into heaven" was recorded in the Osaka Mainichi, one of the most influential papers of the empire, although the story was printed in one edition only. Diplomatic attachés have been accused of gambling and of protecting evil-doers. Six girls of the so-called "modern set" were rounded up and made to tell their story of the "fast set of undesirable foreigners" which had corrupted them. One f the more sensational newspapers retold a charge made ten years ago that in America there are no virgins. Western influence is blamed for the "cafe civilization" and for the moral laxity now said to be engulfing all the Japanese.

An anti-foreign bitterness is rising. Count Soyejima, who came to the University of Chicago to tell the "truth about Japan," returns to Tokio to tell of America's aggression and of her decadence. Mr. Zumoto, who like Count Soyejima is a semi-official publicist, reported that concerted efforts at anti-Japanism are backed by the United States Navy and by Secretary Wilbur himself. When the Japan Advertiser, the American newspaper, softened Mr. Zumoto's speech by dropping out the more anti-American portions and by capping the story with a headline, Attitude in U. S. Toward Japan Is Most Friendly, Mr. Zumoto felt sure enough of his position to make strenuous protest at the omission.

Simultaneously the Pan-Asiatic movement grows. Almost unheard of in 1916, today the leading journals of Japan all favor it. A Pan-Asiatic Society held a congress at Nagasaki in the summer to set a united front against the West. The ignorant masses are being taught that the West is inhabited by heartless monsters who seek to crush the East. The press, which might have served as leader and interpreter of international understanding, has fallen victim to insularity, distorted vision, and prejudice. Its present tactics tend to jeopardize the friendship of the nations.

Contributors to This Issue

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD spent the last four months in England, Germany, and France.

EDGAR MELS covered the original Daugherty investigation for the North American Newspaper Alliance.

ALBERT PARRY is with the Russky Golos of New York City.

MARION BACHRACH conducts a nursery school.

VIRGINIA MOORE is the author of "Not Poppy."

CLAUDE G. BOWERS is the author of "Party Battles of the Jackson Period" and "Jefferson and Hamilton."

ALICE BEAL PARSONS is author of "The Woman's Dilemma."

JOSEPH JASTROW'S latest volume is "The Psychology of Conviction."

HARRY EMERSON WILDES was formerly professor of economics at Keio University, Tokio.

1468 NEW 1926

OXFORD BOOKS

About Shakespeare and His Plays. By G. F. [illegible].

All that is known of the man Shakespeare, and the main problems raised by his plays, are outlined in the clearest way in this small, compact volume. Price $1.20.

Letters from William Blake to Thomas Butts, 1800-1803. (Limited Edition.)

Reproductions of ten letters written by Blake, "with a charm and freedom he seldom allowed himself," to Butts. The volume includes a receipted bill in Blake's autograph. Price $8.50.

Plan of a Novel. By Jane Austen. (Limited Edition.)

The "Plan of a Novel" is a gem of satire, suggested by the absurd proposal of the Prince Regent's librarian that Miss Austen should devote her genius to depicting a "literary clergyman" (whose life and character were closely to resemble his own). This, with other delightful documents in the volume, are printed from the originals. Price $7.00.

Diary of a Country Parson, The. The Reverend James Woodforde. Vol. II. Edited by John Beresford.

Parson Woodforde takes his place beside Pepys and Evelyn, as revealed in this journal with undoubted charm. In this second volume the extracts are almost continuous and show us the daily life of the Woodfordes through the years 1782 to 1787. The first volume (published in 1924) is from 1758 to 1781. Price $4.25.

New Chapters in Greek Art. By Percy Gardner.

In these studies on Greek sculpture, Mr. Gardner has not limited himself to a merely technical discussion but has considered the artistic and historical bearing of the works. The book is fully illustrated with figures in the text, and with several well-known plates. Price $7.00.

Ethics of Buddhism, The. By S. Tachibana.

An attempt to explain the practical morality of Buddhism. Price $5.00.

Prophetic Writings of William Blake, The. Edited with a General Introduction, Glossarial Index of Symbols, Commentary and Appendices, by D. J. Sloss and J. P. R. Wallis. Oxford English Texts.

This edition gives an exact text of those of William Blake's Prophetic Writings which, from their generally non-lyrical form, could not be included in the 1905 edition of the poems. The broad conclusions concerning Blake's doctrines and opinions on metaphysics, ethics, and art, as revealed in these writings, are brought out in the introduction. Two volumes, cloth, price $14.00. India paper edition, two volumes in one, price $21.00.

Two Chapters on Persuasion.

The original manuscript of these chapters is all that remains in Jane Austen's handwriting of any of her novels. They have been reprinted here (not in facsimile) from the fragments in the British Museum. Printed from Jane Austen's Autograph. Price $2.00. [illegible] edition on handmade paper, price $7.00.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
American Branch New York City

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1926 No. 3200

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS ... 439
THE NATION'S Poetry Prize ... 441
EDITORIALS:
The Great Free-Trade Manifesto ... 442
Eugene Victor Debs ... 443
Mr. Asquith Retires ... 443
Critics and Criticized ... 444
A POLITICAL CRISIS IN EDUCATION. By Chapin ... 445
GERMANY REVISITED. By Oswald Garrison Villard ... 447
WILLIAM GREEN'S CONVENTION. By Benjamin Stolberg ... 449
DISASTER LOVES WORKERS. By Hollace Ransdell ... 450
AFTERNOON OF A QUEEN. By Tansy McNab ... 452
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter ... 452
CORRESPONDENCE ... 453
BOOKS:
The Seventh Veil. By George Sterling ... 455
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren ... 455
The Indian's World. By Robert H. Lowie ... 455
The Quality of Reverence. By Carl Van Doren ... 456
Squirming Romantics. By Mary Ross ... 456
One of the de Kovens. By Daniel Gregory Mason ... 457
A Genius. By Laura Benet ... 457
A Village Cut-Up. By Charles W. Ferguson ... 458
Books in Brief ... 458
Selections, Collections, and Reprints ... 459
Drama: Things in the Saddle. By Joseph Wood Krutch ... 459
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
A Plea for Free Trade ... 461

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; in Canada, $6.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: No. 38 South Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

JUDGE WEBSTER THAYER is a disgrace to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. He has not merely refused a new trial to Sacco and Vanzetti; he has done so in violent, unjudicial language which strips his prejudiced mind of any pretense of unbiased judgment. William G. Thompson, who argued the case for the defense, he calls a victim of a "logo-psychic neurosis"; he refutes arguments never advanced by the defense, and repudiates the suggestion that federal officials might be willing to "railroad" a radical to the electric chair on false charges; the confession of Madeiros, which exonerated Sacco and Vanzetti, he tosses aside as that of a confessed crook, although the word of other crooks was accepted against the two Italians at their trial. This is not the verdict of law or of justice. It sounds rather like the obstinacy of an hysterical Yankee; like a man's fear to admit that he may have been wrong. Judge Thayer was not called upon to retry Sacco and Vanzetti, but to state whether the new evidence—chiefly the confessions of Madeiros and of two federal secret-service men—warranted a new trial. The published excerpts from his 20,000-word opinion give no evidence of judicial consideration of the facts. There is still one loophole; the Supreme Court of Massachusetts when the bill of exceptions comes before it may still redeem the reputation of the courts of the State.

NORWAY HAS VOTED WET—very Wet, according to American standards. By a majority of 120,000 in a vote of less than a million her citizens have declared their opposition to the present law, which bars only liquor containing 21 per cent or more of alcohol. Norway established prohibition, on a 12 per cent basis, in 1917; approved it by referendum, on a 14 per cent basis, in 1919; then raised the limit to 21 per cent, as a result of pressure by the wine-exporting, fish-importing countries (France, Spain, and Portugal). But even with this limit—a liberal beer-and-wine limit—Norway has run into the moonshine and bootlegging problems which are so familiar in this country. Evidently light wines and beer are no solution to the prohibition problem. Raising the permissible percentage of alcohol seems neither to calm the opposition nor to end wholesale defiance of the law. Possibly the Quebec system of limited, government-controlled sales will give a better report of itself. Ontario, which is now legally Dry, down to a 2.4 per cent limit, has been watching her neighbor, Quebec. Two years ago she rejected the Quebec system by a majority of 35,000. In December she will vote again—and prophets predict a reversal of the verdict.

A THOUSAND MEN AND WOMEN have defied Charles L. Guy, Justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, in the past few weeks in New York City. They were protesting against his sweeping anti-picketing injunction, and they violated it by marching, in orderly twos and threes, past the shops which they were enjoined from picketing. The only disorder was caused by the police who arrested them wholesale; but they were not tried for contempt of court. They were not really tried at all; they were charged with disorderly conduct and condemned en masse. Three hundred of them have served from one to ten days in jail for refusing to pay the fines of from two dollars to fifty dollars which other hundreds have paid. There is no law against peaceful picketing; Justice Guy, at the behest of the Industrial Council of Cloak, Suit, and Skirt Manufacturers, made his own law in the form of an injunction. Another judge has gone so far as to declare picketing illegal where there is no strike—in the case of a paper-box factory which a union was trying to organize. Judge-made law—that modern form of tyranny—supplants democratic government in non-union Pennsylvania and in West Virginia; but in New York City the judges have hitherto been relatively restrained. It is well that the American Civil Liberties Union is preparing to fight these invasions of the territory of political self-government, beginning with a protest meeting at the Community Church on the evening of November 1.

IS THE BRITISH EMPIRE breaking up? Or merely suffering growing pains? Certainly the conference of Dominion premiers now in session in London opened in no such firm imperial atmosphere as reigned at the end of the war. Canada had just held an election in which she repudiated the party that felt closest to the British Crown; Ireland [illegible] establishing her own diplomatic representatives throughout the world; South Africa's Prime Minister had just repeated his claim of sovereignty and independence within the empire—an ambiguous formula. The assumption that the six self-governing nations of the empire could consult together constantly, formulate a common foreign policy, and accept joint responsibility for it has broken down, as even that organ of empire, the Round Table, admits. It worked at the Peace Conference in 1919 and at Washington in 1921; but it was weakened by the aggressive British policy in Turkey, from which the Dominions recoiled, and by Lord Curzon's insistence upon his right to negotiate alone at Lausanne. The Locarno treaties marked a new turn. Article IX read:

> The present treaty shall impose no obligation upon any of the British Dominions, or upon India, unless the Government of such Dominion, or of India, signifies its acceptance thereof.

NO DOMINION has yet signified such acceptance—not even Australia or New Zealand, often more imperial-minded than Downing Street itself. That marks the burial of the theory of a joint imperial foreign policy. Closer communications, more consultation, may be worked out, and doubtless noble-sounding resolutions will be drafted, but the Dominions are drifting away from rather than closer to the empire. Even the trade figures show the trend. Imperial preferences, special tariffs, agitation and propaganda have not availed—in the past ten years England's share of the trade of every one of the Dominions has declined, while despite the tariff handicaps the United States has increased its percentage. What does all this mean? Certainly not that the empire is collapsing; but, probably, that geography and economics outweigh historical sentiment, and that the days when a tiny island could dominate the world are done.

MORE THAN ONCE Signor Mussolini has found that the Pope did not agree with the high-handed methods of government favored by the Fascists, but until now no visible opposition has been offered by King Victor Emmanuel. From the day four years ago when His Majesty, on the steps of the royal palace, presented the leader of the Fascists with the keys to the city of Rome, so to speak, the two minds have seemingly thought as one; so much so, indeed, that many outsiders have asked just who was the real king of Italy. Victor Emmanuel now declares that he is; that the new decree reestablishing capital punishment for attempts on the life of members of the royal family or of the Prime Minister is distasteful to him; and that he has no intention of signing such a measure. He has the best sort of precedent for his decision; his father, Umberto, suffered two unsuccessful attempts at assassination before the third which carried him off in 1900, yet he steadfastly refused to countenance the death penalty. His son, on ascending the throne, refused also, although Parliament at that time wished to enact such a decree; and he has continued in his opposition to it in spite of one attempt on his own life. At the opening of Parliament in November the issue between king and minister will be fought out. Meantime, Il Duce must take his chances, not only with his life but with a good part of his prestige in jeopardy.

"SMITH HITS MILLS"; "Mills Hits Smith"; "Smith Denies Mills Charges"; "Mills Declares Smith Prevaricates"—thus ad nauseam have run the headlines in the New York papers during the campaign just ending. It has been a battle of personalities; the retorts courteous and discourteous have been overworked to a degree. It has been a campaign of fluids—rum, milk, and water. Representative Mills has insulted the intelligence of the State in asking the electorate to believe that Governor Smith has deliberately connived at the selling of bad milk. On the other hand, his opponents have had no difficulty in showing Mr. Mills's affiliations with big business and particularly with the public-service companies. Between Judge Wagner and Senator Wadsworth the debate has ranged from arguments as to which is the wetter to the question who would go further in his opposition to prohibition. So that personalities should not be lacking in this fight, too, the Democrats have dug up a remark of Theodore Roosevelt to the effect that "It is rarely that a public man champions the right of big business to do wrong as openly as Mr. Wadsworth." This has rather dazed the Wadsworthites. Yet it need not have worried them, for the ex-President was calling nearly every one of his old associates names and likening them to burglars and second-story men in the Progressive campaign. Curiously enough, despite all this mud-slinging the populace has found its radio and its sport pages far more thrilling, and we venture to predict that when the votes are counted "Al" Smith will be more firmly seated at Albany than ever and the total of the poll will show that the campaign has raged most hotly in the columns of the press.

BAD COOKING has probably done more damage in the world than even crooked politics. It seems to have been at the bottom of the flurry in Arizona over the attempt to colonize there a group of Porto Rican laborers at the invitation of the Cotton Growers' Association of the State. Porto Rico is much overpopulated and emigration is officially encouraged whenever there are thought to be adequate guaranties of fair treatment and reasonable hope of success for the emigrants in the new field. The proposals of the Arizona cotton planters had been approved by the Porto Rican Government, and the first group of some 500 emigrants was accompanied by an official commissioner. But, alas, the first meal aboard ship, although consisting of the national dish, rice and beans, was cooked "American style"! Some of it was thrown into the sea and trouble began right there. Porto Rican cooks were hastily commandeered for the rest of the voyage, but the seeds of discord had been sown. There were continued objections thereafter, and when they arrived at their destination near Phoenix many of the Porto Ricans refused to go to work. Various local labor bodies took up the fight, declaring that the cotton growers were paying the Porto Ricans less than the rate paid other workers last year. It is a difficult dispute to unravel at long range, but the report of the official commissioner, which emphasizes the disastrous effect of rice and beans "American style," reveals an acumen unusual in state papers.

THE RIGHT OF NINE-YEAR-OLD GIRLS to wear knickers or overalls in place of dresses is still being debated. Thus in Kentucky a young lady in overalls was permitted to remain at school, after her mother had sent her with a letter comparing her attire with the short skirts and rolled stockings of certain teachers, while in Jeffersonville, Indiana, Virginia Allen in knickers is still banned from the benefits of education and her case is to be brought to trial in another county. Just what charges are to be brought against Virginia The Nation does not know. She may be corrupting the morals of her fellow-pupils, or presenting a spectacle that so fills them with envy—at least the girls—as to make it impossible for them to give attention to their studies. The chairman of the school board may be in the female-clothing business; the boys of the school may be demanding the time-honored right of men only to trousers. But whatever the charge, The Nation hopes that Virginia will come out of the trial with colors flying. And in order to buoy her up a bit in a difficult situation, let it be whispered that there are schools in New York City, and perhaps in other sections of the United States, where any child, male or female, who appears without a pair of overalls to be worn over his or her other clothing is frowned upon, ostracized, and sometimes even sent home in disgrace.

A SCIENTIST HELD IN HIS HAND last week a glass tube; it was discharging a stream of electrons at a rate roughly equal to the electrons thrown off by a ton of radium. To date, less than a pound of radium has been found and utilized in the world; at current market rates, a ton of radium would be worth one hundred billion dollars. A moderately valuable tube that Dr. W. D. Coolidge has created at his Schenectady laboratory! He has named it the cathode tube, and with it he can control streams of countless billions of electrons, traveling at the rate of 150,000 miles a second. The tube is capable of generating 350,000 volts of electricity. So far the discovery lies chiefly in the realm of pure science, and as such it is announced to be one of the truly great achievements of the century. The practical utilization of this inconceivable bombardment of angry electrons has not yet been made public, if indeed it is known, but its applications in metallurgy, medicine, and other fields are likely to be revolutionary.

EX-SENATOR RICHARD F. PETTIGREW, whose death occurred recently, was a man of honor and courage wedded to an old-fashioned America which was opposed to militarism, war, imperialism, and the control of our government by and for big business. So he was a thorn in the flesh while serving as Senator from South Dakota in Washington from 1880 to 1901. Being often far in advance of his times and being given to speaking most unpalatable truths, he was variously dubbed a Populist, a demagogue, and a wild-eyed visionary. Bolshevist he would have been called had the word been known then. The frankness of the man is well illustrated by his saying to Theodore Roosevelt at Oyster Bay that the Colonel should not run for President on a third ticket: "All you can accomplish is to elect Woodrow Wilson, and that will be national disaster." To which Roosevelt replied: "Oh, well, we might as well suffer four years under Wilson as four more years under Taft." For expressing his opinion about the World War, as he had nobly spoken out about the Spanish and Philippine Wars, he was arrested and nearly sent to jail. But nothing could daunt this patriot or prevent his saying what he thought, on the stump and in his books. The League of Nations was to him a "league to perpetuate war" and so he would have none of it. Against American imperialism in Hawaii, Cuba, and the Caribbean he preached insistently. In this field the country needs dozens like him. Finally he came to the extreme view that all capital is robbery and that there was no hope of setting America straight until the workers assumed the direction of economic policy and took "the full product that they create."

TWO FUNERAL SERVICES marked the passing of Thomas Mott Osborne. There was the usual gathering of relatives and friends mourning the death of one whom they loved as a person or admired as a man of position and distinguished service. There was also an assemblage of twelve hundred convicted criminals in Auburn prison saying farewell with a visible sense of personal loss to their beloved friend "Tom Brown"—the man who had made known to the nation and to the world at large the horrors of the American prison system. The second service was more touching and more deeply significant than the first. As Tom Brown he had gone behind the bars and had eaten and slept and worked as a common convict. From the depth of this and other experiences with prison life he spoke and wrote his indictment of the brutality and ignorant repression that marked the management of almost every prison in the country. As warden of Sing Sing prison, in the face of political attack of the most calculated indecency, he introduced a system of self-government and a method of humane treatment which was watched with sympathy and interest by the leading penologists of the world. His failings as an administrator never obscured the human success of his work. He believed warmly in the capacity of everyone to achieve, under the influence of trust and fair treatment, a measure of self-respect and control; and his genius lay in his ability to win from warped and embittered social outcasts a genuine response. He will be remembered for his amazing success in penetrating to the heart of the convict and the conscience of the public.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for 1926 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Wednesday, December 1, and not later than Friday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page.

3. No manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 9, 1927.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

The Great Free-Trade Manifesto

OUR readers who recall that The Nation has been advocating free trade ever since its foundation in 1865 as the most constructive and most pacific measure this country could possibly adopt will understand our elation over the bankers' manifesto in favor of free trade, published throughout the world on October 19. We have reprinted it elsewhere in this issue for purposes of record because we believe it to be a shining milestone of human progress. Here are many of the foremost bankers in the world who have come together to admit the truth of what liberals have been saying again and again since the wicked peace, that the greatest need of the world is the leveling of all tariff barriers. So much a matter of common sense has it been that we could not see how any one could question it. Were the new European states created merely to stem the flow of goods? Were the hatreds of after-the-war to be measured by the height of the tariff walls?

Well, at least the leading financiers have come to see that vastly more important for the restoration of Europe and for its relations to the United States is the sweeping away of these Chinese walls of protection. They have come to it not as idealists or theorists but as practical, hard-headed business men. It has taken war's aftermath to make them appreciate what they should have learned long ago from the history of the United States and from the amazing rise of Germany after the Zollverein of 1832-1835, when it abolished all the tariff and customs walls between the several German states. It was this that created modern Germany and led directly to the proclamation of the empire at Versailles in 1871. If it is right and wise for the small states of Europe to put up barriers against one another today Germany should hasten to restore the tariffs between her several parts. No one would dream of advocating it.

Now these financiers are alarmed because "at no period have impediments to trading been more perilously multiplied without a true appreciation of the economic consequences involved." They point out that the breakup of the old political units alone dealt a heavy blow to international trade. Old markets disappeared and new racial animosities divided communities long since united in trade. Licenses, tariffs, prohibitions of all kinds were imposed, with the result that prosperity rapidly declined. The change of flags in itself would not have meant so much. Thus, the transfer of Silesian mines from Germany to Poland would have made little difference if there had not been erected immediately a tariff wall to make it more difficult for Germans to buy Polish coal. The bankers are right when they say that "too many states, in pursuit of false ideas of national interest, have imperiled their own welfare and lost sight of the common interests of the world, by basing their commercial relations on the economic folly which treats all trading as a form of war."

On the contrary, trade ought to be one of the greatest bonds to tie nations together, to mingle their interests so that it should be impossible for war to arise. Always believers in free trade on economic grounds, we have of late years been more than ever impressed by its necessity to pacify the nations that were lately in the war and prevent any further trade rivalries of the purely nationalistic kind which too often insure war. Richard Cobden was, of course, a leader in suggesting the relation of free trade to peace. "It has often struck me," he wrote, "that it would be well to engraft our free-trade agitation upon the peace movement." Again, writing on September 14, 1859, he said that he saw in free trade the only hope "for any permanent improvements in the political relations of France and England. I utterly despair of finding peace and harmony in the efforts of governments and diplomatists. The people of the two nations must be brought into mutual dependence by the supply of each other's wants. There is no other way of counteracting the antagonism of language and race. It is God's own method of producing an entente cordiale, and no other plan is worth a farthing." If these words were just and true then, they are still more applicable to the war-wrecked nations of Europe today.

Now, if we in this country were really desirous of helping Europe there would be universal acclaim of the sound position taken by the bankers. Instead, the protectionist dailies, Mr. Mellon, and the President have fallen over one another in their eagerness to have the American people understand that that is all very well for Europe, but has nothing to do with the United States. We must and shall, they say, uphold that hoary old fraud, that breeder of socialism, that widener of class differences, that mother of trusts —our protective system. And they take this position at the very moment when our differences with Europe over the war debts are so much to the front, when everybody knows that since our debtors can pay us only in goods we can help them to pay—if we insist upon those debts—only by lowering or abolishing our tariffs. It is a fair measure of the parochial quality of Mr. Coolidge's mind that he takes this attitude and arranges for Mr. Mellon to reassure at the earliest possible moment the protected manufacturers of America. It does not surprise us, however. For fifty years the Republican Party has battened on the graft of the protective tariff. It has filled its coffers with campaign contributions sometimes wrung from the protected, sometimes freely offered in order that the donors might dictate the schedules of the next tariff bill.

But if America lags we may rest assured that the campaign now started by the bankers will go on in increasing measure. It is one of those issues that cannot be settled until it is settled aright, and the continuing disorganization of Europe through tariffs makes it absolutely certain that the fight will go on with increasing vigor. Without free trade Europe must languish. The recent free-trade congress in Denmark and the first Pan-European conference held under the leadership of Count Coudenhove-Kalergi in Vienna at the beginning of October are signs of the times, for Pan-Europe and free trade are nearly synonymous. As for the American bankers, headed by Mr. J. P. Morgan, who have signed this momentous document, we congratulate them upon their courage and vision. They will be heartily abused for their share in it, we are well aware. But, as we have frequently pointed out, the battle is on between the American financiers who have invested great sums abroad and the protected manufacturers. The harder they fight the nearer the day when justice shall be done and the American people be led to adopt the only sound international economic policy.

Eugene Victor Debs

"'GENE DEBS was the only Jesus Christ I ever knew." So Sam Moore, an embittered Negro convict faced with lifelong imprisonment, explained to the warden of Atlanta Penitentiary the extraordinary effect upon him of 'Gene Debs's friendship. 'Gene Debs was a man who evoked that extravagant, almost unbelievable, type of affection in thousands upon thousands of his fellow-men. He evoked it because he gave it. At his funeral services in Terre Haute Victor Berger said that Debs went beyond the Biblical command to love thy neighbor as thyself, for he loved his neighbor better than himself, and the vast crowd with tear-stained faces solemnly nodded assent.

To this love for human beings Debs added a love for humanity. The two are not always combined. The concern for humanity, the vision, the dauntless courage, the uncompromising spirit of the prophet and pioneer may be consistent with a ruthless disregard for the immediate interests of individual human beings. It was not so with Debs. His courage was born of love. His passion for mankind, his hope for the workers grew out of the love of comrades, not only as they might become but as they were with all their faults and weaknesses. In this combination of dauntless prophet, far-seeing idealist, and simple lover of men lay the man's greatness.

Debs embraced the cause of the workers from choice and not necessity. The outward circumstances of his early life and his own gifts were of a sort that would have led him naturally to political and financial success. Indeed, while he was still a very young man, he made a successful beginning in local politics. But his sympathies, long before he was a Socialist, were with the workers. Our generation has almost forgotten that Debs began as an unusually successful labor organizer. He was the founder of the present Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen. When he became convinced that this form of craft organization was not adequate to the needs of the railway workers he resigned his $4,000-a-year position to become president of the American Railway Union at $900 a year. The world still remembers that union and its part in the Pullman strike. The strike and the union were both broken by Grover Cleveland's use of United States troops against the protest of Governor Altgeld of Illinois. This strike, too, was marked by the beginning of government by injunction, and Debs was sent to jail for six months on a charge of contempt—the forerunner of a series of similar acts of judicial tyranny.

In prison Debs first learned of Socialism and became a Socialist, although not until after the first Bryan campaign did he irrevocably tie his fortunes to that movement. Following his release from prison Debs undertook to raise and pay off $40,000 of debts accumulated by the American Railway Union. This obligation he fulfilled at great cost to himself at a time when not even the creditors of the union held him responsible.

From 1897 on, Debs's life and fortunes were inextricably mingled with those of the Socialist movement. Five times he was its candidate for President. He was not primarily a builder of policies, nor in his later years an organizer. He was a flaming spirit, a living incarnation of an ideal. That ideal was an ideal of uncompromising struggle, but of struggle by non-violent methods. The victory he wanted was a victory of peace. It was impossible that Debs could believe the European war a war for democracy, or that any war could end war. So he made himself the spokesman of the Socialist ideal of peace through an understanding between the workers of the world. For his devotion to liberty and peace he was sentenced to ten years of penal servitude. Today it seems almost unthinkable that on the basis of his famous Canton speech any man could have been convicted. In no sense were his words pro-German. They did not ask American troops to lay down their arms. They were a plea for the end of war, for the recognition of Russia, for the preservation of liberty at home. Yet that speech, during a "war for democracy," sent a man past sixty years of age, suffering from the heart disease which finally resulted in his death, to jail with common felons. Worse still, after the armistice Debs was kept in jail by the personal vindictiveness of a President who had himself acknowledged the economic causes of the war as plainly as the man whom he held prisoner. It was left to President Harding, in response to public demand, to restore Debs to freedom. Neither he nor President Coolidge gave him back his citizenship.

Of Debs's permanent place in the history of the labor movement and of social progress it is too early to speak. Philosophically, in spite of the Communist attempt to claim him, he was an extreme democrat, a convinced believer in freedom. However much he might admire the achievements of Russia, he never could identify himself with any sort of dictatorship. Our generation with its little faith in the common man may find his philosophy old-fashioned. Temporarily, at least, it has lost much of its appeal. Yet Debs himself was the sort of man who gives one new confidence in men and their possibilities. That he was what he was, that he loved as he loved, is reason for hope. He belongs to the republic of the immortals whose memory is a living inspiration to mankind.

Mr. Asquith Retires

LORD OXFORD AND ASQUITH he is now, but as plain Mr. Asquith history will record him. For a generation he has bulked large in the annals of the British Liberal Party and of his country. Yet his retirement from the leadership of the Liberals finds them at the lowest ebb of their existence; by one of his last and most mistaken acts the remnant of the Liberal forces was again divided in half. Moreover, his unexpected retirement at this time practically turns over the leadership of Liberalism to Lloyd George, the very man whom he savagely attacked after the coal strike because Lloyd George sympathized in some degree with the striking miners and with that notable evidence of labor solidarity which found its expression in the general strike. A typical old-fashioned Liberal leader, cultured, trained by long years of experience and public service, Asquith retires too late to conceal the fact that his day is done. As the Baltimore Sun well puts it, "he retires because he must accept the verdict of his time that he no longer is of use, in any large sense or field."

A pathetic withdrawal? Perhaps, if one regards only his pre-war career, but well merited if one considers his taking England into the World War. For he was, with Sir Edward Grey, party to that monstrous deceit of his own party, of the Cabinet, and of the country, by which Great Britain was secretly committed to enter into a war if

France and Belgium were attacked. Repeatedly in response to public and private inquiries he and Sir Edward Grey quibbled. "This country is not under any obligation not public and known to Parliament which compels it to take part in any war" he told Parliament on March 24, 1913, in reply to a question by Joseph King. "If war arises between European Powers there are no unpublished agreements which will restrict or hamper the freedom of the Government or of the Parliament to decide whether or not Great Britain should participate in a war." Naval and military conversations had already made that statement a deliberate lie, and when the war came the British people were calmly plunged into it without time for consideration, without time for expressing their opinion; and the false plea that it was for Belgium's sake was set up further to delude the British public and the world. Then and there the doom of the Liberal Party was sealed; for Liberalism to strike hands with the war god is to invite the destruction which came. The Liberal Party stood shoulder to shoulder against the Boer War and came triumphantly into power under Campbell-Bannerman. It fell under Asquith at the very moment it combined with the Conservatives to carry on a war which cost 1,500,000 Englishmen their lives and earned no satisfactory peace, no rewards worth while, not even if one considers the stretches of territory brought under the British flag.

But it was not even given to Asquith to carry the war through to success. A sordid intrigue between Lloyd George and the millionaire press-owners who sought to rule the country and direct the war resulted in the usurper's taking Asquith's place. One would have thought the victim of this conspiracy would then and there have broken with Lloyd George instead of in 1926. But a desire to hold on to office, to be in the thick of things—or to serve, if one pleases—kept Asquith in office. The end of the war found him utterly helpless; the bankruptcy of Liberalism was his own. He had nothing to contribute, no new ideas to advance. He agreed by silence to Lloyd George's Hang-the-Kaiser campaign. He had nothing to say against the bad peace; his tongue could frame no words to spell a policy toward the beaten foe comparable to Campbell-Bannerman's wise and magnanimous policy toward the defeated Boers, which constitutes one of the brightest and noblest episodes in British history. Facing stupendous economic and financial problems, he had no advice to give, no solution to offer. He was spent, wasted, and finished, and with him his party.

There are Englishmen in plenty to say that England is naturally Liberal and that Liberalism is certain again to come into its own. It may be so, but the war is not so easily absolved. Certainly a new type of leader must be found. The land radicalism of Lloyd George will not sweep the country, if only because Lloyd George is himself so wholly without character or stability. Moreover, there is a coldness in the laissez-faire, individualist doctrines of the elder Liberal school quite unsuited to the present needs. Asquith illustrated well in his legalistic attitude toward the general strike how inadequate Liberalism is today, for he could see in it nothing but a threat to the state. The quality of sympathy strained and sifted by legal-minded politicians loses its meaning. The masses who clamor for bread will not turn to a man who sees in their appeal for a chance to live decently only a move against the government—a government which spent a million and a half lives to carry out a secret agreement and to throw other millions into the torture of the battlefield.

Mr. Asquith is not the only "statesman" outworn, done for, morally and spiritually. But it is because of such as these that England is in the travail which is hers today.

Critics and Criticized

THE death of Henry T. Finck, for all of his active life the musical critic of the Evening Post and for thirty-five years a most valued reviewer and writer for The Nation, suggests anew the question whether a critic of the arts should or should not enter into friendships with those whom he must criticize. Mr. Finck's colleague, the veteran J. Ranken Towse, who for an even longer period has been writing of the drama for the Evening Post, has invariably refused to meet actor or actress. Being once lured into a room and introduced to one of the profession, his dismay was in no wise concealed; for he could no longer, after forty years, boast that he had never met a Thespian.

Few critics pass a similarly self-denying ordinance. Mr. Finck was not one of them. A man of most shining honesty, of guileless innocence in many matters, he found in the companionship of artists an unending stimulus in his writing, the source of much information and of endless personal anecdotes with which he enriched his newspaper and magazine writing. If he progressed as a critic it was often, he felt, because he had come to know through his contacts with the musical world how difficult is the lot of the musician, particularly if the musician be a member of such an organization as the Metropolitan Opera Company. Yet it would be idle to deny that he was, at times, influenced by his warm and sympathetic nature. He could never write with complete detachment of Paderewski or of certain singers like Geraldine Farrar or of that superb artist, Jean de Reszke, with whom he came into personal contact. That he was sublimely unconscious of any bias was apparent. And when he felt that certain conductors or performers were to be unfavorably criticized he often went for them with a passion which made people believe, erroneously, that there was involved some personal spite.

Quite the contrary. His ardent nature similarly abhorred Brahms and worshiped Wagner. When the latter's works were new and it was the fashion in New York to deride and abuse anyone who dared to think that the precious stuff of this crazy German composer was music, Mr. Finck's championship of him was so passionate that many were the stories that he had taken money to write as he did. He took sides when he knew the composer or artist; he did so if he never met them in the flesh. Honest and learned, he was profoundly jealous, as every critic ought to be, of his right to absolute freedom of utterance, and promptly resigned once when through a comical error he thought that for the first time in thirty-five years his copy had been edited after leaving his desk. He was beyond every influence save that of his emotions.

As temperaments vary, so will opinions as to whether a critic should hold himself aloof from those he must pass upon. Undoubtedly, Mr. Towse's renunciation is the safer rule. But the question still arises whether judgments may not be rightly modified if through personal contacts one comes to know and appreciate the struggles and personalities of those whom one discusses.

A Political Crisis in Education

By CHAPIN COLLINS

THERE are high doings in the State of Washington. On one side is the Governor of the State. He is Roland H. Hartley, successful logger, who gracefully and picturesquely refers to his opponents as "goggle-eyed jackasses, skunks, sons of guns, and blatherskites," and has told his friends he doesn't believe in state education beyond the eighth grade.

On the other side, as its chief figure, is Henry Suzzallo, recently ousted president of the University of Washington, one-time head of the Association of American University Presidents, former professor of education at Columbia, editor of the Riverside Educational Monographs, member of the Institute of International Education and the British Royal Society of Literature, and an elector in the Hall of Fame.

The sudden but not unexpected dismissal of Dr. Suzzallo as president of the University of Washington, after an administration of eleven years, is the climax of a long educational controversy in the Northwestern commonwealth. It was done on October 4 by order of a board of regents, the majority members of which were appointed by the Governor, it has been charged, for the specific purpose of "getting" Suzzallo. On the other hand, the Governor denies any part in the action of his regents, who declare they found the university head "meddling in politics."

The dismissal has been followed by as spectacular a flare of newspaper resentment as the State of Washington has ever seen, has stirred loud demand for recall or impeachment, and was accompanied by a sensational student demonstration, 4,000 of them gathering before Dr. Suzzallo's home on the campus the evening of the dismissal, bearing torchlights and chanting "Strike, strike, strike!" This threat brought from Dr. Suzzallo his only public comment on his dismissal.

"I have given my life to the University of Washington," he said. "I want you to do the same. Do not strike. Attend your classes tomorrow. Will you do this for me?"

The regents' action has made education the paramount political issue in Washington, an issue that submerges consideration of national questions. Despite all but unanimous newspaper condemnation of the Governor, who was swept into office by a huge majority two years ago, he still is conceded political strength, particularly in eastern Washington and certain rural sections where the university has been regarded with suspicion and Suzzallo's salary—$18,000 a year—as a hold-up. It is pertinent to observe, however, that he has refused $25,000 from another university.

But the situation in Washington has national significance so far as education is concerned, regardless of the merits of the immediate controversy. It precipitates the question: Who is to control our State education? Are legislatures to rule? Are our universities to be dominated, in finance and educational policy, by an uncertain legislative majority? In finance and educational policy, for the first means the second. Or is the Governor to have authority, as he seems to have in Washington? Or are boards of regents or the faculty to have power, and if they ought to have it, how are they to gain it?

Unless Governor Hartley is sustained by the voters who elect a new legislature [illegible] unlikely—the Washington Legislature will enact laws to take unto itself the rule of the university, and will deprive the Governor of the power he now wields. This will block the incumbent, but does it mark reform? Do we want legislative majorities dictating educational policy?

The Washington situation may be duplicated in many States of the Union. The institutions of higher learning there, as elsewhere, are governed by boards of regents, appointed by the Governor and confirmed by the Senate. Members of the board may be removed, the law says, for cause, without defining specifically what the cause may be. The Governor appoints, the Senate confirms, the courts interpret—truly a perfect example of checks and balances. But in the State of Washington an executive, with great measure of success, has overridden legally enacted laws, has removed and appointed regents without apparent cause, and has effectively demonstrated that the American scene is as subject to dictatorship as are other nations not safeguarded by sacred and inspired constitutions.

The State University is Washington's most obvious achievement. It occupies a magnificent campus of some 400 acres in the heart of Seattle. Its ultimate endowment, now restricted by leasehold of valuable metropolitan property, will place it among the richest institutions of the nation. Famed for husky crews and championship football teams, its academic standing has steadily improved.

In a sense the university is a personal achievement, that of Dr. Suzzallo. A noted educator before he came to the university eleven years ago from Columbia, he has led the march from "cow college" to real university. Much of the advance has necessarily been on the material side to meet an astounding increase in the number of those demanding attendance; it has been a work against odds, a constant battle for sufficient appropriations and a work that has been hampered by unavoidable compromise. Dr. Suzzallo, American-born son of Dalmatian parents, has something of the Mussolini in him, an instinct for leadership, perhaps a liking for control.

During the war Dr. Suzzallo's leadership was recognized in his appointment to the post of chairman of the State Council of Defense, charged with keeping industrial peace. To prevent warfare in the vital lumber industry, the council, under Dr. Suzzallo, urged the eight-hour day in logging camps. Chief of the vehement opposition was one Roland H. Hartley, successful logger. When this same Hartley was elected governor two years ago on a "business in government" platform, trouble between the university head and the new State executive was momentarily expected.

Hartley's first legislature had no sooner come together than it adjourned, on his request. He wanted, he explained, to make an "economic survey," in order to formulate a scientific program of tax reduction. Just how to reduce governmental expenditures in a developing State, intent upon good roads and many of them, devoted to reclamation, proud of its low percentage of illiteracy—all expensive wants—and engaged, moreover, in constructing a new capitol group costing nearly $10,000,000, was a problem. Perhaps that is why Hartley decided upon education, the biggest item in the taxpayers' bill. He came before the legislature with an attack upon educational "frills and foibles," and declared:

Higher education, particularly the university, was running hog-wild on expenditures.

Its development made the educational system topheavy, with undue emphasis upon higher rather than elementary education.

The administration of the State's five institutions of higher learning—university, State college, and three normal schools—was inefficient, authority being scattered among the various boards of regents.

Therefore, all boards of regents should be abolished and all institutions lumped under one central board appointed by the Governor.

This proposal was a bombshell. "Frills and foibles" had been heard at every previous legislative session, but demand for a central board, appointed by the Governor, stirred such determined opposition that the Governor himself was surprised. There were those who recalled Hartley's disbelief in State education beyond the eighth grade, the proposal was assailed as ruinous to the natural development of each institution according to its needs, and university alumni pronounced the Governor actuated by hatred for the university and its president, Dr. Suzzallo.

The docile legislature, which had meekly gone home at the Governor's bidding, bucked. It ignored the Governor's advice and made its appropriations for higher education. The Governor vetoed the bill. Hartley's strength in the legislature was known to be powerful, and it was openly charged that he used the appointment of four men to newly created judgeships to swing the vote. At any rate, he was strong enough to have his veto sustained by a narrow margin in one house, although it was overriden in the other. But the majority of the House, refusing to accept defeat, mustered its forces again, and on reconsideration put the appropriations through over the veto after turbulent sessions.

Victory won, the legislators went home.

Hartley was not through. Before long every board of regents in the State received notice from the Governor directing it not to spend the increased appropriations made by the legislature but to confine itself to the previous lower amount, on the ground that the lawmakers had acted "irregularly." As the largest institution, the university was hardest hit. Fire had destroyed its mines building, a new library building awaited completion, and nearly 7,000 students were clamoring for admission, the largest number in history. In the face of these pressing needs, it was recognized the university board could hardly do otherwise than follow the will of the legislature, and disregard the Governor. But just two days before the board was to meet Hartley removed two regents, "for cause" unexplained. This gave him a majority of the board, four to three, and in due course the regents voted, four to three, not to expend the money the legislature had provided.

Of course, the ousted regents protested and carried their dismissal to the courts, but the State Supreme Court held that "cause" was a matter within the discretion of the Governor. This achieved, Hartley, for good measure, removed another regent, also for unexplained cause, and named one of his own choice to the place.

These actions were accompanied by speeches from the Governor in which he charged an attempt was being made by certain interests to rob the State of valuable timber properties, and he declared the educational issue was being raised as a smoke-screen. He studiously avoided reference to Dr. Suzzallo, who remained silent himself, but when the Spokesman-Review of Spokane, recognized as the Governor's strongest newspaper friend, published an interview in which Hartley was quoted as vigorously assailing the university head, it was generally regarded as authentic.

In this statement, now known as the "dago interview," Governor Hartley was quoted as saying: "Dr. Suzzallo does not know me. I was born in America and not in Italy, and if they want to put the head of this State government at the University of Washington, all right. But until then it will remain at Olympia. One man will run it and that will be me."

While the opposition press gleefully pointed out that Dr. Suzzallo was born in California and Hartley himself in Canada, the Governor repudiated the interview, declaring it false and stating: "I didn't know I was being interviewed."

The revamped board of regents, after following Hartley's will regarding appropriations, led an uneventful career until this October. It reaffirmed its contract with Dr. Suzzallo and favorably disposed of several of his recommendations. It had one brush with the alumni association—charging the latter with political meddling—but its attempt to investigate alumni files was frustrated by the sudden removal of the alumni office from the campus.

Then, without warning and behind closed doors, the regents, five to two, demanded Dr. Suzzallo's resignation on October 4, this action following a hotel conference between the Governor and the majority members of the board. Since that date the Supreme Court by unanimous decision has ruled that the legislature acted legally in passing the appropriation bill over the Governor's veto, and has directed the State Tax Commission, which was appointed by Hartley, to base its levies on the 1925 law. This decision is the first event in the long controversy at all favorable to the Governor's opponents, and suggests that in the long run the policies of the executive will be defeated. Certain it is that the Senate, barring an upset at the November election, will refuse to confirm Hartley's regents.

But meanwhile an able university head has been ousted after eleven years of effective service, the president of one normal school has resigned in disgust, the university faculty is demoralized, and an effort has been set on foot to recall the Governor. Perhaps worst of all, the Legislature, if the 1925 majority is returned to office, will take over the educational reins itself.

It is difficult to understand how a State university, depending for its funds upon the will of politically chosen legislators and executives, can remain aloof from politics. Therein lies the essential failure of State-controlled education, as the chronicle of happenings in the State of Washington reveals. It might have been almost any other State. Are State institutions free elsewhere, or must they enter the political arena, trade and barter, accept the necessary mess of pottage in return for their birthright, academic independence?

Will it ever be possible for such a plum to be divorced from politics, utterly severed from executive whim or legislative passion? Will it ever come to pass that these two duly constituted authorities, with the approbation of the people, will place education in the hands of educators?

Germany Revisited

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Baden-Baden, September 25

"THE one bright spot in Europe," I heard Germany called in London amid a general chorus of pessimism and gloom—the one bright spot economically and financially. And so I found it after visiting some ten cities and spending a number of weeks within its confines. Not that Germany presents to the visitor any startling picture of happiness and prosperity. Far from it. If the cities are outwardly repaired and no longer sadly down at the heel, there is still enormous suffering behind the newly stuccoed fronts of the great apartment houses. Indeed, if you should talk with the average German he would tell you of hardships, disappointments, losses, and almost intolerable suffering, in considerable part due to the necessary process of sanitation and of reorganization. To get the measure of progress, therefore, one must compare the Germany of today with that which I saw in 1923; one must not look at individual trees but at the health of the forest as a whole. If one does that, then the conclusion is irresistible that Germany has gained enormously in three years and that, if nothing untoward happens, this conquered country will in a few years surpass in prosperity and economic health her chief rivals of the World War—if indeed she has not already done so.

Primarily, the greatest change is in the mental attitude of the people themselves. Three years ago they were still smarting under their overwhelming defeat and the stigma put upon them by the Allied nations of being mad dogs deliberately bent upon wrecking the world that they might dominate it for their own selfish purposes. Today they have put nearly all of that behind them—save only the extreme Nationalists and the survivors of the old military caste. They are spiritually disarmed. They have said Schluss to the war episode and they can now talk about it with amazing detachment and objectiveness. They can see far more clearly the errors they, or rather their rulers, made. The lapse of years, of course, makes it easier for them to review the past without bitterness, with clearer perceptions of all the factors involved, with a real understanding of the way they and all the other nations were betrayed by their rulers. This is remarkable to an American who knows how long it took to win over the defeated Confederacy to an acceptance of the results of its appeal to arms.

Three years ago there was still a lot of whining and complaining in Germany. Today, even those who say to you frankly that they do not see how Germany can meet the crushing burdens of the 1927 and 1928 Dawes payments discuss the situation without complaint. It has become a purely financial problem, and many of them see that the compulsion to work and to economize and to live simply which the Dawes plan exercises is really a boon; that it is compelling a discipline of enormous value in holding a beaten and stricken people together. One hears, I repeat, of innumerable cases of dreadful suffering, especially among what is left of the middle class. Appeals for aid in genuine cases of utter despair and absolute poverty pile up. For here is a country in which old age has become something terrible, since all savings have been wiped out, every before-the-war life-insurance policy is valueless, all endowment funds for hospitals, homes for the aged, schools, universities, and the rest have been wiped out; every provision for age has vanished. Thousands upon thousands of people who felt their futures safe have nothing whatever to look forward to. The more favorably situated can just make both ends meet, but they cannot spend an extra three marks for a concert ticket; as for the journeys they so loved, they are now prisoners the year around in the places where they happen to be. On top of all this the so-called "rationalization" of industry, the wiping out of myriads of unnecessary businesses, together with the great combinations that are being formed is constantly throwing multitudes into bankruptcy or depriving them of their places. It is easy to understand the reparation official in Berlin who declared that he could not continue to hold his position if he allowed his mind to dwell upon the cases of individual hardship which came before him.

There is still alarming unemployment, now gradually decreasing, as Parker Gilbert, that extraordinary American official in charge of reparations, has prophesied that it would, but still so ominous as to make Germany ask herself, like England, if there are not several millions too many of her citizens in the world. This unemployment does not, of course, include only those who appear at the registry offices. There are multitudes of others, not of the manual-labor class, who can find no work to do, or are breaking their hearts in positions wholly unsuited to them. Among those who have jobs the pay is often preposterous. I know of a chief engineer in a going Berlin engineering concern who gets less than $100 a month, while ordinary servants can be had for from $6 a month up. This particular chief engineer is only one of many who daily watch every barometer of trade with trembling hearts because they know that if their work fails them they cannot hope to find other jobs. Everywhere businesses stagnate or fail for lack of capital. Finally, there is the grave lack of housing, so serious that to cities like Heidelberg no one is allowed to move unless by an exchange of apartments under which some Heidelberger moves to the city from which the new person comes. The municipalities rigidly reserve the right to quarter strangers upon any householder or apartment-dweller who in their opinion has too much space. In Baden-Baden the owner of one large estate has had nine families quartered upon her property.

All of this would be enough to render hopeless almost any people. Yet the improvement in morale and courage in Germany is everywhere noticeable. There is more cheerfulness and vastly more resignation: there is much more evidence of wealth and prosperity. There are, of course, many who have wealth—those who coined money during the war or were able to hold on to large estates or had money abroad, chiefly bankers and manufacturers. The dailies that were so near disaster in 1920-1923 now have the look of success and progress. Their circulations are increasing; their advertising is excellent. They are far more hopeful in their tone, especially those devoted to the republic.

The entrance of Germany into the League of Nations, the steady cleaning up of the economic situation after the inflation folly, the extraordinarily rapid reconquest of the seas by German shipping, the increased activity of the shipyards, the prosperity of the railroads, which carried 33.6 per cent more passengers in 1925 than in 1913, the host of new inventions, the great combinations in trades forced by the Dawes plan, and now the international iron and steel cartel—all of these give the press opportunities in plenty to cheer up their readers. They do not, of course, dwell upon the seriousness of the evils that will follow in the train of these enormous combinations of capital and of the coming in of huge sums of foreign capital through which great mines and large industrial companies are passing directly over to American or other ownership—America has already invested $900,000,000 in Germany since the war. The superstate of German industrialism grows by leaps and bounds and promises work for more and more. In connection with unemployment it must not be forgotten that great numbers of rentiers and retired persons are now working who never worked before; that the war brought masses of women into industrial life and 600,000 men who formerly were absorbed by the army and navy must now be provided for in private enterprises.

Work, work; it is the gospel of work which is saving Germany, as well as civic discipline and the determination to rebuild the fatherland and restore it to the pinnacle it once occupied. Still it remains a marvel, this sudden liquidation of the war mentally, this acceptance of the inevitable. Let no one think that it has been achieved without cost. The price Germany has had to pay for her Kaiser and his criminal mismanagement of her foreign affairs is apparent on every hand. The aspect of the people one sees bears eloquent testimony to this. There used to be handsome men, especially in uniform, and handsome women in Germany. Now one sees them not at all. The crowds appear coarsened; never a beautiful people, they seem positively ugly, and as if to show their desire to be nothing else innumerable men shave their heads so that they are as bald as eggs. The women wear costumes far out of style; if they ever displayed taste in dress it has disappeared. The aesthetic side of life has for the present gone by the board.

Sport has taken a tremendous hold. There is a nation-wide movement to substitute gymnastics for the old military drill and a determination to follow the Greek example, but for the present the cult of beauty is dead. Dire national need and suffering for twelve long years have made it impossible, have destroyed refinements, the things that charm and grace, by taking away the means and leisure necessary to them. Music still flourishes and art too; the theater fights its way on. But for the present—and for years to come—it is the struggle for material existence which controls with individuals and with the various administrative units. The latter are building canals and railroads and are electrifying the country at a tremendous rate; the impelling motive is quite as much to give work to men who would otherwise be receiving unemployment pay as to increase the economic and industrial power of the country. Incidentally the republic is strengthened thereby.

The German Republic? It has gained greatly in three years. In 1923 one could meet many people who still felt a good deal of sympathy for the Kaiser. He had blundered, yes, but he had meant well. Today one still finds monarchists, notably in Bavaria, where some people continue to believe that, despite the federal constitution, Rupprecht will be proclaimed king. But nowhere does one hear any longer regret for the Kaiser or the slightest suggestion that he or one of his sons might some day rule again over Germany. I have heard Rupprecht praised as a good sort, and the Grand Duke of Baden is still popular, but repeatedly working people have said to me that two millions of Germans but not a single member of the imperial family fell in battle. The stigma of coward attaches to the Kaiser more than ever. Even those who think him in some respects misjudged, or say he was mentally unbalanced, declare he should have died at the head of his troops. I doubt if Emil Ludwig's brilliant study of the Kaiser, as utterly destructive of him and his pretences as any anti-German foreigner could possibly ask, could have had three years ago the success it has just achieved. In the more severely critical discussions of the old regime one finds everywhere the clearest proof of the ground lost by the monarchists and won by the republic. To this Ludendorff has contributed not a little by showing himself a weakling in his beer-cellar revolt in Munich and a man utterly destitute of political sagacity, one might almost say of common sense. He has destroyed his own great reputation while Hindenburg has kept his and, barring one very bad error, has set an admirable example of a national executive who can keep his mouth shut. Ludendorff's divorce and remarriage, and the revelation that in the critical days after the war he was busy shipping some of his fortune out of the country in direct violation of law, have all helped to deprive him of popular respect. With him the old order suffers.

Time, of course, aids the republic and so does the order within its boundaries. There is no longer any torture like the Ruhr invasion to upset the people; the French are behaving better, and there is the promise that all the occupied territories will soon be free, that Eupen and Malmedy will be repurchased and the Saar freed from the menace of a change of nationality. The adoption of the Locarno treaties; the admission of Germany to the League and its Council; the amazing prospect of a real Franco-German peace—even if it is only a prospect—and the alliance between German, French, Belgian, and Luxemburg steel and iron magnates have all heightened the prestige of the republic. Every month that passes strengthens it. Every year new voters take their places who have known nothing else since their period of maturity. In Germany, too, nothing succeeds like success. If Stresemann—whose great development as a statesman must be admitted even by those who dislike his personality and his manners—achieves the concord with France, with the aid of Hindenburg's quiet and steadying influence, it is hard to see what grounds the Nationalists and monarchists and extreme conservatives will have for their opposition, especially if economic conditions continue slowly to improve.

The great industrialists themselves are holding out olive branches to organized labor. One of their chief spokesmen has publicly urged the entrance into the government of labor—a remarkable change of heart which bodes great things for the future of German industry, as does also the extraordinary discovery of a means of obtaining all of Germany's oil and lubricants from coal and coal derivatives which would, some bankers believe, in five years render Germany free from dependence upon America, Rumania, or Russia for oil and gasoline now costing her hundreds of thousands of dollars annually. One no longer hears grumblings that things weren't so terrible under the monarchy.

The Communists are steadily losing ground and influence. The bitterness of party strife is, perhaps, less intense. Fortunately the long list of political assassinations seems at an end. If the Reichstag still suffers from a surplus of parties and the politicians are mostly selfish and lacking in vision, if the ministry is still without a strong, harmonious, and homogeneous majority—why, the republic still lives and has for all time demonstrated its right to live by its Locarno treaties and the possibility of that real brotherhood of France and Germany which nature intended.

There are dark sides, of course, besides the dreadful individual suffering and the hundreds of thousands of existences utterly warped or ruined by the war. The purely political situation is none too good. There are many reforms needed. There is endless reconstruction still to be done. The sense of gross injustice to Germany in the matter of the war guilt has not wholly disappeared and will not until the sole-guilt charge is disposed of, until many others besides Briand testify to German gallantry in war, and recall that war spells atrocities on all sides. The working classes are bearing a frightful burden and must not be further depressed if they are to retain decent living conditions. If bad times should come, there will again be grave trouble.

There is no millennium in sight in Germany. Her fundamental governmental problems are still to be solved. She is creating under foreign duress an industrial Juggernaut which may prove to be more threatening to popular government than is the case anywhere else. My point is simply that for the hour Germany is facing to the front, is bearing almost intolerable burdens stoically, and is progressing steadily. She is paying a terrific price for the past but she is accepting that as something as inevitable and as scarcely more worth discussing than the rising of the sun. If she can continue in this spirit, if her admirable self-control and readiness to work should last, if the public order continues and the narrow partisanship of politicians sinks into a genuine desire to place country above party, if there are no baleful outside influences like the collapse of the franc, and if nature is normally favorable, there seems no reason why in fifteen years her economic and financial soundness should not be beyond question. The Germans are winning by the arts of peace what they lost in war. They seem to be demonstrating anew how sweet as well as bitter may be the uses of adversity.

William Green's Convention

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG

DETROIT was William Green's convention. It showed his weakness, in which lies his strength as an incumbent of his office. He can continue to lead the American Federation of Labor as long as he follows the hard men on its Executive Council—Tobin, Duffy, Rickert, Fischer, Woll; as long as the heads of the Big Three Internationals—the miners, the carpenters, and the electrical workers—think he is safe. At Detroit they all tested his strength. They found him weak. They are for him.

Green does not look the professional labor leader. At close range one can note the honorable tell-tale complexion of the miner, slate-blue spots shot indelibly deep under the skin. Otherwise the president of the A. F. of L. looks like a conservative, somewhat old-fashioned, prosperous business man. His features are close together in a broad Welsh face: the eyes are small, nondescript, kindly enough; an upturned but not pert little nose; a cherubic little mouth, which tremulously and a bit indignantly puckers when Green is worried.

For eleven days he sat in the chair and listened to the reports of the various committee chairmen—Tobin, Woll, Duffy, Rickert. They reeled off the resolutions mechanically, but they read their own recommendations with gusto. Virtually all these recommendations were adopted. Now and then a delegate would get up, in congressional fashion, to elaborate his philosophical agreement with the machine—for the record. Now and then someone would courageously move for the substitution of an "if" for a "when." Now and then someone would protest a little, but rarely with his vote. As each question came before the house, Green would rise, incant the suffrage formula, and then duly hammer the vote into the record.

There was a multitude of petty resolutions, not worth the time: the convention costs around $100,000. The more liberal ones are traditional. The most important resolutions were those on Passaic; on the shorter work week; on the organization of the automobile industry and the open shop in general; on the company union; and on the Russian and Mexican questions.

The convention voted in favor of increasing the pensions of Civil War veterans' widows. The Citizens' Military Training Camps were indorsed, as good calesthenics. A nobly vague gesture against race discrimination tactfully ignored the bars which the overwhelming majority of the crafts put up against the Negro. The injunction was deplored. The direct primary was indorsed. Fascism was disadvantageously contrasted with nonpartisan political action. A fair trial for Sacco and Vanzetti was demanded. One or two jurisdictional disputes were skirted.

Occasionally there was a set speech by some harmless lobbyist. Spencer Miller, Jr., of the Workers' Education Bureau, which enjoys more the official than the financial indorsement of the A. F. of L., delivered his annual remarks on what he called "the old, old story of workers' education." The only new feature he might have reported was the bureau's acceptance of $25,000 from the Carnegie Corporation. He didn't.

Passaic was a ticklish problem. At the invitation of Thomas F. McMahon of the United Textile Workers Rabbi Stephen S. Wise came on from New York to testify that the Communist background of the strike has been rendered absolutely kosher. In deep rolling basso, with lifted face and arms, the rabbi defied the Detroit Chamber of Commerce, Moscow, and the mill barons. He thundered for three-quarters of an hour in the style of Cecil de Mille's notion of the Prophet Isaiah. He did an excellent job. The convention voted support for the strike. And Rabbi Wise made it possible for Max Hayes of the Typographical Union to force a collection on the floor which yielded almost $1,300. Several international unions pledged definite sums Green originally had hoped to put through the forty-hour week. The Executive Council, fearfully, changed it to a progressively shortened work week. But the administration did come out for an unlimited per capita tax to fight company unions. The administration is afraid of the company union. Its fancy features render the unintelligent worker too conservative even for the old trade union, and it teaches the radical worker the absurdity of craft separatism.

In its fight against the open shop the machine was more careful. The truth is that the A. F. of L. is spiritually too exhausted for straight organization work. It is for this reason that it, unconsciously, is attacking the automobile industry. The steel industry, ripe for organization work, it is avoiding like the plague. Ford and the General Motors do not employ craftsmen but human automata which are practically unorganizable under the A. F. of L. structure. To facilitate the organization of these industries the Executive Council has temporarily suspended jurisdictional divisions. Only after the organization of these automatic industries, the shop-craft officials are to determine whether the man who tightens a series of nuts is a machinist or a sheet-metal worker.

So much for the business of the convention. And now for the fireworks. These were innocently started by Lee Terrill, industrial secretary of the Detroit Young Men's Christian Association, who invited Green to speak. Whereupon Charles B. Van Dusen, a big five-and-ten-cent man, the president of the Detroit Y. M. C. A., withdrew the invitation. His reasons were lucid: Detroit is open shop and proud of it; all labor leaders are revolutionists; Mr. Terrill is a "mere employee" and, incidentally, the Y. M. C. A. is trying to raise $5,000,000.

Such clarity of vision no doubt got Mr. Van Dusen to the top of the five-and-ten-cent profession. But any Y. M. C. A. issue is also a church issue. And the liberal clergy does not see things quite as clearly. Dr. Lynn H. Hough, for instance, in an impassioned address shook his finger into the face of the secretary of the Detroit Chamber of Commerce and exclaimed in truly magnificent rage: "Louis XIV said, I am the state; but he never dared to say, I am the church!" Little did simple Louis dream of the power of a five-and-ten-cent magnate.

The Y. M. C. A. fiasco led indirectly to the Sherwood Eddy affair. Sherwood Eddy is an important International Y. M. C. A. official. He is also strongly in favor of Russian recognition; and so is Albert F. Coyle, editor of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers' Journal. Mr. Coyle is anxious for an official labor commission to visit Russia. Accordingly Mr. Coyle, through friends of friends of friends of Green, maneuvered Mr. Eddy to the platform. Green did not want Mr. Eddy to speak. Gompers never would have allowed Mr. Eddy to speak. From his own point of view, Green was weak in granting his permission.

Tom Tippett of the Illinois Miners reported at the press table before Mr. Eddy's speech that he happened to overhear the arrangement. It tallies exactly with Mr. Eddy's version. Mr. Eddy was to speak on his European trip, with emphasis on his experiences in Russia; he was to avoid the "controversial" issue of recognition. Mr. Eddy spoke practically on nothing but Russia, and with such crusading fervor that his own stand on recognition could not be mistaken. He also advocated the sending of an American fact-finding labor commission.

Several hours later Green decided to remember that Mr. Eddy was not to mention Russia at all. When the resolution for Russian recognition came up, the Eddy affair developed into the preface for the debate. Max Hayes, "Tim" Healy, Andrew Furuseth, and John P. Frey had their say—pro and con. John L. Lewis got up. Powerful, picturesque, 220 pounds of capable ruthlessness, he calmly and impressively began to portray a picture. He boldly admitted, by implication, that he had some one steal a private letter which Mr. Coyle had sent to Powers Hapgood of the United Mine Workers. And who is Coyle? asked Mr. Lewis. He answered: Coyle is the man who maneuvered Eddy into this convention; he is the man who wants a labor commission to visit Russia; he is the editor of the official organ of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, "a scab-herding and strike-breaking organization" which operates non-union mines; and he is a Communist conspirator.

In this private letter Mr. Coyle pledged his support to John Brophy's campaign against Mr. Lewis for the presidency of the United Mine Workers; he expressed the hope that $30,000 might be raised from "a few wealthy friends" to start the National Miner, which was to be Brophy's campaign organ and to advocate a progressive program among the miners. Mr. Coyle was to name the editor of this organ, and indeed proceeded to name for assistant editor a man who had "gone steadily to the left until now he is one of Jay's best friends." "Jay" is Jay Lovestone, of the Workers' Party.

Mr. Lewis sat down. When he had completed his picture of Messrs. Eddy and Coyle acting as the sinister agents of Moscow, and pointed to William Z. Foster in the gallery, the correspondents of the big dailies did an unusual thing. They laughed long, loud, and heartily. But this is what Mr. Lewis's picture did for the A. F. of L. machine, and especially for Mr. Lewis: There will be no official labor commission to Russia; the Russian bogy, of which rather little was expected, proved more effective than ever in driving the convention to the Right; Russian recognition was of course defeated; the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers was shown up in a very bad light; John Brophy will have to dig coal; and all opposition to Mr. Lewis within his own union has been effectively scattered for some time.

Disaster Loves Workers

By HOLLACE RANSDELL

A PRETTY, cream-colored building stands on the smooth lawn beside the Hackensack, New Jersey, courthouse. It is the Bergen County jail. A walk parting the lawn demurely in the middle leads up to the door of this chaste, innocent-looking structure. A sweet-faced young boy approaches to open the door as I walk up the steps. He looks like a cherub coming to throw open the gates of some paradise.

I enter and am instructed to sign my name in a large book. A man with a kind expression leads me to another room. He speaks to me gently and points out a door labeled "Visitors' Booth." I go in, the door closes behind me, and I find myself inclosed in a tiny, triangular hole. One side of this triangle is made of two layers of heavy-meshed wire netting, with some half a foot between the layers. The netting is reinforced with strips of iron. I can barely see through it.

A man approaches on the other side of the netting. I recognize him with difficulty as the man I have come to see. He is Paul Kovac, who has been held prisoner by the police of the Passaic textile-strike district for three weeks. He comes and presses close against the netting. I do the same. I can see his face only dimly, marked into sections by the iron-barred netting. I stare at it one part at a time. I see the tortured lines around the mouth; then the unhappy eyes. He is pale, unshaven.

Kovac talks to me slowly, painfully—almost in a whisper. His voice is full of patient misery. His ribs have been kicked in by the heavy shoes of a policeman. Every breath he takes hurts him. He says little. He whispers several times anxiously: "When do I get out?"

He tells slowly, disjointedly, when questioned, how he was beaten, knocked down, and kicked by the great boots of police officials; how he was forced to drink great quantities of whiskey; how he lost consciousness and had no idea what happened then.

"I can't hear very well," he says apologetically, as he asks me to repeat what I said. "Something is wrong with one of my ears since they beat me."

He is much upset when asked about some paper he signed.

"I don't know what I signed," he says. "I was sick from the whiskey, the beating. I don't know what I signed."

A bunch of keys clank behind him. He turns away—our time is up. The sweet-faced child unlocks the outside door for me. I step outside and stand staring at the neat lawn, the peaceful white walls. I think of the broken ribs, the suffering face of Paul Kovac. Then of the kindly jailkeeper, the angelic boy, the pretty jail. And I stand and wonder at the strange ways of human beings.

Who is this man, Paul Kovac, and what did he do that he should be treated in this manner? Did he murder his wife, shoot his mother, or choke his father to death? The story is tragic and typical in the district where he lives. With his wife and three small children, Kovac lived simply but comfortably enough in a two-family house at 55 Shaw Street, Garfield. He was a plumber by trade and he also knew something of carpentry. His hands were skilful ones. He could do many useful things with them. But useful hands do not mean money. Wages were low, work often scarce, and prices high. So in spite of her three small children Mrs. Kovac had to take a job in the textile mills to help meet expenses.

When the strike came in January, after a slash in wages in October, Mrs. Kovac went out with the rest. She walked on the picket line, stood the cursing and other mistreatment of the police, and attended the strike meetings. The police came to know her and often gave her much undesired attention.

At home things were not going so badly—for a textile worker. Her husband had a job in a carpenter shop and her relatives and friends helped look after the children when Mrs. Kovac was on the picket line. Things might have been worse—as indeed they soon were. Disaster is fond of workers' homes. It visits often.

One afternoon, September 22, 1926, Wanda Jackowski, a young high-school girl who lives upstairs over the Kovacs' home, saw a crowd of eight or nine police drive up and stop in front of the house. It was a little before five o'clock, so Mrs. Kovac was not home. She was on the picket line at the Forstmann and Huffmann Mills. The police probably knew this and arranged the time of their visit accordingly.

Paul Kovac was not home from work yet. Wanda saw the police pry open the kitchen window of the Kovacs' home and crawl inside. What they did there Mrs. Kovac soon found out when she got home. The whole house had been turned upside down; closets were rummaged and drawers upset. Neighbors on both sides of the house and across the street, having seen or been told of the arrival of the police, came out on their porches and sidewalks. Some of the more curious went to look through the Kovacs' window to see what was going on there. The neighbors were still watching when Paul Kovac himself got home from work. He was met by several of the police, who handcuffed him and drove off with him immediately. Strange that such a desperate criminal should be coming home so confidently that he didn't show any signs of knowing the police were awaiting his arrival.

The next day the Passaic papers came out with screaming eight-column headlines. "Maker of Bombs Confesses—Kovac's home is found equipped to turn out explosives," read the Daily Herald. That Wednesday evening he was arrested was the last that was seen of Kovac for nearly a week. He and eleven others were held incomunicado by the police of Clifton and Garfield for four or five days. The lawyers for the union were refused permission to see any of them.

It was six days before Mrs. Kovac was allowed finally to see her husband. When she did she recognized him with difficulty and horror. His eyes were black and blue and swollen nearly shut. His face was puffed up like a football. Some of his teeth were loosened or broken and three of his ribs were kicked in. He was not able to talk—he just looked at his wife helplessly.

The police had given information to reporters of the local press of a deadly infernal bomb-making machine which they had seized in Kovac's house. Just what was the evidence they found when they made the warrantless raid on the Kovacs' home? A dozen neighbors who watched the whole proceedings tell what it was that the police discovered. A whiskey still in the basement and some plumbing pipes in the shed back of the house!

One has to have imagination to be a police official. The whiskey still became a deadly machine for manufacturing bombs and the pipes grew into the material of which the bombs were made. An important piece of evidence which the police neglected to mention was noted by half a dozen of the neighbors. While the police were still in the Kovacs' home, Eddie Coopers, employment manager at the Forstmann and Huffmann Mills, drove up to the curb in his car, stepped into the hall, and talked to the two police standing there. Nobody was near enough to hear what he said.

What was the agent of the Forstmann and Huffmann Mills doing in the house of a striker at such a time? Paul Kovac, to be sure, was not a striker, but, then, it was all in the family. Besides one can't torture a woman by third-degree beatings into signing the necessary papers—not even a working woman. A bit inconvenient of course, but where there is a husband to substitute, not so bad.

Paul Kovac is alone in his cell in the Bergen County jail at Hackensack, but he is not alone in his misery. Ten other men have been held for about a month on similar charges. Only one of the original twelve arrested has been released on bail. The bomb charges against him were dropped. There are four men confined with Kovac in the Bergen County jail—Thomas Regan, Joseph Toth, Nicholas Schillaci, and Adolph Wisnefski—held under the collective bail of $80,000. In the Passaic County jail at Paterson are six more—Tony Pochno, Paul Ozneck, Alex Costomacha, Joseph Bellemi, Charles Current, and William Sikora—held under $375,000.

What were these terrible bombings the eleven prisoners are accused of? How many people were killed or maimed and how much property was damaged or destroyed? To warrant such savage treatment and such high bail—$455,000 altogether—terrible things must have been done. What were they? Not a hair of anyone's head was injured. As for property damage, there was none worth mentioning. About the only thing these strange bombs did was make a noise. There was a series of mysterious explosions spread over a number of weeks. The last ones occurred about 10:30 on the night of September 17 and in the early morning of September 21.

Nine of the men in jail at Hackensack and Paterson are married and have children. The two others are nothing but boys. Tom Regan is twenty-one, Joseph Toth is only eighteen. They all have excellent records in the community. Some of them are prominent strike leaders.

There may be some doubt in the minds of the union strikers about one or two of these men. It is quite likely that a stool pigeon may be among them or that one or more spies working within the union has involved the strikers under arrest in something unknown to them. A brief survey of attempted frame-ups in the past will show that these are the usual tactics of the companies' agents. The textile mills in the Passaic district are notorious for their company spies and hired detectives. To mention only one frame-up a short time ago, there was the attempt of a hired detective agency to mix Albert Weisbord, former strike leader, in a scandal with a woman he had never heard of. The New York World exposed this trick and it ended in ridiculous failure.

The present one, planned more skilfully and on a bigger scale, has so far been successful. The local union of the United Textile Workers of America, now in control of the strike, has only common sense and justice on its side. What do such things amount to when opposed by the power and wealth of the mill-owners?

Afternoon of a Queen

By TANSY McNAB

I HAVE come to America because I love you as the miner loves the nugget. I love thy rocks and rills. I love your Shipping Board and Jimmy Walker and the directors of the Packard Company and the publicity man of the Pennsylvania Railroad. . . . Charmed, Mrs. Astorbilt. Delighted, Mrs. Van Sturtevant. Entranced, Mrs. Cohen. . . . One genüine 24-karat princess! Step up, gentlemen. Going, going. . . . I attribute my complexion wholly to the constant use of Hokum's Cold Cream. $10,000. . . . At three p. m. Her Majesty will sob silently, in native costume, in front of the tomb of the Unknown Soldier before 8,367 photographers. . . . I want to see all the beloved spots of your marvelous country. I want to see the homes of Buffalo Bill, John Alexander Dowie, of DeWolf Hopper's former wives. . . . My perfect teeth are the result of using Nodecay Dentifrice five times daily. $8,000. . . . Her Majesty will positively appear at the Sesqui Stadium Thursday afternoon and evening, under the auspices of Tex Rickard. Ringside seats $30. . . . A princess with great blue eyes, whose life stands before her, an adventure not yet lived. Going, going. . . . I believe in the old-fashioned domestic virtues of your Washington and Franklin. Home comes first. . . . . Her Majesty has agreed to spend one day in Hollywood, appearing in three shots of Cecil B. Silly's absorbing drama of royal life, "Hotsy-Totsy." $25,000. . . . I find a refuge in a simple home life from the ugliness of crass materialism. . . . By exclusive arrangement Her Majesty's 3,806 frocks and underthings will be photographed at 6 p. m. by William Randolph Hearst. . . . During the dark days of the war, when we were sustained only by the substantial promises of financial support (get that) of your Great Moral Leader, I walked many a weary mile to get a Camel. $6,000. . . . A genuine, A No. 1 princess. My own cheild. Going, going. . . . At 6:30 p. m. Her Majesty will pose with Peaches Browning exclusively for the Daily Mirrow. . . . I consider no meal complete without an afterchew of Riggily's Gum. $9,000. . . . Uncle Shylock, indeed! I would say Uncle Bountiful.

In the Driftway

A CORRESPONDENT calls attention to a recent dispatch from Portland, Oregon, as follows:

> In a search for peace and quiet, and in an attempt to free themselves from "the eternal grind of America's civilization," Paul Handloss, his wife and their four children, and Leroy Rappe, seventeen years old, are dropping down the Columbia River to the sea today in their forty-foot sailboat, Pearl H, bound for Tahiti in the South Seas. They left Portland yesterday with two months' provisions on board.
>
> In a haven of the Southern Pacific Handloss says he will continue his studies of art and literature, begun in Germany. "There we can settle down," he said. "There we can think. I can study once more my art and literature, and once more I can be a free man."

* * * *

THEREUPON the correspondent asks: "Is there no other escape from high-pressure business, from standardization, the motley mob, the noise, the smoke, the dirt, and the foul odors; the confusion, the congestion?" The significant phrase in this question is "no other escape." It implies that Paul Handloss has found one way out. But has he? The essence of the discussion, the Drifter surmises, is right there. Current literature and conversation is full of this demand for "escape," and it is remarkable how many persons naively think the solution lies in running off to sea, especially to the South Pacific. William McFee says that he receives numerous letters from persons who assume that the main qualification for success at sea is dislike of or unsuitability for life ashore. He scouts the idea that there is any "escape" at sea and wisely observes that a passion for adventure is no indication whatever of aptitude for the career of a sailor. A sailor's life, more than almost any other, imposes discipline and demands dependability. The anti-social type is not likely to be happy aboard ship, nor is unsuccess ashore a favorable preparation for mastering the complicated and exacting technique necessary to following any branch of work afloat.

OF course it may be argued that Handloss is not seeking a career aboard ship but merely using a boat to get him to the South Seas, where he expects to lie down under a palm tree and live happily forever after. Even so the sea is a hard taskmaster and will exact more resource, energy, and courage of Handloss before he reaches that beckoning palm tree than is asked of the ordinary man ashore. And what of the palm tree? The Drifter surmises that there is more mythology about that palm tree than in all the advertising pages of our popular periodicals—which is saying much. Unless Handloss has more than two months' provisions, or a supply of money that will procure them, he is not going to have a mint of time for pursuing his studies of art and literature. And what good would it serve if he should? If Handloss is correctly quoted in saying "Once more I can be a free man," the Drifter defies him to specify when, for how long, and under what circumstances he was ever a free man before—unless he was serving a term in jail.

* * * * *

THE Drifter would not disparage a reasonable desire for adventure. But a thirst for adventure is not the same as the much-discussed desire for "escape." A thirst for adventure implies an avid pursuit of life; a desire for "escape" is a retreat from it. The Drifter doesn't believe that any problem is solved by running away from it. That sounds like Sunday-school doctrine, but one must give even the devil his due. Somewhere within the Tower of Babel there must be a chance to work out a measurably sane and satisfactory life without embracing all the current follies and futilities—or there is no possibility anywhere.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Disguised as Itself?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your Fall Book Number Mr. Hobson speaks of nationalism masquerading as patriotism. How much of a masquerade? What is the genuine difference between nationalism and patriotism? It looks to me like the difference between liberty and license: as much of it as you like is liberty, as much as you don't like is license; similarly, whatever of the present phenomenon Mr. Hobson likes is patriotism, whatever of it he doesn't like is nationalism—isn't that it?

Ballard Vale, Mass., October 15 STEVEN T. BYINGTON

Should Actors Be Themselves?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Although I have a profound admiration for your Mr. Krutch, one of the best two dramatic critics in New York, I must quarrel with him for his defense of Gordon Craig's ideal actor: the puppet. Mr. Krutch desires the poor actor to be a cerebral puppet, a "marvelously articulated puppet," with a "conscious control of the voice and the body." He evidently disapproves of that vain egoistical creature, the player who dares to display his own quivering personality to a gaping crowd.

Great actors and actresses have always, thank God, exploited their personalities. Both Reinhardt and Stanislavsky have built up superb acting companies by letting the individual players express their personalities. One of the best examples of how the Craig-Krutch theory and the Reinhardt practice work out was revealed last week when the Theater Guild produced Werfel's "Juarez and Maximilian." I have seen the Reinhardt production three times, and the Guild production twice. In the Reinhardt production each player was himself as we had known him in other plays; at the same time he managed to be the character represented. So wonderfully was personality fused with the tragic spirit of the play that one could not imagine a more perfect performance. In the lamentable control of Fifty-second Street we find the thrill of [illegible] personality and genius lacking.

New York, October 16 P. BEAUMONT WADSWORTH

Courtin' Night in Arkansas

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the backwoods of Arkansas, bottoms or hills, Saturday night is courting night. Absolutely no ifs, ands, or buts about it, a young man goes courting Saturday night—rides or walks. Very, very few have even Fords.

And in the bottoms the mud is deep, black, and sticky. To bog down means something during high water. Dead Man's Slough came by its name naturally. A schoolmate of mine, grown up, was drowned trying to ford Poteau. He wasn't going courtin', but he might have been, had it been Saturday night. Evening is after dinner (noon), night after sundown (supper).

Grass is seldom killed by frost. 'Long in the fall, about cotton-picking time, it turns a pea-green, then brown. About all one can see, especially in the bottoms, is grass and cotton and cockleburrs.

My Arkansas stuff has been well liked lately. I hope youens like thisun:

"It's pea-green grass an' white-bole cotton
An' thick black mud in Poteau bottom."
He's singin' when—he loped in view
An' kept right on till "Howdy do."
Back water's up—horse-high an' past—
In Dead Man's Slough, an' risin' fast.
"An' Bender creek?" he asked, with a smile:
"Out of its banks—good half a mile."
"Gee whiz!" he said; "it's sure a fright;
Gotta see my girl; it's Sat'rd'y night.
"Croppy, ol' hoss, if you bog down
We'll not get through; perhaps we'll drown;
"I know a girl that'll miss a kiss—
Gimme a chew of Granger twis'."
He hitched his belt an' took a chew
An' rode off singin' as all fools do:
"Mistletoe bough in a high elm tree
Fingerin' stars that wink at me."

Kansas City, Mo., October 16 HILLIARD WIGHT

What About Florida?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Who is Stella Crossley, anyway? Not that anything she says is untrue; but she has neglected to speak the wnole truth. Of course the damage was "minimized"—by State and city officials, by the press, by the Red Cross itself. That was because first reports were so inordinately exaggerated. According to the first stories, Miami was wiped out of existence. Most of its buildings stood through the storm with little serious damage. The news left but one building standing in Hollywood; all of the large buildings are still there, more or less damaged. The same is true of Fort Lauderdale. Tampa did suffer "comparatively" little, as did West Palm Beach. The roof blew off our garage and one of our windows blew away, but there was no loss of life in the whole city, and most of the damage was of the same minor sort. I call that comparatively little, and I am not in the real-estate business or dependent upon the tourist trade. There were some 400 people killed, there was some $100,000,000 of property damage, and there are still thousands homeless. That should be enough to appeal to the sympathies of the American people and to procure funds for the Red Cross relief. The hurricane was bad enough, but why make it worse? There was no danger of minimizing the damage in the eyes of those who were here and saw the horror of it, but there was danger that the refugees would be headlined into the belief that they were sorry objects of commiseration who could not help themselves.

One must admit that there was not enough attention paid to the Negroes; unfortunately, there never is. No doubt many of them were killed or drowned in the Everglades region whose bodies were never found or counted, but were left mercifully buried in the mud. Everybody went to work, white and black, and there was little necessity for forcing anyone. At West Palm Beach the American Legion and the Red Cross had been working night and day, collecting food and clothing, transporting it south, taking care of refugees, nursing, bandaging, matching up babies and parents. The Seaboard station was badly littered and dirtied from the canteen service which had been maintained there constantly since the arrival of the first train-load from Miami. They wanted someone to clean it up, and they telephoned the police station. Within half an hour a gang of Negroes was at work, and the station was cleaned. They sang, they didn't get paid, they didn't complain. The police lieutenant said: "Whenever you want any nigger labor for relief work, just let me know and I'll confiscate it."

HARRIS BERLACK

West Palm Beach, Florida, October 17

When Patience Is Iconoclasm

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As Glenn Frank states, President Eliot was not only a builder but also an iconoclast. He was not afraid to call attention to defects in our own country—the country which many have urged us to regard as always right. In the spring of 1912, upon his return from China, he addressed the Harvard Economic Seminar. At the close of his talk he was asked: "Do you not think that China has proved that she cannot maintain a republic, since after seven years she has not been able to establish an adequate currency?"

"Well," came the reply, "I think we should regard China with considerable patience. You remember that it took the United States thirteen years to establish a currency and that during the sixties it was far from sound."

New York, October 1 LLOYD M. CROSGRAVE

Something in a Name

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apropos of the Sesquicentennial of our young republic, semi-sesquicentennial of the New York Times, and your editorial mention of the propaganda capacity of news columns: Should we not also remember the new "Encyclopaedia Britannica"? In its map of 1926 Oslo is Oslo, Czecho-Slovakia is Czecho-Slovakia, but Leningrad is "Petrograd (Leningrad)," with the lie quite bold and the unwilling parenthetical admission quite faint.

New York, October 8 J. B. C. WOODS

Henry Timrod

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am preparing a study of Henry Timrod and shall be deep in the debt of any readers of yours who will point me to or send me copies of Timrod's letters and manuscripts, and of letters in which he is mentioned by members of his literary group—Simms, Hayne, Legare, etc.

New Orleans, La., October 16 LESTER HARGRETT

·U·S· A Study in Democracy
By H. E. BUCHHOLZ

"Here is an investigation into American politics that will repay careful reading."—The Syracuse Herald.

"Mr. Buchholz, it appears, still retains a certain amount of faith in the democratic theory, but democracy as it is practically encountered in this world only depresses him. More than three-fourths of his book, in fact, is given over to a bitter recital of its failures. He then proceeds to present his remedy. There is, it quickly appears, nothing very revolutionary about it. He does not propose to overthrow the Constitution or even to change the laws. . . . All he proposes is that it be brought under better control than in the past—that the civilized minority of men . . . assume a censorship over its processes, and, above all, over its chosen agents. So far, of course, there is nothing new. Every reformer since Jefferson's time had bawled for the same thing; it is the cornerstone of every democratic Utopia. But Mr. Buchholz, after all, has something new to add to it, and that something has the merit, at least, of being simple and practicable."—H. L. Mencken in The Nation.

"Mr. Buchholz, although apparently a pessimist, in reality is nothing of the kind. . . . Rather he is clear-sighted and energetic in his attempts to make others see clearly, too. His book is interesting as well as interesting. . . . Any one disturbed by present-day conditions—and a good many of us are—will find both agitations and solace in the present volume. Its sane point of view . . . should make all straight-thinking men pause and consider. It is worthy of high recommendation."—The Indianapolis News.

"For the most part, it is an intelligently-conceived, timely and desirable piece of work, decidedly readable and easy to get along with. . . . Any man that can find such exquisite, expert and legitimate fault with [illegible] so faultlessly, as it were—doesn't need to be constructive. . . ."—Irving McDonald in the Springfield Union.

$2.30 postpaid

DETERMINISM IN EDUCATION
By W. C. Bagley

"I hail Bagley's book as the most important offering of the year. But you who are afraid that I boil over too easily, you who want to follow a master reasoner careful of his route, step by step, read Bagley on Determinism even through its [illegible] appendix."—International Review.

"It was Bagley, however, who . . . fired the shot that was heard, if not 'round the world, at least from the British Isles to the Hawaiian Islands. . . . Bagley's address . . . brought forth a storm of criticism from those who recognized themselves as being among the group he termed "determinists.'"—H. C. Hines in his book "Measuring Intelligence."

$2.30 postpaid

OF WHAT USE ARE COMMON PEOPLE?
By H. E. Buchholz

"Mr. Buchholz has contributed a work which may well furnish a better basis for an introduction to democratic education than many a book on the principles of education, for he outlines with greater clearness and reality many of the educational problems with which we are confronted today."—I. L. Kandel in School and Society.

"Mr. Buchholz has written an interesting and extremely original volume. There is nothing hackneyed and obvious about it; it does not lean on other books. The man visible behind it is a hearty hater of shams and a vigorous disdainer of the everyday rubber-stamps of thought."—H. L. Mencken in The [illegible] Sun, Baltimore.

$2.10 postpaid

Warwick & York
Publishers Baltimore

Books

The Seventh Veil

By GEORGE STERLING

Life, in a burst of music mad with bliss,
Ran dancing from the shadows where she slept,
And like the sunlight on wild water leapt—
Careless of Time and his betraying kiss.
And one by one her gleaming veils unwound,
Until she whirled untrammeled in her grace,
With light alone on bosom and on face
And thighs uplifting to the viols' sound.

Till at the last, mysteriously pale,
She loosed her forehead of the seventh veil
And all the nimbus of her hair sprang free;
Whereat the music faltered, and in awe,
Full on that enigmatic brow we saw,
Moon-white, the eternal brand of leprosy.

First Glance

BETWEEN two men who in our day have pursued the image of perfection through the making of fine books there is a great and interesting difference. Between William Dana Orcutt and the late Thomas James Cobden-Sanderson, indeed, there is to my mind no resemblance at all—though both have loved the same thing without limit, though both have achieved distinction in their craft, and though while Cobden-Sanderson lived they knew and respected each other. The difference between them is measured by the difference between two books now published from their pens.

Mr. Orcutt's "In Quest of the Perfect Book" (Little, Brown: $5), an account of the enthusiasms which have sent him over the earth, and particularly over Italy, after specimens of the thing he loves, is engaging and infectious. His descriptions of great printers—Gutenberg, Jenson, Aldus, Etienne, Plantin, the Elzevirs, Baskerville, the Didots, William Morris, and Cobden-Sanderson himself—are exciting, and the numerous reproductions he gives of pages from their masterpieces must put any reader in his debt. But the story stops there. We are not moved to ask why he is interested in these things, the reason being apparent—he is a professional. He talks breezily about his passion; he has the complacency of an expert. Should he ever find the perfect book, we may be sure, he would be satisfied that he had come to the end of the world.

For Cobden-Sanderson there was no end of the world. Though he dreamed of perfection he never dreamed of finding it, and had he dreamed of finding it he would not have dreamed of finding it in a book. The binding and printing of beautiful books—and few books in the world are more beautiful than those he issued first from his private workshop and later from the Doves Bindery and the Doves Press—made only an incident in his career, which was devoted neither to the designing of pages nor to the tooling of leather but to reflection upon the meaning of the universe. Now in his published "Journals" (Macmillan, 2 vols.: $25) the story, a deeply impressive one, comes out. It begins in his thirty-ninth year, when, tiring of the law because it told him nothing about the meaning of things, he settled into the silence of his chambers in the Temple and pondered, read, or wrote in a ceaseless effort after peace of the spirit. His hunger was for an occupation both of his hands and of his mind which should be significant equally in London and in the cosmos, in time and in eternity. The world for him was out of joint, as it was for his master Ruskin. It had grown unaccountably cruel and ugly. Men conducted their little affairs below in strange ignorance of the stars and of the extent of space. What should he do? He married Anne Cobden, his unmailed letters to whom fill some of the most interesting pages in these two volumes; he lectured and wrote for Socialism; he accepted Mrs. William Morris's suggestion that he take up book-binding; he became famous in a very few years. At no time, however, were these enough. There were his aspirations toward the cosmos, there was his never satisfied desire for orientation in the largest thinkable scene. Thus the "Journals," wherein for the health of his private mind he entered the details of his soul's longings and adventures side by side with records of his contracts, his meetings with great persons, and his progress in a certain manual art. It is perhaps a unique story. At any rate it is the story of one who did something supremely well because he wanted to do something else better.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Indian's World

L'Art et la philosophie des Indiens de l'Amérique Nord. Par Hartley Burr Alexander. Paris: Ernest Léroux.

THOUGH Professor Alexander is primarily a student of philosophy, he has repeatedly given evidence of his intimate knowledge of the literature dealing with the American aborigines and of his profound sympathy with their world-view. The lectures here presented in permanent form were delivered at the Sorbonne in the spring of 1925 and constitute an effort to bring home to a French audience the true inwardness of Indian art and philosophy. It is a very successful essay at popularization, exhibiting once more the author's familiarity with the technical literature—including the often neglected but important sources due to early missionaries and travelers. The artistic styles of the several culture provinces are ocularly demonstrated by a set of twenty-six plates, regarding some of which the lay reader probably would like fuller elucidation than is vouchsafed in the text. The pictures made by Pueblo Indians of some of their sacred dances are especially noteworthy for the skilful suggestion of movement.

As regards anthropological theory, Professor Alexander follows the golden middle path when dealing with the favorite moot-problem of the last two decades, to wit, diffusion. While he again and again comments on the parallels between Indian and Greek mythology, and though he agrees with the best authorities in affirming some historical connection between the Old and New World folk-tales, he is far from tracing all parallels to a common historical origin. He also does well to explain that the spirit of two myths may be quite different even when there is close resemblance in their episodes taken singly.

There are, indeed, many enlightening remarks scattered through the little volume. Thus it may come as a surprise to many that the Indian's daily life was saturated with a ceremonial atmosphere, that even the routine tasks of warfare and the chase had a ritualistic as well as a utilitarian aspect for our aborigines. And again, few would suspect that the Redskin (Peau-Rouge)—a term for convenience' sake restricted by the author to the Eastern Woodland and Central Indians—had developed a code of chivalry comparable with that of medieval knighthood.

The main purpose of Professor Alexander's treatise, however, is to demonstrate that the American Indian's basic thought is of a synthetic, essentially aesthetic character; and to vindicate such a world-view as against the intolerantly analytical intellectualism of our modern civilization. Here, naturally, appraisal of the Indian philosophy will be inevitably bound up with one's individual set of fundamental values. The reviewer, for one, is quite willing to acknowledge the Indian Weltanschauung as one of the relatively legitimate reactions to the totality of the universe. My quarrel is not with the metaphysical defense of such a position but with a conclusion capable of confirmation or refutation—I refer to Professor Alexander's insistence that such a world-view is distinctively Indian. To be sure, he does not fail to anticipate the objection that it is peculiar to primitive mentality as such. But, so far as I am able to see, his rebuttal merely revolves about a reaffirmation of his appraisal of an aesthetic (as opposed to an analytic) philosophy. In other words, the author answers that we have no right to impose upon such a system the norms of our Caucasian logic. But it seems to me that he ignores a quite different aspect of the problem. Is it true that Indian psychology provides us with a pattern of human nature wholly distinct from any other in the world? Can we fairly say that, while its elements are of the universal human type, the configuration of these constituents in the Indian soul is a thing wholly sui generis? I should not like to be misunderstood as asserting that the propositions here laid down by Professor Alexander are erroneous; only that he has not furnished us the proof. Had he steeped himself with equal ardor in the cosmogonic lore of the Polynesians or the speculations of Bantu sages, he might discover that each of these aboriginal cultures had a tang of its own, yet that Polynesian, Bantu, and American Indian philosophy are fundamentally alike when contrasted with Occidental logic-chopping. It is of course possible that, even from this angle, each would reveal uniqueness of outlook; but without a more intensive scrutiny it seems rash to make such an assumption. Certainly, Professor Alexander's central thesis would not be weakened if the mode of thought he is interpreting for us were found to have a wider following than his exposition suggests.

ROBERT H. LOWIE

The Quality of Reverence

Mohammed. By R. F. Dibble. The Viking Press. $3.

ONE way to write about an Arab born in the sixth century is to wrestle philologically with the skimpy and confusing records which have survived and to try to harmonize them into some kind of credible story. One way to write about a prophet is to assume that he could not have founded a great cult without being divine and then to approach his memory with the reverence due a divine prophet. Neither of these ways is the way of Mr. Dibble. He is no Arabic scholar, and he has been content to use the standard sources of information without going behind them. His book is as free of notes, bibliographies, and acknowledgments of indebtedness as if it were a novel. And far from losing himself in the mysteries of religion, he writes as secularly now as when formerly he wrote about John L. Sullivan. A passage from Gibbon, printed at the head of the first chapter, sounds the keynote of the work. Mr. Dibble might even better have quoted that greater sentence of Gibbon's concerning tolerance in Rome: "The various modes of worship which prevailed in the Roman world were all considered by the people as equally true; by the philosopher as equally false; and by the magistrate as equally useful." Mr. Dibble takes his stand with the philosophers.

His history is a kind of heroic comedy. It begins with a rough, powerful account of pre-Mohammedan Arabia. It exhibits the youthful Mohammed as a neurotic not unlike the Mormon Joseph Smith. It goes on to show how the prophet gathered his disaffected followers, lived through a period of shabby brigandage, emerged in splendor, outlived his detractors and antagonists, and died in glory. Every step of the holy progress delights the biographer. Whenever he can reduce it to simple, rational terms, he unhesitatingly does so. Whenever he cannot, he no less unhesitatingly admits that "an inscrutable image looms in the mind—the grotesque, grand, preposterous, and prodigious figure of Mohammed." It is comedy, but it is heroic.

Is there a truer way in which to write about the origin of a religion? Probably not. A too purely comic attitude in the historian, or a too heroic attitude, leaves something out that ought to be included. No religion could ever have been founded without the help of superstition; neither could one have been founded without the help of heroism too. Something great as well as something mad was needed. Of both elements Mr. Dibble is aware. Even when he is most sardonically pointing out the motives which drew the scattered Arab tribes under a single banner, he is appreciating the vigor with which Mohammed urged his cause and the energy with which the followers carried it to victory. Arabia Deserta suddenly bore its astounding flower. Bedouins and city dwellers heard of it, flouted the idea, yielded gradually to the spell of the new doctrine, saw chances of profit in its code of the sword, became attached to it with a devotion which scorned, in many cases, the calculation of profit, and by the time of Mohammed's death had accepted a fresh pattern for their civilization. This gorgeous story Mr. Dibble tells robustly and shrewdly.

Understanding that reverence is a quality but not always a virtue, he treads now and then not only on Mohammedan toes but on the toes of all religionists. Of the wonders attending the birth of the prophet he says: "All these poetic fancies have been appropriately denounced by Christian scribes, who have claimed that nature would never have dignified the birth of a pagan like Mohammed with such marvelous prodigies as indubitably attended the advent and crucifixion of Christ." It is in passages like this that Mr. Dibble, amusing as he often is, commits the cardinal sin against irony of emphasizing it too heavily. The words "poetic," "appropriately," "marvelous," and "indubitably" in his sentence are only so much slag. Without them, the sentence might have satisfied Gibbon himself; with them, the sentence would have made Gibbon blush a little and look politely away. The consequence of these superfluous adjectives and adverbs is that Mr. Dibble's style is occasionally as gritty as if the Arabian sand had somehow affected it. But sand never did make a bearing run to better purpose.

CARL VAN DOREN

Squirming Romantics

The Romantic Comedians. By Ellen Glasgow. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.50.

MANNERS, and their ethical equivalent, morals, are a pathetic witness of mankind's hope of certainty. "We will have an eternal verity," says the moralist. "Or at least rules of the game, by which all decent people abide," says the mannerist. So simple it would be if we could freeze a smooth crust over thought and action, across which to skate in premeditated ease. But woe to the skaters—for life, flowing on below the specious solidity, works a treacherous hole here and there; or the spring freshets come and all once more is confusion. From slapstick up the intellectual game of comedy is to catch the slothfully trusting spirit when it has been lulled to trust in some formula and show that life itself is nimbler, surer, tougher than our presumptuous expectations.

It is such a game that Miss Glasgow plays in "The Romantic Comedians." Judge Gamaliel Bland Honeywell stands in the pale Easter sunlight at the grave of his Cordelia and feels a suspicious fluttering in his heart; behind him lie the sixty-five temperate, ordered years of living which have preserved his figure and his digestion; before him the wayward spring and Annabel with small heart-shaped face, pale gold freckles, and geranium mouth. And all about lies the simple sophistication of Queensborough, Virginia. It would be so suitable, Queensborough feels, if Judge Honeywell should console his widowed state, after a decent interval, with Miss Amanda Lightfoot, the passion of his youth, from whom he was parted by an absurd lovers' quarrel thirty-seven years ago. Miss Lightfoot, miraculously preserved in the regal splendor of a reigning belle, feels so herself in so far as a lady can feel at such a point. She has always worn blue and lavender, because they were Gamaliel's favorite colors before that silly misunderstanding cast him, on the rebound, into the arms of the virtuous Cordelia. But now, as Annabel discovers, Gamaliel's favorite colors are red and green. Suitability happens to be that last thing that will stir Judge Honeywell's heart this rebellious spring. He even cannot suppress the suspicion that when all is said, he hadn't wanted a perfect wife; he desires, contrary to both custom and reason, the things which are not good for him—the excitement of novelty, the ringing challenge of youth.

Judge Honeywell had put a fatal trust in suitability, and Amanda in faithfulness, and Annabel in passion. For Annabel of the direct younger generation is no less romantic than her faded elders, and Miss Glasgow spares none of the absurdities of her tragic renunciation of love after the defection of a youthful suitor; her resigned marriage to Judge Honeywell; and her impassioned and histrionic flight with the inevitable eligible young man, who comes by to rescue her from the position of an old man's folly. The joke is on them all—an essentially civilized, humane joke, which takes account of the fact that these are no automatons jerked hither and yonder by chance; no puppets of crude sex, but people forced to hold up their heads in the current of experience which rushes them along.

It is almost impossible to resist quoting from the smooth and sparkling pages in which Miss Glasgow turns her kind, amused gaze on one after another of the squirming romantics. Both dialogue and analysis are full of sentences that seem too good to be true, and yet are so truly a part of the fabric of the book—no mere wisecracks—that they can hardly be torn from their setting. The remarks of Judge Honeywell's loose and liberal sister Edmonia, for example.

It is this Edmonia, who followed her own realistic ways with head as well as heart, who alone seems able to get beyond the rose and purple mists of romanticism which have betrayed the rest. "You could have forgiven my committing a sin," she says to Gamaliel, "if you hadn't feared that I had committed a pleasure as well. . . . It wasn't my fault, it was my being able to get up again, that you couldn't forgive. . . . You know I always had what mother used to call a pleasure-loving mind, and I never approved of the sour kind of duty you pretend to enjoy. On the contrary, I've always believed that happiness, any kind of happiness that does not make someone else miserable, is meritorious."

"The Romantic Comedians" is a wise and a witty book.

MARY ROSS

One of the de Kovens

A Musician and His Wife. By Mrs. Reginald de Koven. Harper and Brothers. $5.

THIS work is of course chiefly autobiographical. In it we see Mrs. de Koven in the midst of the Four Hundred, "whose limited scope," she does not mind admitting, "really did include what was best in New York in those days." We see her in Newport dining with two elderly gentlemen who alternately left the table to kneel at her feet, "giving me an example," as she justly observes, "of other times and other ways . . . surely more flattering than the present emancipated youth of our day has any opportunity of enjoying."

We overhear a scrap of conversation at a luncheon in her house in London where the company was "very brilliant"—an example of Oscar Wilde's wit, pronounced by Henry James to be "absolutely unique." Wilde called her a Circe. "'I was born in Chicago,' I was moved to reply. There was horror in his expression as he answered, 'Never, no, never; your parents have deceived you.'"

Mrs. de Koven is mistress of a style that ranges from the saucy to the philosophic. Her description of a gay party at Stanford White's is too long to quote, but lovers of Mr. Dooley will be interested in her theory that Peter Dunne's power was "really psychic," that he was "endowed with a larger share of that mysterious section of our being which is called the subconscious mind than is possessed by ordinary men. Thus gifted, through the open door of this inner being the reservoir of knowledge existing about us pours into their minds a never-ceasing increment of intuition." And how appealing is her plea for the spiritualistic beliefs to which she was led by Sir Oliver Lodge. "The horizon of one who believes he has seen authentic glimpses of a continuing life is wider and happier than that of the skeptic. All earthly griefs and disappointments are reduced to a relative significance and all fear of death is removed. The value of such conclusion, the help in such perceptions, need no argument."

This, one supposes, must have been the state of mind of Mrs. Whitney on that memorable day when, as Mrs. de Koven confides to us, "Her incurable malady had reappeared and I realized that she was doomed when I was shown to her boudoir to take my luncheon with her." Such a situation might have embarrassed a person of less aplomb, but Mrs. de Koven proceeds: "She reviewed her past life, telling of her blessings and speaking of her brother, who, unknown to her, had one day pinned a check for two million dollars on her pincushion. 'Was there ever such a brother?' she asked me." Mrs. de Koven leaves her answer unrecorded, but we may surmise from the context that it was in the negative.

DANIEL GREGORY MASON

A Genius

My Son John. By E. B. Dewing. Minton, Balch and Company. $2.

THE life of a genius is a tough nut for any novelist to crack. Up to a certain point E. B. Dewing succeeds with originality and ability. The picture of John's childhood under his amazingly vital parents is well done. The essay on "Napoleon" is a delightful stroke; but John's genius as he advances to man's estate is unconvincing. We are told about it, and John's environment should certainly evoke it; yet it is not there. A veil hangs forever over that strange shrine, his mind. The nearest approach to actual genius is in the "Letter from John Lord to his mother accompanying the first three parts of the 'Rising Tide.'" Here is felt in some degree the quality of the hero's soul. From the time of his wasteful marriage to the still more wasteful Bernice Harden, however, the life of the book retreats and John becomes a lay figure. The episode of Eva Freyne is too highly colored to startle. The butler's letters to his wife will not hold water. And John's ending, first in the pork-packing business and then from the height of an aeroplane, is unsatisfactory. The book is cleverly written. Why, then, does it fail? The author has not herself been sufficiently stirred to move us deeply. We neither love nor hate John Lord. There is a complacent varnish over him. It is not that some genius would not make such gestures; it is that we are not interested in this genius. We expected of E. B. Dewing, who has a clever and versatile mind, a more believable book.

LAURA BENÉT

A Village Cut-Up

Up From Methodism. By Herbert Asbury. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

HERE is another cry of protest, vigorously uttered, and resonant enough to reverberate throughout the farthest corners of the democracy. It comes from one in lineal descent to the bishop who brought official Methodism to these shores, and it is raised against the absurdities and repressions of what he imported. The contemporary Mr. Asbury, never very kindly disposed toward the saints of Farmington, Missouri, has at last given articulateness to a long-accumulated disgust; the result is a book cogently written, Menckenesque in tone, and calculated to even for all time to come his score with the emotion-mongers of the Middle West. "I wrote it," explains Mr. Asbury, "because I thought it was high time someone told the truth about the oppressive religious taboos which made life in the small towns so depressing." Mr. Asbury is the author of "Hatrack," the story for which a recent issue of the American Mercury was proceeded against.

"Hatrack," however, comes in only incidentally as a portion of one episode. In the main the book is the epic of an apostate pilgrim's progress through the stultifying valley of Farmington Methodism and the final triumph of his sinfulness in the end. That they might preserve the family heritage, the church folk sought to groom young Herbert for the ministry. They did finally convert him—statistically, that is—but secretly he remained a gaudy and incorrigible sinner. When the music subsided that night of the conversion, he left the tabernacle disgusted, bought a bottle of squirrel whiskey from a Negro cart-driver, and consumed it behind the Odd Fellows' Hall.

After that he became a spiritual loss in the eyes of all Farmington:

> I existed solely to play and raise hell generally, and for some reasons best known to myself which gave the most pleasure was throwing rocks at the church or in some manner disturbing the service.

He learned to smoke cigarettes, play pinochle, "cock an appraising eye at the girls"—in fact, he became a regular cut-up! So much for at least one twice-born man.

The attacks which the writer makes upon Methodist faith and practice are no doubt justifiable. In a large measure the Methodists brought this book upon themselves. Religionists, with their assumption of cosmic importance, have been an arrogant lot and that is largely why they have come in for such a cudgeling here of late. Their quarrel should not be with the contents of the book. If they have any, it is one which literary people have too, and it has to do solely with method. The book is often petulant and colicky, written in a denunciatory manner when one of light and frolicsome satire would have been considerably more effective. It leaves the impression that Mr. Asbury has a martyr complex. Many times he falls into that error common to Methodists and atheists, the chief failing of the brethren in Farmington: that of taking religion too seriously. The literary value of the workmanship is marred by the ill humor of many passages and the animus which frequently leers through the pages. It is to be hoped that before Mr. Asbury gives us his much-needed biography of the sainted Bishop he will learn to write more impersonally and with at least periodic restraint.

CHARLES W. FERGUSON

Books in Brief

Our Mobile Earth. By Reginald Aldworth Daly. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

Richly illustrated and clearly written, this is an authoritative introduction to the earth's crust and its disturbers—earthquakes and volcanoes.

Demosthenes: De Corona and De Falsa Legatione. Translated by C. A. Vince and J. H. Vince. Plato: Laws, Vol. I. Translated by R. G. Bury. Pausanias: Description of Greece, Vol. II. Translated by W. H. S. Jones and H. A. Ormerod. Plutarch's Lives, Vol. XI. Translated by Bernadotte Perrin. Epictetus: Discourses, Vol. I. Translated by W. A. Oldfather. Loeb Classical Library. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50 each.

Five new volumes in a series which can never grow too long.

Sappho: The Poems and Fragments. Translated by C. R. Haines. $5. Quevedo: The Choice Humorous and Satirical Works. Translated by Sir Roger L'Estrange, John Stevens, and others. Revised and edited by Charles Duff. $5. The Fifteen Joys of Marriage. Ascribed to Antoine de la Sale. Translated by Richard Aldington. $3. Broadway Translations. E. P. Dutton and Company.

Three new volumes in a series which now at last seems long.

Murder for Profit. By William Bolitho. Harper and Brothers. $2.50. Murder in Fact and Fiction. By Canon J. A. R. Brookes. Brentano's. $3.50.

Of these new treatments of an endless subject the first is by a genius at reporting; the second is by a hopelessly confused and feeble moralist.

Types of Poetry. By Jacob Zeitlin and Clarissa Rinaker. The Macmillan Company. $5.

Although the arrangement of the poems collected in this large volume is unnecessarily formal, the material presented is so copious and so well chosen that students will find it valuable in an unusual degree.

W. N. P. Barbellion. By Richmond H. Hellyar. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

The need for a study of the man whose "Journal" made such a sensation seven years ago is hardly satisfied by Mr. Hellyar's book, which though sympathetic and intelligent, is distressingly slight.

The Psalms. Translated by J. M. Powis Smith. University of Chicago Press. $5.

A new version of "The Psalms" benefiting by modern scholarship was to be desired. Mr. Smith has put into his translation everything he found lacking in the King James Bible. That that was not much, or important, does not detract from the merit of his performance, which is dignified and clear.

Life and Work of the People of England. A Pictorial Record from Contemporary Sources. By Dorothy Hartley and Margaret M. Elliot. The Fifteenth Century. The Sixteenth Century. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50 each.

Two volumes in a projected series of six, covering the ground between the Norman Conquest and 1800. The illustrations are numerous and interesting; the text, while elementary, is a satisfactory accompaniment.

A Milton Handbook. By James Holly Hanford. F. S. Crofts and Company. $1.50.

Introduces the Milton student to most of the information, old as well as new, necessary to a modern understanding of the poet.

The Odes of Horace. Done into English verse by Hugh Macnaghten. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

The translator of Catullus turns to a harder task.

Beyond the Milky Way. By George Ellery Hale. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

The honorary director of the Mount Wilson Observatory continues his discussions of the newest findings in astronomy for the benefit of laymen.

Psychoanalysis for Normal People. By Geraldine Coster. Oxford University Press. Eighty-five cents.

A brief manual intended primarily for nurses—written by a thoroughgoing eclectic who endeavors more or less to harmonize the theories of all the leading psychoanalysists. It is eminently readable but notably safe, being extremely careful to go further than most of the authorities upon which it is based would go in the direction of reconciling the implications of its science with conventional morality.

Selections, Collections, and Reprints

The Letters of William James. Edited by his son, Henry James. Two volumes in one. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

Avowals. By George Moore. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

A Sentimental Journey Through France and Italy, with Selections from the Journals, Sermons, and Correspondence of Laurence Sterne. Edited with an introduction by Wilbur L. Cross. Boni and Liveright. $3.50.

A Night in the Luxembourg. By Remy de Gourmont. Preface and Appendix by Arthur Ransome. Modern Library Publishers. 95 cents.

The Road. By Jack London. With an Introduction by Glen Mullin. The Rogues' Bookshelf. Greenberg, Publisher. $2.

Collected Poems. By A. E. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

Selected Poems of Edith Thomas. Edited with a Memoir by Jessie B. Rittenhouse. Harper and Brothers. $2.

Poetry of the Nineties. With an Introductory Essay by C. E. Andrews and M. O. Percival. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

Collected Parodies. By Louis Untermeyer. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

This Singing World. For Younger Children. Modern Poems selected by Louis Untermeyer. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Grenstone Poems. A Sequence. By Witter Bynner. With an Introductory Note by Edgar Lee Masters. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Voltaire's The Age of Louis XIV. Translated by Martin P. Pollack. Everyman's Library. E. P. Dutton and Company. 80 cents.

An Autobiography of Abraham Lincoln. Consisting of the Personal Portions of his Letters, Speeches and Conversations. Compiled and annotated by Nathaniel Wright Stevenson. Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

Selected Poems. With a Preface on the Nature of Poetry. By Arthur Davison Ficke. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Old Kensington Palace and Other Papers. By Austin Dobson. Rosalba's Journal and Other Papers. By Austin Dobson. World's Classics. Oxford University Press. 80 cents each.

Drama

Things in the Saddle

"GOD LOVES US," the satiric tragedy by J. P. McEvoy with which the newly rejuvenated Actors' Theater opens its season at the Maxine Elliott, is a triumph of staging. The curtain rises upon a permanent set which consists of two platforms, situated one above the other and flanked on each side by lattice-work towers of steel, suggesting the skeleton of a skyscraper. Lights frame whatever portion of the structure is needed at any moment, and upon the two platforms the main

DORAN BOOKS

Fiction: A Distinguished List

A Novel at a New Angle
H. G. WELLS
The World of William Clissold

Irwin Edman in the N. Y. Herald Tribune: "It has the touch and sweep of magnificence. The whole range of contemporary hopes and fears, ideas and emotions, talents and perquisites, becomes epic in the life and memoirs of one intense but intelligent man." 2 Vols. Boxed. $5.00

DU BOSE HEYWARD
Angel

"Porgy" has been called one of the great books of America. From the Negro of South Carolina, Mr. Heyward turns his remarkable talent to a tense story of the mountain folk of North Carolina. Angel, a woman of the hills, strong, powerful, primitive, is an unforgettable figure. $2.00
(Autographed, Carolina Edition $3.50)

ARNOLD BENNETT
Lord Raingo

Since "The Old Wives' Tale" and "Clayhanger" Mr. Bennett has written nothing which suggests the scope and vision of this life and death of Lord Raingo, born a commoner, dying a lord. It is a theme perfectly suited to the play of his characteristic genius, and he has taken full advantage of all its possibilities. $2.00

W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM
The Casuarina Tree

The mastery of W. Somerset Maugham in painting great emotional climaxes against exotic backgrounds is at its height in these intense tales of the white men who live in Borneo and the Peninsula. As in "Rain," he has selected with uncanny insight the moments in the lives of his characters that sum up not only the drama of their lives but of all human existence. $2.00

FLOYD DELL
An Old Man's Folly

In this rich and glowing story of an amazing character, Floyd Dell proves himself a master craftsman. The story of a Mr. Windle, himself the timidest of men, thrown suddenly into a group of rebellious young people, is a finely diverting tale of vicarious but beautiful adventure. $2.00

HUGH WALPOLE
Harmer John

A great romance of man, woman and love, a novel of the Cathedral City of Polchester, the scene of Walpole's hitherto most popular book, "The Cathedral." It is at once his most finished and his most striking story, a drama of sweeping power and of finely contrasted temperaments. $2.00

CYRIL HUME
The Golden Dancer

A new novel brilliantly indicative of this young author's real genius. In it he has imprisoned the elusive spirit of romance. As astonishing as his other novels, it is more beautiful, as he broadens his manner to tell a fine, tender story of youth in quest of a dream. $2.00

George H. Doran Company

DORAN BOOKS

action takes place, while at appropriate moments the clerks, telephone operators, and the like who constitute the background stream up and down the stairs within the hollow towers.

The theme of the play is not in itself original. Its chief character is one of Mr. Babbitt's humble cousins and the story of his sorry life, in the midst of all the babble about service and loyalty incident to the successful conduct of a business devoted to greeting cards and wall mottoes, is distinctly reminiscent of various plays and novels of the last few years. But, thanks in part to the structure of the play itself and in part to the mechanics of its presentation, it takes on a new force if not a new meaning. The hero is not so much a fool as a victim—the victim of a Culture which has the force of a vast organization and the weight of incalculable material resources behind it. This Culture, and not any individual person or will, is the master of the drama of which he is a part, and only by some material thing like the skyscraper which he inhabits can it be adequately bodied forth. Imprisoned in its iron walls he can do nothing except keep step with the innumerable feet which thread its endless labyrinths. Its form incloses his body, its activities absorb his mind. Pressed on from above and below he has not the time, even if he has the capacity, to criticize the ends to which he has devoted his life, and he wanders, pathetic and abused, from futility to futility. At home a querulous wife and a rebellious son remind him how important it is to keep step; at the office there is a boss who is sure that while service is service, business is also business—and besides, has not the local minister assured him that all is well, that Saul of Tarsus himself was only a great writer of circular letters?

Comedy plays over the surface, tragedy of a particularly hopeless kind lies just beneath. Here is a life too small in itself to be significant, but become imposing and terrible as the symbol of a civilization that has lost its way. The steel girders of the building reach up to the skies; the products go out to the ends of our continent; but where all else is gigantic man is dwarfed. He is trapped by nature as all men are, turned from the ends he may propose to himself by the demands of the wife and family he has somehow acquired, but in addition he has made of his civilization not an ally but an enemy. Business has become as inexorable as fate, as oppressive and as exacting as the sternest religion, something for which he exists, not something which exists for him. It catches him in its machine, chains him to its wheel, and carries him, body and mind, round and round in the same never-ending circle. Day after day his feet climb the same stairs, day after day his thoughts circle the same petty idea; and when he drops at last he is worn without having been used—merely something sacrificed that mottoes might circulate.

Nor are those above and below him more fortunate when measured on any significant scale. Master of the works and lowest subordinate are alike unself-determined, alike victims of an idea, all part of a vast sacrifice upon the altar of commerce in the course of which even the high priest immolates himself. Things are in the saddle and ride mankind, and if it has been always thus, yet never before have things so small ridden so hard. Man has been often—always, perhaps—a victim, yielding himself up to the processes of nature as well as to his own delusion, but never have those delusions been so little grand. Church and state have each in their turn been made greater than he, but it has remained for today to discover in "the firm" an institution before which it might worthily lie prostrate. Of all the religions that have oppressed mankind, none has exacted more than the religion of commerce and none, surely, was ever so sorry.

The enthusiasm which has greeted the dramatization of "An American Tragedy" (Longacre Theater) is due in part, I think, to a sort of patriotic piety. The last two scenes—the courtroom and the prison—are extraordinarily vivid and powerful, but those which lead up to them are too brief and sketchy to achieve much effect. The adapter, Patrick Kearney, seems to have approached his task with a reverence for his source which forbids him to do more than transfer to the stage the material at hand as directly as possible, in spite of the sufficiently obvious fact that so vast a chronicle could not be made into a play without complete remolding. Where Dreiser made a single locale the center of much action (as he did the court and the prison) the play is successful; where he employed simple narrative the play, in attempting to be faithful to his method, fails. Curiously enough Laurence Irving's old dramatization of Dostoevski's "Crime and Punishment" opened almost simultaneously at the Greenwich Village Theater under the title of "The Humble," and illustrated how an effective play can be made of a novel if fidelity to the original is not demanded. As played by Mary Ellis and Basil Sydney, "The Humble" is a tense if, occasionally, somewhat old-fashioned drama, even though it is not at all the equivalent of Dostoevski's masterpiece.

Evidently something went wrong with the plans of the Messrs. Shubert for the presentation of the French lyric tragedienne, Damia; and they have at last interjected her into their revue, "A Night in Paris" (Jolson Theater). Damia has a rich voice and an impressive personality, but both her tragic pieces and her folk-songs prove somewhat bewildering to an audience which has settled into the mood of the revue. In the proper setting she might well equal the triumph of Raquel Meller.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

The Neighborhood Playhouse, 466 Grand Street, N. Y. Telephone Drydock 7516
First play of the new Repertory Season
A Satirical Comedy by Alfred Savoir
THE LION TAMER Every evening (except Monday) at 8:30. Matinee Saturday at 2:30.
SUBSCRIBE NOW TO OUR 14TH SEASON
Address Subscription Secretary, 466 Grand St., for information

Longacre Theatre, 48th St., West of Broadway. Evenings 8:30
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30
THEODORE DREISER'S
AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY
"A PLAY WHICH IS BOUND TO WRENCH A MILLION HEARTS." Journal.
DRAMATIZED BY PATRICK KEARNEY.

THEATRE GUILD PRODUCTION
WERFEL'S STIRRING DRAMA
JUAREZ AND MAXIMILIAN
with the Theatre Guild Acting Co.
GUILD Theatre, West 52d Street. Evenings, 8:30
Matinees Thursday & Saturday, 2:30

Student Workers' Contest
Closes November 1st

International Relations Section

A Plea for Free Trade

THE manifesto printed below, called A Plea for the Removal of Restrictions upon European Trade, was published in London on October 19.

We desire, as business men, to draw attention to certain grave and disquieting conditions which, in our judgment, are retarding the return to prosperity.

It is difficult to view without dismay the extent to which tariff barriers, special licences, and prohibitions since the war have been allowed to interfere with international trade and to prevent it from flowing in its natural channels. At no period in recent history has freedom from such restrictions been more needed to enable traders to adapt themselves to new and difficult conditions. And at no period have impediments to trading been more perilously multiplied without a true appreciation of the economic consequences involved.

The break-up of great political units in Europe dealt a heavy blow to international trade. Across large areas in which the inhabitants had been allowed to exchange their products freely, a number of new frontiers were erected and jealously guarded by customs barriers. Old markets disappeared. Racial animosities were permitted to divide communities whose interests were inseparably connected. The situation is not unlike that which would be created if a confederation of states were to dissolve the ties which bind them, and to proceed to penalize and hamper, instead of encouraging, each other's trade. Few will doubt that under such conditions the prosperity of such a country would rapidly decline.

To mark and defend these new frontiers in Europe, licences, tariffs, and prohibitions were imposed, with results which experience shows already to have been unfortunate for all concerned. One state lost its supplies of cheap food, another its supplies of cheap manufactures. Industries suffered for want of coal, factories for want of raw materials. Behind the customs barriers new local industries were started, with no real economic foundation, which could only be kept alive in the face of competition by raising the barriers higher still. Railway rates, dictated by political considerations, have made transit and freights difficult and costly. Prices have risen, artificial dearness has been created. Production as a whole has been diminished. Credit has contracted and currencies have depreciated. Too many states, in pursuit of false ideals of national interest, have imperiled their own welfare and lost sight of the common interests of the world, by basing their commercial relations on the economic folly which treats all trading as a form of war.

There can be no recovery in Europe till politicians in all territories, old and new, realize that trade is not war but a process of exchange, that in time of peace our neighbors are our customers, and that their prosperity is a condition of our own well-being. If we check their dealings, their power to pay their debts diminishes, and their power to purchase our goods is reduced. Restricted imports involve restricted exports, and no nation can afford to lose its export trade. Dependent as we all are upon imports and exports, and upon the processes of international exchange, we cannot view without grave concern a policy which means the impoverishment of Europe.

Happily there are signs that opinion in all countries is awaking at last to the dangers ahead. The League of Nations and the International Chamber of Commerce have been laboring to reduce to a minimum all formalities, prohibitions, and restrictions, to remove inequalities of treatment in other matters than tariffs, to facilitate the transport of passengers and goods. In some countries powerful voices are pleading for the suspension of tariffs altogether. Others have suggested the conclusion for long periods of commercial agreements embodying in every case the most-favored-nation clause. Some states have recognized in recent months the necessity of freeing trade from the restrictions which depress it. And experience is slowly teaching others that the breaking-down of the economic barriers between them may prove the surest remedy for the stagnation which exists. On the valuable political results which might flow from such a policy, from the substitution of good-will for ill-will, of cooperation for exclusiveness we will not dwell. But we wish to place on record our conviction that the establishment of economic freedom is the best hope of restoring the commerce and the credit of the world.

Signatories, with the description and business standing of each:

AUSTRIA: Oscar Berl, merchant; Dr. Otto Böhler, steel; Dr. Siegmund Brosche, chemical manufacturer; Dr. Paul Hammerschlag, Oesterreichische Credit-Anstalt für Handel und Gewerbe; Alfred Heinsheimer, managing director, Vienna Bank-Verein; Maxime Krassny-Krassien, chairman, Niederösterreichische Escompte-Gesellschaft; Dr. Arthur Krupp, Berndorfer Metallwaren-Fabrik; Julius Meinl, manufacturer; Ludwig Neurath, Oesterreichische Credit-Anstalt für Handel und Gewerbe; Dr. Redlich, ex-minister; Dr. Richard Reisch, president, Austrian National Bank; Baron Louis Rothschild, S. M. von Rothschild, Vienna; and four others.

BELGIUM: J. Carlier, Council of Industry and Commerce; Hector Carlier, vice-president, Banque d'Anvers; M. Despret, president, Banque de Bruxelles; Charles Fabri, managing director, Banque d'Outremer; E. Franqui, vice-governor, Société Générale de Belgique; F. Hautain, governor, Banque National de Belgique; J. Van Hoegaerden, director general, S. A. d'Ougrée Marihaye; J. Jadot, governor, Société Générale de Belgique; O. Lepreux, vice-governor, Banque National de Belgique; F. M. Philippson, banker; and four others.

CZECHO-SLOVAKIA: Dr. Josef Barton, president, Textile Manufacturers' Association; Dr. O. Feilchenfeld, managing director, Böhmische Eskompt Bank; Dr. Hanus Karlik, president, Central Association of Czechoslovak Sugar Industry; Dr. Bohuslav Marîk, chairman, Ceskomoravska-Koblen A. G.; Ian Novotny, general director, Pramyslova Bank; Dr. Vilem Pospišil, governor, Czechoslovak National Bank; and four others.

DENMARK: A. O. Andersen, chairman, Steamship Owners' Association; C. C. Clausen, manager, Privatbanken of Copenhagen; Emil Hertz, manager, Danske Landmansbank; Ernst Meyer, chairman of the Merchants' Guild; Etatsraad Fr. Nörgaard, general manager, Copenhagen Handelsbank; and two others.

FRANCE: R. P. Duchemin, président, Confédération Générale de la Production Française; président, Union des Industries Chimiques; Horace Finaly, directeur générale de la Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas; E. Fougère, président de l'Association Nationale d'Expansion Economique; président de la Fédération de la Soie; R. Laederich, régent de la Banque de France; président du Syndicat Générale de l'Industrie Cotonnière; M. Lewandowski, administrateur-directeur du Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris; R. Masson, directeur générale du Crédit Lyonnais; H. de Peyerimhoff, président du Comité Central des Houillères de France; and two others.

These signatories, fearing that passages in this manifesto can be variously interpreted, wish to make clear the points upon which they are agreed.

They believe that the state of instability and economic disorder with which European nations at present are contending has its origin in the consequences of the war, and, in particular, in the monetary crises which resulted from it. They believe that, in order to avoid making worse a disturbing situation, first of all the countries where money is not yet stabilized should move toward a sound currency as rapidly as possible. These countries could do this all the more easily if the economic relations between peoples could be reestablished on a basis favoring normal commercial exchange.

They think, in this respect, that the high rates or the excessive rigidity of certain tariff systems, the direct or indirect extremes of protectionism, of discrimination, or of preference, and the obstacles put in the way of international transactions by unfair transport regulations should be condemned.

They declare themselves, as a consequence, in favor of all measures which would tend to suppress such artificial barriers, which are opposed to the complete return to the economic relations between nations that existed before the war.

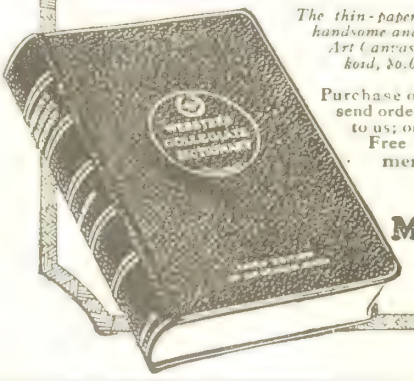
They are not able to forget that it is impossible for any modern state to live and prosper without maintaining commercial agreements with other states, and that as a result of the intimate interdependence of peoples, it is only by a mutual exchange of credit services and of merchandise that world economic equilibrium can finally be brought about.

GERMANY: Geh. Kommerzienrat Dr. Bosch, chairman, Chemical Trust; Geheimrat Felix Deutsch, chairman, General Electric, Berlin; Dr. Carl Melchior, M. M. Warburg & Co., Hamburg; Franz von Mendelssohn, banker, Berlin; Dr. Schacht, president, German Reichsbank; Karl Friedrich von Siemens, chairman, Siemens Bros., Berlin; Franz Urbig, Disconto Gesellschaft, Berlin; Generaldirektor Vögler, Steel Trust, Dortmund; F. H. Witthoefft, senior partner, Arnold Otto Meyer, India merchants.

GREAT BRITAIN: Sir Arthur Balfour, Arthur Balfour & Co., Ltd.; Henry Bell, director Lloyds Bank, Ltd.; Sir Hugh Bell, Bart., ironmaster; Lord Bradbury, director Williams Deacons Bank, Ltd.; William Carnegie, general manager, National Bank of Scotland, Ltd.; W. H. Coats, chairman, J. & P. Coats, Ltd.; Sir John Cowan, chairman, Redpath, Brown & Co., Ltd.; Laurence Currie, Glyn, Mills & Co.; F. C. Goodenough, chairman, Barclays Bank, Ltd.; Norman L. Hird, general manager and director, Union Bank of Scotland, Ltd.; Robert M. Holland-Martin, C. B., chairman, Bank of Liverpool and Martin's, Ltd.; Lord Inchcape, chairman, Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., Ltd.; Lord Invernairn, chairman, W. Beardmore & Co., Ltd., Glasgow; Walter Leaf, D. Litt., chairman, Westminster Bank, Ltd.; Kenneth Lee, LL.D., chairman, Tootal, Broadhurst, Lee & Co., Ltd.; Sir Frederick Lewis, chairman, Furness, Withy & Co., Ltd.; Lord Maclay of Glasgow, shipowner; Andrew McCosh, chairman, William Baird & Co., Ltd.; Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, chairman, Midland Bank, Ltd.; Sir Adam Nimmo, chairman of the Scottish Coal Owners' Association; Right Hon. Montagu Collet Norman, governor, Bank of England; Right Hon. Viscount Novar, K. T., P. C., D. S. O., director, Union Bank of Scotland, Ltd.; A. A. Paton, chairman, Liverpool Cotton Association; J. W. Beaumont Pease, chairman, Lloyds Bank, Ltd.; Eustace R. Pulbrook, chairman of Lloyds; Lord Revelstoke, Baring Bros. & Co., Ltd.; Alexander Robb, general manager, Commercial Bank of Scotland, Ltd.; Lionel N. De Rothschild, N. M. Rothschild & Sons; Sir Felix Schuster, Bart., director, National Provincial Bank, Ltd.; George J. Scott, treasurer and general manager, Bank of Scotland; Sir Josiah Stamp, president, Executive of the London, Midland and Scottish Railway; Sir D M. Stevenson, Bart., ex-chairman, British Coal Exporters' Federation; Rees Griffith Thomas, general manager, British Linen Bank; Douglas Vickers, chairman, Vickers, Ltd.; Lord Weir,

A Short Cut to Accurate Information

—a companion for your hours of reading and study that will quickly make itself indispensable for its wealth of ready information on just the questions which most often puzzle you. You will save time and insure accuracy when you have at hand



WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY

The Best Abridged Dictionary

It is Based upon Webster's New International

106,000 entries from which to get exact definitions, spellings, pronunciation, and use of words; a dictionary of biography to identify characters of history or literature; a Gazetteer department to give salient facts about points of geography; a guide to rules of punctuation, use of capitals, abbreviations, etc.; a dictionary of foreign phrases with pronunciation and translations; and many other features of practical value. It is a splendid book of 1256 pages with 1700 illustrations.

New Words—including the latest accepted vocabulary terms and important additions to the biographical and Gazetteer departments such entries as camouflage, kinetophone, Latvia, Vimy, Hughes, Lenin.

The thin-paper edition is especially handsome and convenient to handle. Art Canvas binding, $5.00; Fabrikoid, $6.00; Leather, $7.50.

Purchase of your bookseller; or send order and remittance direct to us; or write for information. Free specimen pages if you mention The Nation.

G. & C. Merriam Co.

Springfield Mass.

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE

Twenty-ninth Season opens Sunday, November 7th at 8 o'clock

IN THE GREAT HALL OF COOPER UNION

Astor Place and 8th Street

WITH A CONCERT BY THE AMERICAN ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN—What is the Matter with Modern Ideas?
A Course for Successive Friday Evenings.
First Lecture, November 12th, "The Loss of Intellectual Leadership in the Modern World."

FLOYD H. ALLPORT—"Personality and its Social Relationships," Tuesday, November 9th.

BRUCE BLIVEN—"Debunking Our Politics," Sunday, November 14th.

Lectures with open forum discussion every Sunday and Tuesday evening from November to May

ADMISSION FREE

THE SCHOOL OF THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE

In the small auditorium of
THE MANHATTAN TRADE SCHOOL, Lexington Ave. and 22nd St.

MARK VAN DOREN—Literary Critics of Our Civilization. Seven Lectures. Monday Evenings. $1.50

IRWIN EDMAN—Varieties of Metaphysical Experience. Five Lectures. Wednesday Evenings. $1.50

E. G. SPAULDING—Outlines of Philosophy. Ten Lectures. Thursday Evenings. $2.00

C. KINGSLEY NOBLE—Evolution: Facts and Theories. Ten Lectures. Saturday Evenings. $2.00

SCHOOL OPENS NOVEMBER 8TH

Season Tuition - - $15.00
Single Lecture - - .25

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE, 70 Fifth Ave. - Watkins 7945

Weir & Co., Glasgow; Sir Glynn H. West, chairman, Rylands Bros., Ltd.; William Whitelaw, chairman, London and North Eastern Railway; Col. F. Vernon Willey, Francis Willey & Co., Ltd., Bradford; Sir Percy Woodhouse, president, Manchester Chamber of Commerce; Sir Alexander Kemp Wright, K. B. E., general manager, Royal Bank of Scotland; D. Young, Clydesdale Bank, Ltd.

HOLLAND: Dr. C. J. K. Van Aalst, president, Nederlandsche Handel Maatschappy; S. P. Van Eeghen, merchant banker, Amsterdam; F. H. Fentener Van Vlissingen, manufacturer, Utrecht; E. Heldring, president, Chamber of Commerce, Amsterdam; Dr. A. J. Van Hengel, director, Rotterdamsche Bankvereeniging, Amsterdam; Dr. P. Hofstede De Groot, managing director, Amsterdamsche Bank; Paul May, Lippmann, Rosenthal & Co., bankers; Dr. W. A. Mees, R. Mees & Zoonen, bankers, Rotterdam; A. F. Philips, managing director, "Philips Gloeilampenfabrieken," Eindhoven; and seven others.

HUNGARY: Anthony Eber, manager, Hungarian Italian Bank; Charles De Erney, manager, First National Savings Bank; Henry Fellner, chairman First Hungarian Steam Milling Co. of Budapest; Exc. Gustavus Gratz, ex-minister of foreign affairs; Count John Hadik, ex-minister of the crown; Baron John Harkanyi, ex-minister of commerce; Baron Maurice Kornfeld, director, National Bank of Hungary; Baron Paul Kornfeld, director, Hungarian General Credit Bank; Baron Marcel Madarrassy-Beck, president, Hungarian Discount and Exchange Bank; Emil Mutschenbacker, managing director, Hungarian Agricultural Union; Count Ladislas Somssich, president, Agricultural Union; Exc. John Telesky, ex-minister of finance.

ITALY: G. Agnelli, president, "Fiat" Co.; Antonio Benni, president, General Fascist Confederation of Italian Industries; Biagio Borriello, vice-president, Union of Chambers of Commerce; Ettore Conti, senator and industrialist; Riccardo Gualino, president, "Snia Viscosa"; Felice Guarneri, director general, Association of Italian Corporations; Gino Olivetti, chief secretary general, Fascist Confederation of Italian Industries; Nicola Pavoncelli, president, Board of the Bank of Italy; Alberto Pirelli, president, Association of Italian Corporations; L. Toeplitz, administrator, Banca Commerciale Italiana.

These signatories, while signifying their agreement with the spirit which has dictated the above manifesto, wish to place on record that had it been possible for them to cooperate in the framing of the document, they would have preferred to give a different and more precise form to some of its passages. Above all, they would have liked that criticism should have been exercised not only as regards the excessive height of customs tariffs and the rigidity of customs regulations in force in some countries but also in respect of all the numerous forms of direct or indirect protection, discriminations or preferences, artificial subsidies, and restrictions on emigration. With such reservations they willingly subscribe to the manifesto.

NORWAY: Caesar Bang, president, Federation Norwegian Industries; E. G. Borch, president, Royal Agricultural Society; Sir Thomas Fearnley, shipowner; Kamstrup Hegge, managing director, Nan Norske Creditbank and president of Association of Norwegian Private Banks; Hieronymus Heyerdahl, chairman, Christiania Bank of Kreditkasse; A. F. Klaveness, shipowner; N. Rygg, president, Bank of Norway; H. Westfal-Larsen, president, Norwegian Shipowners; Wilh. Wilhelmsen, shipowner.

POLAND: Dr. Henry Aschkenovi, manager, Banque d'Escompte de Varsovie; Stanilaw Karpinski, president, Banku, Polskiego; Exc. Marjan Szydlowski, representative, Association of Mining Industries of Upper Silesia; A. De Wieniawski, vice-president, Banque de Commerce.

IS IT GOD'S WORD?

AN EXPOSITION OF THE FABLES AND MYTHOLOGY OF THE BIBLE AND THE IMPOSTURES OF THEOLOGY

By Joseph Wheless

Associate Editor, American Bar Association Journal

CLARENCE DARROW

says:

"The book shows a remarkable amount of merit, a fine analytical ability, a good sense of humor and is altogether far ahead of any other book on the question that I have ever read."

$5.00 at all bookstores

Alfred A. Knopf, 730 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

BORZOI BOOKS

NEW SHAW PLAYS

TRANSLATIONS

and

TOMFOOLERIES

By BERNARD SHAW

Mr. Shaw, after addressing the world at large on the occasion of his seventieth birthday, with a Jovian gesture, presents to America this volume of

Six Plays and One Translation

All with his inimitable introductions

AT ALL BOOKSTORES $2.25

BRENTANO'S

Publishers New York

RUMANIA: Maurice Blank, vice-president, Banque Marmoresch, Blank & Co., Bucharest.

SWEDEN: Gannar Dillner, manager, Trafikaktiebolaget Grängesberg-Oxelösund, Stockholm; J. S. Edström, managing director, Almänna Svenska Elektriska Aktiebolaget, Stockholm; Gust Ekman, general manager, Aktiebolaget Goteborgs Bank; Ivar Kreuger, managing director, Svenska Tandstićksaktiebolaget, Stockholm; Victer Moll, governor, Bank of Sweden; O. Rydbeck, general manager, Skandinaviska Kreditaktiebolaget; Helmér Sten, general manager, Aktiebolaget Svenska Handelsbanken; K. A. Wallenberg, chairman, Stockholms Enskilda Bank; Marc Wallenberg, chairman, Swedish Bank Association.

SWITZERLAND: G. Bachmann, president, Banque National Suisse; F. Dominice, Adm., Union Financière de Génève; Leopold Dubois, chairman, Société de Banque Suisse; Albert Lombard, vice-president, Swiss Association of Bankers; Rudolf Sarasin, president, Chamber of Commerce, Basle; Carl Sulzer Schmid, president, Gebrüder Sulzer Aktiengesellschaft, Winterthur.

UNITED STATES: Gates W. McGarrah, banker, New York; J. J. Mitchell, president, Illinois Merchants' Trust Co., Chicago; J. P. Morgan, Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co., New York; Thos. N. Perkins, delegation of the Citizens of the U. S. A., member of the Reparation Commission; Melvin A. Traylor, president, First National Bank, Chicago; Albert H. Wiggin, president, Chase National Bank, New York.

Contributors to This Issue

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD spent the summer observing conditions in Germany, England, and France.

CHAPIN COLLINS, a graduate of the University of Seattle, is the editor of the Elma (Washington) Chronicle.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG is a student of the labor movement.

HOLLACE RANSDELL, formerly with the Baltimore Sun, is doing publicity for the Passaic strikers.

TANSY MCNAB is the pseudonymn of a Washington newspaper correspondent.

GEORGE STERLING is a well-known poet of California and the author of "Robinson Jeffers."

ROBERT H. LOWIE, professor of anthropology at the University of California, is the author of "Primitive Society" and other books.

CARL VAN DOREN'S latest book is "The Ninth Wave."

MARY ROSS is associate editor of The Survey.

DANIEL GREGORY MASON is a composer and professor of music at Columbia University.

LAURA BENÉT is the author of "Fairy Bread."

CHARLES W. FERGUSON, the son of a Methodist minister, has contributed articles to the American Mercury and other magazines.

INSTINCT IN THE CELL AND ORGANISM

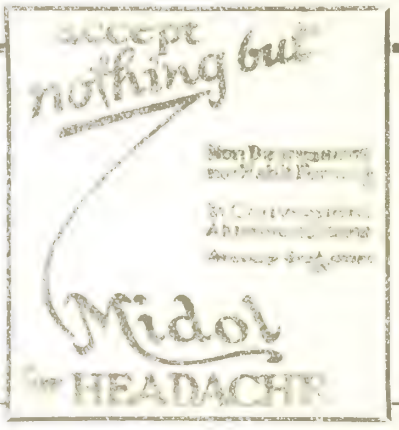
THIS volume of NEANDER P. COOK is a survey of the instinctive [illegible] that drive the living world [illegible] the scientific investigator, [illegible] page of it. $5.00 postpaid. THE WEIMAR PRESS, Alhambra, Calif.

Your Fall Problems

If you want to rent a house or an apartment or if you have one to rent—or sell, advertise in the classified section of The Nation, read by honest landlords and desirable tenants. Rates on application. Special three-time rate. Dept. F. P., The Nation.

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of graduate study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

For further information, address the Director,



THE TRAINING SCHOOL
for
JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
(Affiliated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service)
310 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

A new and entertaining biography by the author of "La Belle Stuart," etc.

The Vagabond Duchess
By Cyril Hughes Hartman

A fascinating account of Hortense Mancini, Duchesse Mazarin, and the men and manners of one of the most brilliant periods in history. Louis XIV, Cardinal Mazarin, Charles II, the Duchess of Portsmouth, and Nell Gwyn are some of the interesting figures in the story. Price $5.00

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

GENERAL DRUG CO., 94 N. Moore Street, New York

IDEALISTS, THINKERS, TRUTH SEEKERS:—
[illegible] is yours FREE for the asking. Elements of Honest Law and Natural Justice.
Lever 700 N. 43rd Street Philadelphia, Pa.

CHILD STUDY GROUPS
for
Fathers and Mothers of Young Children
Fathers and Mothers of Adolescent Boys and Girls
Grandmothers, guardians, teachers, social workers, camp directors, etc.
Whatever your interest and needs, you will find this group work healthful and stimulating.
WRITE FOR INFORMATION TO
CHILD STUDY ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA, INC.
54 WEST 74TH STREET NEW YORK CITY

To advertisers, please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1926 No. 3201

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS ... 475

EDITORIALS:
The Supreme Court as Revolutionary ... 476
Restlessness or Recreation ... 477
The Sea Devil Arrives ... 478
Marie's Romania ... 479

NINE YEARS OF BOLSHEVISM. By Louis Fischer ... 481

NOAH. By Jake Falstaff ... 479

COMMUNISM COMES TO THE VILLAGE. By Vera Danchakoff ... 484

SOCHI DREAMS. By Maryan Tyler ... 487

THOMAS MOTT OSBORNE. By Winthrop D. Lane ... 488

BARBARISM TO CONVICTS. By Burt M. McConnell ... 489

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter ... 489

CORRESPONDENCE ... 491

BOOKS AND PLAYS:
Dagger. By Lhermontov. Translated by Max Eastman ... 492
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren ... 492
Lovely Again. By Sidney B. Fay ... 483
The Modest Method of Willa Cather. By Joseph Wood Krutch ... 494
Selling Dinosaurs. By Lewis S. Gannett ... 494
"Angel." By Lenore G. Marshall ... 495
Historical Portraiture. By Clarence Walworth Alvord ... 496
Pa's Rule. By Grace Frank ... 496
Social Bibliography. By Emery Neff ... 496
Books in Brief ... 497
The Nation's Poetry Prize ... 497
Drama: Something New in Theaters. By Joseph Wood Krutch ... 498

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Soviet Industry. By Harold Kellock ... 499
Japan in Manchuria ... 499
The USSR and the Chinese Eastern Railway ... 499
Increase of Wages in the USSR ... 499

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor
MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: No. 38 South Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London W. C. 1, England.

IT IS NOW NINE YEARS since a little group of men and women of virtually no administrative experience, economists and dreamers, the major part of whose lives had been spent in Siberian prisons or in exile, forcibly took over the power in the Russian state. Russia was then a chaos of political factions, a frantic, starving, disease-swept debating society, into the heart of which the Kaiser was steadily pushing his legions. In this situation the Bolsheviks, numerically the smallest of the political groups, agreed on a course. In effect they said to the debaters: "We have decided to take the helm and steer steadily thus. Our direction may possibly be wrong, but at least we shall no longer be drifting. Any of you gentlemen who disagrees with us will have to be chucked overboard." Thus the debating ended. The men at the wheel were, at least, realists—ruthless, dogmatic, welded together with a common purpose and a self-imposed Spartan discipline which they have been ready to enforce despite its cruel toll. There followed four years of civil strife, invasion, blockade, with a steady acceleration of starvation and disease. Various Czarist adventurers—Wrangel, Denikin, et al.—looked like good investments to foreign imperialists interested in acquiring Russian oil, manganese, iron, and timber for the price of supplying the warriors with munitions, cash, and champagne. But the Russian peasant, weary as he was of exchanging bayonet-thrusts with German workingmen, had brought his rifle home with him, and was quite willing to fight for his newly won farm against the Czarist landlords. So Kolchak was crushed, and Denikin was chased into the Black Sea, and by 1920 Lenin and his colleagues found themselves masters of the ruins of what remained of the former Russian Empire.

THE BOLSHEVIKI are still masters of Russia; and a study of their policies and of Russia's progress as recorded in The Nation's annual special issues reveals an amazing process of successful adaptation and material advancement during the last six years. In the course of our editorial remarks on Soviet production a year ago the following statement appears: "Agriculture and industry have each risen 71 per cent of pre-war figures; next year they are estimated at 89 and 91 per cent, respectively." It is always interesting to compare estimates with actual results. The figures reported in other pages of this issue indicate that the year's production exceeded these official prognostications in both fields. Russia's grain harvest this year was 93 per cent of the pre-war amount; her industrial production rose to 95 per cent. This material improvement has not been accomplished without heavy cost, both political and economic. Some of the cost is described in Mr. Fischer's article, which exposes the roots of Russia's recent political crisis and the serious effects of her credit famine. Russia has come up to her present level of productivity with none of the financial sustenance that has kept the rest of Europe afloat. But she wants credits in order to stabilize her internal life and keep industry moving. Economically speaking, Russia deserves financial backing; her sins are political. To get adequate credits requires in the long run the recognition of the United States. Meanwhile the Coolidge Administration continues to base its policy on the pompous, ignorant moralizings of the State Department and the vindictive anger of Mr. Hoover. It is to be hoped that before too long it will heed the changed tone of bankers and business men and read with attention the special editions of Wall Street newspapers devoted to impressive expositions of Russian progress.

CHINA'S CIVIL WAR has stopped for breath. The Canton armies have swarmed over nearly half of China, and the next step may well be negotiation rather than new battles. The gallant little army from the South has suffered heavy losses and needs time to organize civil administration in its rear. Its first attempt to take Shanghai—by the Russian method of stirring up revolt within the enemy's ranks—has failed; but no one who knows the Chinese Nationalists believes that the first attempt will be the last. Meanwhile, of course, Canton's enemies, however much they may have fought each other in the past, are patching up a skin-saving peace with each other. Sun Chuan-fong, master of Shanghai, may swear blood brotherhood with Chang Tso-lin, the war-lord of the North, but he is unlikely to renounce his ambition to rule his native province of Shantung, held now by one of Chang's henchmen. These ambitious personalities cannot in the long run prevail against the cohesive force of Nationalist principles. The next step may well be the reemergence of Feng Yu-hsiang, the "Christian General" of the North, as an ally of Canton. He has just returned from Moscow, where they teach nationalism and internationalism with equal zeal.

ANOTHER BLOW has befallen the British Liberals. Commander J. M. Kenworthy, one of the most gallant fighters in the war and an equally gallant combatant in Parliament for the rights of small nationalities and oppressed peoples everywhere, has announced his withdrawal from the Liberals and is joining the Labor Party. Here is an important accession, for he is a pugnacious fighter who asks innumerable annoying questions of the front bench and does not hesitate to say what he thinks of governmental adventures in imperialism. He has accompanied his resignation with an appeal to Lloyd George to follow him into the other tent. This will, of course, be in vain, although that pirate captain now commands a mere handful of followers who are not even united in their devotion to him—some of them hate him. We are well aware that prominent English publicists believe that the day is not far distant when there will be a revival of Liberalism, thinking as they do that the British middle class stands at least for Liberalism. Unfortunately for them, the determinant economic power of the middle class has passed from it. The revival may come, but it is not in sight today, and neither is a personality able to lead the parliamentary representatives of Liberalism out of their present slough. In this, however, the plight of the Liberals is little worse than that of the other parties and of the trade unions.

MEANWHILE, THE BRITISH COAL STRIKE has reached its unhappy end. Thanks to Mr. Baldwin and his Government, it is a victory for the mine-owners which is in sight, a victory so complete that it should satisfy the most vindictive of the coal barons. Yet it is a Pyrrhic victory, for the miners will go back to work with bitterness and justified anger in their hearts, accepting lower wages and longer hours—it is the first time in the history of the British labor movement that hours of work have been lengthened. Yet that the lengthening will not increase measurably the total output of the coal mines is the belief of all who have studied the situation. At the close of a gallant fight which has lasted six months, where the most optimistic thought it could endure only four, the trade unions are rent asunder, bankrupt, at loggerheads with one another. It is a tempting opportunity for the worst of the Conservative bitter-enders to attack the entire trade-union movement. If they do, it should mean a Labor Government within two years.

THE RESIGNATION OF HENRY N. BRAILSFORD as editor of the New Leader is a grave loss to British journalism and to the labor movement, for Mr. Brailsford possesses honesty, courage, an analytical mind, and is never without constructive suggestions. Under his guidance the New Leader has achieved a large circulation, but it has apparently not been large enough to suit the directors, who, according to reports, are credited with the desire to popularize it and cheapen it. Mr. Brailsford has been singularly free from that imperialistic bias which is too often the besetting sin of British journalists. He has clearly visioned the Russian situation and he has incessantly appealed for the ending of all bickerings and dissensions in the European and British labor movements. A controversy with J. Ramsay MacDonald, when he was Prime Minister, made many of the friends of both men unhappy during the brief life of the Labor Government. But no one questions Mr. Brailsford's motives or his belief that in criticizing Mr. MacDonald as he did he was serving the cause to the best of his ability. There are so few of his type remaining in journalism that his retirement is a calamity.

"ADVERTISING," President Coolidge told the Advertising Association in convention assembled, "ministers to the spiritual side of trade." Further, it is a great educator, and a driving force in the elimination of economic waste. Further, it is "the most potent influence in adapting and changing the habits and modes of life, affecting what we eat, what we wear, and the work and play of a whole nation." We agree with the latter pronouncement, and only wish it were not so true. One hundred and fifteen million Robots walking the chalkline of the national advertiser; walking a mile for the skin you love to touch; four out of five asking the man who owns one; with a little fairy in the home, and happiness in every box, listening to the master's voice. . . . With the first pronouncement we would also agree if the word "spiritual" could be changed to "mystical." The goods we consumers buy advance upon us from behind a great smoke-screen of advertising, brewed by astute psychologists in vast retorts where shame, envy, fear, pride, love, and every other human emotion are skilfully blended to "break down sales resistance," stimulate wants, create new facts, and force us to buy, buy, buy, until it hurts, hurts, hurts! Of the value, the utility, the relative cost of the goods themselves we learn nothing whatever from advertising.

THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT when it buys soap and ink and textiles pays no attention to pretty girls on the backs of magazines nor yet to supersalesmen with pants like the Prince of Wales's. It pays attention to instructions from the Bureau of Standards, where skilled chemists, physicists, and laboratory experts are busily engaged in debunking advertising and getting at fundamental values. This debunking process saves the Government $100,000,000 every year. Could consumers at large avail themselves of such a service the savings would run into the billions, the bulk of competitive advertising would evaporate like a pricked balloon, and the sodden lockstep in which we move would be snapped and broken. If advertising flour, tooth paste, crackers, hats, perfumes, handkerchiefs educates, so does the Rev. William Sunday; and if it makes for the elimination of waste, so does a superdreadnaught. If President Coolidge had really thought before he read the paper which some bright go-getter probably handed to him he would have realized that most advertising creates the waste which all his New England blood abhors, and that its great virtue lies in the escape it provides for Henry Dubb and his wife into a dream world of shining teeth, creamy complexions, culture by the yard, success in the snappy lessons, perfect-fitting union suits, regularized digestive apparatus, and—at the last—marble mausoleums where "you, too, may have consolation in Cypress Hills Abbey."

NOTE ON NEWSPAPERS: Ogden Mills, Republican candidate for Governor of the State of New York, waged his campaign on the issue that New York City's milk supply was bad and that Tammany officials were responsible. He cited, somewhat vaguely, analyses of city milk samples made for him by a chemist. Finally, in the last weeks of the campaign, the chemist was discovered. He made a full statement that:

> No harmful or injurious matter was disclosed by these analyses. . . . With only three exceptions the milk examined was equal to or well above the minimum standard of the sanitary code with respect to the fat content, which is the most important single factor in milk. . . . In my opinion the milk supply of the City of New York is of as high if not higher quality than that of any large city in the United States.

It was a cave-in of Ogden Mills's charges. The milk issue collapsed like a punctured balloon. And how did the Republican papers treat it? The Sun featured it as important news; the Herald Tribune put it at the bottom of an inside page, under the headline of another story; Mr. Hearst's American, which had passionately supported Mills, simply omitted mention of the chemist's story. There are newspapers, party papers, and personal papers.

FREQUENT ROWS in the past between Comptroller General McCarl and the Coolidge Administration give an immediate practical interest to the Supreme Court's decision upon which we comment on a later page. Mr. Coolidge now has the power to remove this troublesome appropriation-slasher, whose independent tenure of office Congress sought to safeguard. Virtually every constitutional system in the world has provided, in order to insure legality and prevent corruption, that the audit of accounts should not be under the control of the Executive. Our American Congress, in the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921, created a Comptroller General, appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate for a term of fifteen years, removable only by joint resolution of Congress for incapacity, inefficiency, or neglect of duty. The Supreme Court has ruled this unconstitutional; the President may now remove at will. But Chief Justice Taft's opinion suggests a loophole when it says

> The remedy for the evil of political executive removals of inferior officers is with Congress by a simple expedient, but it includes a change of the power of appointment from the President with the consent of the Senate. Congress must determine first if the office is inferior, and second that it is willing that the office shall be filled by the appointment of some other authority than the President with the consent of the Senate.

The Comptroller General, therefore, could be made appointable by the Secretary of the Treasury, in which case he could be made irremovable until his term expired. He might be a tool of the Executive, for there would be no Senatorial confirmation, but when the Administration changed the tool might serve Congress instead of the Cabinet. It may be that Congress will decide that the chance is not worth taking, but it is the only one permitted by ex-President Taft's revolutionary decision.

AUGUST HECKSCHER has given additional proof that his head as well as his heart is behind his $1,500,000,000 project to clean up the slums of New York. At a recent meeting presided over by Mayor Walker he admitted that his first proposal to secure 500 millionaires to contribute $100,000 each for five years smacked too much of private philanthropy, and proceeded to amend the plan, as follows: The city—possibly with help from the State—shall finance the entire project. One-half the needed sum shall be borrowed from insurance companies and private individuals. Philanthropists of course can subscribe to the loan, but it will be a straight investment, duly secured, not in any sense a charity. The other half will be provided by the municipality, which shall proceed to condemn wide areas of slum property subject to gradual and successive improvement, involving a comprehensive scheme of city planning, with wider streets, radiating avenues, more light, sunshine, playgrounds, and parks. It will be municipal landlording on a grand scale, but on a sound financial basis without an atom of charity in it. It moves closer to reality than the original proposal, and deserves careful and sympathetic consideration.

THE LYNCHING TREE never bore more hideous fruit than has come to us from Bristol, Tennessee, by way of the Chicago Defender. If a news dispatch in that paper is to be believed—the story is almost too atrocious for belief—a fourteen-year-old white girl a fortnight ago shot and then kicked to death a colored boy nine years old. The girl is now in prison; her mind is said to have been affected by lynchings of which she had heard, or perhaps in which persons known to her had participated. Hers was no mob spirit; she was quite unaided, and, as far as is known, quite unprovoked. The lynchers never meant such work to be carried on by children. But they took part in lawless and violent murders themselves, they shielded each other from the feeble attempts of the authorities to punish them, they tossed off a lynching as easily as if it had been a barbecue, and every day an impressionable child might see ill-treatment of one race by another, injustice in the courts, Jim Crow on the streets, segregation, contempt, fraud against persons and against property. And this is the result.

THE FAME OF HARRY HOUDINI (Eric Weiss), dead in Detroit, can be measured by the fact that for years, both in America and elsewhere, his name has been synonymous with "magic" and "magician." He was invoked in many a story whose theme was manual cleverness; it was the custom to say of difficult situations that "only Houdini" could extricate himself from them. He was the representative magician of our day, and a marvelous showman. But the interesting thing is that he once more proves the capacity of the best man in a profession to be more than a mere member of that profession. Houdini was so good at his game that he could afford to have fun with it, and to use its technique for other ends. Perhaps he will be longest remembered for his exposure of spiritualist mediums through demonstrations that they were only fair magicians. Watching them, he could see through their tricks and reproduce these himself. The mediums have been called our modern witches—analogues of those disturbers of the peace who turned Salem, and many a European village, upside down in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. If this be just, we can but wish that Cotton Mather had had his Houdini too. There would have been no hanging then, and there would have been some laughter. But Houdinis, it seems, do not come to every generation.

The Supreme Court as Revolutionary

SELDOM does a dissenting Supreme Court justice characterize the opinion of the majority of his colleagues as "revolutionary." It is the more remarkable when a conservative like Justice McReynolds is moved to such expression. The recent decision of the federal Supreme Court will not quell dissenting voices, yet it settles American practice in this: henceforth, unless the Constitution is amended, the President may, alone, Congress to the contrary notwithstanding, arbitrarily remove any of the men whom, by and with the consent of the Senate, he has appointed to office.

This question of the President's power of removal is an old one. It divided the first Congress and inspired some of the greatest constitutional arguments in our history. The Constitution provides that the President > Shall nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments. The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

No mention is made of the power of removal. The first Congress was called upon to interpret this section when a bill was introduced for the establishment of a department of foreign affairs, providing that the head of the department should be removable by the President. The debate ended in the House approving by a small majority the interpretation vesting the power of removal in the President alone. It was necessary for John Adams, as Vice-President of the Senate, to cast the deciding vote in that House. Madison, a strong supporter of the President's power, discounted the idea of any abuse of it on the ground that removal without cause would subject a President to impeachment, and undoubtedly this view influenced the final interpretation given by Congress. Certainly there was no contemplation then of the "spoils system" under which Andrew Jackson removed some 2,000 officials.

The question was revived in 1867 during the famous reconstruction fight between President Johnson and Congress. At that time a statute was passed providing that removals, to be valid, needed consent of the Senate, and that during recess the President might suspend only for good cause, a report of such suspension to be made to the Senate within twenty days after the beginning of a new session. President Grant complained of the statute, but no dispute arose under it until the Cleveland Administration, when the President refused to report on suspensions to the Senate, and Congress thereupon refused confirmation of his appointees. The Senate finally capitulated. At the next session the requirement that reports of suspensions be given was repealed. On several occasions the question has been presented to the Supreme Court, but that body hitherto has managed to avoid it, though voicing an occasional dictum to the effect that the power of removal was exclusively in the President. The portion of the 1867 statute which is relevant to the recent decision of the Supreme Court provides that > Postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be appointed and may be removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold their offices for four years unless sooner removed or suspended according to law. . . .

Frank S. Myers, postmaster at Portland, Oregon, was removed by President Wilson in 1920, no reason being assigned for his removal. Myers protested and finally brought suit for back pay, alleging that the President was without power to remove him in the absence of the consent of the Senate. The issue was fought through to the Supreme Court, which has just held the statute unconstitutional in so far as it attempted to restrict the President's power of removal. Chief Justice Taft, reading the majority opinion, argues that the executive power is in the President alone unless specifically confined by the Constitution; that removal is an exercise of executive power unhampered by any specific clause of the Constitution and may therefore be exercised by him alone. Further, the requirement that the President enforce the laws necessarily implies his unrestricted power of removal. Justice McReynolds, dissenting, argues that since Congress has power to prescribe duties, qualifications, and term, the real question is whether or not the otherwise plenary power of Congress in dealing with postmasters is remitted when they are appointed by the President in concurrence with the Senate. Finding no such remission, he decides that Congress acted within its powers in passing the act. Justice Brandeis holds that the majority opinion overrules the famous case of Marbury vs. Madison.

The position of the majority judges is curious. They admit that Congress may take from the President the power of appointing inferior officers and, by vesting it in the head of some other department, restrict removals as it will, yet they hold that the moment Congress transfers that appointing power to the President it is deprived of this restrictive power. The decision is, as usual, political rather than legal. The settled habit of the court is so to interpret the Constitution as to prevent legislation which seems to disturb intrenched interests. The power of patronage in the President has been so long established and is such a powerful political weapon that to deny him the full benefits of it would cause a vast upheaval in political circles and make it possible seriously to hamper the Executive. The majority of the Supreme Court recoiled from such a decision.

Justice Story once assured us that "it will be a consolation to those who love the Union, and honor a devotion to the patriotic discharge of duty, that in regard to inferior offices the remedy for any permanent abuse is still within the power of Congress, by the simple expedient of requiring the consent of the Senate to removals in such cases." These are now empty words. Despite the dictum of Chief Justice Taft that there may be quasi-judicial offices free from executive control until a decision is reached in any given case involving third parties, the fact remains that any such officer rendering a decision contrary to the policy of the President may be removed immediately thereafter. The decision makes it impossible for Congress to give any determined tenure to these officials, and the fear of removal will henceforth operate to bow hitherto independent officials to the will of the President or of his party speaking through him. The attempts of Congress to set up non-political expert commissions are nullified. An arbitrary Executive has free play for his prejudices.

This may be the law and the Constitution—although when the conservative Justice McReynolds, the liberal Justice Brandeis, and the Olympian Justice Holmes unite in dissent laymen may be permitted their doubts. But it is certainly a menace to free government. If a constitutional amendment is necessary to give independence and a fixed tenure to public officials, let us have it.

Restlessness or Recreation

EIGHT hours to work; eight hours to sleep; and the great question that haunts—or should haunt—our modern civilization is what shall be done with the eight hours that remain? Fifty years ago the idea of a forty-hour working week would have been greeted with scorn and derision by employer and employees alike. Today the five-day week is widely discussed, and is in practice in more than one industry.

Children now spend some six hours of their day in school. From nine until approximately three they sit—the great majority of them—in enforced silence, as nearly without squirming as nature permits, soaking up scattered bits of information that often enough seem to them to be incoherent and meaningless. At three o'clock they begin to live; the stored-up energy of the whole day bursts forth like a charge of dynamite. They dash down the school steps, fling their books inside their own doors, and are ready for play. And what kind of play shall it be?

The Playground and Recreation Association of America at its recent congress discussed how the newly acquired leisure of adults, how the child's hours out of the schoolroom will be spent. There are the movies, the radio, the automobile, the dance-hall; there are the street gang, the ball game in the shadow of towering buildings and pounding motor trucks, the more or less harmless tricks played on neighbors and tradespeople, actual though not particularly malicious destruction of property—window-breaking, upsetting sidewalk displays and pushcarts, petty pilfering; and by a not too devious route there is the mature gang, the small thief graduating into the expert, and the distressing increase of violent and criminal careers among boys and girls of less than twenty-one years of age. Besides these activities which by no stretch of the imagination could be called recreation, there are, of course, numerous flourishing enterprises for organized play. Community theaters, community music, handicrafts, sports, gardens, parks, and groups formed for sociability alone abound in various cities and towns. But for every child in a playground there are hundreds on the streets; and the popularity of lurid movies and the circulation of "sex" magazines and the tabloids show how the majority of adults spend their hard-won leisure.

A great need, the Playground Association believes, is for trained workers competent to direct recreation among both adults and children. Nobody wants to play silly games with a sort of teacher. Nobody wants authority waved over his head even in play-time. There is enough of that sort of thing in school and shop. The expert play director has to be both adept at games and full of contagious enthusiasm. He must be a genius, a martinet, a slacker, or a boss. His accomplishments must be almost unlimited—how to make a good kite, how to play the piano, how to can peaches, how to make a wagon that will go, how to find the right play for a group to give, how to direct, cast, and costume it, how to make the costumes. Of these trained and gifted persons there never has been enough.

It is too much to ask that the overworked and harassed school-teacher add supervised play to her duties. But it is not too much to demand that the schools be made a little less remote from the real, expressive life of both child and adult. They are natural centers, they are convenient, they are heated and lighted and large enough to house a considerable group. Ideally the school is the source of recreation as well as education. In some communities it is. The child remains when lessons for the day are over, because so many delightful and important activities are going on; the adults congregate there in the evenings. But it is hard to make public officials, the guardians of the school-buildings, see the relation between ill-used leisure and a dull and inert, if not actually criminal, citizenry. It means expense—more janitor service, more electricity, more coal, more wear and tear on the buildings, and worst of all, more salaries of workers. The Playground and Recreation Association has made a brave beginning, but it has a problem on its hands.

The Sea Devil Arrives

THAT is what they call Count Felix von Luckner, and "Sea Devil" is the title of the book in which he describes one of the most romantic sea careers ever recorded. Not in the annals of Marryat or Cooper is there a more amazing story of adventure. Indeed, had it been written in any work of fiction it would have been set down as an incredible bit of imaginative writing. What makes it more remarkable is that it has to do not with the era of John Paul Jones but with a sailing vessel in the World War, the war of submarines and dreadnaughts, of fast destroyers and battle cruisers and airplanes. Now this adventurer, who ran away from home at fourteen to go to sea as a cabin-boy, has turned up in New York in charge of a peaceful four-masted schooner which is a floating exhibition of German industry, one of the various devices hit upon to restore her pre-war trade to Germany. Incidentally, he is to lecture about his romantic career. If he can describe it on the platform as he has written it, he will speak to crowded houses.

With the exception of the exploit of that portion of the crew of the German cruiser Emden which found its way back from the middle of the Indian Ocean to Germany after the capture of their vessel, there is no episode in the naval annals of the war more sensational than von Luckner's running the blockade with his sailing vessel, which was fitted up with incredible patience and skill as the Norwegian ship Maletta, which she closely resembled. An oil engine was installed and a propeller, and underneath a load of wood, which apparently filled the entire hull, were accommodations for sixty-four men who were to be the fighting contingent, whereas the apparent crew comprised twenty-three men, each of whom spoke Norwegian perfectly. To turn these Germans into Norwegians required endless labor. They were given letters purporting to have come from their families over a period of a number of years. Each one had to learn the names of his Norwegian parents, brothers, and sisters, as well as the names and records of the ships in which he had previously sailed. His seaman's papers were carefully forged and the man was drilled incessantly until he was letter-perfect as to a past which he had never lived. One of the sailors of youthful appearance took the role of the captain's wife, wearing a blonde wig and the clothes of a skipper's consort. The only entrance to the hidden quarters was through a trap-door in the floor of a closet which apparently was intended only for brooms and other cleaning material. Below there was also accommodation for many prisoners, much ammunition, and two old cannon —which was all that the admiralty would allow to so wild an undertaking.

After the ship had left Hamburg and gone into North Sea waters her departure was so long delayed that the real Maletta left Copenhagen before her imitation could precede her. The ship's papers had to be altered—twice, indeed, since the second selection of a Scandinavian prototype proved as unhappy as the first. To make over the papers a second time seemed impossible. Luckner hit upon a curious way out. He ordered the carpenter to destroy every port-hole in the cabin, the glass being replaced with roughly made pieces of wood such as the seaman uses to repair damage at sea. The ship's papers were then dipped in water and the dangerous portions smooched. They were then displayed as damaged by the flooding of the cabin. Finally, the Irma, as she then was, flew down the Channel before a favoring gale and met no vessel until almost out into the Atlantic. There she was boarded by a British officer, with a boat's crew, who discovered nothing. When the officer returned to his cruiser that vessel signaled "Stand by for an hour." One of the crew remarked: "Then we are lost." This remark was heard below by one of the sixty-four men in hiding. They determined to blow up the ship as had been agreed upon in the event of her disguise being penetrated. Fortunately, when the spark was within a couple of feet of the end of the fuse, Luckner himself brought word that all was clear. Two minutes later the magazine would have exploded and the ship would have been blown into the air. But an hour later she was on her way to the South Atlantic and the Pacific, where she sank fourteen of the enemy's ships before being herself wrecked upon one of the Society Islands, where she had put in for fresh water and repairs. Thirty-five thousand miles she cruised, and her last three prizes were American schooners.

The indomitable captain was not to be kept idle. With five of his crew he sailed 2,300 knots in an open boat eighteen feet long, a voyage of incredible danger and hardship, in the course of which these daring men nearly perished of thirst and hunger and scurvy, only to be captured on Wakaya Island, from which they were taken to Auckland for imprisonment. Even here this indomitable spirit could not be kept behind bars. With nine others he stole the motorboat of the commandant of the camp, captured a schooner, and succeeded in getting as far as Curtis Island before being recaptured after ten days of freedom. Such in brief is the record of the Sea Devil who has now turned to the art of commerce and of trade.

Marie's Rumania

LORING PICKERING, in behalf of the North American Newspaper Alliance, which copyrights and syndicates Queen Marie's well-paid love of the rocks and rills of America, telegraphed to Upton Sinclair in Pasadena, California, requesting the pleasure of his company at a reception to Her Majesty the Queen in New York City. Mr. Sinclair was busy campaigning as Socialist candidate for Governor of California, but he paused to reply.

> Assure Her Majesty [he said] that we shall be with her in spirit and shall tell our Pasadena audience what we think of her Government, the most infamous and blood-soaked in Europe. In due course we expect to learn that Her Majesty has come to borrow American dollars to be used in enabling Rumanian peasant-slaves to slaughter Russian workers groping toward freedom.

We suspect that if Marie came to America hoping to raise a loan for her country the hope has gone aglimmering. Society ladies may still pay good money for the privilege of meeting or entertaining royalty, but even the newspaper cartoonists have begun to laugh at Marie's passion for publicity, and financiers are unlikely to be moved by the tactics of a Valentino. Yet it is just as well for rude persons like Mr. Sinclair to inject a serious note into the round of frivolity. Whatever Queen Marie may be personally, her kingdom is one of the plague-spots on the map of Europe. The spirit of Locarno has touched neither its internal nor its foreign policies. It was cursed with one of the rottenest aristocracies in Europe before the war, and unfortunately for its people its rulers picked the winning side so that the peace confirmed their power. It annexed Transylvania, but instead of placating the Rumanian peasants who lived there the Rumanian land-barons made terms with the feudal Hungarian landlords. It stole Bessarabia from Russia—as Czarist Russia had once stolen the same province from a weaker Rumania—and has steadfastly refused to consult its inhabitants as to their wishes in the matter. Today, under the inspiration of Mussolini's Italy, there is even talk of uniting Rumania and the remnant of Hungary—a fantastic project, for the only cement to bind the two nations is the common interest of the land-barons in checking the inevitable rise of the oppressed peasantry.

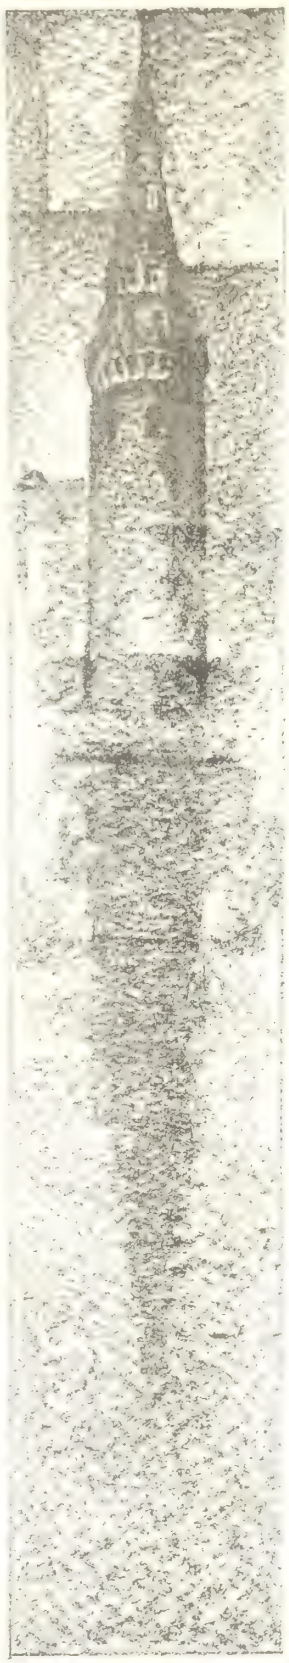
The pretense of democratic government in Rumania today is a farce. At the last election the Government instructed its officials not to permit opposition candidates to enter their districts, or to permit candidates to enter but not to speak; it made wholesale arrests, threw men, women, and children into jail for mere expression of independent opinion, and held them often for months without trial. Nowhere in Europe today is the lot of the Jews more terrible. They are excluded from the universities and subject to constant attacks in the streets; a Rumanian officer has confessed that under the direction of his commander he murdered numbers of Jews who were seeking to cross the River Dniester and leave the country, and despite his own confession a Rumanian court acquitted him!

Of Marie's personal connections with the crimes committed in her country we know nothing. But it would be well if the public which listens to her over the radio and gapes at her glorious strings of pearls should realize what misery lies behind their beauty and upon what bloody suffering is built the throne of her country.

Nine Years of Bolshevism

By LOUIS FISCHER

Drawings by Louis Lozowick



Berlin, October 5

NOVEMBER 13, 1922. A thousand delegates to the annual congress of the Third International are assembled in the throne-room of the ex-Czar's Kremlin palace. Lenin is speaking, watch in hand, for the physicians have limited him to an hour's address. At his feet, on the boards of the platform, sits Radek who gives aid when Lenin snaps his fingers and whispers a Russian word to indicate that his German vocabulary has failed him. The leader is discussing the Russian situation and reviewing the NEP. He picks out the one significant achievement and dilates upon it: the Soviet state has been able during the past year to save 20,000,000 rubles which will be "definitely applied to raising the level of our heavy industries."

Three years later, in 1925, the Russian budget could spare 765,000,000 rubles for the same purpose.

The Soviet Union is suffering the pains of rapid growth; one is almost tempted to say, of too rapid growth. The value of industrial output (in pre-war rubles) rose by 50 per cent in 1921-1922, 33 per cent in 1922-1923, 30 per cent in 1923-1924, 35 per cent in 1924-1925, and about 45 per cent in 1925-1926, and has now reached an average of 95 per cent of the 1913 standard. But while such progress is no proof of any fundamental weakness in the Soviet economic system, it does mean that the resources of the country in money, plant, and materials have been well-nigh exhausted in the quick advance. A loan of, say, $200,000,000 would do much to solve Russia's current economic problems and lay the present controversy in the Communist Party. It might not erase the differences of principle and opinion between Trotzky and Bucharin or between Stalin and Zinoviev, but it would make the dispute less acrimonious and cooperation more likely.

The Soviet Union thirsts for capital. It is ready to make every honorable concession to the United States in order to win that political recognition without which there can be no appreciable flow of loans and credits from New York to Moscow. Should such help from America or other countries not be forthcoming, recurrent crises will probably afflict the Bolsheviks for many years to come unless they are able to capitalize their own tremendous natural and human resources. On a small scale this is actually being done. The state, for example, now has 570,000,000 rubles for investment in industry next year. But such a procedure would be expensive for the inhabitants of the country. The Russians have paid and are paying, and the burden is causing them to grumble more and more. The murmurings of the peasants, who number 125,000,000 souls of a total of 140,000,000, are the direct cause of the rupture in the Communist Party.

Kremlin Tower

The fundamental interests of a peasantry often conflict with those of urban industry, in the Russian case, of the proletariat. The history of Bolshevik Russia shows a series of compromises on the part of the city workers' government in favor of the politically weak but economically irresistible mujik masses. Today, the scarcity of capital, together with other contributing causes, intensifies the demand of the village for further economic concessions and for the wider political prerogatives by which these can more easily be obtained.

The "trouble" is that although the peasants have had to settle most of the bills of the revolution and to carry the expense of Communist mistakes, they have nevertheless grown too prosperous for the town. This condition will become more serious for, whereas the industries have now consumed the larger part of available capital and will show only 5 to 15 per cent annual progress in the next few years as compared with 30 to 50 per cent in the past, the potentialities of agriculture for expansion are enormous. While the urban proletariat requires millions of rubles for new factories and new equipment in order to increase the quantity, improve the quality, and cut the cost of its products, the peasant has merely to plow three inches deeper and clean his seed with greater care to double his crop. Continued financial, educational, and organizational assistance by the Government to the peasants should suffice to send the crop curve high above today's level; but all the energy, money, enthusiasm, and ability of the entire country will not avail to prevent the retarded motion of industrial progress from setting in.

The beginning of this development appeared in 1925. The unprecedented rise in the purchasing power of the peasantry could not be gratified by domestic factory output. Hence the prolonged "goods famine." This "new disproportion between the industrial supply and the peasant demand," says the Moscow Pravda, "is not diminishing. It threatens further complications in the relationship between the working class and the peasantry"—and, therefore, in the party. To adopt the obvious solution and import the required goods would be inadvisable because in the absence of foreign loans such imports could only be paid for out of the return from exports, and the volume of exports does not warrant heavy imports.

The problem of exports thus acquires paramount importance. Russia exports lumber, oil, furs, etc., but far the largest item of export is grain. Now the last two crops have been fairly good, and a paper surplus of many million tons exists for shipment to foreign countries. The mujik, however, will not part with his excess cereals except in exchange for textiles, machinery, leather goods, and other manufactured articles, and these the Soviet industry cannot give him to the extent to which he can afford to buy. Moreover, the state's machinery for surplus grain collection is inefficient. Lenin warned the Bolsheviks to "learn to be merchants" and they have not done so. They can manufacture but not sell. If the Nepman's role in merchandising is shrinking—from 40.8 per cent of the total trade turnover in 1923-1924 to 24 per cent in 1924-1925—he still controls a huge block of the peasant market. He is not handicapped by a clumsy bureaucracy. He goes directly to the mujik's house to close a deal. He has ready cash. His turnover is rapid. He can therefore pay higher prices for grain, and the Government as well as the cooperatives must frequently accept the standard he sets.

Red Square, Moscow

The peasant, too, is responsible for high prices. Ivan says, "Before the war I gave a pood of rye for a linen blouse. Now the blouse sells at three, sometimes four times the 1913 cost." So he avenges himself by raising the price of the unused part of his grain to what for the Government, which is the sole exporter, must be a prohibitive level. The result is a limitation of exports and therefore of imports.

According to the plan for next year, therefore, exports will amount to 790,000,000 rubles and, to create an active trade balance, imports will be restricted to 700,000,000 rubles. Much of the latter are to consist of machinery, raw materials, and semi-manufactured goods which will help to accelerate the process of domestic industrialization.

On this one point there are no two opinions: the historic function of the Russian Communist Party is to further the industrialization of the Soviet Union and thus to weaken the economic balance in favor of the peasants. Indeed, the Stalin administration and the Opposition are in accord on so many subjects that it becomes a difficult task to define the difference between them. To say that the administration majority is promoting the welfare of the peasantry and forgetting industry and the proletariat would be an over-statement. To argue that the Opposition, if it were in power, would carry out a policy of peasant exploitation in order to further the interests of the city working class is to lose sight of the fact that whoever rules in new Russia dare not antagonize the village. It is too assertive, and the revolution has made it conscious of its strength.

There can be no question, however, that the Opposition in some form has come to stay in Soviet Communist politics, and that it will find its chief inspiration and support in the urban proletariat. The primary raison d'etre of the Opposition is the retreat of the party in the face of peasant pressure, and its existence must consequently grow increasingly justifiable as the economic power of the peasantry, developing as it must at greater speed than that of the proletariat, forces the Government to ever further concessions. The Opposition believes that it is still possible to stem the onrushing peasant tide by fewer and less radical compromises than those which the Stalin group has been making. It emphasizes the danger to Bolshevism in the rise of the kulaks or rich peasants, and in their union with the "middle" or comfortably situated peasants against the poor and farm-hand elements in the villages. It charges that the administration minimizes this menace; and the administration returns with a counter-charge of exaggeration.

So trivial does Bucharin, the arch-theorist of the party, regard the peasant danger that he urges them to "Enrich yourselves." This slogan was responsible for much bad blood in Communist ranks last year and probably accounts for the alignment of Krupskaya, Lenin's widow, with the Opposition. For although the Bolsheviks aim to enrich the village as a whole, it was obvious that the enrichment meant by Bucharin could only be attained by some peasants at the expense of others. Bucharin subsequently repented officially, nevertheless the idea of "Enrich yourselves" is consistent with his philosophy and theories and indicative of what may await the party if Bucharin is permitted to impress his views upon it.

Zinoviev and Kamenev, too, when they and Stalin constituted the leading Triumvirate, legislated far-reaching concessions conducive to class differentiation in the villages and to the aggrandizement of the kulaks and "middle" peasants. But the party's last reforms—the right to rent land and to hire laborers—were apparently too much for them. They were appalled by their own handiwork. Hence the famous "Leningrad" Opposition at last December's party congress.

It is significant that this proletarian Opposition insists on giving the name of state capitalism to the industrial system developed under the new economic policy, whereas the majority of the party wishes to style it socialism. It is not merely an academic question. This matter of a name has shaken the whole party because it involves basic considerations of policy. The Opposition accuses the administration of "coloring the NEP," of painting it in too rosy hues, of christening it socialism. The NEP, all agree, is necessary. Only through it can socialism be attained. But it is not socialism. Nor is it capitalism. It is the bridge from the one to the other. With the government, the industries, the cooperatives, the monopoly of foreign trade—the "Socialist heights" as they are called in Communist hands, the danger that capitalism will overwhelm near-socialism is not great. Yet the control of the "heights" does not imply a conquest of the plains. The plains where dwell the Nepman and the mujik are capitalistic. The "heights," on the other hand, are the advantages which accrue to the proletariat from its dictatorship. In them the party possesses the means for attempting the socialization of agriculture and the industrialization of the country. But by idealizing the NEP, the Opposition argues, you induce a feeling of overconfidence in the security of the "heights." Believing that you have achieved socialism in the city you imagine yourself immune from an assault from the plains; consequently you make more concessions to the peasant than you ought.

There is much truth in this analysis. It requires no eagle eye to discern the peasants creeping slowly up toward the city proletarian "heights." The village wants political power, too, and is evidencing an activity in elections which has caused alarm. "Permanent revolution" is the solution offered by Trotzky, that is, uninterrupted resistance against peasant demands until the world revolution diminishes the danger they represent; concentrated effort to socialize agriculture and to make the village more dependent on the town by introducing the cooperative use of tractors, machinery, etc.; and cooperative buying and selling by the peasants. After fighting this idea and defeating Trotzky in the fight, Zinoviev has succumbed to it, as, I believe, the entire Opposition eventually must. The Opposition will sooner or later frankly declare itself the defender of proletarian interests against peasant encroachment.

Such, in very broad outline, are the elements in the Communist Party controversy and in the economic situation from which it springs The mere existence of an Opposition, however, be its platform what it may, presents an immediate and severe problem to the party. The fundamental concept of the Communist Party is "monolithism." The party must be a unit. The Communists are intolerant of groupings, factions, fractions, caucuses, and other combinations prejudicial to the most hidebound solidarity. Individual Bolsheviks may express any views they wish. They may publish them in party organs and air them at party meetings. But once the annual party congress has voted them down, they must advocate their views no longer and undertake no steps to organize support for their opinions. In 1922 the so-called "Workers' Opposition" was silenced in this manner. Then the Trotzky opposition met a similar fate. And now the Kamenev-Zinoviev-Lashevitch opposition is faring no better. In fact, it is being suppressed more ruthlessly than its predecessors. Kamenev and Zinoviev have been expelled from the Political Bureau, Kamenev has been removed from the state offices he held. Pyatakov, first assistant to the late Dzerzhinsky in the Supreme Economic Council, may not return from his present extended "vacation." Trotzky has not been accepted to the praesidium of the Supreme Economic Council even though "good behavior"—silence—has enabled him to stay in the Political Bureau. When such important leaders can be shelved in this wise, it need hardly be said that lesser opposition lights receive similar and in some cases worse treatment.

Many of these measures preceded and many followed the secret meeting of the Opposition in a wood outside Moscow one evening last June. Pickets were posted and other conspiratory trappings were present. There is no greater crime in the Communist calendar than to arrange and participate in such a gathering. Yet the purely proletarian attendance braved the risks of so grave a breach of party discipline because they could see no other way out. They are not reconciled to blind obedience. They want to champion their ideas. But they are muzzled and suppressed. Hence their recourse to illegal measures.

On the other hand, the Opposition gives the administration a most effective weapon by resorting to such secret assemblies, for nothing is more unpopular or considered more un-Communist than this. In general, any opposition starts with a handicap in that it exposes itself to the accusation of wishing to destroy the unity of the party and of precipitating a discussion when the need of the hour is work not words. The path of an opposition in Soviet Russia is thorny and hard, and its chances of success are few. A Communist Party consisting of two or more factions is inconceivable at present, and the oppositionists are too good Communists to dream of organizing another party even if it were physically possible, which it is not. The secret midnight meeting shows that the Opposition is restive under restraint, but it is difficult to imagine what it can do under present circumstances. Trotzky has already reconciled himself to silence, passive obedience, and soldierly service at any post to which he is commanded. It appears that Zinoviev, Kamenev, Krupskaya, Pyatakov, Sokolnikov, Lashevitch, and the others can do little else. At each annual congress and conference they may present their case once again. Otherwise nothing remains, it seems, but to bide their time until the day—if it ever comes—when the demands of the economic situation will recall them to power or until they are convinced by the majority and join forces with it.

Noah

By JAKE FALSTAFF

In Noah's pious blood there stirred
The father of the Pharisee;
A secret bibbling elder, he Spoke with assurance of The Word.
Still he was wise, for he had heard
The grumblings of a deity.
He laid his adz about the tree
And gathered in the beast and bird.

But there were giants in that day;
God was a gaffer of their house.
"The Old Lad's peevish," chuckled they,
And did not pause in their carouse.
Waist deep in cataclysm they stood
And, drunken, cheered the rising flood!

Communism Comes to the Village

By VERA DANCHAKOFF

THE first time I saw the spring airing of Vlassievna's death clothes, it filled me with awe and trepidation. From early morning we children had been on our guard, so as not to miss the hour when Vlassievna, the mother of our twin-servants, should open her trunk. A long linen robe was to be her death shirt. Her slippers must be tight, she explained, so that they would not fall off her feet during her long heavenward flight; and light, so that she might not sink down while walking in the gardens of Paradise. But her greatest concern was to prevent them from creaking, so she oiled all the seams lest she disturb us when at night she would return to walk through our rooms. She hoped after death to pay us frequent visits. A wooden cypress cross and a black head-dress with small white dots completed her death trousseau. She was critical in her choice of the place in our yard for spreading out her treasures. She cleaned away the ants and beetles and sat near by or walked around driving away insects with a branch of fragrant lilacs so that nothing might desecrate her death garb.

Never did we children miss an opportunity to sneak into the back yard or into the kitchen at night. I remember often falling asleep in the lap of Vlassievna, as she sat in her comfortable old armchair by the brick kitchen stove, wrapped in a shawl, with familiar white kerchief pulled deep over her eyes. I would be lulled by her soft monotonous voice.

Nights when everybody was busy in the master's rooms, she would talk freely. "Grandmammy, I want to hear how you became betrothed," suggested my elder sister. "And how you fell in love," she added, with hesitation.

"I was about twenty," Vlassievna starts her story anew, "when the match-makers came to visit our home. Even though I was well known through the whole district, I was carefully scrutinized by my future mother-in-law. 'Hearty as a stag,' she said approvingly, clapping me on my back. "Without a scratch," added my mother, lovingly.

"The bargaining was quickly made, my linen (5 pieces of 25 yards each) and my clothes shown, the counter offer of my future parents accepted: 25 rubles, a sheep-skin fur, shoes, two poods of flour, and a bucket full of brandy. A general inspection followed. Agrafena, my married sister, led me in front of my betrothed. 'Isn't he getting a dainty bit, this mushroom!' 'Surely enough,' the storekeeper's wife grinned, 'somebody gets a dainty bit; much talk is heard about the lass . . . who knows . . .'

"No, mother, no," I thought. "You and father will get the first drink the morning after my marriage; the cup will have no hole at its bottom; no shame upon you, mother!" In many villages it is the practice to offer the first drink on the morning after a marriage to the parents of the bride if she proved to be chaste, and to the parents of the bridegroom, if not. In the latter case the best man offers the parents of the bride a drink in a cup with a hole drilled at its bottom, which he carefully stops with his finger. As they accept the cup, he withdraws his finger and the brandy is spilled.

" 'Hand out the bride,' shouted merrily the members of my new family on the wedding morning, approaching our house in a long procession of carriages. Highly colored ribbons fluttered in the manes of the horses, dozens of bells tinkled on the bows over the horses' heads. Women and men were gorgeously attired. . . ."

I remember how as children we often suggested that when grown up we would live in the village and become either a teacher or a physician. We willingly assumed in our imagination the post of physician's assistant, Feldscher, but none of us would be a priest and even less a policeman. The image of village priest was strongly associated in our minds with the intoxicated priest Evdokim who was drowned in the lake. The policeman of the district inspired in the peasant such a fear that at a mere mention of him they used to cross themselves.

The childhood dream came true, at least for me, when, after graduation from one of the Swiss medical schools and admission to medical practice in Russia I found myself once more, at twenty-five, in the district I had known as a child. My interest in practicing medicine was never very genuine, my longing to become a village physician was no more than a part of a general yearning prevalent at the time among the intellectuals to be of service to the people. Office work in the day time, trips at night, patients numbering about a hundred on Sundays and holidays, struggles with the ignorance of the village midwife and with the incredible superstitions of the peasants, efforts and undertakings doomed at their conception. . . . My own sojourn in the village might have been very short, indeed, had it not been for the priest's recovery from pneumonia, helped along more by his own strong constitution, no doubt, than by my two calls. Nevertheless, he took a fancy to me from that time and even told me about a conspiracy launched against me that summer.

I had been engaged in scientific work in the Leningrad Institute for Experimental Medicine and had been making experiments on rabbits. Those I took along with me in cages to the village for observation. At the same time I was raising axolotls as material for research. To raise chickens or even rabbits for market was well enough for the peasant, but to see "fish-like frogs" in jars and rabbits in cages was more than the peasant was willing to accept. A secret and mysterious purpose was ascribed to my venture. "They thought you meant to transform one animal into another, to make rabbits live in water and make hair grow on the frog-like fishes. They were afraid to see you break the will of our Lord," the priest informed me.

"Father, why did you not explain to them?" I asked.

Quickly the priest folded the written complaint, which was to be sent to the police department. He did not want me to see what I had already noticed, namely, that it was in his own handwriting. After his recovery the priest held a special prayer in the church, in which he thanked the Lord for his recovery and asked Him to enlighten me and to direct me into the path of Holy Truth. . . .

I eagerly devoted myself to a study of the peasant in his home, of his wants and his problems, of his weaknesses and aspirations. I soon found that the peasant would die rather than be operated upon. I also found that the village midwife was much more popular with the peasant than was the doctor. She was a woman of about sixty, who had no education whatever. She just decided one day that she was going to be a midwife and forthwith embarked upon her profession. I had naturally thought that even with my limited medical equipment—one forceps, a pair of long scissors, a couple of scalpels—I would be of great help to the women and children. She decided otherwise. I still possess a beautiful linen embroidered towel, a present to me from a woman who, against my expectations, those of the midwife, and her own, somehow managed to live. I had known Tania since childhood. We used to play together. The girl was expecting her first baby when I, the village doctor, met her as a young woman. She was happily married and her mother-in-law spared her and frequently excused her from work.

I heard Tania's husband tease her: "Now, wife, thou mayst possibly bring me a son," and Tania reply: "Depends yet upon whom the Lord will send; I may possibly have a chance to bring myself a daughter." In the case of Tania I did my best to prevent the midwife's usual procedures in a delivery but when Tania's husband came for me I found that everything the midwife had ever heard about had already unsuccessfully been set in operation. How my heart ached when I was told that Tania had gone through the board! (To put the baby back into a normal position, the woman in labor is launched head down from a board fixed in an oblique position.) The night I spent in her home will stay in my memory as long as I live. Tania, in a deep faint, an ikona over her head, a candle in the bottle, held by the trembling hands of her mother, and myself with no other instruments than those I have mentioned. Tania lost her first baby. But the Lord knows how she herself managed to stay alive!

Just as I had an irreconcilable opponent in the midwife, so the teacher of the village had his opponent in the priest, who taught religion in the school and had an informal supervision over the school affairs. The village public schools at that time were of two kinds, some under the jurisdiction of the Holy Synod, others under the administration of the Ministerium of Public Education. The schools of the first group were more numerous. The teachers in them, mostly women, came almost exclusively from the families of clergymen.

Russian Village

"Don't you see," the teacher complained bitterly, "the program in our schools is so arranged that all the subjects are closely related to the lessons on religion, and those are given by the priest. We are hindered in every attempt to give the children even the most fundamental knowledge. You may see yourself," he added, handing me some printed pages; "here are the instructions we have received lately. Read: 'While teaching the Russian language, limit the teaching to the study of language proper and avoid additional topics like information in science.' And further: 'The study of Russian history must form an integral whole with the study of the history of the Greek Orthodox Church.'"

The most interesting paragraph in the instructions, however, was the one purporting to outline beliefs that the school should impress on the pupils. "They should leave the school," read the instructions, "with the firm belief that the strength of our fatherland depends upon the Holy Greek Orthodox faith and the Czar's autocratic power, and that dire distress and calamities ruin our fatherland every time the one or the other declines."

My friend's school was opposite my office and I used to visit his classes rather frequently. I was present once at one of the final examinations. It was amazing how well the children could recite a number of prayers in the Old Slav language used exclusively in church services. The archbishop, a guest at the examination, was elated over the results and highly complimented the minister. Finally the children's choir sang praise to the Virgin: "The most pure Cherubim and, without comparison, the most glorious Seraphim"—the words of the prayer rang in the air. A girl of about nine in the first row of the choir could not take her eyes from the Archbishop. Musingly the Holy Father smiled at her. "Who, then, child, is the glorious Seraphim?" he asked. The girl blushed, looked down, again raised her eyes full of tears: "Seraphim, seraphim . . . ," she muttered, "it is what makes our lamps burn when we have a party."

The Archbishop silently entered his carriage and drove away.

* * * *

While traveling in Russia last year I longed to renew personal contact with the peasant in his village. Chance helped me in bringing me to my old teacher friend, Nikolai Pavlovitch. My inquiries for him in the district where we both once served brought no information. He had left years ago, I was told. I found him in one of the innumerable waiting-rooms of the Narkompross (Commissariat for People's Education), the same tall figure in a time-worn suit, the same sharp smiling look over the gold-framed spectacles. Upright, with unbent shoulders, his blond head without gray hair, he wore his fifty years almost to his advantage. Our eyes searched each other, while we exchanged words of greeting. We both were trying to bridge over a period of twenty years. He wore two emblems frequently seen in Russia at present, the one representing a small photograph of Lenin, the other bearing three letters: N. O. T., marking his membership in the Scientific Toil Organization.

"Yes, I am a party member," he answered my question, "working in R. K. I.—Workman Peasant Inspection," he translated.

"Nothing could please me better than to take you along on an inspection trip of village schools, as you suggest," he said to me, "but then, in the presence of an official, you may expect to find the peasants somewhat reserved. Why not go by yourself? I suppose Vassiliev may do for you. You may stay in the village for a night or two—it is fifteen miles from a railway station in the suburb of Moscow."

I found that the new schoolmaster had come two years ago into a little snow-bound village. The old teacher to whom the peasants were indebted for the little they knew had died. Some of them could scribble down their names or spell together a sign on a store or even note down their neighbor's debt on the wall with a piece of chalk. They missed the old teacher who had been for so long a habitual figure at every celebration and who during drought used to walk along with them and the priest in religious processions, singing carols and searching skies for rainy clouds.

"They looked at me with concern and discontent." My friend told me of his arrival. "My request for withdrawal of the priest from school was met by a common decision to keep their children away from school."

"'Where is thy boy? Why doesn't thou send him to school?' I inquired, making a round of the peasants' homes.

"'The priest will teach him.'

"'Why the priest?'

"'At least a prayer will he learn from the priest. What will he learn from thee?' And yet after talking awhile: 'Why, if you are going to teach him husbandry and thriftness,' every peasant would say to me, 'I am not against it. You may have my boy tomorrow. Trim him well, grind him sharp, so he may support his parents in their old age.'

"It was, however, pretty hard to break the peasants' suspicion and distrust. 'In no respect a match to the deceased, may he be admitted to the Heavenly Kingdom,' I ofter heard them openly discuss me. And even though they seemed finally to agree upon the value of gymnastics, when they saw their children moving their arms in a queer and seemingly impertinent way, they would sneak unobserved on their tip-toes and smack them energetically on their backs: 'Will you little ruffians stop swinging your arms!'

"And yet," the teacher added, "there was no vacant bench in the school the following term."

I visited the children's carpenter shop, I saw the schoolroom equipped with the furniture made by the children. A piece of ground in the swamps was shown to me by the peasants, allotted to the school at the request of the teacher. There was pride in their words: "No less than a horse's head in size was the cabbage they grew on this waste after draining it."

I stayed over a week in the little village. About sunset, after the last cow of the village herd had turned into her home yard, I had long chats with villagers. No peasant in the summer is found at that time in his log cabin. The women may be busy with children within, the young folks are heard singing and laughing at the outskirt of the forest or on the meadow. Those, however, addressed—Uncle Andrei or Uncle Ivan, men between 30 and 50—are found seated on log benches along the front of the log cabins. Almost motionless, they might be taken for a bas-relief had ever a sculptor chiseled groups so picturesque. To address them may seem much more difficult than it usually proves to be. They know I came from across the ocean and they want to hear again and again about the sea which cannot be crossed in less than five days, and about the large steamers, larger than any house in the district city. In certain things they simply do not believe me. I never could make them believe that there may be houses over ten stories high. And in return for my cheap stories of our everyday surroundings which to them seem unbelievable wonders I often got stories from them exquisite in development, poignant in effect.

"A 'woman' showed up in the neighboring village," says a peasant half-mockingly. "No 'baba' is Natalie now, but 'woman.'" (In Russian the village woman is called not woman, but 'baba'—something like squaw.)

Through the half-coordinated sentences of the peasants I begin to see the image of Natalie, an image beautiful and pure of a Russian peasant woman given her first chance, standing against the background of her many centuries of subjection. Since the revolution gave Natalie the right to attend meetings she not only began to frequent them, but now and then ventured a word. "Not a squaw's business," grumbled the men. "Not a squaw, but a woman I am."

After that Natalie could appear nowhere without being scorned. "Woman, woman!" even the children scoffed at her. They knew that Natalie could not write. "Ask her to sign the records," cried one of the peasants at a meeting. For three months thereafter Natalie was absent from the meetings. When she again appeared, there was a roar: "The woman has come! Ho, ho, ho, the woman has come! Let her sign the records!"

The secretary of the committee, a quiet man as a rule, became frenzied and presented her with the records. "Look, look, she is going to sign!"—and on the white paper close to one another letters steady, though crooked, lay in line: Natalia Moisseeva. There was no end of amazement: A woman indeed!" I saw this story confirmed in a magazine, the Peasant Woman, and many other stories contributed by newly literate women.

The dead earnest of the peasant delegates at meetings in the city greatly impressed me on many occasions. Last summer I took a seat in the third row in the Great Moscow Opera House. The stage was decorated with red banners and a gorgeous flag hung low over the balustrade of the imperial box. Peasants began gradually to fill up the large hall of the theater, the row of the boxes, and the benches on the platform. Krassin, Kalinin, Bucharin, and others took seats around the table on the stage draped in red. They had all gathered to celebrate Cooperation Movement Day. I kept looking intensely in the faces of the peasants. In their traditional garb, many of them with long beards, with wrinkled faces browned by the sun, they did not differ much from the physical image of the Russian tiller of the soil which I had retained in my memory from my childhood. Their presence in the elegant hall, however incongruous it might have been ten years ago, did not seem out of place now. They moved with certainty and spoke in unadorned but logical language. Are these people the direct descendants of those who, like chattels, could be sold and moved some seventy years ago?

Sochi Dreams

By MARIAN TYLER

WHEN people go on vacation they often leave their real selves at home and play at being what they would like to be. In Sochi you can see Russians on vacation, and Russians are the best actors in the world. They put on a good comedy, if it is a comedy.

No one but a Russian would think of going South for the summer. Sochi is near the southernmost tip of Russia at the foot of the Caucasus and on the shore of the Black Sea. People travel three days and nights from Moscow to lie in the scorching sun on Sochi's stony beach. It is heroic. But then only Russians think of going North for the winter. The czars had their Winter Palace in old Petersburg and journeyed through the bitter cold to enjoy the Arctic night. To soft Anglo-Saxons who run away from their seasons this seems a little mad; and yet what could be more logical, if you like winter, than to go where winter is really winter, and, if you like summer, to go to Sochi in July?

Sochi likes to think it is a health resort. In the twenty-odd years since the first sanitarium was built the malaria has, it is true, been greatly reduced. Some remarkable cures are credited to the capable staff of doctors and to the sulphur baths near by. But an even better remedy, the best in the world, is faith.

In its pre-war splendor the place must have been very beautiful in an exotic, un-Russian way. The gardens are still full of palms and roses—a little shabby now, a little frayed by the crowds that overflow from the spacious old villas. During the season the visitors are expected to spend money and enrich the town. They must make the fortunes of dozens of izvostchiks, fur-hatted pirates perched on the graceful old carriages of the aristocracy; of numerous vendors of scarves, sunflower seeds, Communist magazines; barbers, bands of actors, and second-story men, and exploiters of dancing bears. The streets seem always full of animals—herds of goats, long-horned buffaloes harnessed to heavy carts, geese, cows, pigs, and the poor bears led around by the nose—until one wants to start a zoological revolution.

Against this quaint and draggled setting the vacationists stage their unfulfilled desires. There is the inevitable pair of typists, who have spent a year's savings on their grand clothes, very grand indeed for Russia. There is the member of congress, that is, the Central Committee, who manages to forget politics for two months by a remarkable series of romantic conquests. There is the provincial teacher, disappointed that Sochi's night life ends at 10 o'clock. There are a great many tired people, worn with responsibility, whose only wish is to sleep and eat until they have to take up the load again. And there are still too many who, in this environment of ancient wealth, like to pretend that they are fashionable aristocrats themselves.

But what have all these types in common? What makes Sochi more Russian than Atlantic City? Talk to half a hundred of the vacationists and behind all the personal dreams you begin to see one large dream—a long and prosperous Main Street for Russia. How to get it is the point at which parties split and individuals disagree, but they all see the same ideal picture. Factories, clothing, electricity, machines—machines above all. Any piece of machinery, from an electric crane to an eversharp pencil, is reverently admired. If it is foreign so much the better. Russians were always likely to be over-modest about anything native.

After a few days the foreigner begins to understand. The new stock of the provincial stores still looks scanty to him. He begins to feel the discomfort of a life without enough beds and automobiles and stockings and dishes. He thinks of Mr. Woolworth's piled counters in every American town. How much difference a few job lots of tin spoons and nails and eggbeaters would make in the economy of hundreds of Russian households! One side of the world hasn't enough of the things of which the other side has too many, like a man sitting by the fire on a cold night, his back freezing and his face blistered. But Russia makes a virtue of necessity, and sits in the cold to improve her circulation. "Even if we could afford to import everything, as they did before the war," runs the explanation, "we would rather build up our own manufactures."

That is the excitement of living in Russia, the excitement of planning a house or a bridge or a castle in Spain. Sochi must have the biggest, best, and shiniest Main Street in the world. Of course we can't begin it yet. No use starting till we can afford to build it on a grand scale. We know that Sochi fairly cries to be developed, with all the power from its mountain streams, with transport facilities by land and sea, and a population largely unemployed during the winter. Perhaps we shall have a great dam and a power plant as part of the national electric system. Around the dam we shall build factories, a furniture factory perhaps, a paper plant, a woolen mill. The view up the river valley to the snowy mountains? Of course we aren't sentimental about views any more, but it will be more impressive to see the mountains behind the dam. The dam will be like a great wonderful waterfall. The factories will be the best factories that can be built. The harbor will probably be deepened so that freight-boats can come into the river mouth; through trains will run. The Government is planning to develop the Caucasus on a large scale, and all this would obviously fit into the program.

Sochi's dream is something like this. But its facts are different. The town's trade is done in a permanent bazaar of flimsy and squalid booths. Such larger stores as are not vacant are occupied mostly by barber shops, closed half the day for dinner and all day Sunday and Monday. The head of the state bank wields an enormous abacus and takes a month to cash a traveler's check.

When Sochi once begins it will doubtless proceed with the thoroughness and dispatch seen in other parts of Russia—the thoroughness of the railroad schedules, for example. In a country where time hardly exists, where no one is less than an hour late for an appointment, and a week or so delay in any transaction does not matter, trains run on the minute, and often ahead of it. Sochi, however, is a vacation resort, infected with vacation illusions. It still dreams and its dreams are large and grand.

Thomas Mott Osborne

By WINTHROP D. LANE

JUST where Thomas Mott Osborne, who died week before last in Auburn, N. Y., will stand in the history of efforts to make prisons more intelligent places cannot be easily forecast today. It need surprise no one if he takes his place with Beccaria, Jeremy Bentham, John Howard, and others who, in their generation, cried out against absurdities in the treatment of offenders. If he does, Mr. Osborne will perhaps be known more as a stirring propagandist, an exposer of the old and senseless, than as a scientific contributor to the technique of reforming criminals.

Why did Mr. Osborne, a cultured and wealthy man, fifty-four years old, who had held influential positions and could choose almost any way of spending his time, decide in 1913 to live for a week in Auburn prison as a voluntary inmate? To answer that question would probably require the procedure of a psychological investigator. Doubtless there was something in Mr. Osborne's personality that gave him a strong emotional interest in the outcast, the underdog. As a boy he had gone through Auburn prison on a visit. The dark, scowling faces, bending over their tasks, made a deep impression on him. The evil dreams of his childhood, he tells us, centered about an escaped convict; this convict pursued him, holding a long knife. Whether such visions had any relation to Mr. Osborne's interest in prisoners we need not stop to inquire. Later he became a trustee of the George Junior Republic, naturally acquiring an interest in offenders that way. On a red-letter day he read Donald Lowrie's "My Life in Prison." Finally, Governor Sulzer appointed him chairman of a State commission on prison reform, and Mr. Osborne's relation to prison affairs became official. He decided that he needed the intimate acquaintance that actual incarceration would give him.

So he entered Auburn prison. He slept in the same kind of cell as the other prisoners and ate the same kind of food. He wove baskets and shoveled coal. In line each morning he carried his bucket, the prisoner's only toilet. He sent and received notes by the "underground" system. He saw the miserable failure of the prison to do anything helpful for these men. Refusing to work, he merited punishment and spent a night in "hell," the solitary hole. With Jack Murphy, a convict, beside whom he worked, he discussed the way prisons are run. Out of these conversations came the idea of the Mutual Welfare League.

To Mr. Osborne self-government was a means of making prisoners better; it was a therapeutic agent. It was not a concession to imagined rights of prisoners, as some people thought; that would have been ridiculous. It was a way of preparing prisoners for a return to society. Mr. Osborne looked at the old autocratic prison system and said: "That system kills initiative, the power of choice, ability to render judgments, every faculty needed by a man in the world outside. Why is it sensible to prepare people for a return to society by holding them for three years, five years, sometimes ten and fifteen years in an environment as unlike that of society as possible?" To him self-government was a means of training people in the art of living in concert. It was the setting up of a miniature world in which relationships became spontaneous, acts normal, and men were allowed to control their own lives with as much freedom as was possible in a prison in which they had to be confined.

The Sing Sing prison into which Mr. Osborne, as warden in 1914, introduced this plan was an extraordinary institution. It was old, unhealthful, disease-ridden, lacking in accommodations. It was the most famous prison in the Western Hemisphere, receiving among others the most confirmed type of offenders from New York City and elsewhere. It was the prison which almost anybody would have picked out as least auspicious for such an undertaking. Mr. Osborne walked in with a courage born of confidence and zeal. He established his plan of inmate self-government. Almost overnight changes were apparent. Fights between prisoners, that barometer of prison influence and atmosphere, decreased. Men went out with heads erect and shoulders straight. Work was done more cheerfully; a new spirit pervaded the place. Tony Marino, Bowery bad man, escaped and, standing ready to catch a train with money in his pockets, listened to the pleas of former prisoners to return and "save the name of the League"; he returned, alone, knowing that two years would be added to his sentence.

But the establishment of self-government was not the only reform Mr. Osborne instituted at Sing Sing. He went after the grafters; he put out the cheating contractors who were defrauding the State. Such a record could not escape attack. Enemies arose on all sides. For a few months Mr. Osborne was the object of a campaign of abuse such as probably has had few parallels in this country. His personal character was assailed; a Westchester County grand jury indicted him for "perjury and neglect of duty." When the case came to trial the judge threw the charges out as too weak to be seriously considered. Mr. Osborne replied to these attacks, and he did not confine his replies to the courtroom. He took the stump. He went before audiences everywhere. Not only did he explain the grafting that went on at Sing Sing but he explained his new ideas about prison management. He described the abuses of the old system with a wit, an irony, an invective, a bitter denunciation of its aimlessness and stupidities that stirred his hearers deeply. Never have the follies of our conventional methods of handling prisoners been so effectively dealt with as in the speeches of Thomas Mott Osborne.

His resignation from Sing Sing came partly as a result of official meddlesomeness and partly as a result of the limitations of his own temperament. Meanwhile, self-government has not been much used as a therapeutic agent in American prisons. It is aside from the main line of criminological thinking. We are learning today that many criminals—probably more than half—are the victims of mental abnormalities and ailments that bear a direct causal relation to their crimes. It is the removal or modifying of these abnormalities that gives the greatest hope for the reformation of prisoners. Self-government takes little account of such factors. Mr. Osborne himself disclosed small understanding of this deeper approach to the problem. It was his genius for personal relationships and his power of appeal to the hearts of afflicted men that accounted primarily for his success.

Barbarism to Convicts

By BURT M. McCONNELL

AT intervals within the last three years there have come from Florida, Alabama, and North Carolina stories of the cruel and inhuman treatment of convicts that bring back visions of the thumb-screws and racks of the Spanish Inquisition. There is the case of Martin Tabert, for example, a twenty-two-year-old farmer boy from North Dakota who wanted to "see the world." Arrested as a vagrant in Florida and sentenced to pay a fine of $25 or become a convict for ninety days, he wired home for the money. It was sent to him by special delivery letter, but the Sheriff returned it, marked "Unclaimed." The Sheriff was getting $20 for each ninety-day prisoner turned over to a certain lumber company.

Tabert was farmed out to work for this lumber company, was flogged frequently with a heavy whip, and died in a delirium after an especially severe beating.

When the suspicious circumstances surrounding his death were called to the notice of the North Dakota Legislature, a resolution was passed calling upon the State of Florida to investigate. Despite the fact that there was some resentment against this "interference" with the affairs of one State by another, the Florida Legislature ordered an inquiry. This investigation, which established the fact that Tabert was beaten to death, resulted in such a wave of protest against Florida's county convict system that legislation was enacted prohibiting the leasing of all classes of convicts.

It was established that the Sheriff who had returned the money to Tabert's parents had an agreement with the lumber company to furnish it with free labor. The Sheriff was dismissed. The county judge who sentenced young Tabert was likewise dismissed, and the prison physician who was responsible for the care of prisoners in the lumber camp where Tabert died was denounced before the entire State as a "disgrace to the profession." The convict boss who wielded the lash was found guilty of second-degree murder in connection with the youth's death, and received a sentence of twenty years' imprisonment. Furthermore, a particularly brutal form of modern slavery was abolished; and with it the practice of whipping county convicts. Thus passed a regime that rivaled in hellishness the Siberian prison regime under the Czar of Russia or the horrors of the African slave trade. Martin Tabert, therefore, did not die in vain.

In fairness to the citizens of Florida, however, it should be stated that they believed the convict-leasing system to have been abolished several years before. And such traffic in human beings on the part of the State actually had been abolished by statute. But counties were still permitted to lease short-term prisoners to corporations or individuals.

The publicity given to the Tabert case helped to abolish this form of modern slavery in Florida, just as the story of "Uncle Tom" is credited with having played a large part in the abolition of slavery in the United States. Conditions were perhaps overdrawn in both instances, but it was necessary to cite extreme examples. It was necessary just before the Civil War to shake Americans out of their natural complacency, just as it was essential to bring sharply to the attention of Florida the cruel and barbarous methods in force at its county convict camps. For an easy-going and forgetful tolerance, especially regarding evils which do not happen uncomfortably close to our own doors, is one of the fundamental traits of Americans. It was this complacence which permitted the slave trade to flourish for so many years.

Last spring the Attorney General of Alabama conducted an investigation into the death of a convict which revealed a system that coins the sweat and blood of helpless human beings into profit, chiefly for a few corporations, and, secondly, for the State. The officials responsible for this deplorable state of affairs maintain that Alabama's convicts must be made self-supporting; and that it is necessary to lease them to private corporations and work them in coal mines. But in five Alabama prisons where there are no mines 1,784 convicts turned into the State treasury a net profit of more than $300,000 for the last fiscal year. The three prisons where there are mines continue to earn around $600,000 each year.

The Governor of Alabama has the power under State laws to end every form of convict leasing in Alabama, and it has seemed that each of the last three administrations might abolish the system; but it has always been passed along to the next. The excuse is that some way must be found to handle the convicts without placing further tax burdens upon the people. The State therefore sends its convicts to work in mines and other properties of private corporations. In the case of coal companies, where State convicts are concerned, the State supposedly leases the property from the corporation, mines the coal with convicts under its own control, and sells the coal back to the lessor. Actually, the State merely leases the prison stockade and its grounds and buildings. This was the arrangement which replaced the outright leases.

But this condition applies only to State convicts. County convicts, even in this enlightened age, are leased outright to private corporations. In fifty-one of sixty-seven counties in Alabama the county convicts are leased at so much per head to private concerns and individuals for work in coal mines, saw-mills, on farms, roads, etc. The concerns leasing them work them as they see fit, with their own bosses and guards. This amounts to the leasing of human beings into bondage. It is a system that encourages chain-gang bosses to practice brutality to keep production up to a certain standard. Both State and county systems are grounded in human greed and a species of moral cowardice that restrains Alabama's officials from levying taxes sufficient to bring in the necessary revenue.

What of North Carolina? Two serious convict scandals have come to light within the last year and a half. Early in 1925 Mrs. Kate Burr Johnson, executive secretary of the State Board of Charities and Public Welfare, brought two chain-gang guards to trial for the killing of convicts at one of the prison camps. The evidence which her investigators produced sent these men to prison for twenty years.

Last summer this same determined official brought about the prosecution of a former boss of the Stanly County convict chain-gang for the murder of two Negro prisoners. Although the convict road boss was acquitted on the testimony of two physicians that the convicts had died of sunstroke, the State's prosecutor proved beyond any reasonable doubt that the road boss cruelly beat the two Negroes on one of North Carolina's hottest days, when the men either were ill or feigned illness. They were beaten both in the morning and again in the afternoon. The last time they lapsed into unconsciousness and died the next morning. Other witnesses—ex-convicts, ex-guards, and citizens—told tales of cruel treatment administered by the road boss to his prisoners which rival the merciless methods used by slave drivers in the building of the pyramids.

But it was not for the jury to decide whether it was the practice in Stanly County to flog convicts with heavy leather straps, to beat them with clubs or shovels, to drag them behind a tractor over rough ground, or hang them up by their wrists to the ceiling. And in finding the convict boss not guilty of the killing of the two Negroes, the jury rendered no verdict on the question of general cruelty. But it is significant that the road boss, although accused of murder, did not take the witness stand to give testimony in his own defense; and that he was defended by ten of the best attorneys in the State.

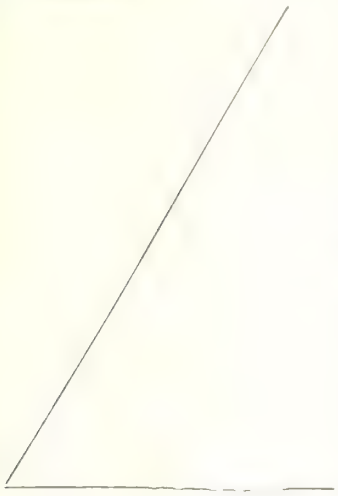
Stanly County's "whipping boss" was acquitted, but North Carolina's chain-gang system was convicted. That, in a nutshell, is the result of the trial. However, the trial brought to the attention of the public one of the serious problems that will confront North Carolina's next legislature—the abolition of the county chain-gang. It was abolished in Stanly County last fall, after the indictment of the former chain-gang boss. But more than fifty counties in the State still maintain these gangs.

North Carolina has two penal systems—the State penitentiary, where prisoners are employed in factories, on the prison farms, or are hired out to road contractors under State guard; and the county chain-gangs. There is no connection between the two, and the State Prison Board has no authority over the chain-gangs. The latter had their inception in the carpet-bagger days. They have continued with all the cruelty that might be expected when a chain-gang boss is vested with the authority of a czar. When convict bosses and guards have the power to inflict brutal treatment upon human beings, sooner or later they inflict it. That is the history of penal systems and the law of human nature.

Convicts are human beings, and they are helpless in the hands of the State. They should not be pampered and they should be required to discharge the debt which they owe to society. But, however far the convict may have fallen from grace, he is entitled to humane treatment. He is entitled to the protection of the State. And while it is right for the State to punish crime, for the protection of society, it should realize that every Christian nation in the world has prohibited the flogging of prisoners. The United States Government specifically prohibits the whipping of inmates of federal prisons or of men in the army and navy.

If other nations and our other States can maintain prison discipline without the use of the lash, why can not Alabama and North Carolina? The Governor of Georgia abolished convict leasing eighteen years ago, simply by calling a special session of the legislature. There was no quibbling, no hesitation, no beating about the bush, such as we have seen in Alabama. In Georgia convicts are not subjected to the cruelties of a coal-mine or chain-gang straw-boss; nor do they endure tortures in an isolated lumber camp, such as were exposed in Florida by the death of Martin Tabert. Nor is there complaint by State welfare officers of conditions among the convicts of Mississippi, Louisiana, South Carolina, and Tennessee. Cruelty is not a characteristic of the people of the South. For this reason it is all the more urgent that the disgrace of the cruel convict boss be wiped out. For civilization depends, in part, on the general tendency to be humane and decent, even to criminals.

In the Driftway



THE Drifter, alas! is not a go-getter, a he-man, or yet a 100 per cent American. From an earlier and more leisurely generation he takes a profound suspicion of this new and upstart culture. But he loves America, and because he loves her, the more bitter sometimes is the pill he has to swallow. Yet his face is by no means granite as he confronts the totality of the kingdom of Babbitt. The Drifter, heaven forbid, is no accountant. He would almost rather be a realtor. But he recognizes that such a term as "balance-sheet" may have its uses. It is a term to suit the philosopher, if he be so inclined, as well as the accountant. So the Drifter has made a balance-sheet of America, with assets to represent the things which please him and liabilities to represent the things which displease him. He is prepared to admit that some features of the asset items as listed are not altogether satisfactory, while some features of the liability items are not total losses. What he has done is to cite words standing for things which give him, as a whole, a rather definite reaction either of pleasure or of pain; of pride or of shame.

* * * * *

THE BALANCE-SHEET OF A CRANK

Assets	Liabilities
The Lincoln Memorial	The Movies
Bathrooms	The Radio
School buildings	Telephones
The Theater (in New York at least)	Saxophones
Henry Ford	Advertising
New England farm houses	The cult of the automobile
Bobbed hair	Correspondence Courses
Engineers	Comic Supplements
90,000 readers of the Mercury	Rotary clubs
Amateur athletics	Professional sport
Public health stations	The Great Open Spaces
About six novelists	Slums
Ditto poets	Mr. Bruce Barton
Ditto artists	Politicians (no exceptions)
Hydroelectric stations	99 per cent of all fiction
The outside of country clubs	Investment bankers
Anthropologists	The inside of country clubs
Mr. Herbert Hoover (see contra)	The Saturday Evening Post
More out-of-door children	Mr. Herbert Hoover (see contra)
More rebellious undergraduates	The Ku Klux Klan
	The Ghost of the Sage of East Aurora

Assets	Liabilities
Experimental schools	Hot dogs
Silk stockings	Suburbia
Cement bridges	Fundamentalists
The National Geographic Magazine	Prisons (no exceptions)
Pueblos	The National Manufacturers Association
John Dewey	Home, Mother, and the Flag
One-piece bathing suits	Traveling salesmen
Some psychologists	Millionaires
Ring Lardner	Tabloids
Short skirts	Bridge
The lads who build skyscrapers	Pittsburgh
California wines	Skyscrapers (with exceptions)
Flappers (in reason)	Subways
Fire Departments	Men's clothes
Birth Control	Prohibition
Slang	Books on sex
Cosmetics (in reason)	Professional uplifters
Motor buses	Atlantic City
Professional women	College presidents
The Hotel Shelton	Publicity directors
The Marx Brothers	Evangelists (no exceptions)
The Hudson River	Mission furniture
Oil heaters	Soft drinks
Beacon Hill on Christmas Eve	Mr. William Lothrop Stoddard
Mr. Clarence Darrow	Phonographs
To balance	Chewing gum
	Associated Charities
	Stock exchanges
	Stock yards
	Florida
	Interior decorators
	Currency reformers
	Boy friends
	Automatic pianos
	Y. M. C. A.'s
	Mr. Bernarr Macfadden
	Railroad stations (4 exceptions)
	Lawyers
	Package goods
	Los Angeles
	Mr. Arthur Brisbane
	Personality perfumes
	Service
	Dr. Frank Crane

* * *

WHICH runs him out of assets with no check whatsoever on the free mental flow of liabilities. He balances forthwith. The Drifter will welcome audits and corrections or even comparative balance-sheets. But do not try to trip him up for being illogical. He admits it in advance. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Why Profanity Declines

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: John Nicholas Beffel comments on the Decline of Profanity but he does not tell why it has declined and what has replaced it. Profanity has declined because religious faith has weakened, and thereby crippled the power of profanity to shock. The modern substitute for profanity is obscenity. I often marveled, when in the army, to hear discourse in which every sentence reeked with obscenity. The speaker usually lugged it in, generally [illegible] that without it the utterance would have lacked force and style.

Englewood, N. J., September 30 S. C. GILFILLAN

Remember Anthony Burns

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It may interest some readers of The Nation to learn that the grave of Anthony Burns, whose surrender under the Fugitive Slave Law stirred the nation in 1854, is in the cemetery at St. Catharines, Ontario. The gravestone bears the following inscription:

IN MEMORIAM
Rev. Anthony Burns.
The fugitive slave of the Boston riots, 1854,
Pastor of Zion Baptist Church;
Born in Virginia, May 31, 1834;
Died in the triumph of Faith in St. Catharines,
July 27th, A. D. 1862.

The stone has fallen over and is broken into three or four pieces. A very small sum would repair it and set it upright once more. No doubt the city authorities at St. Catharines would look after this if friends would provide for it.

London, Ontario, October 19 FRED LANDON

Progress?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Like Nathan Haskell Dole, I was brought up "after the straitest sect of the Pharisees," though with no such melancholy remembrances of the Sabbath, then rather rigidly observed, as seems to have followed him. I am not sure that the American Sunday as we have it now is an altogether cheerful spectacle, and I doubt very much whether it produces the moral stamina which came out of many of the old Puritan homes.

But the world of our day differs from the world of grandfather Dole's day in much more important particulars. It is one world in a measure then undreamed of. The labor power of the world is a giant compared with the pigmy of a century ago. In the expansion of human contacts and the expansion of man's creative power we are ahead of all the generations that have been. Whether these two items are to work for good or evil is the issue we face, and the event is by no means as certain as some of our liberal optimists would have us infer. The field is ours and the tools are ours. But whether betterment is really ours only our ability to get beyond individualism and idealism into the necessary economic adjustments can tell.

Los Angeles, October 15 ROBERT WHITAKER

Are Farm Speculators Entitled to Pity?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The material of Mr. Marsh's article is valuable and many of his deductions well worth consideration, but I fail to perceive the ground of his corollary that immigration should be stopped for a term of years and a government effort made to place superfluous farmers in industry. That misses the point.

The farming industry in this country has been based on a continuous increase of population. The cessation of that factor is a main cause of the present trouble. Nevertheless it produced artificial prosperity through the continuous rise in land values. An end to that condition was due, although not perhaps for fifty years, and much might have happened in that time.

The cardinal defect of our farming system is treating the land itself as merchandise instead of treating the products as such. Rent should be not a fixed sum but dependent on the returns, as it was the world over prior to the Reformation; and where the farmer owns the land his taxes should be on the same basis.

I have personally undertaken over periods of years several agricultural experiments, always profitably for the reason that I secured my market first. This is what is still done in many parts of Europe, notably France. The secret lies in bringing the consumer to the producer to consume the products on the spot, instead of indiscriminately producing and then howling for markets. But the corollary of that system requires that the land itself should not be treated as merchandise.

Oakland, California, October 21 EDWARD HENDERSON

Solving the Slums

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial, Cleaning Up the Slums, is timely and does you justice. May I diffidently and [illegible] to solve any problem?

It is true that I have had small success [illegible] Hundred. McAllister fared better with his Four Hundred until in an unguarded moment a friend induced him to try a new polish on his high hat, which turned green when the sun glinted on it. The parable of the camel and the needle and the other quadruped still holds good. Some of the wealthy are like the stamp collector with the possible exception that the stamp collector is not a bird of prey. Tut-ankh-amen tried an Egyptian recipe for taking his wealth with him and we know that he failed. But we have a new plan now which the wealthy will applaud and which [illegible] may give to the world next week. It will then remain for State and city to tell us whether they will come in, and I believe they will.

I am familiar with Governor Smith's bill passed at the last legislature, but, as you say, it was emasculated and we need more drastic action and opportunity for action. Cooperation between State, city, and our citizens can be had. Politics in this particular instance can, in my judgment, be eliminated. I have some knowledge of the facts of the case. I may be too optimistic. Who can tell? In one way or another we must support or help support those less mentally well equipped than we are, whose arms are falling from sheer fatigue. I know that with your [illegible] you will support [illegible] it is made known.

New York, October 23 AUGUST HECKSCHER

Florida Again

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The natural laws that operate in Florida are fortunately operative in every locality on earth that is suddenly visited with partial or complete loss, by fire, flood, earthquake, or hurricane. Immediately communal interest is aroused and self-preservation is secured through mutual aid. What was before a loose aggregation of individuals, each seeking personal success through competitive methods, becomes a welded group enlarged through sympathy of distant groups until well-nigh the entire nation is a unit for and during the emergency. This is in reality the most hopeful evidence of future advancement, for the spasmodic effort may sometime become the general and constant trend.

The first manifestation we look for after a disaster is aid from the outside. But would any locality be so abject and cowardly as to trade upon its losses, fail to round up its resources, and by general inaction announce to the world that it is both down and out and is willing henceforth to be the object of national charity?

Now when a community knows that its assets are sunshine climate, shelter, food, recreation, pleasure—and also knows that unless these are amply provided at a given time there will be continued loss and suffering—is it not admirable rather than damnable for that community or commonwealth to go resolutely to the work of rehabilitation and boldly announce that it intends to accomplish the seemingly impossible? Is it not legitimate if any community knows that its condition is grossly exaggerated, to ask for a restatement?

Let us not heap upon a stricken State the necessity of coping with unfriendly propaganda. Let us leave its citizens free to use all their mental, moral, and financial resources for the task of getting their communities ready to supply their winter guests with all the comforts they desire.

Real-estate frenzy may in the future as in the past break out in any locality. Realtors may flock from every State in the Union, as they have to Florida. But this condition cannot dominate the situation in any State that can offer a winter home.

California and Florida welcome the winter tourist as the Northern resorts do their summer guests. Why should they not all frankly admit that self-preservation lies that way? Why should self-efforts to rehabilitate any stricken area, and brave demeanor that looks forward, be considered worthy only of scorn?

MRS. OWEN R. LOVEJOY

St. Petersburg, Florida, October 15

Another Kind of Animal

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I don't see why you don't mention in your editorial The Political Zoo the program of the Socialist Party. It is true, as you say, that thinking persons everywhere are greatly worried by the steadily growing control of the country's life by the vast corporations centering in Wall Street. The only way to stop that control is the Socialist remedy of having the country own these corporations. Experience has amply demonstrated that mere attempts to control them will not suffice, because when the government tries to control or regulate the corporations the corporations or their owners simply put forth extra effort and extra cash to control the government by buying the Democratic and Republican parties. Both these parties today get their campaign funds from the plutocrats and both of them, as your article well shows, are therefore servants of plutocracy.

The Socialist Party, on the other hand, has stood steadfastly against this tendency. It alone had the courage to oppose the war, and since the war it has been banding its shattered forces to recover the ground lost at that time. It had the courage to sympathize with and support the Russian Revolution while at the same time it had the wisdom to refuse to accept Moscow domination.

Cambridge, Mass., October 20 ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

Indispensability Discovered

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A former classmate of mine returned to China early in September and left me with the request to send him, among the scores of American periodicals that he used to read, only two—The Nation and the American Mercury.

His request has been a blessing to me, for it necessitated a more careful reading of these two journals. I learned more about The Nation and found it better than I suspected. I discovered the excellence of the book reviews—the review of "The Story of Philosophy," to mention only one—and began to read Mr. Krutch's dramatic column regularly. And there are, of course, the never-failing editorials. The Nation is becoming indispensable to me, as it has become to thousands of others. When I return to China I hope I shall have the price of a subscription.

New York, October 22 CHI-CHEN WANG

Books and Plays

Dagger

(Translated from the Russian of Lhermontov)

By MAX EASTMAN

I love you well, my steel-white dagger,
Comrade luminous and cold;
Forged by a Georgian dreaming vengeance,
Whetted by Circassians bold.

A tender hand, in grace of parting,
Gave you to mark a meeting brief;
For blood there glimmered on your metal
A shining tear—the pearl of grief.

And black eyes, clinging to my glances,
Filled deep with liquid sorrow seemed;
Like your clear blade where flame is trembling,
They darkened quickly and they gleamed.

You were to be my long companion.
Give me your counsel to the end!
I will be hard of soul and faithful,
Like you, my iron-hearted friend!

First Glance

THE study of literary reputations is not as secondary as it sounds. Possibly the primary thing for a writer about literature to do is to discuss the qualities of great works, and in doing so to keep himself pure from contact with anything outside the authors under discussion and their books. But the trouble is that no good book stands alone. Poor ones do; they speak to nobody, nobody speaks to them. Good books are good among other reasons because people talk about them. And often it develops that the things thought and said about a masterpiece are as interesting as the masterpiece itself. This is particularly true of books which are centuries old, and which, through being constantly read while changes come about in the public taste and point of view, become virtually new books. The study of reputations thus becomes the study of the history of literary ideas.

Not long ago I reviewed three large volumes from the Cambridge University Press which followed the turns of Chaucer's fame through five centuries. Now from the Yale University Press comes another such study of an English reputation, on almost as great a scale. "Fielding the Novelist," by Frederic T. Blanchard ($6), is an exhaustive account of the things which have been said about "Joseph Andrews," "Tom Jones," and "Amelia" since their first appearance. To some readers the account will seem frightfully complete; but if they read on they will be vastly entertained and informed. They will see Fielding's reputation growing in its proper dramatic relationship to the reputations of other men—now down, now up, now suffering from comparisons and now benefiting by them. All the while, incidentally, they will be aware that the inarticulate public has read Fielding without stint; and this is interesting. Mr. Blanchard, allowably enough, confines himself to expressed opinions. First there was the opinion that Richardson spoke more directly "to the heart" than Fielding did. This was and is true—the significant thing being, however, the eighteenth century's preference for Richardson because of this. From the first also—and well on into the nineteenth century—there was the opinion that Fielding's novels could not be good books because their author was supposed to have been a bad man. Then there was the opinion that Fielding had not been great because he had not been sublime or romantic; there was the competition he had to face with Scott and later with Stevenson. There were charges in turn that he lacked "imagination" and "mystery," that he laughed too much, that he was only an observer of life—not a critic of it, or something like that. Always, too, there were individual champions, from Gibbon and Coleridge to Henley and Professor Cross.

Mr. Blanchard himself is so much the champion that he neglects to consider, after bringing his hero to the present full tide of his fame, the possibility of future descents into disfavor. I hope that none of these, if there are any, will be serious or for long; but I am sure they will occur. In the very near future, for instance, will there not be schools of critics who cannot get excited over Fielding's simplicity, democracy, and worship of nature? Will not these elements seem superfluously emphasized in "Tom Jones"? Doubtless nobody knows. But anyone may guess, and Mr. Blanchard's book would have been even more complete than it is had he done some guessing.

MARK VAN DOREN

Izvolsky Again

Izvolsky and the World War. By Friedrich Stieve. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

FRIEDRICH STIEVE has placed students of war origins under a double debt of gratitude. In a four-volume German edition of Izvolsky's correspondence he has rendered accessible some five hundred more letters and telegrams sent or received by the Russian ambassador in Paris from 1911 to 1914 than are given in Marchand's much-quoted "Livre Noir." Then by summarizing and commenting on the more significant passages in this correspondence he made the readable and compact study of Franco-Russian diplomacy before the war which is here translated into English. He comes to the following conclusion: "Since 1911 Izvolsky had been working for world war. Poincaré joined him in the autumn of 1912. And since the end of 1913 Sazonov also had seen in European complications the road which would lead Russia to the Straits."

Against Izvolsky Herr Stieve seems to make a pretty convincing case. After Izvolsky had made three futile attempts to open the Straits of the Bosporus and the Dardanelles to Russian warships in 1907, in 1908, and in 1911, he appears to have come to the conclusion that this could not be accomplished except through the complications of a general European war. It was, however, not Germany or Austria which had blocked his path but mainly England. Sir Edward Grey was unwilling to see the Straits opened to Russian warships but left closed to other Powers; to allow Russian warships to sally forth from the Black Sea into the Mediterranean and retreat again where the ships of other Powers were not allowed to follow them would be to convert the Black Sea into a great potential Russian naval fortress. So after 1911 Izvolsky appears to have done all he could to tighten the Triple Entente as opposed to the Triple Alliance and so prepare for the war which he regarded as inevitable and of which he said exultingly when it came in July, 1914: "C'est ma guerre!"

But as regards M. Poincaré and M. Sazonov, Herr Stieve is less convincing. By over-simplification and by his selection of passages to prove his thesis, he seeks to make it appear that the aims and policies of Izvolsky, Poincaré, and Sazonov were identical and in harmony. But if one reads the original documents carefully and without bias, one sees that this is by no means the case. Sazonov was a changeable, secretive, weak minister, who was much afraid of Pan-Slav press criticism. He did not always reveal his purposes to his ally or to his ambassador in Paris. He sometimes shifted his ideas in a manner most disconcerting to the French and the English. M. Poincaré, as he now asserts in his recently published memoirs, was often suspicious of both Sazonov and Izvolsky. The latter he now declares was a snob, an arch-intriguer, and an unreliable reporter of conversations; the pity is that, if he really felt so about him before the war, he did not get him recalled and have a more reliable Russian ambassador sent to Paris in his place. But he evidently feared that any serious attempt to do so might jeopardize his great aim of tightening the bonds of the Triple Entente. In working with might and main for this, he tended to divide the Powers of Europe more and more into two armed and opposing camps, so that the Triple Entente could impose its will on the Triple Alliance; or if a diplomatic crisis arose, the former would defy the latter and willingly risk war rather than accept diplomatic defeat. This was exactly what happened in 1914. A European war was not "inevitable." But Poincaré believed that it was inevitable. He made his preparations accordingly by tightening the Triple Entente, by the adoption of the three-year term of service, and by his loans and repeated promises of support to Russia. In so doing, he did in fact tend to make the war "inevitable." This is his great responsibility, rather than that he plotted deliberately with Izvolsky to bring about a war by which France should recover Alsace-Lorraine.

Even if one does not accept all of Herr Stieve's conclusions, his book is one which students of war origins should read and check up by reference to the original documents from which he has made selections.

SIDNEY B. FAY

The Modest Method of Willa Cather

My Mortal Enemy. By Willa Cather. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

A CHARACTERISTIC contemporary novel which lies open before me begins: "The door opened and the sunlight sprang into the hall like a great blond beast." Miss Cather, on the other hand, commences thus: "I first met Myra Henshaw when I was fifteen." Where the first would capture the attention by violent assault, the other asks only with classic courtesy for the loan of one's ears, and this beginning is characteristic of a certain modesty of method in which half the charm of Miss Cather's stories lies.

In a penetrating essay, The Novel Démeublé, she has herself made a plea for a type of fiction less elaborate in its mechanics than the conventional novel, and she has put her preaching into practice by scrupulously avoiding in her best work any machinery more elaborate than her tale required; yet the modesty of which I speak is something beyond that—something which inheres in the very fact that her stories are frankly stories, events retained in the mind of, and recounted by, a definite person. At a time when novelists are seeking above all else "immediacy" of presentation and are employing not seldom fantastic means to attain it, she has sought no such illusion, has made no effort so to dramatize her narrative as to make it the equivalent of a contemporaneous experience. Events are seen frankly through the haze of distance; the thing immediately present is not these events themselves but the mind in which they are recollected; and the effect is, therefore, not the vividness and the harshness of drama but something almost elegiac in its softness. The knowledge of the narrator is both mellow and imperfect; he gropes, reflects, and tries (after the manner of a human, far from omniscient, spectator) to piece together the bits of his information and to extract from it as much as he can of its secret meaning. What we get is not that sense of present action for which novelists more commonly seek but rather a mood—the reverberations of wonder, of interest, and of pity which have lingered after many years in a sensitive, resonant temper.

Told in a different fashion the story of "My Mortal Enemy" might be almost lurid. Its central character, a somewhat spectacular woman who made in her youth a sacrifice of wealth for love and then found herself throughout life unable to maintain the high mood which would make of such sacrifice a success, is all but flamboyant. Yet told as Miss Cather tells it the effect is not of storm and stress but rather of a quiet and brooding sadness, because its center is the mind of the narrator. She has known the woman when she was still the heroine of a village legend, still a symbol of the love and youth that triumph over difficulty; she has seen her at intervals during the years that follow; and she has gradually divined how things stand, how what began as high romance has ended in the sordid impasse to which a wife who insists upon luxuries beyond her husband's income leads both him and herself. To the girl who tells the story, Myra was more than merely an acquaintance, she was one of those from whom life could be learned. In her she had hoped to see romance justified, young faith encouraged; but from her she heard instead: "People can be lovers and enemies at the same time, you know. We were:—A man and woman drawn apart from that long embrace, and see what they have done to each other. Perhaps I can't forgive him for the harm I did him. Perhaps that's it. In age we lose everything; even the power to love." And it was not, we feel, that Myra was worse than most; only that high resolution is an affair of minutes, life an affair of years. Only things founded in selfishness and prudence last it out—hence the lachrymae rerum for which there is no help.

This method of Miss Cather's—and she has never, I think, been entirely successful except when adhering to it—has its obvious limitations. It does not stir deep passions and it is, as Nietzsche would have said, to the last degree Apollonian. The mood is a minor mood, brooding and faintly melancholic, with an eye turned always backward. But in the midst of our strident literature its graceful ease has a charm not easy to overestimate. Whenever Miss Cather evokes memory there comes with it a lingering fragrance.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Selling Dinosaurs

On the Trail of Ancient Man. By Roy Chapman Andrews. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $6.

THE advertising experts should go to school to the paleontologists. They sold books to millions at a few dollars each; but the experts of the American Museum of Natural History sold million-year-old dinosaur eggs to a few, at thousands of dollars each. Where other scientists have plodded across the nearer sands of Mongolia in painfully lonely expeditions the Museum has persuaded the public to finance the wildest, happiest, completest expeditions, equipped with up-to-date Gobi-conquering Dodge cars, caravans of camels, jazz to tame the unruly llamas, white table-cloths, and all the latest scientific apparatus. There is in the history of science no advertising success to compare with the Third Asiatic Expedition, which Mr. Chapman here describes, unless it be the feat of making Einstein world-famous with millions who had no idea what it was all about.

The beauty of it is that with all the trumpet-blowing it was in fact both a merry and a successful scientific adventure. Kozloff and Sven Hedin followed their camels for years; Roy Andrews picked the best months of the year and in his Detroit motor-cars covered a camel's week in a day, and, with his crew of botanists, zoologists, geologists, paleontologists, and motor mechanics, forced the Gobi Desert to yield up treasures which slower travelers had never suspected. "On the Trail of Ancient Man" is the first hasty summary, a sort of report to stockholders. It tells a gorgeous story of hunting the Golden Fleece in the rugged mountains of Shensi, of wild motor rides across country unknown even to the Mongols, of mad races with [illegible] who kicked up the sands for sixteen steady miles at thirty miles per hour, of the discovery of a dinosaur nest where a precipice dropped into the desert, of sandstorms that ripped the beds from under sleepers, of the patient work of scientists who brush fossils out of sandstone with a camel's-hair brush, of baluchitheres that died in quicksand a million years ago, of impressive fossil links between Cretaceous Asia and America, of almost everything except the trail of ancient man. Of that there is little beyond Henry Fairchild Osborn's prophecy that the origin of man would be traced to Mongolia, "the roof of the world." They did discover relics of a prehistoric race of dune-dwellers who made dinosaur eggs into necklaces some twenty thousand years ago—but two unadvertised French Jesuits had found as much and more, in the Ordos Desert south of Andrews's hunting-grounds, two years earlier, and these dune-dwellers are by no means the earliest known men. The Jesuits knew less of advertising than the New Yorkers, which perhaps is their loss. For the world has a right to ask that its scientists tell it the news in terms that it can understand, and it responds to those who tell the tale.

Roy Andrews has the gift of communicating his own enthusiasms. Apparently the whole expedition absorbed his adventurous passion for the uncrowded reaches of the earth, and the hunt for fossils became a rollicking chapter in pioneer romance. There is melodrama in his account of how six armed Americans overawed a score of zealous Mongol frontier officials and of how he routed bandits beyond Kalgan; there is poetry in his pictures of the purple cliffs and dancing mirages of the Gobi; and on page after page one finds that frontier spirit which, across the barriers of language, creates a bond between American and Mongol and—though Andrews seems not to know it—Russian.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

"Angel"

Angel. By Du Bose Heyward. George H. Doran Company. $2.

"ANGEL," like "Porgy" last year, leaves one with a compulsive sense of radiance and loneliness; and it is the direct continuity of spirit, running clear as water from one book to the other, that convinces one of Mr. Heyward's integrity and intensity as a writer. The books are different and similar. One is the story of a man, a Negro of the swarming tenements in Charleston; the other is the story of a girl who is rapturously a part of the isolated North Carolina mountains. But the two tales have in common a crystalline quality through which is felt the personal will butted against immensity, pitting a single strength against the whole procession. The passionate desire to remain intact possesses most of Mr. Heyward's characters. His belief in the right to live, his perception of the tragic frustrations that are so often the doom of the rebel, his sympathy for primitive people and their codes—these are the sinews which build his elemental dramas.

They are made of more than sinew. They are lavishly full of beauty—"Angel" particularly, for Mr. Heyward knows the North Carolina highlands well. Angel is a girl of these hills. She lives with her father, the Rev. Thornley, a gaunt itinerant preacher. Submissive habit makes her follow her father's exhortations, but the hills speak to her more deeply than his prayers. When Angel falls in love with Buck Merritt she must abandon herself to him joyfully. Buck makes whiskey and is as honestly proud of his still, which has come to him from his grandfather, as [illegible] but it is against just such encroachments that Thornley has battled most tenaciously. He betrays Buck to the sheriff; the mountaineers burn with the outrage; but they cannot guess the traitor, and Angel is unable to sacrifice her own parent. Angel henceforth [illegible] and who is willing to say nothing about Buck's child, she saves herself from the bitter defeat of other mountain women. The complicated climax is the only weakness of the book. "Porgy" was superbly simple; "Angel" shines with the same simplicity at first, but the end is not so convincing.

LENORE G. MARSHALL

Historical Portraiture

Jefferson. By Albert Jay Nock. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

Fathers of the Revolution. By Philip Guedalla. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

THESE two volumes offer a challenge to the historian. They have literary merit. Needless to say neither of the authors is a professional researcher. I feel almost compelled to take upon myself the defense of my fellow-craftsmen who sin so frequently against the laws of belles-lettres and sometimes even glory in their independence. Substance is so much more desirable than form. I shall not gird on my armor, however, for the challenge is a fiction. The majority of historians are craftsmen, and worthy craftsmen; but they are not artists. Fortunately a few do combine a knowledge of their trade with the practice of artistry. Consider Carl Becker and Claude Bowers. "Le style c'est l'homme." What need for a defense?

The purpose of the two volumes is the same, historical portraiture. Both have succeeded, but not in equal measure. Their problems differ somewhat. The space at the disposal of Mr. Nock is sufficient for a full-length portrait with every detail carefully worked out. On the other hand, Mr. Guedalla portrays in less space twelve men, six Englishmen, four Americans, and two Frenchmen (by a whimsical inversion he places among the founders of the Republic George III, Lord North, and Generals Burgoyne and Cornwallis). But this difference in acreage does not affect a comparison of the results.

Mr. Nock calls his book "a study in conduct and character." He is careful to deny that he is an historian. The denial was superfluous, provided he means by the term a man of research. His instinct has been a safe guide. It has led him to a careful perusal of the best monographs on his subject; and he has evidently soaked himself for years in Jeffersoniana until he has been able to identify his own mind with that of the Great Democrat. This is an excellent preparation for his purpose of presenting to his readers a picture of Jefferson in his many activities as farmer, politician, political philosopher, diplomat, scientist, and inventor. He has been remarkably successful. The man Jefferson stands forth with all his virtues and vices. I have but one serious criticism to make of the portrait. Mr. Nock has failed to do justice to the politician; Jefferson was a pioneer in developing the machinery of politics and in experimenting with the manipulation of public opinion in a democracy.

The reader of this work is never conscious of the art of the author. The simplicity of the style and its directness constitute the charm of the narrative. Jefferson through his acts and his words is constantly kept in the forefront of the picture. This is the proper historical method. The man is revealed through his activities, physical and mental. Whether he likes it or not, Mr. Nock must be accorded a place among the skilled historians who are primarily interested in synthesis.

Mr. Guedalla is a professional litterateur, and he never lets you forget his vocation. His literary mechanism is always in evidence. That the reader may be intrigued at the start, he begins in a majority of cases with a clever little essay of three or four pages on a subject wholly foreign to the portrait of the personage to be drawn. Thus Lord North is introduced by a dissertation on memorial statues, General Cornwallis by three pages on the failure of historic persons to recognize their significant acts. Perhaps his straining for effect grows wearisome, but at times Mr. Guedalla is very happy in his descriptions. He is graphic when he describes the aged Chatham as speaking in the House of Lords "less like an ex-minister than as chorus of a tragedy." Too frequently, however, one feels that truth is sacrificed to epigram. To write of Chatham in 1766 as having made "his name grotesque with a peerage" is downright silly. To call him "an Elizabethan minister astray in the eighteenth century" sounds clever; but unfortunately the Great Commoner resembled Disraeli much more than he did Walsingham. Neither comparison has any meaning.

Mr. Guedalla has failed in his portraiture where Mr. Nock has been most successful. He does not present his "Fathers" as acting or thinking. One outstanding reason for this is that he is not familiar enough with his characters. He has never lived with them. Furthermore his interpretation of the political situation is not up to date; it is of the vintage of 1900. He should have read numerous monographs and essays of which I fear he has never heard. He has read widely, but his interest has lain in externals, physical appearance, mannerisms in walking and talking. My pleasure in the book comes from the feeling of intimacy which I have with the subjects—the intimacy of watching a friend shaving.

CLARENCE WALWORTH ALVORD

Pale Rain

Summer Storm. By Frank Swinnerton. George H. Doran Company. $2.

IN most of Mr. Swinnerton's novels there is an architectural symmetry that inevitably delights the lover of technical excellence. By their harmonious parts, their neatly fitted joints, and their beautifully matched or contrasted decorative details they remind one of those flawless Romanesque churches that were built in such numbers at the beginning of this century. Instinct with artifice, if not with art, they are obviously made rather than born. And yet, in "Nocturne" and occasionally in "September" and "The Elder Sister," how unobtrusively the underlying framework reinforces the graceful structure laid upon it!

In "Summer Storm," too, one cannot but admire the skill with which Polly and Beatrice are counterpoised and every scene between them—or between either of them and Falconer—is made to yield its predetermined contribution to the whole drama. Nevertheless, as each carefully plotted conversation leaves its precisely measured quantity of enlightenment and uncertainty behind it, one becomes so much aware of the mechanics involved—especially in the matter of creating suspense—that one's apperception of the characters themselves is dimmed. It is as though a wall had been erected between us and the protagonists of the story, a wall of glass through which we see them clearly but always with the consciousness that they are out of reach.

The love of two girls for the same man is of course one of Mr. Swinnerton's favorite themes, but never before has he taken this problem so lightly. Polly is an engaging but colorless little creature, Beatrice by contrast suggests melodrama and the movies, and Falconer remains throughout merely a vague representative of the social class that Mr. Swinnerton seems least able to make convincing. Their loves and jealousies affect none of them very vitally and us not at all. It is in the subtle interplay of the relations between these three, rather than in them or in their feelings, that the reader will find his interest engaged. The story will hold him, as a story, despite any recognition he may have of its essential artificiality. He will applaud the author's successful projection of his varied backgrounds—the girls' office, the Lane house, the London streets—and of some of his minor characters—Mrs. Lane and Mercy, perhaps, though certainly not the incredible Mr. Abel. The sensitive reader will also be rejoiced by certain revelatory flashes of insight into the more delicate phases of emotion, such things, for example, as the recognition of the significant intimacy of the pronouns "we" and "you" on the lips of unacknowledged lovers. These flashes, however, are unexpectedly and disappointingly rare, and one's final impression of "Summer Storm" is that by the side of Mr. Swinnerton's lustrous best it must be ranked as a rather pale achievement.

GRACE FRANK

Social Bibliography

A Guide to the Printed Materials for English Social and Economic History (1750-1850). By Judith Blow Williams. Columbia University Press. Two volumes. $10.

"THE history of the Victorian Age will never be written: we know too much about it. . . . Concerning the age which has just passed, our fathers and our grandfathers have poured forth and accumulated so vast a quantity of information that the industry of a Ranke would be submerged by it, and the perspicacity of a Gibbon would quail before it." Mr. Lytton Strachey's familiar paradox haunts the weaker hours of historians of modern England. Yet in their best moments they know that their formidable task must and will be done. Society cannot afford to be without the guidance of reliable knowledge of its past, especially its immediate past; and contemporary England and America, reeling through the chaos of post-war and industrial disorganization, are in desperate need of what wisdom may be gleaned from England's experience of the Napoleonic Wars and the unprecedented problems of the Industrial Revolution. But by the bewildering acceleration of the printing press so vividly described by Mr. Strachey the Industrial Revolution has discouraged its interpreters at the very outset. Little wonder that there has been hitherto no source-book of recent social and economic history comparable to those which so dependably direct research into the ancient and medieval periods.

This lack Professor Williams has supplied most competently. She has surveyed the century between the inception of machine industry after 1750 and the emergence of the complex industrial state about 1850. Her "Guide" is much more than a compilation and classification of book titles, although even here her rummaging among obscure libraries, court and parish records, etc., contributes definitely to knowledge. Her method is selective. She has winnowed out the valuable third or quarter of some 25,000 volumes examined. She has subjoined to each bibliographical item a concise summary of its content, and often has added a personal judgment of value. The author's Foreword is a keen and sane analysis of the importance and difficulties of research in the period; and short histories of journalism, banking, trade unionism, law reforms, public-health movements, etc., introduce special sections. There are full bibliographies of government reports, of industrial technology in various stages, of economic and political theories and movements, of biographies of significant figures. The American scholar will welcome the greater proportion given to books available in libraries in the United States.

Remarkably few valuable books published anterior to 1925 have escaped inclusion in Professor Williams's 1,100 pages. She has foreseen "the incomprehensible omission of the obvious," of which one may instance the correspondence of J. S. Mill with Carlyle and with Gustave d'Eichthal, and the scholarly volumes of Mr. D. A. Wilson which are superseding Froude's untrustworthy "Life" of Carlyle. But any serious objection must be directed, not at her vigilance but at her judgment of the value of certain volumes or her policy of excluding certain materials. For example, the reviewer regrets her omission of "a systematic survey of works of general literature as reflecting the social problems of the time," for which she refers the reader to the "Cambridge History of English Literature" and similar works. Such departmentalizing of knowledge is unfortunate at a time when historians are increasingly recognizing the importance of literature as the classic expression of social attitudes, and when literary historians are awaking to the indispensability of social background for the adequate interpretation of letters. Encouragement to healthy cooperation among specialized historians could have been given by the mention of Professor Louis Cazamian's "Roman Social en Angleterre" and "Carlyle," and of American works like Professor Vida Scudder's "Social Ideals in English Literature" and Professor Ashley H. Thorndike's "Literature in a Changing Age."

But such cavils seem ungrateful in view of Professor Williams's thorough and self-effacing accomplishment of an enterprise so large and socially valuable. Her survey of primary sources comes at the opportune moment when an unusual number of secondary and interpretative works are in preparation. Hereafter there will be little excuse for glib or sentimental generalizations concerning the Industrial Revolution and other origins of contemporary civilization. The general student of history will welcome the selective character of Professor Williams's work, and the specialist will find it an invaluable point of departure. The productivity of the next decade and interest in events subsequent to 1850 will, it is hoped, bring forth a new edition; but the main roads through the field seem definitely opened.

EMERY NEFF

Books in Brief

Cornish Names. An Attempt to Explain over 1,600 Cornish Names. Longmans, Green and Company. $1.50.

An interesting excursion into practical etymology.

The Inner Harbor. More Maine Coast Poems. By Wilbert Snow. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.75.

The author of "Maine Coast" continues in his vigorous vein to celebrate the simpler virtues of New England. His material is interesting, and he is interesting; few recent volumes of poetry have been more readable. But his original fault, a somewhat wooden regularity of beat, is still present; and it would seem that he is most promising in those lyrics wherein he gets farthest away from the ideas of "description" and local color.

Pope. The Leslie Stephen Lecture for 1925. By Lytton Strachey. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.

This essay is so good that it could have been better. As an appreciation of Pope's immortal poetry it is welcome and even exciting; but in the course of defending Pope against his romantic detractors, such as Matthew Arnold, Mr. Strachey had several opportunities to analyze the poet's quality, and this he never does. He only describes it.

Selected Poems of Carl Sandburg. Edited by Rebecca West. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

This selection is especially distinguished by Miss West's introduction, which brilliantly describes for a British audience—and for that matter an American one—the idiom of Mr. Sandburg, relating that idiom to the loquaciously introspective genius of the Middle West.

Science and Poetry. By I. A. Richards. The New Science Series, Vol. II. W. W. Norton and Company. $1.

An arresting analysis, inspired largely by the same author's "Principles of Literary Criticism," of the handicap incurred by poetry in any day, and particularly our own, when it bases itself upon beliefs. Beliefs change and poetry dies—unless it is pure. As in his previous book, Mr. Richards is concerned with a definition of poetry which shall make of it an instrument capable of clarifying and assisting, rather than thwarting or evading, the fundamental psychological processes.

The Elder Brother. By Anthony Gibbs. Dial Press. $2.

Viewed from the level of his first novel, this second one by Mr. Gibbs is a distinct step up. The author has put aside some of his Christmas-tree ornaments of style; he no longer turns verbal handsprings in front of his characters. The London and Oxford backgrounds are skilfully managed, and the narrative moves at a good clip. To be sure, one accepts the story with certain reservations, but unlike "Peter Vacuum" it does not deserve to be thrown bodily out of court.

The Keen Desire. By Frank B. Elser. Boni and Liveright. $2.

A certain kind of idealist recoils from life in silence. There is another kind, like the hero of this book, who with energy rushes terrified upon life, most afraid always of his fear, crying out with the pain of it. Martin Lavery has keen desires, but for just what he doesn't know. The book is a remarkably straightforward account of the behavior of a young man who is moved by mixed urgings, obsessional and rational; by the tension that comes from a fear of being patronized (he's so unsure of himself); and by an even more compelling fear of that fear. For the man of any insight knows that the real terror of life is terror of self. Martin's drunken debauches, his erotic reveries, his flutterings toward romance, his cruel and delicious self-torture, his unhappy consciousness of self are all put down, sometimes with shrewd observation and always with a terrible sincerity.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. This year in addition a second prize of $50 and a third prize of $25 will be offered. The rules for 1926 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Wednesday, December 1, and not later than Friday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page.

3. No manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poems will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 9, 1927.

7. Besides the winning poems, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Drama

Something New in Theaters

ON October 25 Miss Eva LeGallienne moved with a company into the dingy old playhouse on Fourteenth Street and constituted it forthwith The Civic Repertory Theater. On the outside the same old paint is peeling from the columns, and inside the same garish gold and red, dictated by Neapolitan taste in the recent days when the building housed popular-priced opera by and for the inhabitants of Little Italy, still offends the eye. The aisles are lined with well-worn linoleum and the seats are far from resplendent, yet the institution born amid these depressing surroundings is one to pique curiosity and to stir hopes. During the first week of its existence two ambitious plays were presented—one extremely well—and a long list of others is promised. Moreover the top price is one dollar and sixty-five cents.

That Miss LeGallienne is not a supremely great actress is obvious enough. She never succeeds in submerging her own rather odd personality in any role, and her plaintive voice is suitable only to baffled and querulous characters; but the energy which enabled her to launch her enterprise almost, it would seem, single-handed augurs well for its success, and she has, besides, proved herself a director of unusual skill. Of the two plays so far presented the first, Benavente's "Saturday Night," is merely, I think, a second-class work—pretentiously empty symbolism not quite redeemed by some bright lines and one act of colorful melodrama; the second, however, Chekhov's "The Three Sisters," is not merely a remarkable play but a challenge to any director as well. Almost completely innocent of action in the ordinary sense and depending entirely upon character and atmosphere for its effect, it demands the most skilful handling if it is not to fall into an intolerable tedium. In it three sisters, marooned on a Russian Main Street, bewail the dulness of their lives; when the final curtain descends it leaves them in a state somewhat worse than the one they were in when it rose; and that, in one sense, is all. Yet in the meantime the famous Russian soul has been skilfully anatomized by one who was enough of it to share its moods, enough above it to regard it with humorous detachment. A full dozen delicately delineated characters have had their hour upon the stage and the whole tone of Russian provincial society, with its mixture of poetic melancholy and rowdy gaiety, has been richly evoked. Chekhov has transferred to the stage both the baffled aimlessness of his stories and their charm as well. Or, rather, Chekhov has devised a text which challenges the director to do just that. No play could be less trusted to play itself, no play calls for more delicate emphasis or more skilful management of the numerous characters who are held in relation to one another not so much by the thread of any action as by their relation to a chord which the playwright has struck and of which they constitute the component notes. All that it demands of a director Miss LeGallienne has acomplished extraordinarily well, and the members of her company have found themselves uniformly capable of interpreting the various roles they are called upon to play.

More interesting, however, than either of the two plays so far produced is the question of the fate in store for the organization which produced them. Here is something new in the world of the New York theater, new not because it is a repertory theater but because it is one which apparently intends to make no concessions in the direction of what it is generally supposed that the public demands. Not only are "The Three Sisters" and most of the other plays so far announced plays which have no obvious appeal to even the more arty portion of the general public, but the institution itself has been founded without provision for any of the adventitious aids to success. There is no imposing list of patrons, no suggestion, a la Vanity Fair, that the best people will be expected to discuss Civic Repertory. Society can hardly be tempted to the shabby confines of the present building, which is not even picturesque like a Greenwich Village cellar or a remodeled horse-barn, but merely dingy instead. One does not even pay more here than elsewhere—one pays, indeed, considerably less—and so there is not the least reason for coming except, perchance, the desire to see a play which has nothing, not even sensational novelty, to recommend it except its own intrinsic merits. Never before has the thing been tried.

George Kelly's "Daisy Mayme" (Playhouse) is an amusing acid comedy which deals with a family struggle not unlike that which furnished the basis of the same author's "Craig's Wife." The scene is again Suburbia and the theme again the bitter, Machiavellian struggle of a woman for the possession of a house—this time the house of her brother into which a wife threatens to intrude. The malicious minuteness of Mr. Kelly's observation and the verisimilitude of his mimicry in dealing with the conversation and manners of the middle-class American are not surpassed by any of the numerous dramatic authors now exploiting the same milieu, but the thing which most clearly distinguishes him from the others is the dramatic tension which he manages to impart to his satires. Ridiculous his characters are, but his women have a demoniac intensity, a poison in their pettiness, that makes them terrible as well. "Daisy Mayme" is not merely funny, it is, like "Craig's Wife," exciting as well. At Henry Miller's Theater Raquel Meller is again appearing in a program of Spanish songs.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

The Neighborhood Playhouse, 466 Grand Street, N. Y. Telephone Drydock 7516
REPERTORY
OPENING NOV. 4
The Revival of the Hindu Classic
The Little Clay Cart
Playing thru Nov. 10th Mat. Sat.
Also Nov. 11 to 17 (incl.)
The Lion Tamer
"An extremely saucy comedy of the French circus." Alexander Woollcott.

Longacre Theatre, 48th St., West of Broadway. Evenings 8:30
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30
THEODORE DREISER'S
AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY
"A PLAY WHICH IS BOUND TO WRENCH A MILLION HEARTS." Journal.
DRAMATIZED BY PATRICK KEARNEY.

THEATRE GUILD PRODUCTION
WERFEL'S STIRRING DRAMA
JUAREZ AND MAXIMILIAN
with the Theatre Guild Acting Co.
GUILD Theatre, West 52d Street. Evenings, 8:30
Matinees, Thursday & Saturday, 2:30

LECTURES

THE ARTS of the THEATRE of TODAY
OUR CONTEMPORARY ARTS: SECOND SERIES
At the Anderson-Milton School of the Theatre
128-130 EAST 58TH STREET
Helen Arthur, Nov. 9 — Sidney Howard, Dec. 7
Stark Young, Nov. 16, Jan. 25 — Christopher Morley, Dec. 14
Richard Boleslavsky, Nov. 23 — Lee Simonson, Jan. 11
Alice Brown, Nov. 30 — Adolph Bolm, Jan. 18
Joseph Wood Krutch, Feb. 1, Feb. 8
Single Admission $2.25 Special Rate for Course $22.
Tickets on Sale: National League of Girls' Clubs, 472 West 24th St.
Anderson-Milton School of the Theatre, 128 East 58th St.
Make checks payable to National League of Girls' Clubs.

WILLIAM MORROW & COMPANY

The Outstanding Biography of the Year

George Washington

The Human Being and the Hero

1732 — 1762

by

RUPERT HUGHES

"MR. HUGHES has taken the youthful Washington, a fading myth, and made him a red-blooded, lusty, gusty human being for the first time. A splendid, stirring story. . . ." — Claude G. Bowers in The Nation.

"THIS figure is made understandable by Rupert Hughes and places George Washington really on a higher and more imposing pedestal than that which has been built by generations of flatterers and endless volumes of fulsome and uncritical praise." — Editorial in Cleveland Plain Dealer.

"A SERENE, well-balanced, but acutely critical study. . . . It is a great relief to find an able, popular author coming back to the old, well-bred tradition that a writer should talk to his reader across the printed page in the same spirit in which a gentleman would talk to another across a dinner table. . . . This first volume has set a high mark for the second."— Nathaniel Wright Stephenson in N. Y. World.

"THE Washington presented by Mr. Hughes can be accepted as the truest picture yet offered."— W. C. Ford in Boston Herald.

Second printing, 590 pages, with many illustrations. $4.00

303 Fifth Ave. New York

IS IT GOD'S WORD?

AN EXPOSITION OF THE FABLES AND MYTHOLOGY OF THE BIBLE AND THE IMPOSTURES OF THEOLOGY

By Joseph Wheless

GEORGE A. DORSEY

(author of Why We Behave Like Human Beings) says:

"Every boy and girl in America should have access to 'Is It God's Word?' and every pulpit in Christendom should have a copy. The time has come for a showdown between mummied superstition and enlightened curiosity. Wheless deals the fetish worshippers a staggering blow —they should no longer be allowed to control the education of the youth."

$5.00 at all bookstores

Alfred A. Knopf, 730 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

BORZOI BOOKS

NORTON BOOKS

THE MEANING OF A LIBERAL EDUCATION

By Everett Dean Martin

WHAT IS WORTH KNOWING?

Does knowledge really help us? What do people expect to become when they set out to improve their minds? What are the essentials of a liberal education? This book is not concerned with schools or colleges but raises the deepest questions about human life. It undertakes to interpret education as a possible way of thinking about questions of daily living, and to help us to determine what an educated person really is. $3.00

Modern Science and People's Health

Edited by Benjamin C. Gruenberg

THIS IS THE STORY of what science is doing for people's health. A group of distinguished authorities, including an anatomist, chemist, physiologist, psychiatrist, bacteriologist, and former public health official, have joined forces to give to the general public, in clear language, the "secrets" of the remarkable advances in medical science. A book certain to become a health classic. $2.50

Leading booksellers everywhere carry these books. If your bookseller cannot supply you write to the publishers.

W. W. NORTON & COMPANY INC. 70 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK

THE MODERN WORLD

Edited by JESSE LEE BENNETT

A MAGAZINE SEEKING TO DEAL CONSTRUCTIVELY WITH THE IDEAS, THE PERSONALITIES AND THE INSTITUTIONS WHICH ARE MOLDING AND SHAPING THE CONTEMPORARY WORLD. A NON-NATIONALIST, NON-PARTISAN, NON-SECTARIAN, NON-DOCTRINAIRE JOURNAL EMPHASIZING THE FACTS AND IDEAS WHICH UNITE MEN RATHER THAN THOSE WHICH SEPARATE THEM

In the November number are the following articles:

Tabloid Minds and Celluloid Emotions.....Phillips Russell
Giant Power—The Hope of Civilization .McAlister Coleman
Medley of Modernity.....M. H. Hedges
International War Debts.....John W. Bennett
The Corrosive Effect of Anti-Babbittry...McKee Barclay

15c. a copy. $1.50 a year.

THE MODERN WORLD, 331 North Charles Street, Baltimore, Md.

Name .....

Enclosed find $1.50 for one year's subscription.

Address .....

City..... State.....

International Relations Section

Soviet Industry

By HAROLD KELLOCK

KRASSIN, at the time he was Assistant Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the Soviet Government, remarked: "If Russia can get foreign loans, she can recover. Without foreign loans she will have to crawl on her hands and knees." There have been no foreign loans. Yet the ninth anniversary of the Soviet state finds the monthly reports of the principal industries showing an output equal to that of 1913—with the exception of iron mining and the metal industry. The railways have reached pre-war effectiveness, and the mileage is several thousand miles greater than in 1913. The grain crop this year is close to pre-war production in the same territory. Other crops, with the exception of cotton and sugar beets, have increased over the pre-war rate of production.

The Soviet Union, altogether unaided, has made a more complete recovery than most of its European neighbors who have received substantial aid in the form of foreign loans. It has had 25,000 tractors—most of them imported from the United States—at work this fall, where there were only 12,500 a year ago and less than 500 before the war. It has reequipped and modernized its oil fields and is starting the same process with its coal mines. The per capita consumption of electric power in Moscow last year was 225 per cent of that in 1913. Industrial production during the fiscal year 1924-1925 (ending September 30, 1925) was 60 per cent greater than the previous year, that of the year ending September 30 last, estimated on the returns for eleven months of that period, was about 40 per cent above the output for 1924-1925. Labor efficiency has shown a steady gain; in the oil fields, during 1924-1925, it increased 15 per cent over the previous year. The rise of the cooperatives has been a marked factor in the recovery. The consumers' cooperatives alone now have a membership of 11,000,000 and conduct 53,446 stores as compared with 42,000 a year ago. Their turnover during the fiscal year just ended was upwards of three billion dollars, an increase of 50 per cent over the previous year. The foreign trade turnover of the Soviet state for 1922-1923 amounted to only $199,300,000. In 1924-1925 it had increased to $657,631,000. During the first nine months of 1925-1926 it was $555,680,000. The trade with the United States in 1925 was about $110,000,000, two and a half times the value of the pre-war trade.

According to preliminary statistics made public in October by the Supreme Economic Council in Moscow, the net profit yielded by State industry during the fiscal year ending September 30, 1926, was 450,000,000 rubles ($231,750,000). The gross value of industrial production increased 43 per cent, reaching 6,780,000,000 rubles as against 4,060,000,000 rubles in 1924-1925. The output of some of the principal industries follows:

	1925-1926	1924-1925
Coal (met. tons)	24,302,000	16,083,500
Oil (met. tons)	8,240,029	6,960,576
Pig iron (met. tons)	2,201,121	1,291,511
Martin steel (met. tons)	2,879,871	1,868,642
Rolled iron (met. tons)	2,138,440	1,390,203
Cotton cloth (1,000 meters)	1,999,282	1,499,020

Coal production for the year was reported as 87 per cent of the pre-war figure; oil, 90 per cent; iron and steel, 70 per cent; cotton textiles, 90 per cent. The number of workers employed in state industry on September 1, 1926, was reported at 1,931,478, as compared with 1,563,501 on September 1, 1925.

These are signs of remarkable progress. But a miracle of this sort has its limitations. While the gain in production is impressive there has been no commensurate gain in fixed capital. In fact the Soviet Union today is like any concern whose turnover is out of proportion to its capital resources. Factories and plants are now working pretty well up to 100 per cent of their capacity, the best factories under three shifts, yet there is virtually a famine in many classes of industrial goods. Prices of commodities are more than double pre-war prices. During the fiscal year just ended about $200,000,000 was squeezed out of the federal budget for the expansion of industry, agriculture, and the cooperatives, and internal loans added perhaps $100,000,000 more, but this was but a small mite toward new factories and reequipment, toward satisfying the soaring demands of the population for manufactured goods.

Now more than ever, it would appear, the placing of industry in the Soviet Union on a firm basis for the future depends upon the establishment of normal relations with the United States. Apparently the diplomatic stumbling block is the failure of the Soviet Government to acknowledge the American debt incurred by the transitory Kerensky regime—somewhat less than $200,000,000. Responsible Soviet officials have repeatedly expressed a willingness to negotiate a funding agreement for the Kerensky debt, but at the same time they point out that funding payments can be paid for only in goods which can not be produced without a substantial American loan for new factories and workshops. Perhaps a bit of diplomatic amiability will contribute to a solution of this impasse and promote a friendlier understanding between 115,000,000 Americans and 140,000,000 Russians.

Japan in Manchuria

WE print below extracts from an article by Sen Katayama, the noted Japanese revolutionist, which appeared in Pravda (Moscow) on September 12.

Japanese enterprises in Manchuria are at present using Chinese labor, the Japanese numbering only one-third of all labor employed there. Nevertheless the strength and influence of Japanese capital in Manchuria are constantly increasing; Manchurian industry and commerce are almost monopolized by Japanese, and the capitalists of other countries are pushed away from the territories under Japanese influence.

Furthermore, Japan is not even satisfied with the South Manchurian enterprises and is planning to extend her influence further north and into Inner and Outer Mongolia. As a means to this end Japan chose railroad construction. The Japanese Eastern Company, with headquarters at Korea, and the Japanese millionaire, Okura, hold possessions in Mongolia. They hold large plantations of rice and also various industrial enterprises, in which they use Korean labor. During the World War Japan plotted to place under her influence Siberia, Kamchatka, and Mongolia. The intervention in Siberia was the beginning of realizing that scheme.

All of these plans of Japan failed except those which were related to South Manchuria and Inner Mongolia, although even those acquisitions are threatened by awakened China, which insists on the annulment of the remainder of the Twenty-one Demands. Moreover, Japan encounters much more hindrance in the growing influence of USSR in Manchuria and in the whole of China.

The rich resources of Manchuria, which are developing rapidly since Manchuria became linked with the outside world through the South Manchurian and Chinese Eastern railroads, offer the means for creating an independent economic unit. For this purely economic consideration, as well as for its political significance, Manchuria attracts very serious attention among the countries of the world, and especially among the capitalists of Japan. The territory of Manchuria comprises large plains with a soil very favorable for agriculture; its entire population consists of less than fifteen million, i. e., there are only forty inhabitants to each square mile. Japan, having a very small area greatly overpopulated, is coping with a problem which is, owing to an aggressive imperialistic policy, constantly growing worse, as almost all doors are closed to the Japanese. The only open door is Manchuria. Naturally enough, Japan is anxious to intrench in Manchuria and in Inner Mongolia, to turn her immigration wave in that direction, and to develop there her industries and commerce.

The temporary failures of Chang Tso-lin, which have damaged Japanese interests in Manchuria, have also reflected on the governing elements of Japan. The Japanese banks alone lost, when his currency broke, about 400 million yen. His fall would be a most destructive shock to the interests and influence in Manchuria of the Japanese imperialists and capitalists. It may even be that Japan is looking for a war with Soviet Russia. At any rate, she is trying to provoke it through this Manchurian bandit. Apparently Japan is preparing to intervene in Manchuria. Chang Tso-lin is carrying on an aggressive policy with regard to Soviet Russia. He began by demanding the dismissal of the Soviet ambassador from Peking, charging that he was the instigator of the nationalistic movement in China. At present the chief of Manchurian bandits attacks Russia at another front—the Chinese Eastern Railroad. His entire conduct is inspired by the Japanese military clique, which aims to undermine the interests of USSR and to promote Japanese interests in Manchuria and Inner Mongolia.

The USSR and the Chinese Eastern Railway

THE course of the recent Russo-Chinese conflict in North Manchuria is reflected in the vigorous note sent by Chicherin, Commissary for Foreign Affairs, to the Chinese Chargé d'Affaires in Moscow on September 8.

I have the honor to request you to communicate to the Government of the Chinese Republic the following. Notwithstanding the emphatic warning expressed to the Chinese Government contained in the note of the Soviet Government of August 31, in connection with the illegal demands presented by the authorities of the three eastern provinces of China to the board of the Chinese Eastern Railway to deliver up the river fleet belonging to the Chinese Eastern Railway and the dissolution of the education department of the Chinese Eastern Railway, the Soviet Government has not only not received a proper reply to its communication from the Chinese Government, but has received information that the authorities of the three eastern provinces have committed further illegal acts. According to this information, on September 2 the Chinese authorities in Harbin forcibly seized all the vessels of the river fleet and all the property appertaining thereto belonging to the Chinese Eastern Railway. At the same time the staff of the Chinese Eastern Railway in the offices of the river fleet were ejected and their places were taken by others; the flag of the Chinese Eastern Railway was removed from the vessels and replaced by the flag of the Chinese

Built by CITY HOUSING CORPORATION
A Limited Dividend Company

REAL Cooperative Apartments

With playgrounds and gardens. Only 15 minutes by subway from the Grand Central zone.

A NEW model community has grown up just across the Queensboro Bridge from Manhattan. Two years ago it was started as an intelligent experiment in building attractive homes for people with moderate incomes. Speculative profits were done away with by limiting the company's dividends to 6%.

Today over 600 families are living there, including a number of Nation readers.

Acres of playgrounds and gardens

The most unusual and talked of feature of this community is the permanent provision of acres of playgrounds and gardens. There are tennis courts, baseball field, swings and slides for the private use of Sunnyside residents. Instead of unsightly backyards cluttered with clothes poles and fences, a new block plan provides artistically landscaped central garden courts.

Compare these terms with present rents

A small number of delightful cooperative apartments are ready for immediate occupancy. All rooms are outside, newly decorated, and unusually attractive. Efficiency kitchens are equipped with overhead driers, enamelled kitchen cabinets and ice-chests. Steam-heat and hot water are of course included.

To give you an idea of how low costs really are, following are the prices and terms of two of these apartments:

4 Rooms $6,000 Cash $750 Monthly $62.10
5 Rooms 7,100 Cash 880 Monthly 73.20
(Garages available at $6.50 monthly extra)

The increased equity and dividends through savings reduce these monthly charges still further.
Sunnyside Gardens is well worth a visit. It has attracted the favorable comment of people from all over the United States and from abroad. Sunnyside Office, just across from the Bliss Street subway station, is open all day Sunday or week days until dark.

Take Corona Line to Bliss Street, B. M. T., I. R. T. or Second Avenue Elevated, or Fifth Avenue Bus No. 15

Sunnyside Gardens

CITY HOUSING CORPORATION

A Limited Dividend Company Organized to Build Better Homes and Communities.

L. I. CITY OFFICE
Queens Blvd. & Carolin St.

TELEPHONE
Stillwell 8475

navy. On September 4 the same authorities committed further illegal acts by forcibly ejecting the staff of the Chinese Eastern Railway from the educational department and sealed those premises. Indignantly placing on record these unexampled acts of the local Chinese authorities, which not only flagrantly violate the treaty relations between the USSR and the Chinese Republic, but are absolutely intolerable as between states which are in normal diplomatic relations, the Soviet Government points out that by tolerating such conduct on the part of the authorities of the three eastern provinces the present Chinese Government cannot but agree that serious difficulties are created for the continuation of normal diplomatic relations and consequently it must bear all responsibility for aggravating the relations with the USSR. Reaffirming its declaration that it is fully prepared to give careful consideration to all the controversial questions arising out of the agreements existing between the two governments, the Soviet Government expects the Chinese Government to take urgent measures to secure the immediate cessation of the above-mentioned infringement of its rights, and for the elimination of a situation that may react most unfavorably upon the future diplomatic relations between the two countries. The Soviet Government expresses the firm conviction that, in order to preserve and further develop normal relations between the two states, the Chinese Government will not delay in replying and in taking the necessary measures for the settlement of the conflict with the USSR.

Increase of Wages in the USSR

THE following discussion of increased wages in the Soviet Union was contributed by W. Schmidt, People's Commissar for Labor, to International Press Correspondence for October 7:

The resolution of the Council of the People's Commissariat of the Soviet Union, dated September 21, concerning the increase of wages for categories of workers in receipt of the lowest rate of pay, is a measure of very great significance, especially when it is taken into consideration that the advancing of wages during the whole time has not been interrupted and continues constantly. If we regard the months of April to June of the economic year 1922-1923 as representing 100, the average real wage in the whole of industry rose to 124 in the corresponding months of the economic year 1923-1924, to 145 in April to June in the economic year 1924-1925, and to 167 in the corresponding months of the economic year 1925-1926, and, therefore, rose altogether by 67 per cent during this period.

This advance was achieved through a general increase of wages, on the one hand, and, on the other, by the introduction of piece-work for the skilled workers and of supplementary premiums for the laborers. In view of the high piece-work wages the increase of the wages for skilled workers has exceeded the increase in the pay of the laborers.

The growth of the wages of the skilled workers is adequately guaranteed by the system of piece rates, and will still be in the future, as the output of labor increases in consequence of the fresh equipment of industry and the introduction of rational methods of organizing work. This possibility, however, does not exist for unskilled and semi-skilled laborers working at so much per hour, and it is, therefore, necessary to bring their earnings more into accord with those of the skilled workers. This was, and still remains, a task of the labor movement.

A number of measures were adapted to this end: increase of wages for those in receipt of the lowest rates of pay under the collective contracts, increase of salaries of the lowest categories of employees, together with the execution of the standardization of the salaries of civil servants, subsidizing of the local budgets for the purpose of increasing the pay of the low grades, etc.

LOVE'S PILGRIMAGE
By UPTON SINCLAIR

Out of print 15 years. Book stores have asked $7.50 for it
New edition now ready

JACK LONDON: "It stands alone—there is no book like it."
ISRAEL ZANGWILL: "It seems to me to be literature of a high order."
EDEN PHILLPOTTS: "I am full of enthusiasm for this splendid work of art."
ROBERT HERRICK: "You will want my opinion of its frank speaking, of course. It is about the frankest book I have ever seen in English, and yet it is perfectly clean in every word. That is much. As compared with a novel like Sudermann's 'Song of Songs', it is as mountain brook water to a sewer."
FREDERIK VAN EEDEN: "It is surely your greatest book, and very nearly one of the great books of the world. . . . You give wooing, marriage, pregnancy, birth in great classic lines. . . . It is one of the best things in English literature. Of course, you will be attacked and decried, but that is all right. This book will make your world fame. Even the Russians will appreciate it."

663 Pages, cloth $2.00, paper $1.25

UPTON SINCLAIR
Pasadena, California.

for Facts About Russia
Read SLAVONIC NATIONS OF YESTERDAY AND TODAY
Milivoy S. Stanoyevich
Handbook Series $2.40 each

Reminders of the scholarly education of the Old Russia, the native intelligence and industry of the peasant, the high courage of the idealist present the character of the Russian people in a pictureful way. The problems of the Russia of Today and the possibilities of the Russia of Tomorrow are also pictured.

RECOGNITION OF SOVIET RUSSIA
James Goodwin Hodgson
Reference Shelf Series 90c each

Gives arguments pro and con for the diplomatic recognition of Russia by the United States.
Full bibliography and briefs.

Complete list of Handbook and Reference Shelf Subjects sent on request.

THE H. W. WILSON COMPANY NEW YORK CITY
971 University Avenue

GENERAL DRUG CO., 94 N. Moore Street, New York

AMTORG TRADING CORPORATION

165 BROADWAY, NEW YORK

Sole representatives in the U. S.

of

Gostorg (State Export and Import Bureau) of the RSFSR, Moscow

Gostorg of the Northwestern Region, Leningrad

Ukrainian Gostorg, Kharkov

Transcaucasian Gostorg, Tiflis

White-Russian Gostorg, Minsk

All the leading industrial and commercial organizations and combinations in the Union of SSR

and

Arcos Ltd., London

Exporting to the Union SSR:

Agricultural machinery and implements
Mining machinery
Technical equipment for industries and transport
Drugs and chemicals
Office materials
Objects of general use, etc.

Importing from the Union SSR:

Furs and hides
Bristle, horsehair, wool, casings, and other animal products
Hemp and flax
Fish products
Medicinal herbs and other raw materials

MOSCOW OFFICE: KUZNETZKY MOST 14

Centrosoyus-America

INC.

17 BATTERY PLACE
NEW YORK CITY

Sole American Representatives of the All-Russian Central Union of Consumers' Cooperative Societies — "Centrosoyus" and other Russian Cooperative Unions.

Importers of Russian furs, bristles, flax, caviar and crabmeat.

Exporters to Russia of American manufactured products.

ALL-RUSSIAN UNION OF AGRICULTURAL (PRODUCERS') CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES

SELSKOSOJUS

HEAD OFFICE: B. Dmitrovka, 4, MOSCOW, U. S. S. R

AFFILIATED CO-OPERATIVE ORGANIZATIONS

"MASLOCENTR" (Dairy Co-Operatives)
"LNOCENTR" (Flax and Tow Co-Operatives)
"PLODOVINSOYUS" (Vegetable, Fruit and Wine Co-Operatives)
"SOYUSKARTOFEL" (Potato Co-Operatives)
"TABAKSOYUS" (Tobacco Co-Operatives)
"PTITZEVODSOYUS" (Poultry Co-Operatives)

Represented in America by:

SELSKOSOJUS, INC., AMERICA

MAIN OFFICE
90 West Street
New York City
TELEPHONE
Rector 0117-0118

FUR DEPARTMENT
238 West 28th Street
New York City
TELEPHONE
Lackawanna 6985

PURCHASES

Tractors and Repair Shop Equipments, Agricultural Implements, Binder Twine, Seed Cleaning Machinery and Seeds.

SELLS

Furs, Skins, Casings, Butter, Flax and Tow, Seeds.

These steps did not previously suffice to produce satisfactory results, and it is only now that the consolidated general economic situation affords the possibility of putting through a number of measures in this direction in order to increase the wages of the low-paid workers. But even these measures must be effected without causing a strain to our currency and without entailing other undesirable economic consequences.

It is, therefore, necessary, in accordance with the resolution of the Council of People's Commissariats, dated September 21, that we pay close attention during the year 1926-1927 to the increasing of the wages, especially of the low-paid groups of workers in industry, transport, post, and telegraph services, in consonance with their financial possibilities.

A faulty calculation in advancing wages would certainly provoke, apart from financial difficulties for the industrial branches concerned, a number of difficulties in the goods market, for every increase of the purchasing power of the population, not backed by a corresponding increase in the quantity of goods available, would lead to a weakening of the purchasing power of the ruble and, consequently, of the real wages of all workers.

A badly planned advance of wages for the groups left at a disadvantage would not only injure the position of these groups but would also be detrimental to the whole of the working class. Therefore, an increase of wages can only be permitted to an extent of 10 per cent for the low-paid groups of workers engaged in production, and then only in the following branches in which wages are depressed: coal mining, ore mining, individual branches of the metal industry, of the textile industry, and the chemical industry, the match industry, glass manufacture, china manufacture, and special production, and, finally, the railway, post, and telegraph services.

The percentage of the advances and the distribution of the increases among the lowest ratings of workers will be fixed upon the revision of the collective contracts in the branches concerned when the period of validity of the old collective contracts has elapsed. If the date of the fresh conclusion of the collective contracts be postponed, the advance in wages will be calculated as from the moment of expiration of the old contracts.

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS LOZOWICK is a New York artist.

LOUIS FISCHER, who has been The Nation's correspondent in Moscow, is now in Berlin.

JAKE FALSTAFF is on the staff of the Akron (Ohio) Beacon Journal.

DR. VERA DANCHAKOFF, who is now in Russia, was formerly a professor at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Columbia University.

MARIAN TYLER is at present living in Russia.

WINTHROP D. LANE has made distinguished studies of prison conditions.

BURT M. MCCONNELL is a member of the editorial staff of the Literary Digest.

MAX EASTMAN, formerly editor of the Masses and the Liberator, has lived abroad for four years, mostly in Russia.

SIDNEY B. FAY, professor of history at Smith College, is soon to publish a book on war origins.

LENORE G. MARSHALL frequently reviews fiction and poetry for the magazines.

CLARENCE WALWORTH ALVORD has been professor of history at the universities of Illinois and Minnesota.

HAROLD KELLOCK is the Statistical Director of the Russian Information Bureau.

CHALFONTE~HADDON HALL
ATLANTIC CITY

In the very center of things on the Beach and the Boardwalk.

"Dual Trio" Radio Concert every Tuesday evening. Tune in on WPG at 9

STAND out like personal friends in the thoughts of those who love to go down to the sea for rest or play—their simple, friendly hospitality has so graced every service for so many years.

Especially delightful during the winter months are the broad deck porches facing the sea with their comfortable steamer chairs looking down on the flowing life of the Boardwalk. For the more active—golf, riding on the beach, theatres, Boardwalk activities, fascinating shops, music and entertainment.

American Plan Only - Always Open
Illustrated Folder on Request
LEEDS and LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

Want someone for a position? Want a position?
The responsive employer and the intelligent applicant for employment read The Nation. Write for rates. Dept. W, The Nation.

True food is the foundation of Good health

Fresh Vegetables
Whole Wheat Products
Satisfying Diet for Diabetics

Trufood VEGETARIAN RESTAURANT

No animal fat used
153 W. 44th St., East of Broadway

AURORA HEALTH FARM
Not a sanitarium; not a boarding-house
Mendham Road
MORRISTOWN
NEW JERSEY

Beautiful country, elevation 700 ft.; only one hour from New York. Open all year. Suitable for those requiring rest, electric and hydrotherapy baths for rest and convalescence. Personal medical supervision. Home-like atmosphere. No bed-ridden, contagious or mental cases.

ROBERT SCHUMAN, M. D.
Telephone—MORRIS TOWN 1826

Do you want to make extra money?
Address Dept. 11
The Nation
20 Vesey Street New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1926 No. 3202

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 495

[illegible] 495
[illegible] 497

THE UNIVERSE INC. By Rudolf von Laun 501

THE OUTCOME IN THREE STATES ..... [illegible]

WHAT COST MUSSOLINI? By Oswald Garrison Villard ..... [illegible]

THREE BLACK WOMEN. By Ramona Hathaway ..... [illegible]

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Public ..... [illegible]

CORRESPONDENCE ..... [illegible]

BOOKS, MUSIC, DRAMA:

Pure Death. By Robert Graves 509

[illegible] 509

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

New Zealand's Family Debt. By T. Walsh 516

An Editor's Farewell ..... [illegible]

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFÉ VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor

MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum post paid in the United States and Mexico, to Canada, $6.00; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: No. 30 South Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London W. C. 1, England.

IGNORANCE, INTOLERANCE, DISCOURTESY—we can imagine these words embossed in gold, hanging above the desk of the Secretary of State of the United States. His latest act in the spirit of this wall-motto is the exclusion of Alexandra Kollontai, Russian Ambassador to Mexico, who applied in Berlin for an American visa so that she might land in New York and pass through the United States on her way to Mexico City. Mr. Kellogg has displayed these qualities on other occasions—notably in refusing admission to the Count and Countess Karolyi, hinting ridiculously that they might be Communist propagandists. His present performance is more explicable and more serious. Mme Kollontai is a Communist. This gives the State Department its public excuse for refusing a visa. But it is a poor one. In the United States are numerous Russian Communists who came in properly equipped with passports and visas. They are here on business. They lunch with bankers and make deals with American business men. No State Department official questions their presence or pretends that they are making Communist propaganda. Mme Kollontai is no more dangerous to our sacred institutions than are they. Mr. Kellogg has excluded her from the country for one reason: she is an official diplomatic representative of the Soviet Government. Her desire to pass through the United States gave him an opportunity to offer additional evidence of his solemn disapproval of the Workers' Government of Russia. As Senator Borah has pointed out in a vigorous denunciation of Kellogg's act, this sort of deliberate effrontery is "intolerable and unjustifiable."

SUICIDE, SAID DANIEL WEBSTER, is confession. So, too, is resignation—on occasion. One of these was the resignation of Judge George W. English of St. Louis, who wrote to the President in the following words: "I have come to the conclusion, on account of the impeachment proceedings against me, regardless of the final result thereof, that my usefulness as a judge has been seriously impaired." Marvelous perspicacity! And what a delicate sense of the fitness of things! Surely, in his entire judicial career nothing has so become Judge English as the leaving of it. He has thereby spared the country the expense of at least $100,000 for his trial on the charges of abusing his judicial powers and misuse of bankruptcy funds, a case which would have taken up a vast amount of the time of the Senate at a special session. And the bench is rid of one of those who disgrace it. Perhaps Judge Webster Thayer of Massachusetts, as to whose temperamental unfitness there is also little doubt although his personal character seems beyond suspicion, will now be good enough to follow suit.

SPEAKING OF JUDGE THAYER reminds us that one hundred members of the Paris Bar, including many famous lawyers and politicians of all shades of politics and opinions, have signed a petition asking for the immediate release of Sacco and Vanzetti—further striking testimony of the international character this case has assumed and how deeply it is affecting the American reputation for justice in foreign countries. "By enduring," these French lawyers write, "for fifty-four months the terrible strain of daily expectation of capital punishment, these men have thereby gained the right of freedom even if they are guilty." Of this we hope the Governor of Massachusetts will take due notice. He certainly cannot have overlooked a recent editorial on this case in the Boston Herald, a paper which can surely not be charged with truckling to labor or having the slightest symptoms of radicalism in its makeup. The Herald carefully explains that it has no sympathy with the views of Sacco and Vanzetti but in its opinion they "ought not to be executed on the warrant of the verdict returned by a jury on July 14, 1921." As the months have merged into years and the debate over this case has continued, the Herald has been compelled to examine its position and abandon its original judgment that the men were guilty. The final straw was the recent decision of Judge Thayer, beginning with his misstatement, not to say falsification, that the Supreme Court of Massachusetts had approved the verdict of the jury. If the Massachusetts Bar only had among its members men of the spirit of Wendell Phillips and others of abolition days, there would be some uncomfortable hours ahead of Judge Thayer.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS in England are not always indications of the drift of public sentiment, but those that have just been concluded have naturally roused great interest because of the recent general strike and the bitternesses aroused by the coal strike. It was supposed, of course, that there would be a Conservative and Liberal reaction away from Labor. Instead, Labor made sweeping gains in more than three hundred cities and boroughs in England and Wales. Only a few boroughs on the outer rim of London moved in the other direction. Labor gained no less than 161 seats, with only 21 losses; the Conservatives won 15 and lost 78, the Liberals won 8 and lost 53. The Manchester Guardian has pointed out that the most significant successes of Labor are in the North of England and the North Midlands. Altogether, these elections reinforce the statement made in our columns by the former Prime Minister, J. Ramsay MacDonald, that Labor has profited politically and not lost by the general strike and its aftermath. Every by-election since last spring has confirmed this. Three more vacancies, one caused by the resignation of Lieutenant Commander Kenworthy as a Liberal, and two in Conservative seats, will shortly afford another test. The fact that England faces the winter with an entirely inadequate coal supply, and that the coal strike is not yet settled at this writing, are other reasons why the drift to Labor is so marked.

EMORY R. BUCKNER, United States Attorney, announces that in December he will retry former Attorney General Harry Daugherty and former Alien Property Custodian Thomas W. Miller. The announcement does him credit and relieves Mr. Buckner from any suggestion that political motives might interfere with active prosecution of the case. Mr. Daugherty and Mr. Miller already stand convicted before the bar of public opinion; if they have the belief in themselves which they assert they must this time take the witness-stand in their own defense. Men who destroy ledger-sheets on bank holidays, men who happen to be discovered in possession of bonds which were paid to other men substantially as bribes, must do some tall explaining if the public is to be relieved of its suspicion. Friends of the two men insist that they obtained and used the mysterious bonds in order to help pay off the Republican campaign deficit of 1924. That may be; but it should be offered in evidence and sustained on the witness-stand, not whispered—or even printed—out of court.

THERE SEEMS to be a growing bureaucratic arrogance and stupidity in this country. A Polish girl who had lived sixteen years in the United States arrived at Ellis Island. She had lost her entrance permit on the way. The authorities held her on Ellis Island, investigated, discovered that the permit had been issued to her, and—ruled that since she did not have it with her she must be deported! Two British subjects came to Kentucky from Canada two years ago (after an American consul had informed them they needed no papers), played in various orchestras, married, took out citizenship papers—and then one afternoon were thrown into jail without warning by a petty official who charged them with illegal entry to the United States. They had, it seems, violated the contract-labor law by answering from Toronto an advertisement in the Billboard. There was no suggestion of bad faith, nothing but ignorant violation of a technicality, but the arrogant little officeholder put them in jail. Such officials should be removable for cause, and should be removed without delay. In the first case an editorial in the New York World brought a prompt revision of the ruling; in the second case the brave editorials of the Lexington Herald have not yet achieved justice or decency.

THE RECENT OUTBREAK in the Tombs, in which the warden and several prisoners were killed, has led many persons to clamor again for still more stringent laws in dealing with criminals. It may be, however, that the stringency of existing legislation is the cause of such desperate breaks for freedom. When a man convicted of four felonies, no matter what their nature or how many years may have elapsed between the first three and the last, must be sentenced to prison for life, it would seem that legislation had become about as severe as was necessary. Under the Baumes law, recently enacted in New York State, a judge is apparently compelled to sentence a fourth offender for life; no juristic discretion is permitted. And under the same law, sentences have become grotesquely distended, until a judge hands out forty years as casually as if it were a month in the workhouse. Judge Franklin Taylor, of Brooklyn, is in process of testing the mandatory character of this law. He has refused to impose a life sentence on a man guilty of stealing $11 from his employer. The prisoner has served terms at a truancy school, at Elmira Reformatory, two terms of a year each for petit larceny, and ten years for burglary. But his employer was ready to give him another trial, and Judge Taylor refuses to treat him as a permanent criminal and menace to society and lock him up for life. Meanwhile we are every day having an opportunity to test the efficacy of these laws. Severe sentences are being imposed daily. Does it appear that crime is decreasing?

IN APPLAUDING the four-times-chosen Governor "Al" Smith as a phenomenon unique in New York State's history the newspapers forgot De Witt Clinton. That gentleman was continuously in public life from 1798 until his death, thirty years later. He began his career—after certain preliminaries in the Revolutionary War—as member of the New York State Assembly, where he served only a few months, resigning to enter the State Senate. From this he graduated to the Senate of the United States in 1802; his term here was also of the briefest, since he left in a year. From 1803 until 1807, from 1808 till 1810, and from 1811 to 1815 he was Mayor of New York City. During this time he also served as member of the State Council of Appointment (1801 and 1806), as State Senator from 1806 to 1811, and as Lieutenant Governor from 1811 to 1813. He received 89 out of 217 votes for President in 1812. He organized and headed the Erie Canal Commission from 1810 to his death, with one year's intermission, and he was thrice elected Governor of New York for a three-year term—1817, 1820, and 1825—in which office he died. This dizzying career will be a hard one for Governor Smith and New York State to beat, since we no longer encourage the holding of two offices at once, but there is still time. If New York lends its "Al" to the nation for a while, New York will want him back again. By the time the largest city in the country stops voting for him, De Witt Clinton may look like a piker.

Wet or Dry?

ONE certain thing emerges above the hubbub of conflicting claims as to the meaning of the Wet-and-Dry contests at the polls: Prohibition is not a dead issue.

Eight States voted directly on Prohibition issues, and in other local contests the Wet issue played a stellar role. Missouri, California, and Colorado turned down proposals to repeal the State enforcement laws—Colorado by the surprisingly small majority of 20,000; Missouri by 100,000 in a total vote of three-quarters of a million; California by a close vote in a very heavy balloting. Montana, on the other hand, by a majority of 10,000 in a total vote of about 100,000, voted to repeal her enforcement law; Nevada, with a total vote of barely 10,000, voted nearly four to one to memorialize Congress to repeal the Prohibition Amendment; Wisconsin, by more than two to one, urged Congress to amend the Volstead Act to permit the manufacture and sale of beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol. Illinois and New York voted on referenda urging Congress to permit the States to define what constitutes an intoxicating liquor. In Illinois the vote was almost two to one for the proposal; in New York it carried with the tremendous majority of 1,200,000, sweeping most of the up-State counties where the Drys were reputed to be strong.

"If popular government means anything," "Al" Smith, who rode to victory on a Wet wave, commented, "the State referendums cannot fail to influence Congress." The Methodist Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals retorts with a careful canvass of Congress. The Senate, it reports, has 73 Dry members and only 22 Wet; the House has 311 Drys, 106 Wets, and 18 doubtful members. So, it concludes, the country is quite safe for Prohibition, newspaper shouts to the contrary notwithstanding.

Certainly the results do not all point one way. There is no Wet tidal wave sweeping from one coast to the other, and in plenty of States the results can be interpreted either way, according to personal inclination. Massachusetts, for instance, elected the Wet David Walsh to replace the Dry Mr. Butler in the Senate, but it gave an impressive majority to Alvan Fuller, who was as Dry as his Republican colleague, Mr. Butler, over Mr. Gaston, who was more vociferously Wet than Senator Walsh. The early Wet victories from the California cities were more than offset by the heavy Dry vote of the rural districts. The cynical answer that the farmers are profiting too much by the high price of Prohibition wine grapes to want a change is not sufficient; the country districts of America are unquestionably overwhelmingly Dry in sentiment.

Yet there is no question that the results reveal a significant and growing dissatisfaction with the working of the Prohibition laws. The States which voted Wet in this election cast one-third of the total vote for President in 1924; they are the leading industrial States of the Union. Rhode Island and Maryland are certainly also Wet; and if Mr. Wilson, who fought Representative Vare in Pennsylvania, had been Wet instead of Dry he might have made an even more impressive showing. The referenda must be heeded as a sort of weather-vane. We look for more referenda, and welcome them. The issue of Prohibition needs more discussion and more clarification. It is the livest issue in American politics today.

South Carolina's Shame

TO Walter White, assistant secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, goes the credit for unearthing one of the ghastliest stories in American history. This young man, who has already distinguished himself in various Southern States by investigating race riots and lynchings that reflected discredit on local and State officials, went down to Aiken, S. C., alone, to find himself in the most lawless and brutal district that he had ever visited. The result of his investigation he communicated to Governor McLeod in a letter that might well have scorched His Honor's hands as he held it. Reminding the Governor of his promise to "do everything in my power to get at the truth in this matter and to fix the guilt upon the proper parties," Mr. White furnished details of the lynching, and ended with a list of names, occupations and addresses of a score of men who took part in it.

The data which Mr. White gathered in his courageous and careful search can, he declared, be amply substantiated by various citizens of Aiken whenever the Governor will guarantee them immunity from the wrath of the Ku Klux Klan. According to Mr. White, the Klan engineered the lynching, and effectively controls the community. But the State militia is at the Governor's call. The good name of South Carolina is in shadow; protection can be furnished if Governor McLeod wants it.

A law-abiding and industrious family of Negroes, the Lowmans, were accused of selling whiskey. A sheriff and four deputies, in plain clothes and with nothing to distinguish them as officers of the law, approaching the Lowman house, terrified the mother and her daughter, and brought about a fracas in which the mother was killed, the daughter Bertha and a son Clarence seriously wounded by gunshots, another son, Demon, shot but not seriously hurt, and the sheriff killed. Seventeen days after the affair five of the Lowmans were put on trial for murder, with lawyers for the defense appointed by the judge. Bertha, Demon, and Clarence were found guilty, the two boys being sentenced to death and the girl to imprisonment for life. So outrageous was this trial that a Negro lawyer in South Carolina was able to present to the State Supreme Court a brief that resulted in a new trial. At the second hearing of the case, Demon was found not guilty. Within one hour of the reversal of the verdict persons as far away as Columbia knew that the Lowmans would be lynched that night. And they were.

Mr. White, in his extraordinary story, which is now being substantially repeated by the New York World, charges that, far from being overpowered, Sheriff Nollie Robinson opened the prison doors and helped to drag Bertha Lowman downstairs to her death. Officials of the law and relatives of high South Carolina officials were present at the bestial lynching. Here is the real shame of the South. Not that a bunch of hoodlums disguised in sheets and pillow-cases can carry off a defenseless Negro and kill him, but that officers of the law, sworn to uphold the law, too often actually aid the murderers of the prisoners they have sworn to protect. The Governor of South Carolina is faced with a task which he cannot shirk. He must prove these charges false or he must bring the guilty persons to justice. Else he stamps himself as unworthy of office and his State as unworthy of the Union.

Mr. Coolidge, the Election, and the Future

SO Mr. Coolidge believes that he and his Administration were not defeated at the polls. At least that is the assurance he gave to the correspondents three days after the election. He had lost control of the Senate? Yes, but you see that had to do only with personal and local issues. The only national part of the election related to the House of Representatives, and there his party kept control albeit his majority sank from 59 to 37 and the latter figure counts the eleven insurgent Congressmen from Wisconsin as Republicans. So the President rests in peace and is not even troubled by the fact that his own State administered an overwhelminig defeat to Senator Butler, his Man Friday, his national chairman, his sponsor, and his chief supporter in Massachusetts.

Now we do not deny that there was no single compelling national issue in this election and that the several Senatorial contests did hinge upon such matters as the corruption in Indiana, Illinois, and Pennsylvania, the dry-Republican bolt from Wadsworth in New York, and other questions. But in his own State Mr. Coolidge himself made the issue perfectly clear; he demanded the return of Senator Butler, whereas in all other States he refused to interfere in the contests. He went to his old home to vote for the Senator, and he allowed that gentleman to make his whole campaign upon the necessity of supporting the President. Mr. Coolidge himself wrote that Senator Butler's presence in the Senate "is of great importance to me in my efforts to discharge the duties of my office," and he assured his State that in the Senate Mr. Butler "holds a place which no one else could command for Massachusetts, admired for his wisdom, respected for his integrity"! Among the many Republican spellbinders who came from outside of Massachusetts, Colonel Theodore Roosevelt the Lesser asserted that the defeat of Butler would be a slap in the President's face. Whereupon the electorate rose in its might and slapped Mr. Coolidge's face with a Walsh majority of 54,955. Yet Massachusetts is normally Republican and Mr. Coolidge is supposedly its favorite son. The Butler campaign began more than a year ago and was fortified by unlimited money and the support of some of the most influential dailies—and Butler was defeated. If this was not a direct and personal rebuke for the President, what in the world could be?

Again, disguise it as Mr. Coolidge will, the loss of control of the Senate is still another blow to the Administration. It is idle to assert that the President is happy to have a divided Congress. Negative as his personality and policies are, Mr. Coolidge knows that he will be largely judged in 1928 by his achievements during the next two years. That is already proved by his sudden proposal to return to the income taxpayers next year as a rebate their final income-tax payment of 1926—a move hailed in both Republican and Democratic camps as entirely political. But the President cannot stop there. To what else will he "point with pride" in June, 1928? More than that, the control of the Senate has passed to men who are far more dangerous to him and to his policies than the Democrats, who are the merest shadow of an opposition, wholly without constructive leadership. The balance of power now rests with the group of Republican Progressives who, together with Senator Shipstead, the Farmer-Labor Senator, constitute the hope of political progress today. Norris, La Follette, Nye, Frazer, and Shipstead are now reinforced by Brookhart of Iowa and Blaine of Wisconsin, with whom will stand at times, on varying issues, Borah, Couzens, and Howell, Republicans, and Wheeler and Dill, Democrats. It is with them that the President will have to reckon.

In the hands of these men now lies the moral leadership of Congress. It is to them that we must look for aggressive action against the beneficiaries of corruption who will shortly be knocking at the portals of the Senate. Borah and Norris are already at work upon plans to prevent their being seated; in the face of this monstrous buying of primaries and elections the President has sat silent, or spoken mildly through the "Spokesman." It is Senator Norris who, in a degree, has redeemed the reputation of his party by opposing Mr. Vare on the stump, and by calling attention to the fact that in 44 election districts in Philadelphia not a single vote was counted for Mr. Vare's opponent, William B. Wilson. These Progressives are the only Senators who dare to speak out against the rule of wealth in this country, who dare to believe that the United States merits a better fate than to be ruled by a super-government of big business, who are ready to uphold at all times the old Progressive standards which stirred and thrilled the voters from the accession of Mr. Roosevelt until this country entered the World War. Mr. Coolidge knows full well that he cannot buy or bribe by office these insurgents. He must also realize that they are now not only able to say what bills shall or shall not be passed; they will be in a position to challenge his every executive act with an authority they have hitherto lacked. What chance is there now for putting over a Muscle Shoals deal, save by the aid of Democratic votes? There is every prospect that the President's executive acts will be more carefully studied and more freely criticized where criticism is needed than heretofore in his career.

What use will the Progressive Senators make of their power? If we can appeal to them it is in the direction of urging them to unite upon a program and to map out a consistent policy for the next two years. They must themselves be the opposition the country so sorely needs. It is they who must focus the spotlight of publicity upon the White House and reveal its pretenses and its shams. It is they who can now draw for the public, the public which has administered his first defeat to the President, the true portrait of Calvin Coolidge. If they are wise they will do their utmost to prevent the President's renomination for a third term. This Massachusetts election, which has removed from the Senate one of the most harmful of our reactionaries, should set men's tongues free in other camps also. The fear of the President's power and patronage may now pass. If so, that will be one of the greatest benefits of the election. We are, of course, not so optimistic or inexperienced as to believe that we shall make great progress during the next two years. But the removal of men like Butler, and Ernst, and Wadsworth, the militarist, from Washington is clear gain, and the strategic position of the Progressives a promise of vigorous stirring in what would otherwise be an utterly arid political desert.

A Nation Gone Mad

"FASCISM accepts the law and the judges only on condition that their sentence be death," announced Filipo Turati, secretary-general of the Fascisti when the new court-martial system for smashing anti-Fascism was announced. This puppy-Mussolini was but remouthing the phrases which the big dog Mussolini had taught him; and all over Italy still smaller puppies are repeating the same phrases of contempt for the ordered processes of civilization. Italy today is a state whose rulers have, literally, outlawed themselves, and the result is becoming plain. When a half-crazed boy fired a pistol at Mussolini in Bologna the crowd, like a mob of American lynchers, tore the lad's body to pieces; and the passionate followers revenged their leader by smashing two thousand houses and killing a hundred citizens in other towns of Italy. Thus Fascism asserted its devotion to Italy. That among the houses wrecked was the home and library of the philosopher Benedetto Croce, perhaps the greatest living Italian, mattered not at all. Whether the hundred dead men were even members of anti-Fascist organizations no one knows; it was enough for these bloodthirsty patriots that they killed somebody. They were following the battle-cry of their leader and treading "on the rotten corpse of liberty."

Sometimes the Fascisti stop to formulate their anarchic code in so-called laws. Following the latest attempt upon the Duce's life the Cabinet Council approved a series of "emergency decrees" which, according to the Rome correspondent of the New York Times, included:

> The death penalty for anyone attempting the life of the sovereign or the head of the State, or guilty of treason, espionage, or armed rebellion; dissolution of all parties, associations, or organizations carrying on activity against the Fascist regime, with three to ten years' imprisonment for anyone attempting to reconstitute such organizations after their dissolution, and two to five years' imprisonment for anyone belonging to them or spreading their programs or doctrines; and five to fifteen years' imprisonment for anyone spreading abroad false or exaggerated news about conditions in Italy.

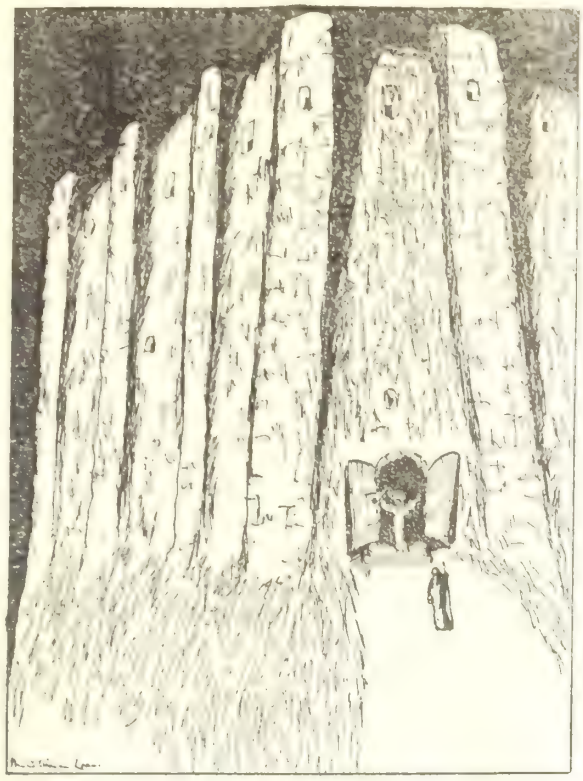
Trials for such offenses will henceforth be conducted as courts martial. Anyone reported to have sent abroad any news of internal conditions which might "impair the credit or prestige of the State abroad" is to be turned over forthwith to a special court composed of five Fascist officers ranking as colonels or higher, with a general as presiding officer. Henceforth no news is to go out of Italy except good news; no criticism of administration, no hint of uncertainty. And, to facilitate matters still further, a new office of political investigation, free from any interference by trained police officials, is to be built up around the local offices of the Fascist militia and given a free hand to cope with the party's opponents. And, to make matters still surer, all opposition papers and periodicals are, quite simply, suppressed. The old technique—which some Fascists have imported into America and used on opposition papers here—of smashing press machinery is deemed inadequate; henceforth there will be no opposition presses to smash.

Now if Italy could keep her Fascists at home and confine their activity to killing each other, the rest of the world might stand by appalled but unconcerned for itself. But Mussolini's regime refuses to let the rest of the world alone, or to leave in peace those of Italy's citizens who have managed to escape abroad. Mussolini has repeatedly gone beyond the normal limits of diplomatic courtesy in complaining that France gave asylum to political exiles faithful to the traditions of Mazzini and Cavour; recently we have had a hideous revelation of the machinations behind those pronouncements. Mussolini's agents have actually financed anti-Fascist plots in France in order to build up a case which might induce France to deliver to Fascist "justice" other opponents of the bloody regime. It was a sad moment for Italian patriots when Ricciotti Garibaldi, a grandson of the national hero, confessed that he had, with Mussolini's gold, adopted the role of agent provocateur. Nominally a leader among the anti-Fascists, he was in constant consultation with Mussolini's police officials, and turned over to them the clues by which they could arrest and do to death the men whom he incited to their anti-Fascist acts. The French police believe that they have discovered worse than this: Garibaldi was in consultation with the Catalonian patriots who recently attempted, from French soil, to organize an armed uprising in Spain. Fascist officers took part in this affair, and the French police assert that the Fascist interest in this minor revolution was due to the hope that it would arouse France to eject all the political exiles who now find refuge in Paris.

What Mr. Villard wrote of Mussolini six weeks ago, before his return from Europe (we print his What Cost Mussolini? much delayed, elsewhere in this issue) is even truer today than it was then. Wars have been fought in the past on lesser issues than this provocation of rebellion on the soil of friendly nations. Who can feel safe when such an unscrupulous gang reigns over one of the great nations of Europe? Such measure of practical success in administration as it may temporarily achieve only aggravates the danger, for it is twisted into an invitation to other nations to adopt the same methods of government by the despotic rule of an arbitrary clique. Mussolini's technique in smashing opposition by ruthless decrees and obscene practices is borrowed in part from the worst days of medieval tyranny, but it is garnished with up-to-the-minute modernisms which appeal to the little dictators of the Balkans. For the moment the emotion seems in itself to have a splendid meaning; but the illusion fades, and the nation is left exhausted and disillusioned. After Mussolini Italy will have to go through a reconstruction more depressing than the black years through which Western Europe has been recovering from its war-time debauch.

Italians are still Italians. No nation in Europe has a richer history or more glorious traditions. But, for the moment, the nation seems to have gone mad. It tolerates the excesses of the homicidal maniacs who are Fascism's high priests, and millions of Italians today glory in them. France seems, happily, to have reacted from the threat of Fascism. But across the map of Europe Pilsudski is apparently attempting to reduce Poland to another one-man government—his new press laws rival Mussolini's in their severity toward men who dare to criticize their rulers. Will the recent orgy of murder in Italy, followed by the exposure of the dastardly use of Garibaldi's grandson as an agent provocateur, start a revulsion?

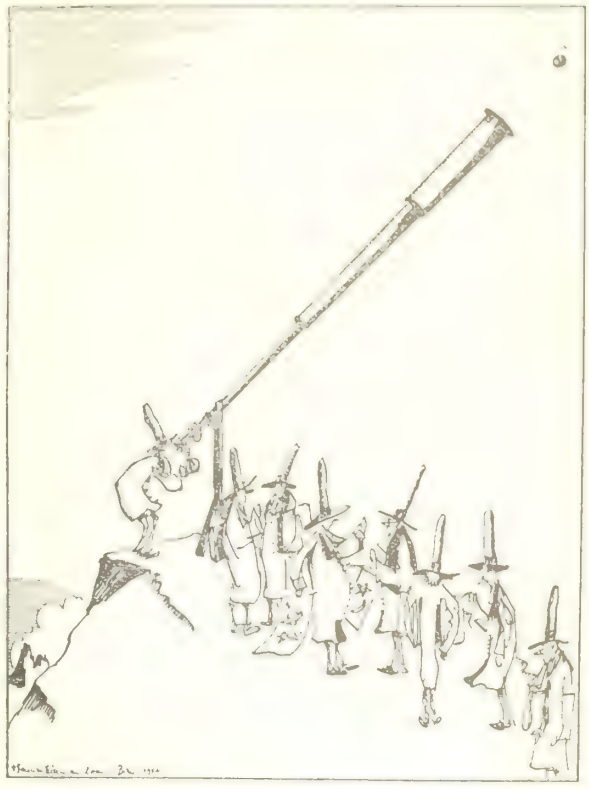
Airplanes and Safety



A WHOLE year of commercial flying without a single accident of any kind involving injury to passengers during the year for which he reported was the proud boast of Sir Eric Geddes at the second general meeting of the Imperial Airways, Limited, the company which has now control of all the English flying lines. To Americans who have read of three accidents in the cross-Channel flying during the past summer, Sir Eric Geddes's statement seems incredible, but it is the truth. Of the three planes that came to grief while flying between London and Paris, two were French; the third, an English one, dropped into the Channel, its passengers being rescued just in time by a trawler, so that Sir Eric Geddes can still maintain that no passenger on an Imperial Airways plane has lost his life or been injured during the last eighteen months of flying. When it is considered that the German lines comprised within the Lufthansa and its allies make a similar boast that no passenger has ever lost his life or been seriously injured while flying with them, it is obvious that aviation has made enormous strides in the direction which counts most, except for the French and Franco-Rumanian lines. The German records show that last year 142 German planes flew 3,125,000 miles, carrying more than 55,000 passengers without injury. During the last five months alone they have flown 2,500,000 miles and carried safely 56,000 passengers. During the last twenty-one months the British planes have flown 2,000,000 miles and carried 56,000 passengers. Sir Robert Donald has just commented in the Referee upon the almost complete absence of accidents in the German service, and reports that the Red Cross emergency station at the great Tempelhofer Feld in Berlin has never been called into service.

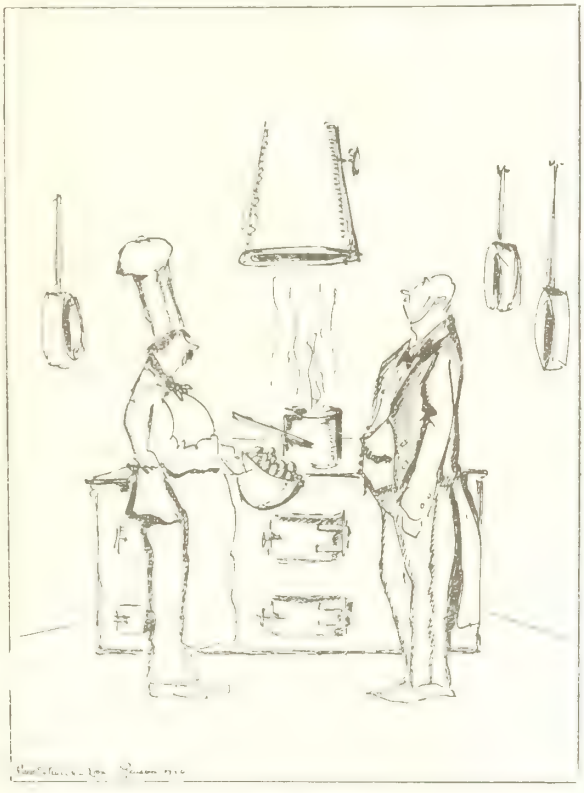
Throughout his speech as chairman of the British company, Sir Eric Geddes emphasized the factor of safety. The Airways standard of maintenance he declared to be the "highest in the world." He even explained the company's unfavorable financial statement, which showed an operating loss of $108,500, by the notation that it was in considerable part due to the company's voluntary withdrawal from service of one-engine airplanes and their replacement by multi-engine machines, of greater power and capacity, which insure greater safety. Although the single-engine planes were excellent, he said, they have been taken off in order to "provide the public with a service established on the safety and reliability principles of British transport organizations, believing that the company will without doubt reap the reward of its policy." This is business wisdom, for there can be no doubt that fear of accident still limits the use of the airplane service. There may be one series of accidents after another on the Continental railways, as happened last summer, but people continue to travel by railway as a matter of course and without anxiety. Yet a single airplane accident sets everyone to gasping and injuriously affects travel on all of the airlines, not merely on the one which was responsible. Eventually, of course, every risk must be eliminated; the latest experiments undertaken by the British Air Ministry show that the day of the fool-proof airplane is not far off.

Meanwhile, the Imperial Airways is steadily developing its service, believing that "the trial and adventure of air travel are passing"—as proof of which they cite the fact that they safely transported $45,000,000 worth of bullion and precious metals. They are now making through-ticket arrangements with all connecting lines—the first aerial airplane guide was issued last summer—since it is to the long-distance passengers that the company must look for the permanent development of its business. It is also continuing to open up new lines, and in January, 1927, expects to begin what is in some ways the most important service it has yet undertaken—the line from Cairo to Karachi in India. Toward this the British Government has granted an annual subsidy of $458,000. Each of the especially built airplanes will be fitted with three air-cooled motors and will be capable of maintaining flight easily with two engines only. The journey will occupy at first three and a half days, but as night flying is developed it will be cut further. Sir Eric Geddes was particularly happy to announce that not only will Sir Samuel Hoare, the Secretary of State for Air, be a passenger in the first Cairo-Karachi airplane, with his personal staff, but he will be accompanied by his wife. No more striking tribute, Sir Eric thought, could be given to his organization, for this will be by far the longest air journey ever undertaken by any woman. Certainly public confidence in this form of travel is aided by such use of the lines by distinguished persons. It is this sort of support by his Government, although the subsidies it pays are only half or less than half of those paid in Germany and France, which emboldened Sir Eric Geddes to prophesy that the European services of the company will be entirely self-supporting during this fiscal year. Indeed he believes that if it had not been for the strike, his financial showing would have been far more satisfactory.



While this marvelous development goes on abroad, America lags. There is not one established passenger line in the United States, and yet, because of its enormous distances, this is the country, beyond all others, which could profit most by the new form of transportation. The small city of Halle in Germany has no less than fifteen airplane departures and arrivals in a single day. Any inhabitant of that city can leave in the morning and arrive in Paris or Zürich or Rotterdam or London or Stockholm or Copenhagen or Hamburg or Cologne or Breslau or Warsaw on the same day. There are three direct flights to Berlin and three to Leipzig and Breslau. For the more distant points, such as Warsaw, Stockholm, and London, it is necessary, of course, to change airplanes, but they come and go with a regularity and a safety which no one can appreciate who has not traveled by these lines or personally examined the service they offer. Sir Robert Donald declares that the Lufthansa is taking steps to obtain a monopoly of air transport toward the East and Asia. They have already, in cooperation with the Soviet Government, opened up lines to Kovno and Moscow and to Siberia, and are supplying machines to the Europa Union, which dominates Russia and Asia. They are now operating two sleepers, night planes specially built, which not only compare favorably in comfort with railroad sleepers, but are also equipped with moving pictures and radio sets. Why is it that American enterprise lags in this field? At least it is gratifying to read that two lines for carrying parcels are planned by the American Railway Express.

The Universe, Inc. By H. v. L.



THE PILGRIM

"I am sorry, sir, but I cannot show you a passport."
"Mr. Debs, I hardly think it will be necessary."

EXCITEMENT IN EUROPE

European astronomers claim to have discovered that the United States is on the planet earth.

BAD EGGS

The Cook of the Grand Hotel des League of Nations: "Look here, more than half of those eggs are no good. How can I make a decent omelet?"
The Headwaiter: "Go ahead and try. The guests upstairs are doing the same thing."

FRONTIERS

Nightmare of the man who went to Europe for a fortnight's pleasure trip.

The Outcome in Three States

California's New Governor

By GEORGE P. WEST

San Francisco, November 5

FOR Governor, United States Senator, and other major offices the election in California merely confirmed the Republican primaries of August. The election of C. C. Young to succeed Friend Richardson as Governor and the reelection of Samuel M. Shortridge as United States Senator were assured by the primary. Shortridge, of course, continued to be a caricature, a theatrically perfect embodiment of the buncombe, evasion, and subserviency which is the cynic's idea of the perfect Senator. California did itself the honor of cutting down his normal Republican lead, although even here most of the credit goes to Dry support of his Democratic opponent rather than to any dissatisfaction with Shortridge's political and economic views. But part of the credit goes to John B. Elliott's stand in favor of public development of water-power and other liberal measures. The vote for Senator in 7,771 precincts out of 8,512 was 607,008 for Shortridge and 366,077 for Elliott. This is to be compared with a vote for Governor in 7,795 precincts of 755,482 for Young and 264,524 for Wardell, Democratic candidate for Governor on the same ticket with Elliott. Wardell, also a liberal, is a frank Wet. At least a hundred thousand voters in southern California regretfully abandoned their Republican allegiance to swat Sam Shortridge for one of his few public virtues—his lack of hypocrisy on the prohibition question.

In Young, California is getting what Robert L. Burgess of the San Jose News aptly calls a representative of left-wing Babbittry. Mr. Young was born in New Hampshire, came to San Francisco as a child, and for fourteen years taught English there in the Lowell High School. The 1906 earthquake sent him into the real-estate business in Berkeley, and he became an Assemblyman soon after, elected on the ticket of the Progressive and then militant Lincoln-Roosevelt League. He became Speaker of the Assembly and then Lieutenant Governor, an office he holds at the present time. As presiding officer of the House and later the Senate he has been fair, intelligent, judicial, and always to be found with the Hiram W. Johnson faction in a pinch. His New England caution and conservatism are combined with a long-standing belief in humanitarian and ameliorative legislation. But he has never spoken out on the Criminal Syndicalism Act, and as presiding officer has honorably escaped so many votes on important issues that in spite of his long public career his course is a matter of guesswork.

Public interest centered largely in the initiative-and-referendum proposals, of which there were thirty on the ballot. Defeat of the Wright act providing for prohibition enforcement by local peace officers by a majority of 107,000, heralded with glee in San Francisco on Thursday, turned into a victory by something over 55,000 on Friday when returns from Los Angeles and the McPherson belt began to come in. Similarly Los Angeles defeated a moderate gas-tax proposal, which would have assured adequate highway building. A measure authorizing the reading of the Bible in public schools was rejected by 70,000.

California branches of the American Civil Liberties Union have already begun a campaign for repeal of the Criminal Syndicalism Act. Upton Sinclair polled 34,629 Socialist votes for Governor in 7,795 precincts.

Progressive Wisconsin Wins and Loses

By ROBERT S. ALLEN

Madison, November 4

PROGRESSIVE Wisconsin emerged from its first general State election since the death of its great leader, Robert Marion La Follette, with what is on the whole an impressive victory. It sent to the United States Senate a second Progressive Senator, replacing a reactionary whom even the elder La Follette had been unable to defeat; returned to the House its ten Progressive Congressmen, and filled every State office, with the exception of the governorship, with Progressives, returning a legislature which will be controlled by liberal policies. Much ado has been made over the loss of the governorship. The reactionary press, particularly in Wisconsin, has had much to say about the disintegration of the Progressive Party. Yet with the old leader gone, with serious dissension and even desertion within the party ranks, the citizenship of the State remains steadfast in its liberalism. Even the reactionaries cannot deny that his claim of progressivism was what elected Fred R. Zimmerman to the office of governor.

The defeated candidate of the Progressive leaders, Attorney General Herman L. Ekern, was defeated by 50,000 votes. Ekern polled 175,000 of the usual Progressive strength of 225,000. Some 50,000 Progressives preferred Zimmerman and voted with the conservatives, some of whom in the past had not hesitated to rate Zimmerman as a "Socialist." The question now arises, what effect will the victory of Zimmerman have on the 1928 campaign when Senator La Follette must stand for reelection? Zimmerman will undoubtedly try in the next two years to create a strong machine and there are those who believe that he will contest for the Senatorial nomination two years hence. Should he not be the choice of the anti-La Follette wing it is understood that Congressman John Schafer, the only one of the Congressional delegation to support Zimmerman, will undertake the candidacy. While he did not in so many words urge Senator Lenroot's election in the campaign just ended, he did attack and denounce Governor Blaine and urge his defeat and was crafty enough to conceal his position until after the date of filing candidacies had passed, so that it was impossible for the Progressives to oppose him with another candidate. If the throngs which attended Senator La Follette's meetings during the campaign can be taken as a gauge of his popularity it will not be possible to defeat him in 1928. Whenever he spoke, whether by day or by night, in cities or in the country, he was cheered by great crowds who rushed up to him after the meeting to greet him personally. Even the reactionary Milwaukee Journal spoke wonderingly of these manifestations of regard.

As for Senator-elect Blaine, in view of the reports that he may follow in the footsteps of Lenroot and become conservative in Washington, it is worth recording Senator La Follette's opinion that "during his six years as Governor Mr. Blaine has never compromised with the reactionary forces of Wisconsin." By initiative and courage he has forced the tax-dodging corporations of this State to pay into the treasury $7,500,000 which they had endeavored to evade. He has thereby incurred the undying enmity of the powerful interests.

Illinois Votes for Corruption

By CHESTER C. NASH, JR.

Evanston, November 4

ILLINOIS voted—but the net result of the election was merely an expression of opinion on four important issues. This State has proclaimed to the world that just now it does not care to purge itself of unclean politics and that the nation must act on the issue of honesty and honest government raised by the primary-campaign funds. At least this State has wearied of Volsteadism and it appears to approve the action of the church triumphant in descending into petty politics.

First and foremost in this sad tale is the election of Colonel Frank L. Smith, the recipient of more than $150,000 of public utility funds while a candidate and while chairman of the Illinois Commerce Commission, to the post of United States Senator from Illinois. The electors had two alternatives, George E. Brennan, a former ward-heeler, suddenly become Democratic king of the West, who promised to go to Washington and remove or ignore—he was never quite definite—the Eighteenth Amendment, and Hugh S. Magill, an honest independent Republican, untainted by corporation funds, experienced in statesmanship, and of unquestioned integrity. Colonel Smith won, the former ward-heeler was a close second, and the honest citizen a very, very bad third. The farm vote was a deciding factor. The Western Democratic boss carried Chicago and Cook County, but the out-State vote elected Colonel Smith. He polled 773,000, Brennan 717,000, and Magill only 147,000 votes.

This does not, however, end the story. There are many who believe that Colonel Smith will never take his seat. Even in Republican circles they are speculating as to whether if the Colonel should be refused entrance into the Senate his successor will be Governor Len Small or Fred Lundin, the old Republican power behind the polluted Republican throne, who will receive this honor. Decent Republicans everywhere are hoping that the report of Senator Reed's investigating committee and the determination of Senator Norris to prevent Colonel Smith's taking his seat will retire Senator-elect Smith to private life. It must be pointed out in this connection that many Republicans who do not approve of Smith's action voted for him in the fear that if they voted for Magill, Brennan, whom they consider a worse type, would be swept into office.

The referendum on prohibition was overwhelmingly carried by those in favor of the modification of Volsteadism. That the Wets would carry Chicago was a foregone conclusion, but what is surprising is the fact that the country vote put its stamp of approval on modification while defeating Brennan, the wet Senatorial candidate.

Finally, the election was graphic evidence of the church's adoption of petty politics. The organized church, represented by the Anti-Saloon League, backed the corporation-fed, "dry" Republican; the unorganized church, in the persons of a few isolated, conscientious leaders, backed honesty, integrity, and public service. The dollar won. It has thrown the church openly and unqualifiedly into an unsavory brand of politics and the future career of this new "bloc" may be watched with interest.

What Cost Mussolini?

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Paris, September 27

SAID an important American diplomat the other day: "I am little interested in what returning Americans tell me about the great improvement in outward conditions in Italy—that the trains are running on time, that the country has been cleaned up, that people are working, that there are law and order. Any tyrant can accomplish that. What I should like to know is what price Italy will pay for Mussolini about twenty-five or thirty years from now." The truth is, of course, that one can pay far too high a price for outward efficiency and order. Yesterday I met a tourist just in from Rome who is enthusiastic in his praise of the new Italian regime. He recited with the greatest satisfaction that the friend with whom he is traveling was fined twenty lire on a train near Milan because an official came through the car and found that the American had his shoes on the seat opposite. "And the streets! You should see how clean they are and how dirty they used to be!" So it goes on every hand here in Paris. American worshipers of efficiency, of the god of getting things done, as well as our captains of finance and industry, make the air resound with paeans of praise for the man who "has put everybody to work and saved Italy from Bolshevism." It never occurs to them to ask the price that is paid for these things.

These adulators of Mussolini never look below the surface. Is it true that Mussolini saved Italy from Bolshevism? There are many to dispute it. It is a slogan, a trade-mark, a catchword, and so it is eagerly snapped up. Ask people for particulars and they tell you of the attempt of the automobile workers and others to control their factories in Turin, and speak of the bomb explosion in the Diana Theater in Milan. Do they inquire whether everybody is really at work in Italy, and if so, how many days a year and at what rates of pay? No, indeed. The mere statement suffices. Does it ever occur to them to ask how many men are in prison as a result of Fascist activities, with or without charges being filed against them? Do they stop to inquire into Mussolini's personal record? Of course they don't do any of these things. If they did they would find that it is only six years since Mussolini was openly preaching anarchy and the destruction of all government; on the 6th of April, 1920, twelve months and eighteen days after the founding of Fascism, he wrote in his own paper, Il Popolo d'Italia: "Down with the state in all its forms and incarnations. . . . To us there remains only the consoling religion of anarchy." Probably 10,000 persons are in jail for having offended Fascism in one way or another, among them an Englishman who got eight months for saying in a restaurant, among other things, that he was tired of seeing Mussolini's "mug" on every wall. Do they ever stop to inquire, these enthusiastic Americans, as to the sources of their news about what Mussolini is doing and saying? Are they aware that the strictest kind of censorship exists in Italy, and that any man who criticizes the Dictator can be sent to jail for thirty months? Are they aware that Mussolini's speech or utterance, before being printed, has usually been revised and edited by the official press bureau?

If they have heard that the entire opposition press has been suppressed in Italy, they have forgotten it. They do not trouble to ascertain that no Italian daily dares to print an account of such a thing as the recent alleged attempt* upon the life of Mussolini until the story has been written precisely as Mussolini desires it to be told. They assume that Italy is content and happy because they hear no protests against what is going on, and they are not aware that he who criticizes the Dictator can immediately be sent to jail for months—jailed immediately with no possibility of rescue by a habeas corpus proceeding, or any other. In their laudation of Mussolini's law and order they remain in ignorance of the fact that the whole Italian judicial system smacks of the Middle Ages and is utilized by the Dictator to crush anyone who opposes his will. If they read of Italians of the highest standing, like Professor Salvemini, being deprived of their citizenship and all their property merely because of daring to criticize the despot, these Americans are not interested—no more than are our great financiers who rise at public luncheons and "bow down before the solemn and majestic and lonely figure of Mussolini." They do not look into the actual conditions of Italian finance and inquire, among many other things, why it is that the Government is having millions advanced to itself by the treasury with the distinct statement that, by virtue of a royal decree of June last, it shall not account for these millions. Finally, these Americans never take the time to inquire why it is that the Vatican is openly turning its guns upon Fascism, or to ascertain just what is the condition of the agricultural workers under the Mussolini regime. The indisputable facts as to the murder of Matteotti they do not care to know, or they pass the incident over as a trifling peccadillo of friends of the great and lonely and majestic figure.

The diplomat I quoted is right. The interesting thing is not what Mussolini may achieve in the six months or six years that may yet be his, but what is the price for this horrible strangling of liberty, this destruction of every vestige of democratic government, this brutal enslaving of a people for the exaltation of a megalomaniac who, in his speeches at least, is full brother to the ex-Kaiser. All Europe today is anxious as to what he may do tomorrow in international relations. He nearly wrecked the League of Nations three years ago by his assault on Corfu. His attacks upon Germany in regard to the agitation over the Tyrol and upon France for granting the right of political asylum to Italian refugees are samples of the way he keeps the chancelleries of Europe in turmoil. No one knows where he will break out next, or how. He is as adept in rattling the saber in its scabbard as was the Kaiser. Fascist leaders talk recklessly of war with Turkey or even with France. The danger is that in order to save himself he may resort to arms like other pinchbeck Napoleons. Meanwhile, he is the enfant terrible of Europe and all Europe is paying for him in increased nervous tension and uncertainty lest it pay also a fearful price in blood. Why has France placed three more divisions on the Italian boundary?

Whenever Mussolini falls, Italy will have to pay the piper. It will be lucky if it does not find its finances completely wrecked and its future heavily mortgaged. It will have laboriously to reconstruct the whole financial and economic structure of the state and the institutions of democracy which Mussolini has pulled down. It will have to revive the faith of the people in the processes of democracy. It will have to end government by fiat, government by passion, government by prejudice, government by corruption, government by brute force. It will find a people disappointed, disillusioned, and with much less courage for undertaking the remodeling of the state. At least the thousands of imprisoned political victims of the great and lonely and majestic figure will be released. The miseries and sufferings caused by the tyrant can never be undone or compensated for. But there can be a return to normal and civilized government even though it be less efficient on the surface. The alternative of such a people living for generations under the domination of a dictator and his successors is simply unthinkable. The world has its cycles of reaction, but it has also its cycles of revolution and evolution.

For Americans Mussolini is serving an extraordinarily useful purpose. You can measure a man's devotion to the democratic ideal and his belief in America's principles of government by the attitude that he takes toward Mussolini. If with some knowledge of what is actually happening in Italy an American still prefers the Mussolini type of government, he is plainly disloyal to our American political principles. Curiously enough, the adorers of Mussolini include primarily those who shouted loudest for war in order to make the world safe for democracy. They are the ones who cry most loudly against the dictatorship of the Bolsheviks in Russia at the moment they laud to the skies the dictatorship of a handful of Fascists. If the Bolsheviks should prove as successful outwardly as Mussolini, we may yet have our captains of industry and our casual tourists singing the praise of the men who may then have brought "order out of chaos" in Russia. Incidentally these American adorers of Mussolini have no time to waste on such happenings as the indictment of two of the Harding Cabinet for corruption in office. Why should they? Many of them subscribed to the eight-hundred-thousand-dollar memorial to the man who gave America the crookedest Cabinet in the history of the American Presidency. And they see nothing inharmonious in their ostentatious worship of the American Constitution and form of government and their loud-mouthed admiration for the majestic figure in Rome. They support public-school contests in oratory upon the subject of our Constitution and the advantages of our Congress over all others, while they whoop for joy when they hear that Mussolini has driven another nail into the coffin of Italian representative government. Let us hope that when the inevitable crash comes in Italy they will recognize the folly of their present position in supporting what a Fascist friend of mine, with unintentional humor, calls the "superdemocracy of Mussolini."

* This refers to the fifth attempt of September 11.

Three Black Women

By REBECCA HOURWICH

Christina

WITH careless arrogance, a swish of running tires, and a swirl of car that scattered all the naked children, the Chief Magistrate of Zululand and his party stopped at the Mahashini kraal, the royal kraal of Solomon Dinizulu, King of the Zulus. Solemn awe, respect bordering on suspicion and fear, curiosity, and delight at strange visitors stamped all visible faces. One unruffled woman leaned against a fence, did not alter her position, watched all proceedings dispassionately, and registered a cynical amusement. Her attitude was more than sophisticated; it was regally poised.

"That," said Chief Magistrate Fynney, without waiting to be asked, "is Christina!" If Christina's bearing had failed to impress the tone of the Chief Magistrate was conclusive. Christina was a personage!

At close range she was charming, gracious, the perfect hostess in her blue Mother Hubbard and black shrouded head. For Christina garbed her body and soul in Christianity; but her spirit remained indomitable Zulu. That was her tragedy.

Christina learned at the mission church that Christians marry the men of their choice. Perhaps that was why she smiled and looked with favor on John, and loved John, a common sweep of the kraal. Meanwhile, Christina, sixteen, comely and shapely, was the subject of wily speculation among the elders of the tribe. Many a day they deliberated to which house they would affiance Christina, the prize of the tribe. After considerable negotiation a suitably important and well-placed groom was found, and the marriage arranged. Cetewayo, King of the mighty Zulus, whose word was law in the tribe, sent for his daughter Christina and informed her of the forthcoming marriage.

Christina announced she was a Christian and would marry only the man of her choice, John the common sweep. Cetewayo laughed at even the suggestion of such an alliance. John or no one was Christina's final word. But as days went by, and Christina remained obdurate despite the progress of arrangements for the marriage, Cetewayo, grim and threatening, endeavored to explain that a daughter of the royal house of Zulu can only marry a man of noble blood, a man of her own or approximate rank.

When Christina pined and sighed as do all lovesick maidens regardless of the color of their skins, Christina's malady and the reason for it came to the attention of the local missionary.

"What nonsense is this, Christina?" he asked. "You and John are fine young people, sturdy, honorable, and faithful members of the church. You will make a fine young couple. Leave the kraal; I will find work for you. Let me marry you."

"You don't understand," Christina assured him. "A Zulu cannot marry without the consent of the Zulu king. Win my father's consent, and John and I will be able to marry."

Promptly the local missionary visited Cetewayo and urged the marriage of Christina and John, but with no success. Other missionaries heard of Christina's and John's romance, and went of their own accord to visit Cetewayo to win his consent to the marriage, but to one and all Cetewayo gave the same answer: "A daughter and sister of Zulu kings cannot marry a commoner."

Finally the Bishop heard of Christina and John and of their obstacle to happiness. "This is silly business and must end," said the Bishop, and forthwith ordered the marriage of Christina and John. Again Christina explained. "I want to marry John, and John wants to marry me, but I cannot marry without the consent of my king. Don't order me to marry; win the consent of my king."

So the Bishop journeyed to call upon the King of the Zulus. And the King of the Zulus, who is always a man well versed in the niceties of rank, appreciated the position of a dictator respected in the land of the ruling whites. He bowed before the Bishop, thanked him humbly for the honor conferred by the visit, showed him every courtesy of the kraal, and showered him with beadwork and skins. Gracefully and tactfully he expressed his regrets not to be able to grant the Bishop's request, but surely the Bishop would understand that laxity in the case of the King's daughter would be subservient of discipline to all the sons and daughters of the tribe? The Bishop's visit closed the church's active interest in the affairs of Christina and John.

Cetewayo died, and his son Dinizulu ruled in his stead. Christina appealed in vain to her brother. Dinizulu, too, died, while Christina and John remained unmarried. Solomon, Christina's nephew, many years her junior, now reigned. Solomon wears trig gabardine uniforms and a cocked military cap, and drives about in high-powered automobiles. It is rumored that Solomon does not take ancient tribal laws without a trace of humor. Christina appealed to him.

Solomon assured Christina that his sympathy was with her; that he would like to see her happy, but it could not be done at the sacrifice of respect for law and order: certain traditions had to be maintained. Did he not have forty wives, a strain on his time and attention, because the tribe expected it of him? Members of the royal family must bow to custom and put the interests of the tribe first. Christina had made a mistake, but it was not too late, for though she was getting old a good husband would be found for her; she had better forget John. Christina ceased asking permission to marry.

When I saw Christina she was nearly fifty. A few weeks before John had died. Neither one of them had ever married.

Christina, a daughter of the ancient house of Zulu, whose basic creed is be fruitful and multiply, had foregone the pleasure and prestige of family life. She had remained true to her lover, for she had loved no one else; she had remained faithful to her church, for she had refused to marry except at the dictates of her heart; she had remained loyal to her people, for she had refused to marry without the consent of her King.

But not even Christina realized that her loyalty paled in significance beside her supreme independence, that she had pitted her own sense of right, and stood out alone against the most highly organized institutions of the country in which she had been born, the Christian church and the Zulu state.

Mrs. Tanga Jabavu

"IT must be a little difficult to be the wife of the only native professor in Africa," I ventured.

"Oh, Mrs. Jabavu makes life difficult for herself. She has many queer ideas, curious whims and notions. She is very eccentric, and I fear will ruin Jabavu's career. She is spoiled, ruined by undigested education in England. She got a lot of notions over there about what she calls the emancipation of women. Last year, when her child was only a baby, she left it and went to study in England. A married woman! She does not even see the absurdity of it."

The heavy, perspiring missionary paused, permitted himself a covert glance from my ankle to my knee, and continued with malignant assurance, poorly disguised by assumed hesitation.

"You will pardon me, but I feel that women of Mrs. Tanga Jabavu's age, of your age, ought to be giving the flower of their youth to insuring the progress of the race, to future generations. I do not think those are the years that a woman can afford to be away from her husband."

The missionary was only one of many who complained to me about the ridiculous Mrs. Tanga Jabavu.

Mrs. Jabavu was at home when I came to see her. Her home was a little larger than the average rondovel occupied by natives, but it was one nevertheless: a one-room, round, whitewashed, mud-and-plaster, thatch-roof hut, nestled among the well-built roomy homes of other professors. The stone floor and window casings were features unknown to most native huts; nor did the difference end there. There were iron cots, curtains, a kitchenette, a desk with drawers at either end, a typewriter, and a general air of ascetic neatness.

On a crude wooden chair, the light from the window streaming in on her eager, mobile face, Mrs. Jabavu sat leaning toward me. Tensely, apprehensively, she waited for me to speak. When I told her I wanted to hear about native women she professed not to understand, but it was only after I had told her a little about myself, that I, too, was married and had a little girl, that I won her confidence.

"You are traveling here for your work, alone, and you left your little girl and husband at home? Maybe, then, you will understand about me."

I urged her to talk about herself, which she did, simply and factually.

"I was teaching here at Lovedale Institute, where I had once been a pupil, when I became engaged to Professor Jabavu. We both felt I could be more useful if I spent a year studying abroad. So I went to Birmingham to a Quaker settlement and specialized in religious work and music. Religious work was familiar to me because my father is a Presbyterian minister, due to Lovedale influence. In 1916 I returned and Professor Jabavu and I were married. In 1922, though I was married and had a child, I went back to Birmingham and spent two years there. I have only recently come back.

"You see I needed so much more studying. I needed bookkeeping, typing, practical subjects, and English, to learn to write; and ever so much more music. I want to record our music, for it is through music that we can reach our people. And it is also through music that we can teach them self-respect, that they have a culture of their own.

"My husband edits a Xosa-English weekly which has a woman's supplement. I wanted that supplement to mean something to native women as well as native men. All the months that I studied it was fitness to conduct that department that I had in mind.

"Our population must prepare themselves for wider political life. If our women remain unprepared they will drag the men and the race to their level, for no race is higher than its women. And our women! You cannot imagine, you cannot conceive the subjection of our women. It is not that even the most educated are all held down to housekeeping. It is not that they have no financial independence. These are ills common enough among Europeans. It is that our women are slaves, with no control over their children, their homes, or their bodies. They must bow absolutely to the will of the men.

"The mines, the increase of industrial life, greater educational opportunities have widened the natives' sphere, taken them out of the kraal. Our women have not kept pace with the change, but they shall. We women must help each other rise."

Time passed and Mrs. Jabavu held me in a spell; behind her hovered the ghosts of millions of Bantu women; she was their spokesman.

Mrs. Jabavu had no traditions of individual thought, activity, or independence for the women of her own race. There are no black women in history. Rather, she could look back upon centuries of unbroken bondage. She had neither cooperation nor encouragement from members of her own race, or other races, for the blazing of a trail is lonesome work. Yet she holds to her the vision of free black women. Mrs. Jabavu is that rare thing among women, a brave and consistent feminist.

Sanni

IT was Sunday morning at St. Matthew's Mission in the hills of the Ciskei. The little red brick chapel tolled its bell, and stood beckoningly open to the natives of the countryside. Specks of black and white moved toward the organ strains from every direction. Closer and closer they came, stiff and awkward, clumsily aware of shoes donned but once a week at the nearest bend before the church boundary. In staid black suits, starched white blouses, limp black skirts, thick black kerchief hoods, English prayer-books perched precariously atop heads, sedately they filed by. Gradually we left them behind, as a Xosa priest and I pressed on to a distant kraal for outdoor services.

Our congregation waited for us under a low spreading tree, the closely huddled thatched huts in the background. Seated in a semi-circle the men took one side of the tree, the women the other. Clothes determined the progress of conversion in the community: half-nakedness, beads, and colorful trappings—heathens living in darkness; partially clothed in European clothes—a self-conscious groping toward Christianity; absence of all ornaments, in complete European attire of drab tone—complete devotion to Christianity.

There were present men, women, and children in all stages of darkness and light, but self-conscious Christians predominated, judging by the gleam of shiny white collars in the sharp sunlight. Only the old chief, grizzly and gray, crouched in the attitude of Rodin's thinker on the edge of the group, appeared wary of the white man's God. The women were for the most part absorbed in cuddling and nursing roly-poly brown lumps.

Ponderously and pompously the young priest conducted his service. After him other pompous youths offered up prayer in holy self-righteousness and dispelled the charm of hot drowsy hills at mid morning. Even the petted babies grew bored and restless. Then, when everyone was tired, and all the men were finished, a woman asked permission to lead in prayer.

Suddenly, on that gentle shaded hill, five miles from a mission station, forty miles from a railroad station, in the heart of a primitive country, a woman's voice pealed forth in prayer. There was nothing dramatic about her attitude. A simple figure in the conventional mark of native Christianity, a blue Mother Hubbard wrapper hung loose from the shoulders hiding the lines of the form, a tight black kerchief binding the head. Neither swaying nor chanting nor moaning, nor assuming excessive dignity to show her rise above her previous heathen state, on bent knee, in the accepted and familiar attitude of Christian prayer, she prayed in Xosa.

And never before or since have I heard such a prayer, such real prayer. It was as if everything grew still and shrank before the passion and fervor of one racked but hopeful human being. She was no longer a lone woman in prayer, but a symbol of something fine and beautiful, something out of human grasp.

Later that morning as the Xosa priest and I were returning I asked him: "What did the woman pray about?"

The priest looked a little abstracted, as if he were recalling a trivial incident hard to remember, and briefly replied:

"Oh! That woman? Oh, she. Oh, Sanni. Oh, she was praying for her sons and other mothers' sons at the mines in Johannesburg."

In the Driftway

THE way of the translator is hard. He may be a most meticulous philologist who talks glibly about Grimm's law and Verner's law. Or he may be like the old schoolmaster, a wounded soldier retired to teaching, who would strike a snag in every second line and decide "to skip that devil." One language is quite sufficient. In fact, it may be too much. The Drifter remembers an evening in Colorado when a handsome sign by the roadside invited him to come in and eat some "tender stakes." And again, he recalls an advertisement announcing that "an errant girl" was wanted. The Drifter blames no one. What with tacks and tax, die and dye, beer and bier, and a thousand similar puzzlers, he has never wondered at those who found themselves lost in the labyrinthian mazes of one language. And there are 3,424 languages.

THERE have been in all ages ingenious translators who have wrestled with this host of tongues. Nor does the Drifter berate them too severely for any oddities or even mistakes. What could be more enjoyably modern than the old rendering of Genesis 3:21, "And the Lord God made Adam and his wife coats of skins"? Homer or no Homer.

THE Drifter recalls a good story told by Carl Sandburg in a public lecture, one of his "good shows." Two Senators, said the tousle-headed Swede, were arguing about foreign words and their ability to understand them. The more confident of the two laid a wager of ten dollars that he would translate any poser put by the other. The wager was accepted. After a minute's hesitation the problem was stated: "What is the meaning of 'Vox populi, vox dei'"? A smile of triumph spread over the challenger's face. "'Vox populi, vox dei'—you want to know what that means? Well, sir, know then that 'Vox populi, vox dei,' being interpreted, means 'My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?'" And he took the money he had won, which the other, being an honest if unlearned loser, relinquished without protest.

EVEN lawyers may at times contribute to the treasury of translations. Not many years back a mighty Goliath of an attorney, armed with the poisoned sword of war hysteria, was trying to slay a valiant David, a pacifist friend of the Drifter. In keeping with the times, some German letters were purloined from the friend's files and presented at the trial. Like a jumping-jack popping from his box, the lawyer dramatically demanded: "Who is Mr. Gruss?" Confusion. "Yes, Mr. Gruss. You have many letters from him." "I have not. I know no such person." "Don't know him? Why here are a dozen letters from him—from Germany—all signed H. Gruss." Confusion worse confounded. Finally the defendant asked to see the letters and sure enough there it was at the end of every one, "Herzlichen Gruss," with no further signature. With a smile he passed a German dictionary to the attorney, who had, at least, vindicated his solid Americanism.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Delayed News From Arizona

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: George Hunt, your faithful subscriber, was elected Governor of Arizona for his sixth term, defeating E. S. Clark, Republican, by about three hundred votes. Carl Hayden, Democrat, beat Cameron for United States Senator by a large majority. Cameron's eleventh-hour slush-fund charge was a ghastly flare-back. It has made Cameron ridiculous. Senator King, now in Los Angeles conducting the investigation, finds no evidence that money was sent from California to Arizona to influence the election. Lewis Douglas, Democrat, the able and progressive son of James Douglas, Arizona's chief millionaire and an antagonist of both Hunt and Cameron, was elected by a large majority over Judge Baughn, Republican. This made it a sweeping Democratic victory throughout the State. Hunt was opposed most bitterly by the reactionaries of both parties and was almost fatally handicapped because Van Dyke, editor of the Miami Silver Belt, the only Hunt daily in the State, was the ardent and chief supporter of Cameron.

Pasadena, Cal., November 9 FRANK C. LOCKWOOD

Passaic Wants Help!

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The stirring article called Disaster Loves Workers, by Hollace Ransdell, in your issue of November 3 brings dramatically to the public's attention the plight of the Passaic textile strikers who were arrested on a most obvious frame-up.

Since this committee was organized at the commencement of the strike we have had information of countless cases where the Passaic police have attacked and jailed strikers and their sympathizers at the behest of the mill-owners. Women members of the committee were attacked and beaten by the police blocks away from any mill. While the police have been cautious in their treatment of those who have come into Passaic from out of town they have been merciless to the strikers, as the recent arrests for so-called "bomb outrages" indicate.

Lovers of freedom must not forget Passaic and the glorious ten-months' struggle that the workers have been waging there. There is still desperate need for food and clothing for the women and children. Gifts of money or clothes made to this committee are distributed at no overhead cost to the neediest cases. Readers of The Nation have responded generously in the past to our appeals. We know that they will not permit hunger or suffering to break this strike. Send clothing or checks to me at Room 638, 799 Broadway, New York City.

New York, November 3 Clarina Michelson,
Secretary, Emergency Committee for Strikers' Relief

Judge Bausman Judges

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Though a Democrat all my life I can see no reason for upbraiding President Coolidge for his stand in respect to the war debts, and I am very sorry to hear the genial editor of The Nation using the language of an ill-humored Englishman that we are "exacting the last penny" from our former Allies. This is a gross exaggeration, the English having adjusted on the basis of about three-quarters, the Italians on the basis of one-fourth, and the French refusing to settle on any basis at all. As to the latter country, our exasperation is [illegible] by the fact that while we are asking her to repay merely what we advanced after the armistice, plus an almost incredible quantity of food and munitions which she could turn into cash.

Yes, you are right in saying that our country is singularly [illegible] on this question. I have seldom seen the mass of the people so [illegible], and he must be a strange man who will say that we are not a generous people. We are practically [illegible] on the question of paying not "the last penny" but a [illegible] to all except those who sojourn in Europe and fall under the spell of Americans and American bankers abroad. We asked nothing as spoils of war and the Allies got everything they could lay their hands on, though they charged us for everything and paid us for nothing. They deceived us in every [illegible] to get us into the war, and this has added gradually to the popular resentment. As to the spoils of war, Mesopotamia alone will reimburse Great Britain. Mesopotamia is indeed a prize, gloriously fitted for agriculture and apparently abounding in petroleum. Tan[illegible] and tropical products and five times the size of Pennsylvania, will never be released from mandate, but must be considered forever the property of the English, who received the mandate. Great Britain comes out of the war mistress of the seas, having completely outwitted us at the Washington Disarmament Conference, where again we showed an astounding liberality in the face of the best professional military advice.

The common sense of the people I have always believed in. Common sense told us to stay out of the war, but the people were lashed into it by a fury of propaganda from those who now refuse to pay what they borrowed. Common sense tells us today to lift from the backs of our own taxpayers a substantial part of what was deliberately borrowed from us. Nor are Americans altogether stupid. They are not insensible to the fact that every dollar we release to the Europeans will go to armaments to increase their power over us, and that the real origin of all this controversy is not the repayment of the debts but the envy aroused by our sudden expansion into foreign trade. We may have to pay a price for our standing up at last for some of our rights, but at any rate we will not be bullied.

The sudden volley of abuse against us in Great Britain was wholly unprovoked. Their government had made no proposal for a reduction of the debt. It is not possible for them to say that they have made a new proposal to our country that has been rejected. They prefer, apparently, a campaign of propaganda.

The Allies, and principally Great Britain, got by the war an enormous proportion of the remaining raw materials of the earth, and for these, as in the case of rubber, we shall have to pay a good round price, some of them in the event of war being cut off from us entirely by the powerful fleets of Britain.

Seattle, Washington, October 25 Frederick Bausman

The Cardinals on Sunday

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your editorial paragraph on the St. Louis "Cardinals" makes us Catholics laugh. Does any one suppose we cared a tinker's curse whether the Philadelphia Ledger called them "Cardinals" or not? Nor would the composite picture of the St. Louis team wearing a cardinal's hat shock even a sister of charity. Thank heaven, we have a sense of humor.

To illustrate our attitude on such matters, here is a little gag that went the rounds among us (referring to the Sunday game of the series):

"Say, Mac, I hear the Pope is trying to stop the game today."

"Stop the game, Mike—but what has the Pope got to do with it?"

"Shure, he don't want the Cardinals to be playing on Sunday."

San Diego, California, October 27 E. H. Whelan

Contributors to This Issue

George P. West has contributed several articles to The Nation on events in California.

Robert S. Allen of the Christian Science Monitor spent the weeks preceding the election in Wisconsin.

Chester C. Nash, Jr., who writes from Evanston, Illinois, is associate editor of the National Underwriter.

Oswald Garrison Villard has just returned from Europe.

Rebecca Hourwich gathered the material for Three Black Women in Africa.

Robert Graves is an English poet, and the author of "Country Sentiment," "Whipperginny," and other volumes.

Allen Tate is a poet and critic of New York.

Robert Wolf is the author of the novel "Springboard," published this fall.

Paul Weiss is a contributor of philosophical articles to the current magazines.

H. E. Buchholz is the author of "U. S.," recently reviewed in The Nation.

Henrietta Straus, for several years a writer on music for The Nation, is preparing a book for publication.

Books, Music, Plays

Pure Death

By ROBERT GRAVES

This I concealed, Death is terrible to me,
To no man more so, naturally,
And, at last, I have rid my natural terror
Of every comfortable philosopher
Or tall dark doctor of Divinity:
Death stands again in his true rank and order.

Therefore it was, when between you and me
Giving presents became a malady,
The exchange increasing surplus on each side
Till there was nothing but ungivable pride
That was not forgiven; and this degree
Called a conclusion not to be denied,

That we at last bethought ourselves, made shift
And simultaneously the final gift
Gave: each with shaking hands unlocks
The sinister long brass-bound coffin-box,
Unwraps pure Death, with that astonishment
Which greeted our first love-abandonment.

Tiresias

Transition. By Edwin Muir. The Viking Press. $2.

MR. MUIR is now the author of three volumes of interesting and important criticism. His purpose in the first two books, "We Moderns" and "Latitudes," was to organize a system of personal attitudes into a coherent Weltanschauung, an ordered vision of the chaotic contemporary situation. The result was interesting because it emerged through the terms of the chaos itself—the decadent philosophy of idealism. In the present volume Mr. Muir proves that his version of contemporary thought was not only philosophically interesting but important for literary criticism. The attitudes of the amateur metaphysician become the principles of judgment of the critic; these principles are important because they enable Mr. Muir to interpret modern writers with taste, depth, and perspective. He supports the validity of his earlier statement of the contemporary problem with the act of criticism itself, with a comprehensive, if somewhat personally interpretative, discussion of nine of the most significant writers of our time: Joyce, Lawrence, Huxley, Mrs. Woolf, Stephen Hudson, Strachey, Eliot, Miss Sitwell, and Graves. Mr. Muir's literary competence is enormous, but the comprehensiveness of his treatment is nevertheless to be wondered at in an age of dissociated intelligences.

As a philosophical critic Mr. Muir sees that the present age is crucial for literature. It is an age of transition. The traditional mythology of European culture has been discredited by practitioners of the historical method, like Frazer and Rivers, and by the encroaching world of scientific hypothesis. We stand, as Mr. Eliot's Tiresias stands, "throbbing between two lives"; our mythology is dead and we have not yet achieved a substitute for it out of the world-picture of modern science. For the pre-condition of all literature is a body of mythology to which the life-attitudes can respond freely as wholes. The traditional mythologies supported the spiritual equilibrium of man by rendering his origins sublime; but this is obviously no longer possible. The task of poets, then, in the present desperation, which became acute about the time of Ibsen and Baudelaire, is not the impossible resurrection of the myth but the construction of new myths which "idealize man's goal." The optimism is derivative of Nietzsche. The intellectual integrity of the optimism doesn't exist.

This conclusion appeared in Mr. Muir's first volume, but it is still his solution of the contemporary problem. He quotes with approval Wordsworth's belief that as soon as the world of science becomes somehow as "familiar" as the primitive world of religious myth, our cultural integrity and our literature will be restored. There has always been a certain meanness of intellect in this belief, for it ignores the hopeless breach between the abstractionism of science, however familiar this may become, and the object itself, for which the abstraction stands and to which it is the business of poets to return. There is enough truth in Mr. Muir's romantic solution to make it look plausible; that is, it registers dissatisfaction with science as it is as the material of poetry; it hopes in some obscure way to submit science to a mysterious change and transfigure it. This is philosophical insight overreaching itself—the defect in rationality of romanticism. For Arnold's judgment that the romantic poets "did not know enough" comes to this: that their rational equipment, their "ideas," was not adequate to the materials of the age; the scientific spirit, which they resisted, was the spirit into whose hands they played by failing to understand it. It was in this spirit that the post-Kantians generally and Coleridge in English criticism made idealism the official philosophy of romanticism. From this philosophical movement most of the merely literary intelligences up to the present time derive their terms, and hence their confusion.

The idealistic antithesis necessity versus freedom and its bedfellow, appearance versus reality, run all through Mr. Muir's thought. For although on occasion he laughs at the philosophers (which is neither one thing nor another), he yet proceeds, often perhaps without knowing it, with many of their assumptions. These seem to him to possess the finality of categories. Some of Mr. Muir's most interesting judgments inhere in a distinction between struggling with the spirit of the age and escaping from it: a writer struggles through appearance to reality or attempts to reject appearance altogether. The distinction yields illuminating results in the discussions of Eliot, Lawrence, and Graves; but it is capable of misleading Mr. Muir on his own ground. A case in point is his account of the brothel scene in "Ulysses." The remarks appear to be strictly analytical; they are actually the extension and support of a personal viewpoint. The brothel scene, says Mr. Muir, fails to release us from our oppressions; "it is rather a gigantic attempt to attain release." Thus Mr. Muir converts the brothel scene into a commentary on his own metaphysic. He sets up the straw man of "release," then proves that Joyce is not the straw man. Valuable as nearly all of Mr. Muir's judgments are, it must be pointed out that they are philosophical, not literary criticism; they interpret a given work to Mr. Muir himself; they do not isolate and expose its properties.

Mr. Muir further articulates his philosophical requirements of literature by means of Arnold's criterion, "the criticism of life." He has a shrewdness not unlike Arnold's, and he has more than Arnold's sensitiveness to writing which philosophically perplexes him; for example, Virginia Woolf's classicism. However profoundly we may dissent from his main assumptions, he is the only critic who has succeeded in grasping the modern situation as a whole.

ALLEN TATE

Chiefly Debits

Debits and Credits. By Rudyard Kipling. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

ONE never gets over any of one's loves, and this is no less true in literature than it is in life. Unless, through a mistaken impulse of romance, one returns years later to revisit the beloved. That is a very different thing from dwelling on the beloved's early photographs. Rudyard Kipling was to me, during the years from sixteen to twenty-one, one of three or four major literary enthusiasms, and to this day, when I reread "Kim" or "The Day's Work" or certain of the stories in "Puck of Pook's Hill," he seems to me the leading Edwardian writer of rhythmic English prose, and the greatest master of the cooked short story.

I say the cooked short story with intention. Joyce's "Ivy Day in the Committee Room" or "The Dead," Hemingway's "Cat in the Rain," Bunin's "The Gentleman from San Francisco," Tchekhov's "The Darling" belong to an entirely different genre. Kipling's short stories are as artificially constructed as an Elizabethan play—there is a beginning, a middle, and an ending, quite in the classic manner, an introduction, a climax, and all that, just as we were taught to analyze in school. Modern short stories, the best of them, are bits of crystallized moods—they can no more be analyzed than can a lyric poem. But Kipling is dramatic rather than lyric, even when, as in "They" or "Steam Tactics" or the priceless "My Sunday at Home," his purpose is primarily a simple job of landscape painting.

In this form of the short story that is so much less closely related to the novel than to the play—a narrow and exaggerated situation, dragged out of its context, and given a finality that exists nowhere in life—I think Kipling has never been excelled. For a certain kind of material, a certain type of healthy objective art, the manner which he created and brought to perfection seems to have a peculiar and ultimate fitness. Curiously enough this tight little Anglo-Indian provincial, this idolator of the stool-pigeon and the spy (in "Kim"), this hater of the organized worker (in "A Walking Delegate" and "The Mother Hive"), this worshiper of the militarist and the profiteer (in almost everything he ever wrote—it is superfluous to quote chapter and verse) finds his closest present resemblance in the Communist writers of the Soviet. This is a sight to make the gods laugh. But if you doubt it, compare "The Lawbreakers" in "Flying Osip" with that other boy-scout story, "The Army of a Dream." Compare "A Mere Trifle" with "His Chance in Life." I am not maintaining that Seifulina and Zozulya have ever read Kipling—probably they have not—but Communist art is active, extrovert, concerned with externals, and finds its natural parallel in the work of the man who admired Cecil Rhodes. Possibly all types of patriotic art tend to run in the same channels, regardless of the particular content of the patriotic creed. Certain it is that the Communist writers have turned toward a form that is essentially Kipling's, in abandoning the psychological tradition of their past.

It is because Kipling was such an admirable interpreter of [illegible] which held within it [illegible] that is achieved both its past vitality and its present [illegible]. There is no truth in the doctrine that good art must embody valid social theories. Great art is [illegible] conviction, regardless of how preposterous may be the lies the artist tells. But it is difficult to write with conviction if one is isolated from the currents of [illegible]. It is difficult, but not impossible. Blake did it, Stendhal did it, Emily Dickinson did it—all of them were out of harmony with the spirit of their time. To be sure their remoteness from their age lay in the fact that they were ahead of it. When one is passed by one's age and left behind it, one is in a different case. Like Shaw, like Gorki, like so many of [illegible], Kipling no longer believes in what he writes, and this is the one essential for third-rate work. It is better in such a case to be too stupid to realize one's obsolescence, but it is difficult to be a first-rate artist and be stupid enough.

The lack of assurance in the present volume sticks out on every page. "The United Idolators" is a piece of inept self-plagiarism whose only genuine line is its footnote: "See Stalky and Co." "The Prophet and the Country" reads like a parody on "The Captive" of the triumphant past. For the rest, the stories are attempts to scale down the World War into a compass that was not inappropriate for the taking of Lungtungpen, but that shows up rather sadly in comparison with most modern war fiction.

"Debits and Credits" is not an additional achievement for Kipling—it is not even a conclusion to his literary career—it is simply a faint echo out of that past, swashbuckling but Arcadian, to which neither he nor we will return again.

ROBERT WOLF

The Minds of Yesterday

The Making of the Modern Mind. By J. H. Randall. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

THAT strange medley of illusions, truths, and nonsense, that union of conflicting ideals and ideas which is part of man's cosmorama is much more and much less than a mere accretion of past beliefs. There is some originality and individuality in every one, no matter how trite the answers; while, on the other hand, the past that is constitutive of the present is far from pure, being refracted and colored by misunderstanding, faulty and arbitrary interpretations, and a priori notions. A history of the work of the past may clarify the present; it can never disclose it.

Mr. Randall begins with the Middle Ages. He delineates with fidelity and sympathy the major currents in religious and social beliefs, paying special attention to the Renaissance, the rationalistic seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and the romantic progressive concepts of the last hundred years. The reactions of different men at different times to the problems of government, society, life, and the future and the influence of science and religion on them, are clearly shown, the analysis being illuminated by judicious and representative selections from the original works. Unfortunately art, literature, poetry, and philosophy are neglected except in so far as they relate to "tendencies" or fall within conventional rubrics; while the restriction to recent times and the Western civilization—though justified by the size of the work—permits a description of but a fragment of our intellectual background.

The somewhat comprehensive bibliographies affixed to each chapter enhance the value of the work as a source- and text-book for those who wish to dip into the immediate past in order to discover the answers of others to the ever-present riddles of life. As a contribution to the understanding of some typical and significant figures the book is at once accurate and interesting. As an attempt to catch the modern mind in the making it is sadly inadequate.

PAUL WEISS

Peace in the Schools

The Menace of Nationalism in Education. By Jonathan French Scott. The Macmillan Company. $1.60.

THAT many elementary school histories reek inaccuracies and prejudices is true, of course, but not especially surprising in view of the fact that, in large measure, the more advanced works on which they are based also are heavy-laden with bunk. Such inaccuracies as characterize the elementary texts give a youngster going through the grades a lopsided conception of the past, its heroes, its villains, and the roles these essayed. A writer trespasses upon debatable ground when he jumps at the conclusion that such misconceptions, imparted to the masses during youth, have ever made any considerable contribution to an international strife. Nevertheless, today it is both meet and holy that advocates of peace should turn a searchlight on school texts.

Here is an alluring field for the proponents of world peace, and already they are exploring it. In Edinburgh a year ago the World Federation of Education Associations set itself the task of making a critical view of all the histories, geographies, and readers taught in public schools in the principal countries of the world, with the purpose of offering constructive criticism. The preparation of this report will take some years, and meantime a forerunner appears in Mr. Scott's book—which, unfortunately, does not make much of a contribution. The volume seems to have grown out of a very superficial investigation, while the material gathered has in many instances been handled stupidly. Mr. Scott examined, apparently with great haste, some of the histories and geographies now used in France, Germany, and England. His chief accomplishment seems to have been the culling from these books of hundreds of sentences and paragraphs that reveal either what the author is pleased to label narrow nationalism or else what he accepts as broad internationalism. Evidently no large survey was made of all the textbooks of any one country; no endeavor was put forth to ascertain the relative popularity of each book reported on; no need was felt of evaluating any book in its entirety. The consequence is that the author in instances summons the same textbook to take the stand, first to testify for the prosecution and later to be a witness for the defense.

Mr. Scott concludes with a series of suggestions that, to the American point of view, hardly point toward world peace. He recommends that the Committee on Intellectual Cooperation of the League of Nations pass upon all elementary texts. Then he grows a bit bolder: "Suppose the League went farther. Suppose that, instead of merely recommending schoolbooks, it extended its supervision to the preparation of courses of study and even of textbooks for the use of schools in various countries." Also, he thinks it would be a good thing to adopt a universal language, such as Esperanto, in all elementary schools. If the League of Nations wants to awaken Mars, it can turn the trick by adopting in its entirety Mr. Scott's program for warless internationalism. H. E. BUCHHOLZ

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. This year in addition a second prize of $50 and a third prize of $25 will be offered. The rules for 1926 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Wednesday, December 1, and not later than Friday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page.

3. No manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poems will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 9, 1927.

7. Besides the winning poems, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Children's Books in Brief

The Magic Flight: Jewish Tales and Legends. By Yossef Gaer. Frank Maurice, Inc. $2.

The Foundling Prince and Other Tales from the Rumanian of Petre Ispirescu. Translated and Adapted by Julia Collier Harris and Rea Ipcar. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

The Donegal Wonder Book. By Seumas MacManus. Frederick A. Stokes and Company. $2.

The Japanese Fairy Book. Translated by Yei Theodora Ozaki. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Skazki. Tales and Legends of Old Russia. Told by Ida Zeitlin. Illustrated by Theodore Nadejen. George H. Doran and Company. $5.

Fillmore Folk Tales. Selected by Wilhelmina Harper. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.50.

A group of fairy and folk tales from various countries which carry the young reader across oceans and mountains and many times bring him up at the same place. For it is astonishing how persistent certain stories are, bobbing up indiscriminately in Rumania, Ireland, and Japan. Of the group, Miss Zeitlin's book, with gorgeously gilded illustrations and bright end papers, is the handsomest and Mr. MacManus's, with a reckless Irish tune to it, has perhaps the most originality and freshness.

The King of the Golden River. By John Ruskin. The Light Princess. By George MacDonald. The Little Library. The Macmillan Company. $1 each.

Two worthy additions to a series excellent for its subject matter, its size, its firm binding, and—sometimes—its illustrations.

The Hunter. By Ernest Glanville. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

A story of Bushman life minus most of the romantic touch that so often mars a book of this kind. The Bushmen because they would not organize against the Zulus and other enemies were destined to extinction. Here they are shown giving ground, hunting, trapping, consulting the bones of destiny, meeting and conquering the animals of the forest, meeting and being conquered by the other men. A picture of a life that to most children will be both strange and exciting, and that will come to them here with not too many distortions.

Valery Garrick's Picture Folk-Tales. Illustrated by the author. Frederick A. Stokes and Company. $1.50.

A book of merry tales for very little children, with thoroughly ingratiating illustrations.

Winnie-the-Pooh. By A. A. Milne. Drawings by E. H. Shepard. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

Mr. Milne has this time taken to prose and with Mr. Shepard's and Christopher Robin's help has turned out another book full of delight for all children under seventy. Except that it has not the advantage of demanding that it be learned by heart, as "When We Were Very Young" does, one sees no reason why this story of Mr. Edward Bear, otherwise known as Winnie-the-Pooh, and his friends should not gain quite as many firm and unshakable admirers.

Pantomimes for the Children's Theater. By M. Jagendorf. Brentano's. $3.50.

Five pantomimes with the story, a description of the characters and the action, and the music given with all necessary details for production.

The Boy's Life of Barnum. By Harvey W. Root. Harper and Brothers. $1.75.

The life of the founder of modern publicity, told for boys—but a thrilling enough story for their elders, who have recently been regaled by a longer account.

Further Nonsense, Verse and Prose. By Lewis Carroll. Edited by Langford Reed. Illustrated by H. M. Bateman. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

These scraps, collected from magazines and the less-known books of Lewis Carroll, would none of them have made him the immortal author that he is. They have all of his faults, few those may be, together with only a fair share of his supreme virtue.

Music

Mrs. Coolidge

LISTENING to such ensembles as the Pro Arte Quartet of Belgium and the English Singers, one is apt to forget, in the quiet beauty and high perfection of their art, the even loftier beauty of the purpose to which we owe their acquaintance. This purpose—to plant and spread the love for chamber music in this country—has indeed been carried out so generously and so regularly ever since its first manifestation, the Berkshire Festival in 1918, that we have come to take more or less for granted the gifts and achievements of its sponsor, Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge. It is only when, the music ended, one files out past the bookshelves of a public library that one realizes to what extent this purpose has reached. If one, moreover, has had any experience with the educators of the preceding generation, one even realizes with a shock that one has heard, for instance, a world-famous quartet, like the Pro Arte, in the Music Division of the New York Public Library; and even quivers to think that there is a music division at all. The shock deepens as one tries to grasp the fact that not only the Pro Arte Quartet but also the English Singers—the latter the most perfect exponents of Tudor vocal music this country has ever known—made their initial bow to American audiences in a concert hall in the Library of Congress at a Chamber Music Festival given under the auspices of Congress.

Those who have long known the attitude of the American people toward music as an art may well wonder that their representatives should have given it official sanction. Those who have known the attitude of American educators may wonder even more, for it was a musician, again Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, and not an educator who put this through. If there are any, however, who do not know this attitude, let them go down to the Juilliard Musical Foundation. The secretary of this foundation is an educator. And as the ostensible purpose of this foundation is also, like that of Mrs. Coolidge's, to develop and spread musical culture in this country, it might be illuminating to compare their respective methods for attaining this purpose.

The Juilliard Foundation, as was perhaps to be expected from the educational training of its secretary, began along the line of least resistance by dispensing free tuition. With American artists and composers all over the country hard pressed by competition brought about through economic conditions in Europe, the Juilliard found no other use for its ten-million-dollar trust fund than to give thousand-dollar scholarships to students—many of doubtful talent—for study with private teachers who were well able themselves to succor talent, and at musical institutions already endowed and backed by multi-millionaires who were not only able but willing to succor talent. Next, the Juilliard decided to concentrate its activities. And so, with a crying need all over the country for training schools for conductors, the foundation built a costly music school in a city already amply supplied. Again, with an even greater need for orchestral readings of original compositions, so that composers may have a chance to hear what they have written and therefrom learn their faults, the Juilliard has been giving fabulous salaries to teachers already established in this city.

On the other hand we see Mrs. Coolidge starting a cham-

NEW BOOKS FROM The BRICK HOUSE

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON
By Ben Ray Redman

A profound, yet entertaining study of the most considerable living American poet.
$1.00 net

EUGENE O'NEILL
By Barrett H. Clark

This first book that has ever dealt entirely with O'Neill is a complete appraisal of the work of the foremost American dramatist. "An excellent book which criticizes, describes and maintains a point of view." Harry Hansen in the N. Y. World.
$1.00 net

BACKYARD
By Gloria Goddard

A first novel of extraordinary distinction, Backyard bears rich promise of becoming another Main Street. It is a story of small town life—but never dull, never prosy, never redundant. Clement Wood calls it "The finest first novel I have ever read." "It is a novel small in detail but large in significance." N. Y. Post. "Its objectivity and fresh imagery are delightful. N. Y. Times.
$2.00 net

TRANSFIGURATION
By Sergeev Tzensky

No more typical story of modern peasant life has come out of Russia. This is the third of a series of Russian masterpieces, not previously translated, edited and introduced by Maxim Gorky.
$2.50 net

THE FIDDLER IN BARLY
By Robert Nathan

The most mature work that has come from Mr. Nathan's pen, this story of a whimsical old fiddler and his dancing dog is finding a wide and enthusiastic public.
$2.00 net

DRAWINGS OF THE GREAT MASTERS
Edited by A. E. Popham and K. T. Parker, Ph. D.

I Florentine Drawings of the Quattro Cento by H. S. Ede.
II Drawings of the Early German School by K. T. Parker.
III Flemish Drawings of the Seventeenth Century.
[illegible] little quartos form exactly right medium through which [illegible] appreciation of old drawings may be stimulated." N. Y. Herald Tribune. $5.00 each volume. With 70 full-page plates.

EARLY AMERICAN INNS AND TAVERNS By Elsie Lathrop

[illegible] on the subject that covers the country from Atlantic [illegible] from Mexico to Canada. It is entertaining, inclusive, [illegible] Illustrated with photographs and drawing.
$5.00 net

THE SILVER STALLION By James Branch Cabell

The [illegible] of the romances of Poictesme and Mr. Cabell's greatest novel. "A book which I hold [illegible]" Heywood Broun. "As good as 'Jurgen' if not better." N. Y. World. "The [illegible] persuasive account James Branch Cabell has yet given us of that perpetually impossible country of 'Poictesme.'" N. Y. Times.

ROBERT M. McBRIDE & COMPANY, Publishers
7 West 16th Street New York

ber-music festival of her own because, being a musician as well as a musical philanthropist, she finds that American festivals, unlike those of Europe, omit chamber music from their programs. The fact that the world is at war does not daunt her. With civilization tottering, she sets up its beacon in the Berkshire Hills; with most of the world's musical nations at war, she invites the musicians of these nations to participate in this light; and with building almost at a standstill, owing to scarcity of material and labor, she erects a Temple of Music to house her festival, and four cottages to house the members of her Festival Quartet.

Again, being a musician, she was aware of the non-commercial value of chamber music; and so, to encourage composers to enrich its literature, she offered a thousand-dollar prize for a specified type of work every other year, and a commissioned work from a specified composer on the alternating years. The manuscripts of these works she has donated to the Musical Library of Congress. Moreover, to insure a fair verdict for the prize composition, she selected her judicial committee from musicians representing every phase of musical opinion from the conservative to the radical, and from the critic to the composer and performer. This committee is changed completely in personnel every prize-giving year. And finally, to perpetuate the festival after her death, she established a trust fund, which she offered to Congress and which the latter accepted, sufficient to build a concert hall in the Congressional Library—there to be held a chamber-music festival and chamber-music concerts every year. Under this fund both the New York and Boston public libraries also benefit. Six concerts were held in the former last year by the Lennox String Quartet. This year was opened by the Pro Arte Quartet, to be followed by the Flonzaleys. Chamber-music concerts have also been established in various big colleges through her generosity. And the greatest organizations and artists have been engaged to give this music. Besides the Belgian and English artists are the London String and the Wendling Quartets, Harold Samuel, Lionel Tertis, Selim Palmgren, and Myra Hess. There has been no finer quartet playing heard here in years than that of the Pro Arte; no ensemble singing ever heard here so intimate and exquisite as that of the English Singers. One turns indeed with relief from the futile extravagances of the Juilliard Foundation to the selfless standards which this woman has set above nation, race, creed, or even friendship.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

Drama

Ibsen Restated

AS one watches Eva Le Gallienne's admirable production of "The Master Builder" enrol itself upon the stage of the Civic Repertory Theater one is struck again by the fact that the interest of Ibsen's plays, far from fading, like that of lesser works, in the light of a different day, renews itself again and again, constantly shifting its center, but remaining always keen and fresh. It is not merely that the later plays, once thought too "difficult," take precedence over the simple sociological preachments of his earlier period but that these more complex works provoke new discussion in new terms. Armed though one may be with the latest handbook of official interpretation and hence prepared to tag each symbol with its literal meaning, there is a tantalizing something which eludes the grasp and stirs the mind. These plays refuse to stay explained, to give up all their secret. Issuing as they did from a mind less definitely circumscribed by its own logic than is sometimes supposed, from a mind that groped after even more things than it grasped, they are full of intuitions not fully stated, and so, like most great art, they hold a latent significance, have aspects which wait patiently for new tempers in new times to discover them. The problems of the richest demand, like the problem of "Hamlet," continual restatement.

"Such is the price that we pay for the great boon of democracy: the man of native intelligence is either barred from the public service altogether or subjected to almost irresistible temptations after he gets in."

Says

H. L. MENCKEN

In His Most Important Book

NOTES ON DEMOCRACY

A devastating polemic on democratic government and an illuminating analysis of its practice in America.

Second large printing

$2.50 at all bookstores

Just Out:

PREJUDICES: Fifth Series

By H. L. MENCKEN

Essays on Birth Control, Comstockery, Capital Punishment, and War: Conrad, Hergesheimer, Lardner, and Masters, William Jennings Bryan, Beethoven, The Last New Englander, Edgar Saltus, etc. $2.50

Prejudices, Gift Edition, 5 vols. boxed, $12.50

ALFRED A. KNOPF

730 Fifth Avenue - New York

BORZOI BOOKS

The subject of such plays as "A Doll's House" and "Ghosts" is practical morality. With that Ibsen began, and he accustomed both himself and his students to think in its terms. But after the manner of reflective men he soon soared upward, and like one of his own heroes he left off "building homes for men" to concern himself with the more intimate problems of the individual soul. And so though a play like "The Master Builder" still has its moral implications, though it [illegible], for example, upon the relation of the genius to the lesser men whom he crushes, its primary concern is with [illegible]ms of a different order, its aim is to comprehend the soul of a man whose solitary brooding has carried him, as it had carried his creator, to a lonely height from which the world of feminism and syphilis seemed no longer very significant. And it is this comprehension that offers continually a fresh challenge, for it is only begun, not ended, when its fable is explained upon the basis of allegory.

In such plays as "The Master Builder" and "The Wild Duck" Ibsen, though perhaps himself not wholly conscious of the fact, was concerned with something more than the veiled expression of a philosophy of life. His symbols have become, as symbols, clear enough, but there is stated by implication at least a problem which is, perhaps, the most acute now facing the contemporary intelligence—the problem, that is to say, of the relation of psychology and metaphysics. Every phenomenon here dramatized is subject to two interpretations. It is either a phenomenon of abnormal psychology or one of those symbols through which the world of eternal reality establishes a contact with the world of appearance. To the psychologist it is one thing, to the metaphysician another, and Ibsen, true even here to his dramatic credo "My business is to ask questions, not answer them," is content only to provoke the mind into activity. To the builder, for whom architecture has become a religion and height an expression of his aspiration, the dizziness which overcomes him when he mounts to the top of one of his own towers is the unfathomed secret which either holds the meaning or hides the meaninglessness of his life. Is it, as we should say, "a complex," an oblique expression of the sense of guilt which his ruthless methods have generated and his will suppressed, or is it rather the force of some higher power, of something outside himself, which tells him thus that he has failed somehow to adjust his aspiration to its meaning? Spurred onward, he mounts at last to the summit of his new home, for a moment he seems to triumph, then topples and falls to his death, leaving the question unanswered for him, for Ibsen, and for us.

One might, if one cared to do so, proceed to show how the same fundamental question underlies the other later dramas of Ibsen, but it is sufficient to say that here, in this conflict rather than in any other, lies their profoundest significance for us. Nor is this significance small, for it involves the whole question of the [illegible] of life and of where it is to be sought. Do those phenomena whose meaning eludes us have a transcendental significance, or is their complete explanation to be found always [illegible] that is to say, imprisoned forever in that world of seeming where psychology is the ultimate science, or does the world of eternal reality sometimes break through in symbols?

With "Caponsacchi" (Hampden Theater) Mr. Walter Hampden continues his policy of presenting modern poetic drama. The present play, made from "The Ring and the Book," is [illegible] superior to [illegible] does not escape both a heaviness of pace and a certain melodramatic obviousness of content. The vast Century Theater is now given over to a [illegible] called "The Pearl of Great Price." Like "Experience," which some may remember from seasons past, it is one of the illegitimate offspring begot by "Everyman" upon musical comedy. The theme is chastity, but times do change, and it must be recorded that the entrance of an abstract person called Wanton drew the first applause of the evening.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

The Neighborhood Playhouse, 466 Grand Street, N. Y. Telephone Drydock 7516
November 11-12-13-14-15-16-17. Mat. Sat.
THE LION TAMER
By ALFRED SAVOIR
"An extremely saucy comedy of the French Circus."—Alexander Woolcott.

Longacre Theatre. 48th St., West of Broadway. Evenings 8:30
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30
THEODORE DREISER'S
AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY
"A PLAY WHICH IS BOUND TO WRENCH A MILLION HEARTS."
—Journal.
DRAMATIZED BY PATRICK KEARNEY.

LECTURES

SPECIAL LECTURE
Adjustments in the Family and Beyond
Dr. S. Ferenczi of Vienna
AUSPICES
Child Study Association of America, Inc.
Empire Room, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel
Thursday Evening, Dec. 2d, 8:30. Admission $1.00

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL
5 Lectures on "The Human Body"
by DR. A. STONE
Nov. 19: The General Structure of the Body.
Nov. 26: The Blood and Circulation.
Dec. 3: Food and Nutrition.
Dec. 10: The Mechanism of Secretion and Excretion.
Dec. 17: The Reproductive System.
At 8:30 p. m., 244 East 14th St. Admission 25c.

NORMAN ANGELL
American Lecture Tour
1926-1927 Now Booking
Subjects:
THE CRISIS IN DEMOCRACY AND THE MAIN ST. MIND.
ILLUSIONS OF CURRENT POLITICAL THOUGHT.
THE TEACHER AND THE PUBLIC MIND.
EUROPE, AMERICA AND THE COLORED WORLD.
Sole Agent: W. B. FEAKINS, Inc., Times Bldg., New York
Send for particulars

Real Estate

If you have a house or property to sell or lease, try The Nation classified advertising section.

If the experience of other advertisers of real estate is a guide, your advertisement in The Nation will pay.

Write for rates to Dept. R., The Nation.

H. G. WELLS' MASTERPIECE

In a New, Elaborately Illustrated Edition

The New Pictorial Outline of History

Walter Lippman said in Vanity Fair:

"If you start at the first page and read slowly and sympathetically to the last, you will not only fill in vast gaps in your ignorance, but will also place whatever you do happen to know in some relation to the rest of human life."

The Nation said:

"To read this book is in itself a liberal education."

NEW TEXT: Not simply the original "Outline" brought up to date, but a complete revision. The rewriting of large sections and addition of much new material make it the one complete story of man.

NEW ILLUSTRATIONS: More than 800 pictures, maps and color plates illustrate in a matchless manner the evolution of all civilizations. The world has been searched for materials to make the pictorial story complete.

NEW PRINTING: The litho offset process used in this edition makes the text easy to read and gives extraordinary fidelity to the illustrations.

NEW SIZE AND BINDING: The page size permits an admirable proportion between type and pictures; the book is easy to hold and read.

This edition must be seen to be appreciated. At your bookdealer's—2 vols. $15.00.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

New York Boston Chicago Atlanta Dallas San Francisco

They are talking about

George Washington

THE IMAGE AND THE MAN

by W. E. Woodward

"The most stimulating study of Washington in relation to his times that has yet been written."—N. Y. Times Book Review.

"Much the best biography of Washington I have ever read."—Baltimore Sun.

"Mr. Woodward's book is not a mere idol-smasher of the vulgar sort. It is a genuine effort at interpretation and, in a high degree, a successful one."—James Truslow Adams, N. Y. Herald Tribune.

"It is, I think, the most interesting and provocative life of Washington yet written."—Henry Hazlitt, N. Y. Sun.

"The most brilliant portrait."—Claude G. Bowers, The Nation.

"W. E. Woodward has carved a little more to the skin of Washington than any man who has yet attempted the task."—John G. Neihardt, Kansas City Journal-Post.

"[illegible] biography of the season."—Keith Preston, Chicago Daily News.

"Will appeal to tough-minded people."—C. Hartley Grattan, The Book Review.

Octavo. 13 Full Page Plates. $4.00

BONI & LIVERIGHT, NEW YORK

GOOD BOOKS

Hygiene, Medicine, Surgery

WHICH?

WHY INFECTIONS?

In Teeth, Tonsils, and Other Organs

By NICHOLAS KOPELOFF

This book discusses the increasing prevalence of surgical operations. Convinced by a wealth of fascinating facts, the reader is brought to the conclusion that "surgery is the last resort."

The daily battle you wage against disease-producing germs and how to decide upon the best course toward health is explained in interesting lay language and clear style.

$2.00 at all bookstores

Alfred A. Knopf, 730 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

[illegible]

International Relations Section

New Zealand's Family Dole

By T. WALSH

THE Government, a Conservative one so far as politics go in this South Pacific country, has put forward a bill to help the family man by allowing him to draw from the consolidated fund the sum of two shillings weekly for every child in the family over two in number. The limit that may be drawn is eighteen shillings per week, the amount that a man with eleven children, none of whom are of an age to earn, may draw.

New Zealand, down in the warm Southern seas, was peopled by political and economic refugees from England, Scotland, and Ireland. The number of its inhabitants that claim descent from Continental people is negligible. The first comers, smarting under the injustice of the conditions that drove them from the land of their birth, had liberal ideas, but the necessity of scratching out an existence in a new land under strange conditions left little opportunity for remodeling state constitutions, even if inherited ideas had permitted thinking along such lines. The second generation had more leisure, however, and a remarkable wave of liberal thougnt swept the country in the end of the last century; political franchise based on land ownership was abolished in favor of universal suffrage; women were given a vote; ownership of land by the state with regulations for long leases, in case of all unalienated land, was established; money advances by the state to workers and farmers for building homes were legislated for; state insurance (fire, accident, and life) was set up to compete with private companies and actually lowered fire-insurance premiums by one-third in the first year of operation; accident insurance to cover all workers was made compulsory and an arbitration court to handle industrial disputes was established.

The Industrial Arbitration Court consists of a judge and one assessor nominated by the combined employers and [illegible] combined trade unions. Its functions at first were nebulous, rather a sort of referee body to act in strikes when an impasse seemed inevitable. By degrees the court was granted mandatory powers to fix wages in most trades for periods not exceeding three years; the net effect was that from being merely a nominal body helping to arrive at settlements in strikes it became all powerful in deciding rates of wages and standardizing conditions of labor; a factor not without benefit to employers. Owing to the manner in which the court was established and the fact that the successive governments were representative of the financial and commercial classes there was no principle fixed by law on which the court could base wages; in every application for variations of wage conditions the court had to endeavor to ascertain just how little the employees would take rather than strike and just how far the employers would go rather than lock out their men and tie up their plants. The sequel was that price-fixing of commodities was established and the general opinion of all classes was that no matter what the prices of goods were in other lands, the sellers of articles in New Zealand were entitled to get a price that was based on the figure needed to repay the New Zealand manufacturer for the wage scale fixed by law of the court. During the war prices rose and wages did not follow. Moreover, the court dealing with wages propounded the view that in addition to furnishing cannon fodder (conscription was enforced) the workers ought to submit to lowered wages as a result of soaring prices of food, etc., in order to bear a just share of the burden of war—that at a time when buyers of war bonds were exempted from income tax.

In the midst of the developments in 1917 certain amendments were made to the law governing the arbitration court. Apparently without anyone being aware of the fact one of the amendments gave the court power to use the actual cost of living as the basis for computing wages. Under this power the state statistician was authorized to collect the necessary data as to size of families, prices of food consumed, and the other factors related to the cost of living; no actual standard of living was expressly set up. But in the ordinary course of events that would have had to follow. Meantime the court fixed a basic wage, to which was to be added a varying amount to represent the value needed to give the wage earner a living wage based on the data being collected by the statistic office. The first application by the court of its policy gave the employees, in 1920, an increase of about 16 shillings weekly; the Government, scared out of its wits, promptly interfered in the award of the court, though the law expressly forbade such action, and suspended the application of the award, later compelling an amended and reduced rate to be gazetted as the award. Out of the controversy that arose around this action emerged the idea of giving the family man some special treatment, as any average wage inevitably left him short of the money that was needed to provide for all his dependents. In New Zealand the proposal put forward by the trade unions was for a subsidy out of the consolidated fund on wages fixed by the arbitration court, of an amount of 5s. or 7s. 6d. per week per child; the employers urged reducing single men's wages by making them contribute to a fund to subsidize the wages of married men.

The census taken in April last called for information as to earning powers of all breadwinners and the number of dependents. Naturally the information could only be obtained on the basis of average classes and is not so detailed as close study of the problem would produce. It showed, however, that out of all grades of people in the community, there were 52,423 children in families where the number of children exceeded two; and that of this total there were 49,125 of such children dependent on men who earned four pounds per week or less. As the arbitration court in fixing its basic wage took the average family as two adults and two children it appears that about 49,000 children exist for whose sustenance the wage law made no provision. As £4 is a low weekly wage in New Zealand, it is quite evident that the widest interests of the state require that some means be found to allow of a considerable percentage of the juvenile population being given the food and other things necessary for rearing as human beings.

The employers are opposing the measure, contending that "it is not British; that it is charity; that no such scheme has been adopted in Britain or any British-speaking country." Such argument is meaningless; the British wage system is no model for any country. The government party has a huge majority in both houses of Parliament and if it desires it can make the bill into law.

GABRIEL WELLS

announces

The Bonchurch Edition of

The Complete Works of

Algernon Charles Swinburne

in

Twenty Volumes

Edited by

SIR EDMUND GOSSE and THOMAS J. WISE

Limited to 375 sets for America

THE OUTSTANDING GABRIEL-NOVEL*

THE TIME OF MAN

By Elizabeth Madox Roberts

A great American novel. "A wonderful performance."—Sherwood Anderson. "A work of genius."—Edward Garnett. "Brim full of beauty."—Keith Preston. "A beautiful work of art."—Carl Van Doren. "Abiding literature."—Time. "A discovery for the judicious."—Saturday Review. Third large printing. $2.50

*Chosen by The Selecting Committee of The Book-of-the-Month Club in its October choice. HENRY SEIDEL CANBY, CHRISTOPHER MORLEY, DOROTHY CANFIELD, HEYWOOD BROUN AND WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE.

THE VIKING PRESS
30 Irving Place, New York

By the author of "Beatrice D'Este," etc.

Sacharissa

By Julia Cartwright

Scholars and statesmen, soldiers and poets, fashionable ladies and solemn churchmen alike were charmed by the beauty and wit of "Sacharissa"—Dorothy Sidney, Countess of Sunderland, the immortal inspiration of Waller's lyrics. One of the most delightful biographies of recent years. Price $5.00

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

A LUNCHEON RESORT FOR THE DISCRIMINATING CLIENTELE—THOSE APPRECIATING UNEXCELLED CUISINE AND SERVICE.

EVENINGS—ONLY. SPECIAL PARTIES, ANNIVERSARIES, BANQUETS, LADIES' NIGHTS, BEEFSTEAKS, SMOKERS, SUPPER AND DINNER DANCES.

OUR BANQUET DEPARTMENT SPECIALIZES IN SERVING
GROUP DINNERS UP TO 1000
AT $2.00 A COVER UP.

Ownership Management
by THEODORE KEMM

GRAMERCY 4900 to 4907

ADAM and EVE

BY

OSCAR T. CROSBY, F.R.G.S.

AUTHOR OF

Thibet and Turkestan - International War

A study of the Garden of Eden Story, inspired by travel in Mesopotamia and in other Oriental Lands.

Cloth $1.25

THE STRATFORD COMPANY - Boston, Mass.

An Editor's Farewell

MR. H. N. BRAILSFORD, in resigning from the editorship of the New Leader, published the following farewell to his readers in the issue for October 22:

This is the last number of the New Leader which I shall edit. I tendered my resignation in June, and at Margate it was accepted by the governing body of the Independent Labor Party. Its resolution states the reason for the change in plain but friendly words. A majority of the Administrative Council [illegible] of paper."

[illegible] is to be the paper will be edited by [illegible]. The council has asked me to contribute a weekly article to the New Leader. I hope (after I have had a holiday) that this may be possible.

During my editorship the circulation of the New Leader has stood at a level between two and three times higher than that of the Labor Leader when I took it over. It has had its financial ups and downs, but I have the satisfaction of handing it over with a weekly budget which now meets expenses.

My aim during these four years has been to provide for thoughtful readers in the Socialist movement a paper which might rank, so far as the handicap of its small size permitted, with the older political reviews. A weekly paper devoted to news ceased to be necessary since the Daily Herald was founded. For popular reading there are in London and the provinces many Socialist weeklies. The chief need of our movement seemed to be a review which could discuss from week to week what I described in an early issue as "the constructive problems of the foreground." It is, therefore, with the measures which should serve to make the actual transition from capitalism to socialism that the New Leader has been chiefly concerned.

It may claim that in this short time it has influenced the thinking and the policy of the Labor Party. The agricultural program which was adopted last week at Margate was outlined and gradually shaped by articles and discussions in our pages. The view of credit and currency which is now widely accepted throughout the party was discussed more fully and earlier in our columns than elsewhere. The ideas which center around the living wage and family allowances, after winning the assent of the I.L.P., were at Margate accepted by the Labor Party as subjects for inquiry.

Often, I fear, at the risk of offending the older leaders of [illegible] the New Leader has kept its independence and its critical attitude. It has recognized the duty of opposing [illegible] It has refused [illegible] on the issue of birth control) to fetter itself by party calculations. Nor has it forgotten the duty of [illegible] to the unions. In its conduct it has sought to guide itself by three rules: to avoid hate; to be loyal to [illegible] truth; to remember at every turn, as the [illegible], that we are engaged to [illegible]

[illegible] criticism I learned in many ways to modify my first conception of the paper. On one point I was never willing to yield. A sane life must be a whole life. [illegible] however, [illegible] it may be, impoverishes itself if it [illegible] to the intellectual and aesthetic [illegible] Bernard Shaw, in an early defense of this attitude, "may seem an irrelevance amid our struggles, yet by [illegible] from [illegible], we surely [illegible] and only in so far as we possess it and allow it to mold us, shall we, by our struggles, [illegible] world in the [illegible]." And so, week by week, an annoyance to some, a satisfaction to many, the wood-engravings, the poems, the essays, and the scientific articles have appeared.

The last of my many [illegible] as editor is to thank the friends who have worked with me. . . . And then, if the paper has done something to shape our political thinking, it is to its band of contributors that we owe it. . . .

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of graduate study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.
For further information, address the Director,
THE TRAINING SCHOOL
for
JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
Affiliated by the National Conference of Jewish Social Service
210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

Accept nothing but
Midol
for HEADACHE
Non-Depressant, Non-Habit Forming
In Convenient Aluminum Boxes
At any drug store
GENERAL DRUG CO., 94 N. Moore Street, New York

True food is the foundation of Good health
Fresh Vegetables
Whole Wheat Products
Satisfying Diet for Diabetics
No animal fat used
Trufood VEGETARIAN RESTAURANT
153 W. 44th St., East of Broadway

AURORA HEALTH FARM
Mendham Road
MORRISTOWN
NEW JERSEY
(Not a sanitarium; not a boarding-house)
Beautiful country; elevation 700 ft.; only one hour from New York. Open all year. Suitable for those requiring rest, electro- and hydro-therapy. Ideal for rest and convalescence. Personal medical supervision. Homelike atmosphere. No incurables, contagious or mental cases.
ROBERT SCHILLING, M. D., Medical Director.
Assoc. Physicians: M. D., Associate Physician.
Telephone—MORRISTOWN 1 8 2 0.

MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Louise Strong. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 317 East Ohio Street, Chicago

CHILD STUDY GROUPS
for
Fathers and Mothers of Young Children
Fathers and Mothers of Adolescent Boys and Girls
Grandmothers, guardians, teachers, social workers, camp directors, etc.
Whatever your interest and needs, you will find this group work helpful and stimulating.
WRITE FOR INFORMATION TO
CHILD STUDY ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA, INC.
54 WEST 74TH STREET NEW YORK CITY

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1926 No. 3203

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 519

EDITORIALS:
- Joseph Cannon 521
- Shake Hands! 521
- China Talks in Her Sleep 522
- Are Teachers Muzzled? 523

TOURIST SEASON, 1926. By Hendrik van Loon 524
DOHENY AND FALL FACE JUSTICE. By Raymond Clapper 525
THE EDGE OF CHINA. By Lewis S. Gannett 526
PROSPECTING FOR BURIED WORLDS. By Ida Treat 528
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 529
CORRESPONDENCE 530

FOREIGN BOOK SECTION

WHO READS AMERICAN BOOKS? By Joseph Wood Krutch 531
THE NORTHERN LITERARY WORLD. By B. W. Huebsch 532
NEW BOOKS IN FRANCE. By René Lalou 533

BOOKS:
- A German View of the Kaiser. By Oswald Garrison Villard 534
- Scraps of Paper. By Baron Baudran 535
- A New Look at Cervantes. By Eliseo Vivas 535
- The Simple Savage. By Carroll Lane Fenton 536
- Heavens Above and Earth Beneath. By Joseph Wood Krutch 536
- The Last Napoleon. By Ernest F. Henderson 537
- The Nation's Poetry Prize 538
- Books in Brief 538
- International Books in Brief 538
- Drama: Spiders. By Joseph Wood Krutch 539

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- Foreign Rule in Shanghai. By James H. Dolsen 542
- Japan's Alien Land Law 544

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR FREDA KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

EXCELLENT NEWS comes out of France to delight all who love that country and wish to see Europe progress toward peace and stability. The army is to be cut at once from 650,000 to 400,000 and compulsory training reduced from eighteen months to one year, real steps toward disarmament, the more welcome because of the discouraging role played by the French delegates to the international disarmament conference. Not only will this help France financially, it is further proof of that change of French spirit which marked Locarno, Geneva last September, and Thoiry. Meanwhile the franc has gone on improving, until it is now quoted at 3.30 cents—indeed, the progress is so great as to make some fear that it is almost too rapid. Again, we have the news of still another rapprochement between industrial Germany and industrial France by which real advantages are obtained for the metallurgical industries in the Sarre and in Lorraine, by assuring to them a free market for a large quantity of their products. No less than 1,700,000 tons of raw and finished steel will enter Germany free of duty. Thus the leveling of tariff barriers, demanded by the bankers' free-trade manifesto, has begun, and the close industrial cooperation of the two former enemies is hailed in both countries as a new bond for peace.

HOW MUCH LONGER are Americans going to stomach such weasel-worded sentiments as President Coolidge voiced in his Kansas City address on Armistice Day? It would seem as if the day of balanced periods and contrasted sentiments, of the on-the-one-hand and on-the-other type of oratory, might soon be past. Just as in his Omaha address, Mr. Coolidge was for preparedness and yet against a rivalry in armaments; he was for peace, but he rejoiced that we had been at war to protect our honor and our rights. He was first sniffingly humble and then disgustingly proud and conceited. Europe, he said, is reported to hate us, and he adds, childishly, "this means our interests have come within the European circle, where distrust and suspicion, if nothing more, have been altogether too common. To turn such attention to us indicates at least that we are not ignored!" To this gem the President added a few minutes later: "If the American spirit fails, what hope has the world?"—a question that will be very candidly answered from Europe. Throughout, the address is sophomoric and muddled to a degree, full of almost incredible banalities, and notable only for its announcement that capital is to be conscripted in the next war to end war and that he will move no further toward putting us into the World Court.

IT IS HIGH TIME for a new agitation for a federal anti-lynching law. The South met the movement in 1922-23 with the argument that it would take care of its own lynchers. And for a time it seemed to do so. The number of lynchings which had averaged more than thirty a year, fell to 16 in 1924 and to 18 in 1925. But now the country seems to be conspiring to make a new record for this peculiar American form of bestiality. Already the total for 1926 is almost twice that for 1925 and in the last month crime has followed crime. On October 1 three nameless Negroes were burned by a mob near Miami, suspected of having stolen goods from storm victims. The sheriff states that he believes the charge untrue; but the men are dead. The Governor of South Carolina has sent an investigator to Aiken to study the lynching of the three Lowmans there, but there is no hint of real action, despite the fact that the New York World has bravely exposed data to justify several jail sentences, in one of the finest campaigns in American newspaper history. October's record also includes the lynching of a Negro charged with murder in Tennessee, and the hairbreadth escape of a Mississippi Negro whose friends motored him out of the State; November began with a combination of white and redman's methods in Montana, where a Negro was burned to death in his barn by Indians who set the barn aflame with fire arrows. In Texas on November 10 brave white men crushed the head of one Negro after wounding him with gunshot, and burned two others in their log cabin. If the doctrine of State rights permits such crimes it needs revision. South Carolina's is a test case. The Governor knows who is guilty; they are his friends; will he dare bring them to justice—or will he prove that federal legislation is the only solution?

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTEEN Congregational ministers in England, after partaking of the communion from a chalice made in prison by a conscientious objector, recently signed this pledge:

> Believing that we are called by our understanding of Christ to unreserved abstention from war, and to a complete dedication to peace as the only true defense of our most treasured loyalties and loves, we covenant together before God, praying that in the day of calm we may win others and that in the time of storm we may stand firm to our witness.

The World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches, meeting in Philadelphia, has just called upon America to take the lead in calling a conference to outlaw war, and voiced its opposition to military training in public and high schools. Harry Emerson Fosdick in his Armistice Day speech denounced the War Department for its attempt to "turn our high schools into military academies and our universities into West Points." Are the churches at last awakening?

HENRIETTA PERKINS, the managing editor of the Beanpot, Boston University's humorous weekly, was forced to resign her position a year and a half ago because she had published an issue ridiculing compulsory military training and the local R.O.T.C. Last spring compulsory military training was abolished by the new president of the university, and in his annual report, recently made public, he explains why. Briefly summarized, President Marsh's reasons were as follows: First, he is a true American and as such is opposed to militarism; second, he believes that preparedness is no guaranty of peace; third he holds that Boston University was founded "to promote virtue and piety and learning" and not to train men to fight; fourth, he is a Christian and believes that Christianity is opposed to war and hence to militarism. President Marsh's statement is vigorous and courageous; with more dignity, it is as vigorous and courageous as were the earlier utterances of Henrietta Perkins. We hope—with some confidence—that the president of the university will not meet her fate.

HARVARD MEN may well hang their heads with shame over the ending of the athletic relations of their university and Princeton. This is not because the Harvard Lampoon issued an incredibly ungentlemanly and ill-tempered number on the eve of the Harvard-Princeton game. President Lowell is right in saying in his apology for this bit of undergraduate folly and bad manners that freedom of utterance of these publications is to be adhered to even if there are occasional lapses from the standards which any group of well-bred college men might be expected to uphold. The trouble is that the initiative came from the Harvard athletic authorities in their sudden and unexpected move this fall to alter the relations with Princeton, apparently for the purpose of creating the opportunity, by dropping Princeton, for a mid-Western football game. For that the only excuse would seem to be a desire to cater to the mid-Western graduates and to advertise the college in the Middle West. Whatever the motive, the action was stupid and thoroughly deserved the rebuke so swiftly and effectively administered by Princeton. To a wrong policy has been added not only a disgusting exhibition of bad manners but a reception in Cambridge of the news of the break with a superciliousness that can only add to the great unpopularity of Harvard University throughout the country. All of which is another argument for the abolition of all of these hippodrome intercollegiate contests and the limitation of undergraduate activity to intramural sports.

IT IS WITH A START that one reads that Louis Brandeis has passed his seventieth birthday, so young and resilient is the quality of his mind. Ten years on the Supreme Court have not dimmed the zest for thinking which has made him an inspiration to successive generations of young men and women. Much of the credit for the first Wilson Administration belongs to this man who so deepened the President's thinking. In the Supreme Court he has stood again and again in a minority with that other valiant justice, Oliver Wendell Holmes, now eighty-five years old; but as Justice Learned Hand points out in the Jewish Tribune, he has profoundly molded the American conception of the law, chiefly in > the doctrine, often repeated, that the law can be successful only when founded upon patient inquiry into the economic and political facts from which alone safe generalization is possible. He will not admit the pretensions to universality of doctrines drawn from another social order, axiomatic, like most axioms, because they respond to prejudices too deep to tolerate question. In their stead he has insisted upon detailed research into the daily working of large industry and of the Great Society. This may seem an obvious approach; in fact, it represents a diametrical departure from the last five decades of American law.

BERNARD SHAW'S reported quip upon hearing that he had been awarded the Nobel prize in literature for 1925—"It must be because I published nothing in 1925"—suggests, we fear, that he is not the scandal he used to be or ought still to be. Mr. Shaw has thrived on nothing so much as his unpopularity; his temperament in its prime felt itself chiefly when it was opposed. Does the universal vogue of his dramas, followed now and sealed by the award of a literary prize, indicate that he has become a prophet not without honor in all countries? If it does we are sorry—for it is far from being true that the world, as some say, has caught up with Shaw. It has been pointed out that the Nobel prize in literature frequently if not always goes to an author who sums up in his works the national genius which he represents. Is it the implication, then, that the Irish people are one with the author of "Back to Methuselah"? They are not that, nor are the people of any other country we know anything about. To be sure, Mr. Shaw has recently spoken well of his people because of all that they have endured from his critical tongue; but he would be the last to agree that nothing remained to be remarked. As to his deserving the Nobel prize there can, of course, be no doubt. We only hope that no one will suppose his claws to have been thereby rendered harmless.

AGUSTO TURATI is secretary-general of the Fascisti in Italy. By a cruel slip we named Filipo Turati last week as holding that position. Filipo Turati is, of course, the veteran leader of the Italian Socialists, resolutely opposed to all dictatorship, Fascist or Bolshevik.

Joseph Cannon

THERE was much of the roughness of the soil about Speaker Cannon—to give him the title by which he will best be remembered. He dated back to the pioneer days of Illinois, and the men who first tilled those prairie fields were coarsened by hardship and, often enough, by privation. Rabelaisian Mr. Cannon could be and frequently was. Like Lincoln, his stories were not always intended for polite society, and the pungent oaths with which he permeated his conversation accounted for some of its natural color and force. He constantly suggested Lincoln in other ways—in the native shrewdness of his comments, in his thoroughgoing knowledge of the homespun Americans of whom he was one, in the lankiness of his person. If ever a Congressman was typical of his community it was Cannon, and his constituents recognized it by returning him to Congress for forty-six years, when he was in good and when he was in ill repute. They loved and revered him, and no charge that he was a parliamentary czar or that he tyrannized over the House by rules which had to be altered over his protest affected their loyalty to him. He could do no wrong in their eyes; he might have pecadilloes, he might go too far at times, but Joe Cannon was rural Illinois in Washington. There experience and native ability made him a remarkably able and useful legislator along technical governmental lines.

There can be no doubt that he was that too rare thing, a rugged personality. One might like or dislike him—his was a character unafraid, unashamed, and downright. Even the men who fought him hardest respected him; they always knew where he stood and where he was to be found. They knew him, too, as a hard fighter, but on the whole a pretty fair one, and they knew that he recognized but one master and that the Republican Party. To him his own party was perfect and its every policy ideal, especially the protective tariff. If ever a man sincerely believed that abolition of protection meant complete disaster and the reduction of the American workingman to the status of the despised foreigner it was Cannon. More than that, the span of his active political life measured not only the rise but the transformation of his party from the idealism which gave birth to it and made it the home of all who cherished human liberty into a sordid organization which repeatedly bought its Presidential victories by tariff favors auctioned off to the highest bidder or by downright cash paid out for voters in "blocks of five" or by the only slightly subtler purchase of "watchers" today.

Mr. Cannon helped to make the party the tool of big business, and he helped to enthrone the swollen capitalism of today in the seats of the mighty in Washington. An idealist? Never in his later years, whatever he may have been in his youth. He was a Simon Legree with the party whip; he was Napoleonic in riding roughshod to party ends. For "mugwumps" or independents, he had only contempt; such were traitors. His party had saved the nation; the nation was its to spoil—or rather to weld according to its wish, and, of course, its wish was the highest form of wisdom. So it was idle to appeal to him for freedom for the Filipinos or to make any appeal based upon the belief that men rank higher than property or upon the brotherhood of man. Like his party, he became entirely cynical; unlike it he was not corrupt. Dethroned as Speaker, he could take defeat philosophically and live to see a greater triumph for party control of the House and for the crass materialism of the hour than he had ever dared to hope.

Shake Hands!

IT is hard to say who takes more of the joy out of life, the moralists or the hygienists. It seems to be nip and tuck between them. The moralists have already forbidden us to take a nip and now the hygienists—the joke doesn't quite work out, but the hygienists, in the person of Dr. Louis I. Harris, Health Commissioner of New York City, are out against the habit of shaking hands, something we always regarded as so innocent a pastime as to be almost innocuous. In fact, we felt the handshake to be so innocent that its disuse on that account by the younger generation was imminent. By classifying the handshake among dangerous, if not wicked, occupations, Dr. Harris has perhaps given it a new lease of life. He says:

> For instance, a person whose hands have perspired and are moist shakes hands with a friend. The friend, whose hands may or may not have been soiled, contracts any disease germs on the other fellow's hands. Unconsciously, one puts one's hand up to ward off a sneeze and the germs are blown onto the hand. In hand-shaking, these germs are transmitted.

So the common handshake must pass into the discard along with the common towel, the common drinking cup, the common kiss, and other customs of our boyhood. There was a time when one could wash his hands and face in a restaurant or elsewhere on the day's route. Now one has to put on a wash before breakfast that will last until dinner. The paper towel fails to preserve either the temper or that schoolgirl complexion. The common drinking cup, too, was a comforting institution. It used to be possible to quench one's thirst in a public park, library, museum, or street without turning on a geyser and taking a shower bath as well as a drink. Then there is—or was—the common kiss. In our boyhood it was all right except when inflicted by a severe and unpopular aunt. People never rescued us then by suggesting that kissing was unhygienic. But the doctors decided a good many years ago that the practice was a means of transmitting germs, and we understand that it has gone out in our most hygienic society. It takes a good while, of course, to kill the custom entirely, and one who walks in the parks, travels on excursion steamers, rides on top of Fifth Avenue buses, or peeps into parked automobiles gets the painful impression that in unregenerate and rather extended circles the kiss is still both common and preferred.

Well, Dr. Harris, what do you prescribe in place of hand-shaking? The Maoris of New Zealand greet each other by rubbing noses, but that must be unhygienic too. Kissing the hand seems to have a mild boom in consequence of the visit of Queen Marie. But the New York World pronounces against it (Broun, J., dissenting) on the ground that American men do it so badly. Besides it is not likely that Senator Borah would permit anything so suggestive of entangling European alliances.

If we may no longer shake the hands of our friends in greeting, perhaps the only thing left is for us to shake our friends.

China Talks in Her Sleep

BIG things are happening in China—epoch-making events. Paying no attention whatever to our Mr. Silas Strawn, who returned from his sojourn in Peking's Legation Quarter disgusted with chaos and civil war, China is calmly resuming her status as one of the great nations of the world. It is true that she has no central government; it is true that politically she is in the hands of a dozen petty military potentates who are engaged in constant war and are ruining her 7,000 miles of railroads; it is all the more impressive that in the midst of this apparent chaos she has been moving against the foreigner without division and, step by step, regaining her lost "rights."

The Government at Peking has no power to enforce its domestic edicts even within the red walls of the ancient city, but when it announces abrogation of one of the "unequal treaties" with a foreign Power, its edict is accepted even by the provincial governments which count themselves at war with Peking. Toward the foreigners China is impressively unanimous. There is no dissent; all China thinks and feels as one. Mr. Strawn and Mr. Balfour may complain that, much as they would like to take steps for China's relief, there is no government in China with which they can deal; the Chinese recall that when there was a strong central government the Powers shilly-shallied, and now, in the moment of their apparent weakness, they intend to free themselves—and they will.

Belgium has no gunboats in Chinese waters and no garrison in the Legation Quarter of Peking. The Great Powers are right in thinking that China has begun with Belgium in order to set a precedent where precedents will be most easily established; and that she intends to proceed from the particular case to the general application. The Chinese Government abrogated the old treaty with Belgium and announced its willingness to negotiate a new treaty on a reciprocal basis, but not to repeat the humiliating lessons of the past. And while the Powers have been mumbling and grumbling, and Belgium has been suggesting reference of the question to the World Court at the Hague, the plain fact remains that Belgian citizens in China today are without extraterritorial privileges.

The Western Powers have hitherto exercised the extraordinary "right" not only of collecting China's customs and duties for her, but also of fixing the customs at a uniform low rate. They have, at various conferences and in various treaties, suggested their readiness to improve the status, but when the time came for action they have been unable to agree. They have even insisted that China had no right under the treaties to add to the customs taxes a sales or consumption tax upon foreign-imported articles. Upon this point at least two of the provinces, Kwangtung and Chekiang, long ago broke away from the foreign leading-strings; their policy is now general. The salt taxes, nominally collected under foreign supervision and pledged to the payment of foreign loans, have also slipped from foreign control; but the customs hitherto have remained secure in foreign hands. Now Canton has formally notified the Powers that she intends to raise the duty-rate at Canton, and to apply the surplus receipts to recompense of the workers who have suffered in the sixteen-month-long strike and boycott against British Hongkong.

This action has its amusing sidelights. When the consular body at Canton protested, in the name of the foreign governments, against the decision, Canton's Foreign Minister replied that since the Powers did not recognize his Government he could not accept their protest. When they recognized Canton, he said, Canton would be glad to discuss with them. British government interests are reputed to have favored suggesting to British merchants that they refuse to ship goods to Canton as long as this tax was imposed. But British commercial interests in the Far East had a contrary view. Famished by the sixteen months of boycott, they demanded the right to ship their goods to Canton, however high a tax Canton might impose upon them. And their point of view won the day: British merchants are shipping British goods to Canton; and the Canton Government, under the noses of the silent British gunboats, is collecting the "illegal" tax.

Shantung is following Canton's lead. General Chang Chung-chang is imposing a 2 per cent ad valorem goods tax on all goods passing through his territory, and although the foreign merchants have held meetings of unanimous protest the tax is being collected. Of course the example will be followed elsewhere. This may be chaotic; it may be irregular; it may even defy the text of the old treaties; but the situation in which foreign Powers drew up the customs schedules and bound China to them, then collected the duties for China and applied them to payment of interest on foreign loans is too ridiculous to continue. The Powers have themselves to blame. They failed to correct this unjust situation while they yet had time. There are other injustices which the Chinese have not yet attempted to remedy. The national customs administration remains under British control, despite the facts that a treaty which Britain forced upon China assigned control to the nation which does the largest business with China, and that Britain's position in China is no longer first. And every cent of the customs revenue is deposited in the (British) Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, which uses these Chinese government funds not as the interests of China but as the interests of foreign business suggest.

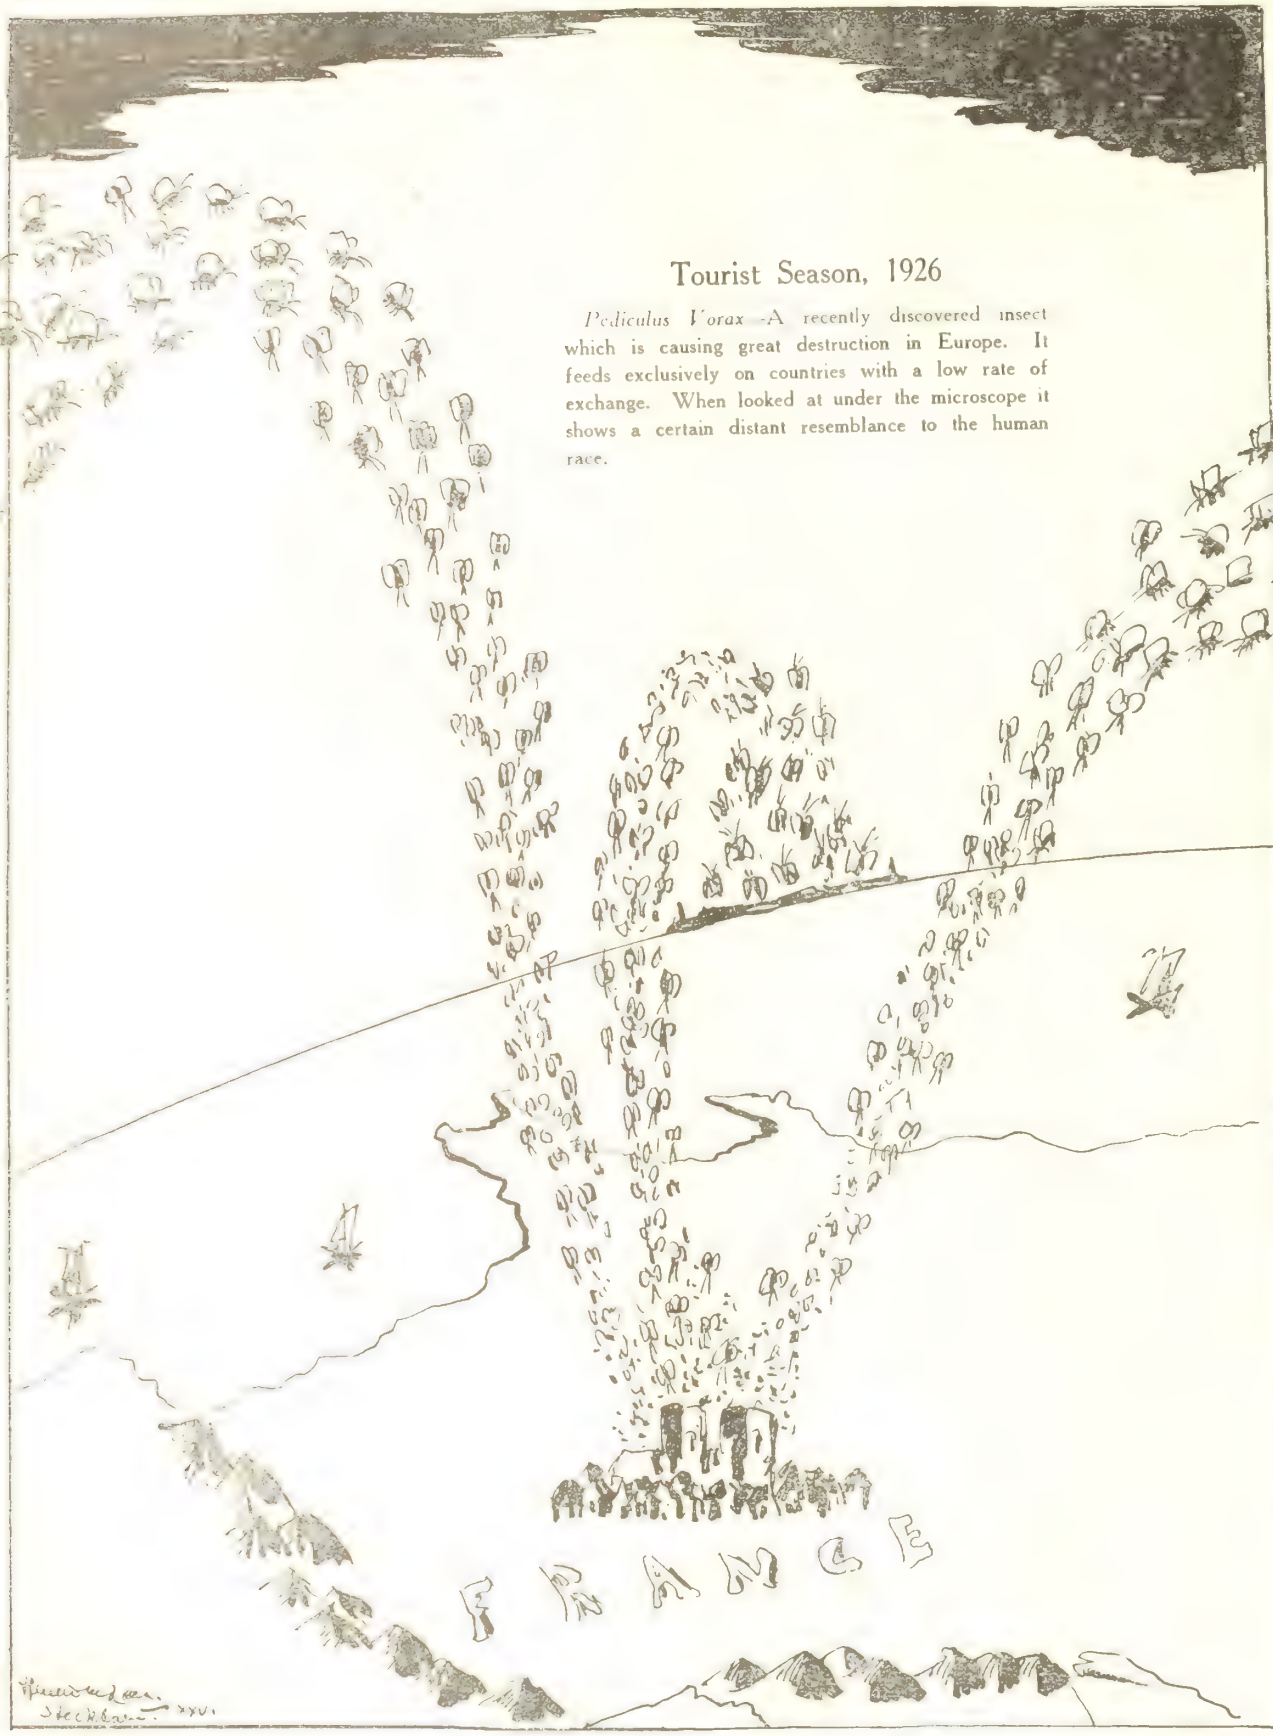
From North to South the same Nationalist passion shows itself. It is significant that the Cantonese army, advancing in the name of nationalism, has been sweeping across province after province. Meanwhile, in this process of civil war, the Chinese factions are learning how to fight. Canton's victories were not won by vast masses of coolies fighting as listlessly as chess men. Canton fights with small bodies of well-trained and well-armed men—and wins. China now has at least three first-class arsenals, and others of smaller caliber. The end of the "chaos" which appalled Mr. Strawn may be a first-class military Power in a nation of 400,000,000 souls, animated and united by a dislike of Westerners. Our State Department and the other foreign offices would do well to rouse themselves and look for opportunities to prove that friendship for China which all politicians profess. Japan has reversed her role in recent years; she is the one foreign Power reported sympathetic to China's action upon the Belgian treaty, She knows China. If the time has not yet come it may soon arrive when talk of a pan-Asiatic bloc will be real.

Are Teachers Muzzled?

THIS question has come up anew because of a decision of the Board of Superintendents of the New York City school system in the case of Abraham Lefkowitz, a teacher who has been denied promotion to head of a department. The Board of Superintendents does not like some of Mr. Lefkowitz's utterances and declares that he voiced his views with "insolence," "intemperance," and "vulgarity." Without mincing matters they declare that

> A teacher may not have one set of opinions for the classroom and another for the public platform. As a school-teacher, he has not the same rights as other citizens to print, publish, or declare his thoughts and opinions. He is no longer at liberty to "freely write, speak, or publish." This is not an interference with his rights as a citizen. His rights are as "free and untrammeled as they ever were."(!) He may at any time "emancipate himself from the shackles of the department and exercise his full rights as an American citizen" by resigning his position. As was said in the Clifford case: "It is, therefore, erroneous to say that his right of citizenship is abridged in any particular, and the courts have so held." In determining whether or not a teacher shall be promoted, the Board of Superintendents is obligated to take into account the history of the teacher, his public opinions, the persons with whom he associates, and his attitude toward governmental questions.

In other words, the teacher is placed in the position of a soldier or sailor, denied the right of freedom of speech, and compelled to keep silence if his convictions do not happen to coincide with those of the temporary set of officials who happen to be his employers.



William J. O'Shea, the superintendent of schools, is even more specific. In an interview in the New York Evening Sun Mr. O'Shea was quoted as saying:

> We do not wish to restrain the freedom of thought of any teacher so long as that freedom is kept within reasonable limits. We expect the teacher to differentiate between liberty and license. How could the teacher teach children under his care to love American institutions and principles, if, after school hours, he went out and berated American institutions and principles? We find that many of those who have done so are considered by medical men of some eminence as psychopathic. Thus they are more to be sympathized with than criticized. But as employees of the Board of Education it makes no difference to what societies they belong so long as they do not take advantage of their position to teach un-American doctrines.

Mr. O'Shea did not have Mr. Lefkowitz in mind when he said this, and, indeed, voted for Mr. Lefkowitz's promotion, but he reserves the right not only to deny promotion to teachers thoroughly satisfactory in the classroom if he does not like what they say or how they say it when they are off duty, but also to insinuate that they are pathological cases if it suits his purpose to do so—a blackguardly and cowardly act. He uses the language of every tyrant, every Pilsudski, every Mussolini. Of course, men of this type always protest that they want freedom of speech, but within what they themselves consider "reasonable limits" and "liberty, not license." Like the judges of the inquisition of every period and age of intolerance, they propose to decide what is reasonable and where liberty ends. What a dangerous precedent to set if the "outs" of today become the "ins" of tomorrow.

With all respect to the judicial decision cited, we deny that the Bill of Rights is ever forfeited by any American citizen, and that there is anything in the position of the teacher which distinguishes him from any other civil servant to the extent of requiring that he shall be muzzled and his utterances censored outside of his working hours. If the superintendents understood American traditions they would never join the attempt to deprive teachers of their civic rights. If they had that understanding they would know among other things, that there can be no drawing of the line in such matters by mere administrative officials. Who is wise enough to define what is the true Americanism of the day? The authorities of schools, cities, and States in the days of slavery frequently undertook to say that it was un-American to denounce slave-holders and that those who did so abused free speech and degenerated into license. Professor Charles Follen was dropped from Harvard University because of his anti-slavery views. Miss Prudence Crandall, who dared to instruct colored children in a private school, was forbidden to do so by the legislature and the officials of the State of Connecticut. Public opinion was at that time on the side of the officials, but history proved hers the true Americanism and that of the authorities base and spurious.

Whether the views to which the superintendents object are defensible or indefensible has nothing to do with the case. The teacher has a right to his own views and has a right to express them. If he advocates views or conduct which are contrary to the law, there are plenty of statutes to take care of the offender. But for petty officials to tell our teachers what to think and how to speak when outside of the classrooms is to dig the grave of the free-school system and to deal a most dangerous blow to the American republic. The superintendents aver that the offense of these teachers, one of them so fine a woman as Jessie Wallace Hughan, is not that they belong to certain societies, or hold certain views, but that they avow what is in their hearts. John Stuart Mill in his essay on liberty had a good deal to say about that social intolerance which would compel men to conceal their thoughts. He declared that "The price paid for this sort of intellectual pacification is the sacrifice of the entire moral courage of the human mind . . . the sort of men who can be looked for under it are either mere conformers to the commonplace or time-servers for truth." If one believes that muzzled, conforming, and time-serving teachers can educate American boys and girls in the American spirit, one must stand with Mr. O'Shea. But if one thinks that the best teacher is he who is freest, then there must be the most vigorous dissent. Thomas Jefferson in his second Presidential inaugural proclaimed the right of any American in any place at any time to denounce this government, or to demand its dissolution or the substitution of something else for this republic. He wanted free and honest Americans; Mr. O'Shea demands servile, cowardly, groveling teachers who dare not say that their souls are their own. If there is anything of the good American spirit of revolt against governmental outrage left in the teachers of New York City they will unite to make life miserable for Mr. O'Shea and the Board of Superintendents until these officials realize the enormity of their offense against the American spirit.

Tourist Season, 1926
Pediculus Vorax.—A recently discovered insect which is causing great destruction in Europe. It feeds exclusively on countries with a low rate of exchange. When looked at under the microscope it shows a certain distant resemblance to the human race.
FRANCE

Doheny and Fall Face Justice

By RAYMOND CLAPPER

EVEN when they have the best of lawyers defendants are sometimes confronted with the unpleasant necessity of going to trial. So on November 22 Albert B. Fall, former Secretary of the Interior, and Edward L. Doheny, beneficiary of government oil leases, finally are to face a jury on charges of conspiracy to defraud the Government.

The case which comes before the District of Columbia Supreme Court is intricate, yet simple. Most of the major facts already have been established through the remarkable investigation led by Senator Thomas J. Walsh three years ago and in the civil suit to cancel the Doheny lease which the Government won in both lower courts and which is now before the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal. The present trial is the criminal phase of the affair to determine if there is any personal guilt. All of the facts hitherto established will have to be technically reestablished in the criminal trial. But that will be routine. Just one question confronts the jury—whether there was any connection between these two sets of circumstances:

On November 30, 1921, E. L. Doheny, Jr., arrived in Washington carrying a small black satchel given to him by his father in New York the night before. It contained $100,000 in bills. He was met by a tall, lean man of Western appearance, ragged mustache, hair fringed down around his coat collar in restrained Buffalo Bill style, a pair of small, shoe-button eyes with lids narrowed as if they had often looked down the cold steel of a gun-barrel—the Hon. Albert Bacon Fall, erstwhile prospector, miner, ranchman, lawyer, associate justice of the New Mexico Supreme Court, United States Senator from that State, Harding's private personal preference for Secretary of State but, by the grace of political influences, actually at the moment of this meeting the Secretary of the Interior in charge, by recent executive order, of all naval oil lands. The brisk young man handed the Cabinet officer the contents of the small black bag. Possibly a slip of paper was handed back in exchange; the young man's father insists that there was, though he only produced a torn scrap of what purports to be Fall's note for the money, with the signature missing. The young man returned to his father in New York; the Cabinet officer perhaps to the White House for the semi-weekly Cabinet meeting. Simple, quiet, smooth performance.

Two years later snooping Senators heard rumors. Fall denied he received any money from Doheny. Senators asked how about that $100,000 spent on Fall's run-down ranch and ten years of back taxes paid up about the time the young man made the trip to Washington? Fall insisted he received nothing from Doheny, but did borrow $100,000 from E. B. McLean, publisher of the Washington Post. McLean denied it. Then Doheny admitted he had been the Secretary's financial angel.

"We had been old-time friends," Doheny told the Senate committee. "We both worked in the same mining district. I was fortunate. Senator Fall was unfortunate. The amount of money I was loaning him was a mere bagatelle to me; it was no more than $25 or perhaps $50 to the ordinary individual. A loan of $100,000 from me to Mr. Fall is no more extraordinary. I am just an ordinary, old-time, impulsive, irresponsible, improvident sort of a prospector."

Shortly before the episode of the little black bag Fall and Doheny had been living in the same hotel at Washington. They had discussed in a general way a project for the construction of storage tanks in Hawaii to provide an oil-supply base for the navy. Two days before the black bag incident Doheny had written a memorandum to Fall outlining some features of a tentative deal. Passing over a long, intricate story, the result was that on April 25, 1922, five months after the incident related above, Doheny was given a contract, through his Pan-American Petroleum and Transport Company, to construct tanks at Honolulu to hold 1,500,000 barrels of oil for the navy. Doheny was to be paid for this with oil which the navy received as royalty from drillers on Teapot Dome and other government oil reserves. But soon it was found that the Government was not receiving enough oil to pay Doheny, so, on December 11, 1922, the big contract giving Doheny drilling rights in the 32,000-acre Elk Hills naval oil reservation in California was signed. These contracts and leases were all negotiated under the general direction of Fall with only technical assistance from the navy, as Harding, by executive order, had in May, 1921, transferred jurisdiction to Fall's Interior Department.

It was this second contract which gave Doheny access to the 250,000,000 barrels of oil in the Elk Hills reserve. This is the contract which he admitted to the Senate committee probably would return him a profit of $100,000,000. The earlier contract, in April, was undertaken, Doheny insisted, purely as a patriotic matter without thought of profit.

The little ruddy-faced, blue-eyed oil king told about it in an interview published in the New York Times of July 1, 1925. Doheny said that Rear Admiral J. K. Robison, chief of the navy bureau of engineering, and now retired, under whom young Doheny had served during the war, came to his New York home to tell him of the grave military situation. That was in 1921 during the Washington Arms Conference.

> In my mind's eye I can now picture the Admiral standing in front of the open-hearth fire gesticulating excitedly as he discussed the grave situation which confidential naval reports indicated confronted this country.

This situation was, as the Admiral outlined it, that a Pacific Power—Japan was obviously meant—had huge oil supplies ready for war and that the United States must concentrate oil at Hawaii to protect its navy fuel supply.

> He said that, though the public did not know it, war actually hung over the United States when President Harding called his arms conference; he called my attention to the fact that my home, the home of my son and of my grandchildren, of all that I hold dear, were out here on the Pacific coast, and he asked me to consider the rest of the people on this coast and their position much as I would consider that of those near and dear to me.

The Admiral urged Doheny to undertake construction of oil storage tanks at the Hawaiian naval base. Further development of the naval base there hung upon the assurance that adequate storage tanks would be built.

He appealed to me, not as a man in the oil business, but as a citizen of this country, to give to our Navy De-

On that December night, nearly four years ago, I pledged my word not only to Admiral Robison that my com- and I would, when and if requested by the Government, formally offer to build and provision with oil its crude oil from the naval reserves, and that this would be done at cost and without profit. I intended then, and nothing ever shook this intention, that this would be done, in so far as I could do it, even if it took the last penny of my resources.

The improvident old prospector again!

But fortunately for him, the navy was so hard pressed for royalty oil with which to pay Doheny's expenditures in this patriotic project that it had to turn over to him the 32,000-acre Elk Hills reserve to pay for the job. And the Lord, as usual taking care of the improvident, shaped it all so that Doheny was in line for a $100,000,000 profit on this second deal.

The Government's prosecutors, being no doubt mean old cynics, insist that if this be patriotism, it is of the sort that Dr. Samuel Johnson so conclusively defined.

The Edge of China

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

I

THE Christian General's army had just evacuated Tientsin, and troops were pouring inland across the mud flats toward Peking. The railroad to the sea had ceased operating. A few British-American tobacco trucks carried opulent passengers through the lines to the seaport, but the route was uncertain and I

This is the first of three articles in which Lewis Gannett describes his motor trip across Mongolia from the Chinese to the Trans-Siberian Railroad. In the second article, Mongolia a Nomad Republic, he gives his impressions of Urga, the capital, and of the "Red" Government which has ruled Mongolia since 1921—its customs and schools and sheep-herds and personnel. The third article, Toward the Arctic Ocean, describes the trip across the mountains into Siberia—the route over which Russia is said to have sent aid to Feng Yu-hsiang, the "Christian general" in North China.

the back door—to take the train 120 miles to Kalgan and cross the Gobi Desert and the mountains by motor-car, striking the Trans-Siberian Railway, 1,100 miles beyond, at Verkhne-Udinsk.

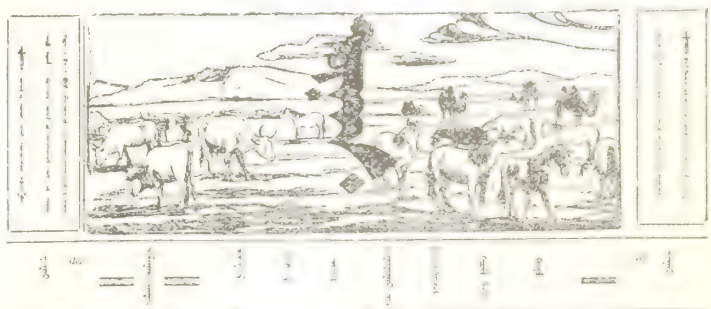
Looters were at work in the suburbs, so the huge [illegible] gates closed at five. The train was due to leave at seven; it did not leave until after midnight. All evening I sat on my bags in the Shichimen Station outside Peking's walls, while troop-trains poured through, carrying soldiers, horses, mules, coal, tents, automobiles, everything they could salvage, including engines from every railroad north of the Yangtze, and first-class cars full of officers. Suddenly in the midst of the alien turmoil I heard unmistakable American whoops, and there, leaping from a freight train, were six incongruous American marines on guard over four carloads of coal intended for the Legation. The cars had been sitting in that station or near it for three days; and after reciting their lives and loves the boys set up their army cots and went to sleep on top of the coal.

About me on the cold floor, some smoking long pipes, some munching hunks of bread, some asleep, some just squatting, were Mongols in gorgeous fleece-lined robes of turkey-red, or fire-orange, or water-blue, knotted at the waist with vividly contrasting sashes; with long boots of green or red-stitched leather that turned up and out at the tips like the corners of a Chinese roof, and on their heads spiked helmets of basketwork lined with fur, simple turbans of flaming color, or structures of rich brocade and cloth of gold. Outwardly the women were utterly indistinguishable from the men—though with headgear removed they revealed their wealth in strange ornaments of beads and semi-precious stones. Weaving in and out about us was an Oriental parade—more Mongols; Chinese boys, men, women; my coolie—a lad of perhaps 15, naked to the waist except for a buttonless coat; Marshal Feng's gray-clad soldiers with their weird fur caps; girls in long silk robes of exquisite pattern, and girls in cotton trousers; men in Chinese skull-caps, Western stocking-caps, Western felt hats; policemen in black uniforms—not a white face among them, and no one in a hurry—all moving with the infinite patience of the Orient. . . . Did the Chinese in pre-foreign days wear such gay colors as these Mongols? Royalty, to the end, dared color in stone and tile, but the masses today are a dull army in blue-cotton overalls.

My train pulled in at ten, and departed some time after midnight. To my surprise the berth promised at Army Headquarters was real. In the midst of a retreating army I slept in peace.

I woke up at the Great Wall and scrambled into my clothes too late to snap a picture before the engine began snorting for departure. But I could see it from the train—the only monument of man that is visible from the moon. It is an incredible thing, a sort of human attempt to rival the volcanic energy that tossed up the mountains. Over the boldest of the jagged rock-peaks this enormous creature streaks its way like a flash of lightning—soaring, leaping, stopping at nothing, losing in its infinite length the awe of mass and becoming a delicate thing of grace.

And it leaps from the sea to the Tibet borderland—as far as from New York to Chicago—and was built two thousand years ago.



All morning we rode through Asia—brown mountains behind a brown plain of frozen mud; mud-walled villages indistinguishable from the grave-dotted plain—graves here are mere heaps of earth in the midst of tilled fields; now and then a city of castellated walls, built of bricks made from the same brown mud. The eternal Chinese, in their eternal blue cotton, leaned, arms muffed in the opposite cuffs, against the station walls or against their homes, watching with passionless attention the daily spectacle of life. Only the putteed soldiers of the "Christian" army had a trace of the energy of the West. We passed one large city with walls that must have been forty or fifty feet high; in places the sand of this grassless country, where the wind drives the dust all winter, had swept up and drifted first against and finally clear over the ancient bricks and was sifting down inside the city. The past still lived, but the desert present was engulfing it.

In Kalgan China and Mongolia meet. The streets straggle up and down the bare hills, and every other shop sells furs. Soldiers and camels were everywhere; the ricksha tries to support itself in Kalgan, but the frozen ruts make it a miserable conveyance. A ricksha boy with wisps of English led me to the deserted site of the "Pioneer Inn"; we climbed the gate and knocked at doors that swung desolate in the wind. Across the fields I spied an American flag flying over a brown compound; it was the Consulate, and there I learned the whereabouts of the new inn. Williams, its American proprietor, was somewhere in Mongolia; his Dutch wife was in Peking; their children spoke only Chinese; but a Chinese "boy" knew some English and, after I had tried in vain with all the languages I could muster, bought for me a sheepskin sleeping-bag, a tall fur hat, beefsteak, eggs, bread, and cheese. At the Russian transport agency I managed, with the aid of three Russians each of whom knew a few words of German, to discover that one of the famous desert Dodges was leaving next day for Urga, and to convey the information that I wanted passage. It cost me $30 gold—for a five-day, seven-hundred-mile trip.

Our car—like all the desert cars—was a marvelously rigged Detroit Dodge with a heavy iron superframe built around a touring-car body, so that the running-boards could hold several hundred pounds each. Two tons of freight—mostly cigarettes and tea, apart from water and gasoline for the long journey—were loaded in; the two Chinese passengers climbed on top of the boxes; I, privileged, sat beside the driver. Our passenger list was unwontedly short; we passed Williams returning from Urga carrying nineteen Chinese, wadded with furs and roped in. The Chinese know how to dress for that climate—felt boots, skin trousers, fur hats, and long lamb's-wool-lined tsubas that reach the ground and go once and a half around them.

The car wound its way through the camel-crowded streets, stopped to present credentials at the heavily armed gate outside the city, and then headed straight into the mountains. Always we went up. We lurched and stumbled up a rocky river-bed; slipped through dirt canyons worn in the soft loess; passed villages dug out of these soft hillsides, with paper-covered windows cut in the earth, and other villages huddling against rock cliffs; cities with crumbling high walls, and tiny mud villages with towering brick-kilns. Each pass seemed only to open new heights beyond. But gradually the peaks softened. The jagged rocks gave way to brown, tilled fields. Sheep and cows appeared. The villages were sparser; this was bandit country on the edge of China, where the robbers find escape into the desert easy. A caravan had been robbed the week before, and a car reachd Urga with its passengers but minus its freight two days after us. This, too, is the frontier country of Inner Mongolia into which the Chinese pioneers drag their plows and oxen each year a little further, gnawing away the no man's land that was once the proud domain of Mongol princes.

We made only thirty miles the first day, but the next morning the plowed land disappeared; the country flattened out and became still more barren—we entered the Gobi Desert. Long caravans of camels passed us plodding steadily southward; we swept through camps where the burdens had been dropped in neat rows and the camels set free to graze or rest, while their Mongol drivers pitched lovely low turquoise-blue tents beside the packs. For miles and miles there was no sign of life—then a little group of yurts. The Mongol yurt is a round hut covered with camel-skin or felt. A lattice-work frame makes the shell—three or four feet high; then poles radiate hub-like to the top, which can be partly thrown open to let out the smoke. The low door may be of ornamental leather—or, more usual on this route, of Pratt's motor spirit tins and boxes. ("Pratt's motor spirit" is the pseudonym under which Socony "gas" travels in those parts, and the discarded packing-boxes and tins are revolutionizing Mongol life along the auto-routes.) Camel-dung is heaped around the base of the yurt to keep out the cold. Camel-dung, indeed, is the sole fuel in that country—it blazes up quickly and the huts warm easily. I felt very grateful to it on those cold Gobi nights. In summer the yurts are demounted and packed—a whole hour's job—and moved to greener fields. For the whole seven hundred miles we played hide and seek with a line of telegraph poles, which is, I suppose, the modern equivalent of the old Great Wall and probably a better defense. Sometimes the desert was utterly bare, mere sand or bedrock; sometimes it was fairly grassy, sometimes wild and rocky. It was exhilarating to know that there were such great open spaces still untamed and uncombed. Against the level sunset sky, speeding faster than our car, long lines of racing antelopes—Gobi gazelles—would often silhouette themselves. The ponies roamed everywhere—sometimes in herds of a thousand. Sometimes the car stuck in the sand and we had to shovel out ruts; sometimes, near the water-holes, it was bogged and we had to push. One day I counted for thirty miles and reckoned an average of five and half dead camels or camel skeletons per mile.

Name and date-line and decorative heading of Urga's only Mongolian newspaper, the Truth

Prospecting for Buried Worlds

By IDA TREAT

"SPEAKING of the reposefulness of pure science . . . ." The Deputy-on-a-Vacation wiped a perspiring forehead that steamed copiously in the flare of the acetylene lamp and leaned his bobtailed excavating pick against the rock wall of the cavern. Between his spread knees the bed of the trench he was digging showed a smooth layer of moist yellow clay. On either side squatted a fellow-prospector wearing the classic costume—hobnailed boots, mechanic's overalls, and tight Basque caps, the latter a prudent protection against jagged stalactites.

The three of us were grouped at the bottom of a deep, natural well, worn by water in one of the limestone foothills of the French Pyrenees—a well that plunged down at a sharp angle for nearly a hundred feet from the opening, but which a series of convenient landings rendered accessible without the assistance of a rope. Yards overhead, daylight filtered dim and blue through a fringe of stalactites. At the bottom, the pit widened into a star-shaped chamber out of which several low passages, none wide enough to admit a man's body, radiated like tentacles. We had vainly examined the smootn rock walls for prehistoric engravings, though these were scarcely to be expected so near the cave-opening. The next step was to search for traces of a hearth.

"This looks to me like another case of wasted effort." Bending over, the digger lowered the miner's lamp into the trench. "Small chance that human beings ever inhabited this hole. This is probably bear clay." As if in proof of that last statement, his fingers detached a white something from the bed of the trench. It was the canine of a bear, four inches long from the base of the root to the tip. "What did I tell you? No beast of this size ever shared his den with men!" Reaching for a slender poker-like tool, the speaker grubbed cautiously in the yellow clay. A few strokes brought up a second fragment—the lower jaw of a bear cub, its canines still imbedded in the bone. But clinging to the under side of the specimen, showed several lumps of soft black charcoal. There was a hearth after all! Working with tools and fingers, we laid bare the "culture layer": more coals, splinters of bone, the humerus of a reindeer, fragments of horn—ox or bison? But no flints. Only one archaeological specimen—the broken end of a bone dart deeply grooved along the middle—typical of the Magdalenian industry of the region, and proof positive that men of the Old Stone Age had built their fires in the Tuto de la Mandro—(the Fox's Hole). That sufficed. Gathering our tools we clambered up the steep passage toward the opening of the cave. Out of doors we masked the narrow entrance with brush and rocks. We had staked another claim.

Luck of that order, it may be added, is not often duplicated in weeks of prospecting. For buried civilizations like our buried treasures are not to be found down every fox's burrow, even in a country where the humblest rabbit-hole may lead to a mine for archaeologists. Though the enthusiastic searcher bears constantly in his mind's eye the vision of the Cave-Absolute, there are several hundred chances to one that he will never find it. The perfect cave—he knows in advance its every detail: the smooth curving walls and vault, ideal canvas for the cave-man artist; the long succession of galleries that end at the final "sanctuary" where a frieze of painted bison or mammoths stands out in sharp relief against the limestone ground. There will be hearths of course, on the surface, with bones that admit of identification, flint tools of classic cut, and weapons and ornaments of horn and ivory. . . . The ambition of the explorer has no limit. In spite of a long series of disappointments, he never penetrates a new cavern without the supreme confidence that this time surely he is going to "strike it rich."

Reality, however, wears a different aspect. The smooth white tunnel ends generally in a landslide, is choked with earth and stalagmite, or gigantic blocks of limestone fallen from the vault which nothing short of TNT would budge. The gallery that "must lead somewhere" dwindles to a crack in which the eager explorer, after wriggling for rods on his stomach, often wedges himself so firmly that only by vigorous tugging from the rear is he at last extricated. Then there are "unpleasant" passages, where a stratum of clay partially washed away between two rocky layers is cut by the fissures of many earthquakes. Underfoot, an unreliable crust of stalagmite; overhead, boulders protruding from a cheesy mass of breccia whose solidity is a matter for conjecture. Too chaotic to be of prehistoric interest, such passages must nevertheless be visited; the painted gallery may lie beyond. But the prospector advances gingerly, treads lightly on the uncertain stalagmite, avoids brushing against projecting rocks, and rarely fails to proclaim with suspicious firmness that floor and vault will undoubtedly last longer than the explorer. It is a curious fact, however, that whatever apprehensions he may experience generally disappear after the first visit. A cave revisited is like a house of a friend; no one thinks of questioning the solidity of the beams.

A blocked passage always represents a problem for the prospector. For a curtain of stalagmite masked the inner galleries of Niaux and shut off the chamber of the clay bisons at Tuc d'Audoubert. Stalagmite, if the layer is not too thick, breaks easily. A few hours' work with mallet and chisel will generally show whether the gallery continues. Earth, however, is another matter; every shovelful must be carried and deposited somewhere; and tons of it may be banked behind the first shovelful. The rock wall that bars so mysteriously an underground stream may prove a lesser obstacle. For that rock wall may represent a siphon; if you have the courage to dive through, you may come out—as we did at Montespan—in a gallery rich with prehistoric treasures. A clay-coated gallery often reserves surprises. There was one like a tunnel through the mud at the time of our first visit. A year later, whole slabs of the clay coating had dried and fallen, revealing the white rock-walls and rows of red Magdalenian dots.

Even in a country like the French Pyrenees where every clump of scrub oak may conceal the entrance to a prehistoric habitation, the scientific prospector finds few competitors. The natives keep prudently away from caves, which are currently supposed to be haunted by demons.

Caverns of any size have generally been exorcised or sanctified by the presence of pious images, to the ultimate despair of prehistorians, as in the case of Lourdes. The openings of smaller caves, which threaten the welfare of domestic animals or hunting dogs, are prudently blocked with stones. Fortunately for the explorer, the custom of throwing dead animals into convenient holes is no longer a current practice; during the war the thrifty peasant learned by experience that a sick cow may represent as much profit as a well one, provided he disposes of it in time.

The countryside follows the activity of the explorer of caves with attentive suspicion. He is generally credited with hunting for treasures other than archaeological. Would any sane man risk breaking his neck down dark holes infested with evil spirits, if he didn't hope for concrete returns?

"I've got an—an object to show you." The Manchot waited until the last group of stragglers from the fair were well out of earshot before continuing, while he plunged a hand deep into the pocket of his alpaca blouse: "We found it in the potato-field. Le voilà."

With an air of mystery, he produced a small bronze ax, curiously flattened. "It's very heavy," he hazarded, watching us narrowly.

"Naturally, a bronze tool—"

"We know of course that it contains gold," the Manchot pursued conversationally.

"Bronze," we repeated, "an alloy of copper, tin. . . ."

". . . . And platinum," he concluded, as if he had not heard. "You see, it's very solid. Neither hammer nor file leave any mark." Unfortunately for the specimen, the traces of his energy were only too apparent.

"In case you find another, don't repeat the experiment," we counseled. "That is, if you expect to sell it for ten francs to a collector."

Ten francs! the Manchot pocketed his treasure with indignation and went away grumbling. He at least was no fool and no city folk, however clever, were going to put anything over on him! The incident is typical. Not infrequently the discoverer of a promising site finds his plans for its excavation hopelessly blocked by the peasant proprietor and his hopes of lucre.

Fellow-archaeologists in France have a tacit agreement concerning territory rights. A given district is considered the legitimate hunting ground of the scientist who first began digging in the region. No colleague would think of "trespassing" within the imaginary boundaries. The foreigner however is less delicate. Today the dollar represents the principal bugbear of the French prehistorians. For how can French science, in these days tremendously handicapped for funds, hope to compete with the moneyed American who has been known to offer the peasant-owner of a prehistoric site as much as twenty thousand francs for the privilege of a single summer's digging?

"If Americans are interested in prehistory, it would be more generous to help us find the means to continue our research, rather than fight us with the one weapon which today we are powerless to wield," is the expression one hears constantly. There is much talk of pushing a law to prevent foreigners from excavating prehistoric sites. But the French Government will doubtless not care to risk offending even scientific America in these days of debts and agreements. In the meantime the dollar looms large as a potential enemy.

"You have found a site in the Pyrenees?" we were asked by a French prehistorian. "Then for God's sake hurry and get a hard and fast bail before the Americans get wind of it!" The current Americano-phobia has penetrated even the domain of pure science.

In the Driftway

AUGUSTE ESCOFFIER, celebrated French chef, who is said to know 10,000 recipes—eighty-nine for preparing eggs!—has been talking. Most cooks guard their secrets jealously, saying with a wave of the hand "Oh, sometimes I do it one way and sometimes another," or "Well, I take a pinch of salt, not too much butter, just enough milk, cinnamon according to taste—" As a rule a cook is a man of few words. He says it with flours.

* * * * *

MONSIEUR ESCOFFIER, having arrived close to his eighty-third birthday, has been letting a little wisdom ooze out. Even so, he says less about cooking than about eating—but that's a great art too. He does not condemn American cooking; presumably he is wise enough to know that it has its surpassing virtues. But in restaurants nowadays these are usually obliterated in a pitiable effort to imitate the methods of Monsieur Escoffier's own France, or at least to make one think so from the barrage of the menu card. Otherwise it is generally sunk without trace on the Athens-New York-Chicago route in favor of a cooking which is merely Americ*anized*—with, oh, what unhappy consequences! The Drifter would prohibit naturalization to all cooks. As long as they remain foreign they are usually excellent, but once they begin to salute the flag between every stir of the soup, they are ruined. What's worse, the soup is too. The Drifter has often heard doctors condemn the frying-pan. But it doesn't wreck half so many digestions as the melting-pot.

* * * * *

IN America, Monsieur Escoffier suggests, there is many a slip 'twixt the stove and the stomach. He names three: the cocktail, ice water, and the steam table. "You Americans," he says, "begin the meal with the cocktail, and those who do not take the cocktail in America take ice water; and I have seen many take the both. How can the palate, insulted with the cocktail and stunned by the cold, cold water, appreciate a delicate plat?" How, indeed! The cocktail, of course, does not concern us moderns. Monsieur Escoffier is French and may be pardoned for overlooking the fact that the cocktail was eliminated by the Volstead law. Ice water was not prohibited by the Volstead law—yet it is drunk in as great quantities as ever! As Monsieur Escoffier says, it stuns the palate. That, with some cooking, is not altogether a misfortune. But the prevailing practice in our restaurants of stuffing a glass with ice has made it impossible to get fresh water at all. And since the use of cracked ice became general no water bottle on a restaurant table is filled except when it gets completely empty. In some cases that would seem to be about once a week.

* * * * *

AND then the steam table—a device for spoiling cooked foods, especially vegetables, by letting them stand. But the steam table is not, as Monsieur Escoffier thinks, the fault of American hurry. Rather is it the result of our insistence upon "meals at all hours." The French do not attempt anything so ridiculous, as every American knows who has tried to get anything substantial to eat in Paris except between eleven and two or six and nine o'clock. Along with the steam table, Monsieur Escoffier ought to have condemned the general ice-box, in which ice takes the place of cleaning just as in water it takes the place of freshening. The steam table takes the flavor out of everything; the common ice-box gives the flavor of the strongest, say onions, to the weakest, maybe custard. It's democratic, but it's also what Sherman said of war.

* * * * *

THE Drifter would like to go on; but it's dinner time. He must make his way toward a steam table, toward a water bottle that has not been refilled since last Saturday. The cocktail, of course, has been eliminated by the Volstead law. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Coolidge for Mayor!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Now that President Coolidge approaches unemployment, do you not think steps should appropriately be taken to secure his election as Mayor of Northampton? What, otherwise, shall we do with him?

I trust The Nation will lend this movement its serious support. Many of us will gladly contribute to his campaign fund.

Boston, Massachusetts, November 5 L. H. J.

County-Jail System

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read with interest the article in The Nation entitled Barbarism in Central [illegible]. To my mind it does not strike at the real root of the trouble, the county-jail system itself.

A study of the county jails in New York State by a joint committee, headed by George W. Wickersham, former United States Attorney General, points to the necessity for committing sentenced prisoners to the custody of the State authorities and establishing a series of industrial farms under State control, similar to the farm colony of the District of Columbia established by Congress at Occoquan, Virginia. The National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor in cooperation with the General and State Federations of Women's Clubs is guiding a nation-wide movement for the abolition of the county-jail system. This is the one and only way to correct the abuses. The county-jail system was carried over to this country from England, but England has long since discarded it and placed all prisoners under control of the central government.

Alabama is not "the only State in the Union that tolerates the exploitation of its convicts for profit." It is the only State which turns its State prisoners over to private interests; but in some fourteen of the other States the exploitation continues under the prison-contract system. The "State and States' use" system will solve the prison-labor problem, but it is a process of evolution not revolution and it will require money, time, and brains to carry it in forty-eight States.

The Governor of Alabama cannot solve the Alabama problem alone. All the States must cooperate if this century-old scandal is to give place to a system of prison labor which will insure proper industrial training to the prisoner, support for his family, and fair play to the free worker.

New York, November 3 JULIA K. JAFFRAY,
Secretary, National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor

Saintly St. Louis

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "The Constitution of the United States makes every man equal regardless of color or race. They can buy property anywhere, but a body of men can bind themselves together by making a contract not to sell to a Negro or any Mongolian races. This is the only way to get around the problem." This is a quotation from a statement by a St. Louis home protective association. Before the bar of justice this protective association stands alongside those who violate the Volstead, Harris, and Mann acts, and should suffer the penalty.

An investigation shows that those Negroes who live in restricted districts are law-abiding, industrious people who ask merely to be let alone—to live their lives in their own way. In many instances they are business and professional people seeking small, modern homes, not the barnlike structures most often offered to Negroes in so-called Negro neighborhoods. The Negroes attend strictly to their own business. The "invasion" of such people is feared, however, for they are black, and to be black in St. Louis is hell.

Why not let them live as and where they want to live, not as the Home Protective Association wants them to live?

The annual membership fee of this association is two dollars, but the association will pay the fee for anyone who cannot afford to pay this princely sum. Just think, a man who cannot afford two dollars a year dictating the living of some others—many of whom have spent years and fortunes preparing for their careers. Democracy! Christianity!

St. Louis, Mo., November 3 CARL KIZKAGE

How Old Is Will?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A phrase in my review of "Potemkin" [Nation 123:252] has brought me the following testimonial from the office of Mr. Will Hays:

MOTION PICTURE PRODUCERS & DISTRIBUTORS OF AMERICA
WILL H. HAYS, President

Mr. Ernestine Evans
c/o The Nation,
20 Vesey Street, New York City.

My dear Mr. Evans:

In your comment of September 15 appears this paragraph:

"Will Hays, who seems never to forget that the average mental age of the American public is fourteen years, and is so very careful lest the movies help to mature us."

Let me quote the following from many of Mr. Hays's addresses to set you straight on this subject:

"No one can reasonably demand that all motion pictures be constructed to fit the psychology of the 12-year-old boy or girl. The primary purpose of motion pictures is entertainment for the mature, and certain of life's problems and situations—perhaps not just the things for juvenile observation—must be picturized, if we are to have any drama in our photoplays. The general run of motion pictures are not now and never will be intended especially for the 12-year-olds. If all pictures were made suitable for the adolescent mind, the grown-ups would not patronize the motion-picture theaters, and if the theaters had to rely for their maintenance upon the patronage of children they would soon pass out of existence. Every thoughtful person—parents and guardians included—will accept that situation."

New York, October 22 H. L. RUSSELL, Editor

Mr. Hays is the Czar of the Movies. Presumably he knows what goes on in his realm. That he should find it "entertainment for the mature" is evidence of the irrepressible youthfulness of the monarch. Besides, I said "fourteen years," not "twelve."

New York, October 26 (MISS) ERNESTINE EVANS

Who Reads American Books?

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN books at least the balance of trade has stood steadily against us. Abroad our label has been conspicuously displayed upon gramophones and cameras, sewing-machines and safety razors, but the European publisher so rash as to issue an American book has been more likely to conceal than to advertise the country of its origin. Since Emerson proclaimed, somewhat prematurely perhaps, our cultural independence, a whole line of patriots has echoed his theme, but their utterances have rung more convincingly in American than in foreign ears. Baudelaire described our country as "a gas-lighted barbarism"; Ibsen, notwithstanding the American reception of his work, dismissed us comprehensively as "hogs"; and Anatole France, even while he addressed some of us as comrades, did not always trouble to conceal his contempt for "these gaints with a child's brain." And yet there are signs to indicate that certain of our contemporary writers may accomplish in Europe a task at which even Emerson, Thoreau, Hawthorne, and Whitman failed.

Theodore Dreiser received his first recognition from England. The American publisher who undertook "Sister Carrie" lost his courage when the wife of one of his officials declared herself offended by the proofsheets and he wriggled out of his contract by printing the book without offering it for sale. It was not until an English edition had received high praise abroad that it was issued here by an accredited publisher, and it is therefore not surprising that "An American Tragedy" should be hailed by British critics. Yet even in view of this fact those Americans who have felt, not without reason, that critics across the sea displayed a marked disinclination to praising American work will learn with unexpected pleasure of the glowing enthusiasm with which it is being received. In the Nation and Athenaeum Edwin Muir gives it superlative praise; one of the most distinguished London publishers has expressed to us in a private letter his warm admiration; and even the conservative Spectator is unreserved in its approval, incidentally rebuking those tender Americans who feel it necessary to qualify their praise with some reference to Dreiser's "atrocious style."

> Almost everyone in England [it says] had heard of Mr. Dreiser's great novel, considered to be the finest work of fiction yet produced in the United States. . . . Many had heard, too, that while "An American Tragedy" was impressive, it was full of faults, clumsiness, and stodgy passages. Examination proved a surprise, consequently. A novel stands or falls no more by the prettiness or ease of its phrases than it does by the number of copies it sells. To be great a novelist needs neither sweetness nor grace. The essential properties—wholeness, breadth, penetration, truth, vitality—are here. "An American Tragedy" is a very great and very portentous novel indeed. It is a sudden and even staggering vision of man in the grip of industrial civilization. It expresses a distress which every thinking person must have harbored secretly and which lesser, though doubtlessly equally sincere, prophets have expressed. . . . And if Mr. Dreiser tells this simple, plain story with so great a wealth of detail, in so many hundreds of pages, it is because he has seen why crimes of this sort happen, why smutched little boys like Clyde exist. . . . The rustic has a function in life, can feel some dumb satisfaction arise from [illegible]. But darker the lot of the average town youth. He has no skill with his hands, no joy of his strength, no concrete object for his ambitions. Other men see in him only one more rival in a race with no end and no rewards. Swift never indicted society half so forcibly as does Mr. Dreiser. Sure Swift did not believe that each of us is responsible. Swift believed in a Supreme Being; but there is a cold abyss as God of the great cities of America as Mr. Dreiser shows them to us. The Russian novelists, the Irish playwrights are optimists compared to Mr. Dreiser; yet his despondency arises not from a grievance but from clear-sightedness. Absurd to speak of his style when the construction of the novel is so inevitable, so grandiose, and so complete. Idle to carp at long or awkward sentences when the authentic tones of truth ring through every page. Here, indeed, are pity and terror; darkness hangs over the universe. There is something almost painfully real about the minute descriptions of the apparently insignificant actions of the hero as they are given here. Each has a tragic significance. . . . These things are happening, one says, everywhere. We call it an enlightened age. . . . Theodore Dreiser's voice cries startlingly "Quo vadimus?" The whole of this vast, sad book is shot with a rare appreciation of the essential beauty of man's innermost spirit; and if the millions of Clydes in the world are being swept into an abyss, the appalled reader of the menacing work of fiction closes it with the conviction that they are utterly and urgently worth salvation.

To Dreiser, unquestionably, belongs the distinction of having initiated the contemporary movement in American literature, and to that will perhaps be added the credit of marking a definite turn in the history of the attitude of Europe toward American books. To be sure, signs of such a turn have already appeared. England reads us; Germany is busy translating our works (though not always with great discrimination in its choice); Russia has established relations through a special committee for the publication in Russian of our best books; and even France, for centuries the most provincial of all European countries in its attitude toward literatures not its own, has begun to take cognizance of us. Cooper, Poe, and, for some strange reason, Harriet Beecher Stowe she has always read, but without thereby acknowledging our national literature, since she read Cooper for his savages and she maintained that Poe was a freak, unaccountable except upon the hypothesis that his genius was developed as the result of "French influences" received in the South. Now, however, she is becoming aware of our collective existence and is revealing, by such works as the sympathetic and informed survey of contemporary American literature recently published as a preface to a translation of Sherwood Anderson, that she is eager to understand our spirit as a whole. In view of such facts observable in all Europe some obviously outstanding work upon whose merits all can agree is of supreme importance and it looks now as if "An American Tragedy" were such a work.

Who reads an American book? Perhaps the time is not far off when that question will be as pointless as it would be now if "English" or "Russian" or "French" were substituted for "American." Already Sydney Smith's famous gibe, which, though it may originally have been innocent of offense, we have never been able to forget, has lost much of its sting.

The Northern Literary World

By B. W. HUEBSCH

THERE is no heir, apparent or presumptive, to Brandes's laurels in Scandinavia. Indeed, it is a mistake to think of a successor in terms of nationality, for it is nothing more than chance that Brandes is a Dane. If a figure comparable to his should appear it is as likely to bob up in Salzburg or Seville as in Copenhagen. The accident of being born a Scandinavian has certain definite consequences. Geography and language, factors that tend toward isolation, are responsible for the twofold aspect of Scandinavian culture. The three lands are off the commonly traveled routes, their society has been thrown back on itself, and their manners and customs bear distinct marks of difference from those of other European nations. This isolation has developed a passion for travel, and thus the Scandinavian has seen and learned much of East and West and has freely taken and adapted to his own purposes whatever seemed desirable in the large world outside of his peninsula.

Similarly in the matter of language. It is not extraordinary that three countries with such a history as that of Scandinavia should have developed a notable literature; the English-reading world is becoming aware of the quantity and quality of books by Norwegians, Danes, and Swedes since the Saga period. A significant fact of their culture is that the economic obstacles to translating the literature of the world into languages read by only a few millions drive them to the study of languages. Thus, to the Scandinavian, a liability becomes an asset; the limitations of his own language have forced him to a greater altitude and a consequently wider vista.

Being without political world ambitions, and with fewer congenital prejudices than exist elsewhere in Europe, the North has bred critics who see clearly and assess with intelligence and impartiality. Brandes is, of course, the one who is universally known. The one other of recent years who might have stamped himself on the wider realm of letters was Oscar Levertin, a critic greatly admired and revered, who was cut off in his prime. The acknowledged leader of the Scandinavian literary republic is Henrik Schück, a Swede whose monumental general history of literature is now done, a great work in two senses. His history of Swedish literature, already a generation old, is without a peer. As a young man he published a study of Shakespeare's works, and some thirty years later he brought out, not a new edition but an entirely new book, in the preface to which he makes humorous apology for the presumption of his youth. But although Schück's works alone would make him the outstanding man of letters among those functioning actively, his commanding position is due to the qualities of intellectual leadership that have caused a school to grow up about him. It is not a controversial school but a life of which he is the center. His philosophical outlook, his consideration of social forces as factors in literature, his geniality, power, and style have attracted the best disciples, who, in turn, are the potential leaders of the younger generation.

The most dynamic figure in creative criticism in the North today is Fredrik Böök, also a Swede. He has unbounded energy, writes books, writes in magazines and newspapers, and lectures. His admirers are legion and it matters little to them that Böök often lets his first enthusiasm run away with him. He may not be a critic of the first rank, but he is charged with life, he inspires controversy, he is radio-active. Quite naturally such a man has detractors and enemies who turn his weaknesses to their account, and so there are camps from which sharp words are hurled. Böök's latest book, by the way, is not one of criticism but describes a journey to Jerusalem; it was one of the most popular volumes of the last Christmas season. One of the best of the younger scholars, one generally looked upon as Schück's legate, is Martin Lamm, whose interests and versatility prompt him to write of Swedenborg as well as Strindberg. And he is popular as a lecturer, not only in his university classes but in extension courses. Particularly interesting to Americans should be Ruben Gïson Berg, an essayist and critic whose new "Modern Americans" is a just and sober estimate of our living literati.

It may be gathered from the foregoing—a mere fingering of the surface—that Swedish literary life is not wanting in critics. They are truly critics and not merely reviewers, although none of them scorns journalism. Fogelqvist writes much in a daily newspaper. They vitalize the public mind, they train thousands of readers to understand and demand true evaluations. The fact that Sweden, like every other country, produces a great deal of trash may not be concealed, but the reading public is never left in doubt; whoever buys Nick Carter does so with his eyes open.

Publishers everywhere are almost feverishly anxious to find in the literature of other lands the talent which is wanting in their own. Few will dispute the statement that there are only half a dozen men and women under sixty, the world over, who are first-rate story writers. On the whole it is an age of little people in imaginative prose. The book-trade suspects that there is something sterile, if not rotten, in the state of literature, and publishers in their naivete (yes, publishers are naive, as are bankers and politicians and all people generally counted as clever) turn to other lands, believing that "Dort wo du nicht bist, Dort ist das Glück." The Scandinavians, as well as other Europeans (the Latins in a smaller degree), translate a great deal.

To an American their choice seems just about as indiscriminate as does our selection of Scandinavian books to them. The books that sell well in the country of origin are the most likely to be translated, but Europeans apply their own taste to our product, or allow their own conception of the American character to govern them, and sometimes issue translations of works which have enjoyed no commercial success at home. All of Europe regards America as a phenomenon to be studied, hence those of our books which explore the American soul find the most eager response. Most Europeans who have looked into our literature are respectful, and often worshipful, before the name of Whitman. Many of them make a great leap from Whitman to Upton Sinclair. However critics may disagree on his merits, his books seem to have impressed Europe—or at least the Central Empires and Scandinavia—more deeply than have any other contemporary American social studies. Sinclair Lewis is the best known of today's American novelists; in certain advanced circles the word "Babbitt" is applied in its American significance. Sherwood Anderson is beginning to be translated. Berg devotes a chapter of his "Modern Americans" to Dreiser and Anderson. There is talk of a Swedish translation of "Spoon River," in consequence of the importance assigned to it by Berg. On the whole it is safe to say that Scandinavians prefer English fiction to American, but that is not to be wondered at, since English life and manners are close to the Scandinavian heart.

To those who believe that all Scandinavians are blondes, that all their women are cooks or chambermaids, that they all say "Ay Bane" when in America, and that Ibsen was a Swede or something, it may mean little that the lines between the three nations are hardening rather than melting. The political relations are friendly enough, but there is a distinct recognition of the pronounced differences that exist between Dane, Norwegian, and Swede. They have a healthy desire to maintain their separate identities, culturally as well as politically; identity does not mean narrowness, for it has been demonstrated that these small-nation people are perhaps to be taken more seriously as internationalists than are imperialists who do lip service to hollow Leagues and Courts. The Norwegians, long cultural vassals of the Danes, are furthering their ambition to revive the peasant speech, the landsmaal, although there are few present indications that this will be adopted as a literary language. Norway is publishing more books at home and depending less on Denmark, it is said. Nothing illustrates better the independence of the respective languages than the fact that a book by a popular Scandinavian author—Selma Lagerlöf's latest, for example—is issued simultaneously in Swedish, Danish, and Norwegian.

Sweden does cross-word puzzles and has an all-fiction magazine and in other ways does doubtful homage to our leadership. Just now the system of selling books on the instalment plan is being pushed to the utmost, not only by publishers who send their agents throughout the land but by retail booksellers who find their relations with their old customers threatened by the publishers' invasion of the retail field. An interesting feature of this new method of selling is that practically all of the books thus marketed are in de luxe bindings. The word "de luxe" usually connotes pinchbeck in American "sets," but these Swedish bindings are really representative of good bookmaking. And the literature is not like that which is associated with the terrible word "book-agent" in the United States. It consists of the tried works, classics and sound modern books, that deserve to be in good libraries. In one case, however, a work for sale on instalment payments has been specially prepared; it is an encyclopedia in about a dozen volumes, less exhaustive than the standard Swedish encyclopedia (which, by the way, is about to be issued in a new edition) but more popular. The advance sale of the new work was 65,000 copies; this in a country of only six millions! Another publishing project, already partly executed, is a series of fifty classics, mostly fiction. Its literary standing is attested by the names of the editors: Fredrik Böök, Martin Lamm, and Peter Hallström. Many of the books are from foreign languages, and where the existing translations are inadequate new ones are being made. This earnest interest in the literature of other lands is constantly in evidence; for instance, new editions of Goethe's "Conversations with Eckermann" and Mill's "Autobiography" (with an introduction by Heckscher, the distinguished economist) have just appeared in Sweden. And there are others.

New Books in France

By RENE LALOU

Paris, October 10

ONCE more pessimism proves wrong; there is to be no abatement in the activity of French publishers this winter. Just look at the program of that one-year-old firm, les Arts et le Livre; you will find there several beautiful art books, new children's books by Rachilde and Mac Orlan, an anthology of literary prizes, the first three volumes of "The Nineteenth Century Studied Through Its Texts" (an undertaking which ought to appeal to foreign readers), and that collection called l'Intelligence in which such writers as Valéry, Gide, Curel, and Bergson will be represented by their most significant work. Material difficulties seem to have increased the national taste for the highest spiritual activities; no publishing season has been more promising as regards poetry. The Nouvelle Revue Française will offer Jouve's "Nouvelles Noces," two reprints of Valéry's "Charmes," and Thibaudet's matchless study on Mallarmé; Grasset will publish a book of poems by Mme de Noailles as well as two essays by the abbé Brémond on "Pure Poetry" and "Poetry and Prayer"—a much-discussed problem to which Kra will add a contribution by Maurice Martin du Gard, director of the Nouvelles Littéraires, called "Religion and Poetry."

The mighty dead will not be forgotten. Plon promises the diary of Maine de Biran, the philosopher, as well as "le Mystère en pleine Lumière," a posthumous work by Maurice Barrès. From Grasset we are to expect Mistral's collected essays and Pierre Champion's big study on Marcel Schwob, whose "Moeurs des Diurnales," a Rabelaisian, Swift-like pamphlet on journalism, was the first number of l'Intelligence. The N. R. F. will give both Debussy's "Monsieur Croché," the perfect anti-Wagnerite, and the letters that passed between Rivière and his friend Alain Fournier; with "le Temps Retrouvé" they will bring to a close the publication of Proust's prose epic, to which will be added a volume of his chronicles. Robert Dreyfus will edit with interesting commentaries the letters he received from Proust (Grasset), while his biographer, Léon Pierre-Quint, announces an essay on "The Comic Spirit in Proust" (Kra). The last-named firm is also to reveal three hitherto unpublished pamphlets by Stendhal, Benjamin Constant, and Gobineau and some of Rimbaud's letters to one of his teachers.

Let us now come to the protagonists of the French novel—I mean those from whom we are still to expect a novel every year for a quarter of a century onward. Grasset declares that in "Eglantine" Giraudoux has written a fascinating sequel to "Bella," that "le Bouddah Vivant" will be Paul Morand's masterpiece and a revelation of Asia, that Thérive's "Souffrances perdues" will keep a fine balance between romance and realism, that Mauriac's "Locuste" will probe deeply into the inmost secrets of family life. At Rieder Jolinon will publish a humorous study of provincial life, "la Paroissienne," and Panait Istrati will complete the cycle of his "Haidouc stories" with "Codine," a description of his childhood in Rumania. Life in the sanatoriums is the subject of Kessel's "Captifs" (N. R. F.), and the gofever will be illustrated in "Partir," a novel by Dorgelès (Michel). These authors are still young and the firm of Crès has no room for them as yet in the Musée du Livre; but all of them are welcome in the collection Maîtres et Jeunes d'Aujourd'hui, a comfortable anteroom to universal glory. As for the true "young," Arland, Beucler, Crevel, Bove, Prévost, Eluard, Vitrac, Honnert, Kra and the N. R. F. extend to them the warmest hospitality; their poems and confessions will appear in the Cornets Littéraires and Une Oeuvre, un portrait; for such works are usually short and the sympathy of their readers is much increased by a portrait of the author facing his first page with a romantic look. Among their leaders Aragon will publish his kaleidoscopic "Paysan de Paris" (N. R. F.) and Soupault his intense "Corps Perdu" (Grasset), while one of their critics, André Lamandé, will bring out in Les Enfants du Siècle (Grasset) what ought to be a panoramic description of up-to-date romanticism.

As for the theater, Crès will publish a fifth volume of Lenormand and the seventh and last volume of Becque's complete works. Thanks to the N. R. F. we shall soon read Bloch's "Dernier Empereur," two plays by Jean Cocteau which have received qualified applause, and Romains's "Dictateur," recently staged after many difficulties and amid much passion, both literary and political; the same firm will also publish the "Théâtre de Maurice Boissard"—Romains's personal enemy and a cynical critic of the stage.

Last season Maurice Genevoix was awarded the Goncourt prize and Gilbert de Voisins the prize of the French Academy for literature; so Grasset has asked them to write the memories of their ante-laureate career and will publish Genevoix's "Boîte à Pêche" and de Voisins's "Les Miens." He will also give a "Racine politique" by Dubech, stating the French royalist point of view on that great poet. The influence of Maurras will be felt throughout the book, but it will be strongly opposed in an essay by the Thomist leader Maritain on Maurras and the Roman Catholics. Plon will publish that pamphlet, together with Jacques Boulenger's apology for the poetess Desbordes-Valmore, and a curious essay on Arnold of Brunhoff's experiences as a grocer. Novelized lives have met with such success that the number of announcements in that line is increasing daily: Horatius and Propertius (Grasset), Descartes and Baudelaire (Plon), Henry IV, Montaigne, Law, and Stendhal (N. R. F.) are [illegible] to life. The reason for those choices is not very clear, except in the case of Law, the father of modern financiers, who has unfortunately become what we call a "figure d'actualité." The interest in Asiatic things is somewhat lagging; will the travel-books of Claude Anet (Grasset) and Henry Bordeaux (Plon) revive last year's enthusiasm? Anyhow, Kra will score two cosmopolitan successes with a life of Mussolini and a biography of Suzanne Lenglen. "La porte du Sauveur" (Rieder) by Etienne Burnet is given as an impressive testimony on Bolshevism; two novels on the Jewish problem are to be expected from André Billy (Ed. de France), and Edmond Fleg at the N. R. F., which will also be responsible for Groethuysen's thesis on "l'esprit bourgeois." Les Arts et le Livre represents Africa with a competent study by André Berthelot. As for America, "Serafina" (Crès) will tell the tribulations of a young French girl who followed an American soldier, while Jacques Dyssord in "Joe" (Grasset) will publish the notebooks of an American citizen who discovers the Old World. Will it read like a translation? Of translations I have not spoken here; it is enough to say that they promise to be more numerous than ever, with a praiseworthy attempt at being less unfaithful both to the original text and to the French language.

Books

A German View of the Kaiser

Wilhelm der Zweite. Von Emil Ludwig. Berlin: Ernst Rowohlt Verlag.*

IT would be difficult in the annals of biography to find a book more destructive to its subject than this extraordinary volume on the ex-Kaiser. What makes it the more devastating is the fact that, as he promises in his preface, Herr Ludwig cites no authority hostile to the Kaiser, but builds up his case only by citations from the Kaiser himself, his personal friends and admirers, his tutors and official intimates. More than that, he gives to the Kaiser a clean bill of health so far as his personal morality is concerned and takes the side of the Kaiser against the latter's parents. The tragic Emperor Frederick and his English wife he holds responsible for Wilhelm's unhappy youth and much of the still more unhappy bent of his pathological mind. He also stresses the Kaiser's physical deformity and attributes to his desire to conceal and conquer that defect many of his blustering traits—for instance, his masquerading as a soldier—while crediting him with enormous determination and will-power in overcoming a handicap which might have entirely ruined another career. It is only fair to add that the partisans of the Emperor Frederick and his consort have vigorously replied to Herr Ludwig's characterization of them. It is undeniable also that the empress-mother adequately sized up her son and, although usually opposed to Bismarck, was one with the Iron Chancellor in deploring that incredibly stupid policy of driving Great Britain into the alliance with Russia and France which was the undoing of Germany.

But the disasters of 1914-1918 were inevitable when the Kaiser came to the throne bereft of parental love and surrounded only by sycophants and court officials, not one of whom ventured to tell him the truth about himself and his policies. Historians of the future who read Herr Ludwig's volume will surely wonder how any people as gifted and as able as the Germans could possibly have stood for government by such a man. Not even the fact that many of our American citizens of the 100 per cent captain-of-industry type—the same who are now worshiping at Mussolini's shrine—declared the Kaiser to be "miraculous" exculpates the Germans; it was the great Nicholas Murray Butler himself who, after receiving the Red Eagle of the third class, declared the Kaiser to be "at once a man of action and a student," "of judicial temperament and abounding in sympathy and imagination," "of sound ideas and true ideals," who if he "had not been born to monarchy would have been chosen monarch—or chief executive—by popular vote of any modern people among whom his lot might have been cast." Those who saw him at closer range can still less be forgiven for their mental aberrations in estimating him.

Well, this German biographer of the Kaiser proves per contra that Dr. Butler's hero was incredibly shallow, entirely undereducated, with no sympathy for or understanding of the masses of his people; that he was vain, egotistic; that he was swung one way or another by hatred, by anger, and by jealousy, and was totally lacking in statesmanship, besides being cowardly to a degree. He had no ideals save the commonest imperialistic ones. Never could this great man face an issue or take a position unless compelled to do so. Usually he vacillated, trimmed, dodged, and if he decided, decided wrong. Take his attitude during the crisis prior to the war as Ludwig summarizes it. Immediately after the Serajevo assassinations, the Kaiser wrote: "The Serbs must be cleaned up and, what's more, promptly." On July 5 he first refused to give the Austrian Ambassador his consent to the despoiling of Serbia; after lunch, without consulting his Chancellor, he gave him a blanket power of attorney, for Germany. On July 10 he penned his belief that the Austrians were trying to devise terms the Serbians could not accept, yet he twice wrote "too bad" when the Austrian ultimatum was delayed. The Serbians were "a band of robbers who must be arrested for crimes." On July 26 he wrote: "One fulfils ultimata or one does not. But one does not discuss any longer!" Next he annotated Sazonov's threat, that if Austria devoured Serbia Russia would fight, with this slang: "All right; go to it!"

* Soon to be published in this country by G. P. Putnam's Sons.

But when the Serbian answer came this man of war characteristically swung completely around: "A brilliant performance for a period of only forty-eight hours! This is more than one could have expected. A great moral success for Vienna; but with this every reason for war disappears." He was ready then to be the intermediary for peace between Serbia and Austria—to intercede for what he had just said was "not a civilized nation," but "a band of robbers." The "murderers of princes" were actually praised. He had forgotten that he had ordered them driven from the Adriatic. Next his fury turned on the Czar—and the Serbians were again "bandits and murderers of kings." And so it went in that terrible crisis.

Beyond question the most moving and dramatic portion of this extremely dramatic book—(fascinating even though it gives evidence of haste in composition and suffers from its style)—is the straightforward narration of the wretched Kaiser's performance during the war. Always he was fed with good news—never bad; at first his orders alone were followed. Then authority slipped from him, for he developed no leadership, no inspiration, no quality of statesmanship, not the faintest glimmer of military capacity or understanding. He gave only one hour a day to the war! Vital military conferences were shortened or ended because lunch was ready; his headquarters, because of possible danger, remained 200 kilometers behind the front. And so, Ludwig writes, "one loses battles." As the end drew near everybody in his entourage talked to him of art, science, technical advances—anything to distract him. When finally the truth was revealed to Wilhelm he was utterly bankrupt, he could do nothing, advise nothing, say nothing—he could not even die with his troops. He would never surrender—"to the bitter end I shall fight." Go to Holland? Never, never. "Well"—a few hours later—"if I must, but not until tomorrow morning." The next morning his son to whom he had given his word not to flee could no longer find him in Germany. In the gray of the morning the Kaiser ended his utterly incapable career in the most incapable way. He lost his only chance to win the respect of mankind.

The Kaiser, it is said, proposes to answer Emil Ludwig. It would be characteristic of him, but still more characteristic if he decided not to, for this book is complete, overwhelming, crushing in its simplicity, its authoritativeness, and its directness. If it is not the final estimate of history, it is surely extraordinarily close to it. OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Scraps of Paper

Chiffons de Papier. Par Alcide Ebray. Paris: André Delpench. 20 francs.

"A TREATY," someone has said, "is an agreement between two or three Powers, destined to be violated." M. Alcide Ebray's book should convince any one who doubts the definition. He parades before the eyes of the reader an uninterrupted series of treaty violations from 1830, when the Treaty of Vienna suffered its first but not its last infringement, to the days when France defied the Treaty of Versailles by her illegal occupation of the Ruhr. All of the Powers seem to have concealed under the signature of their diplomatic agents mental reservations pregnant with new conflicts, and they seem to have rivaled each other in bringing their tribute to the altar of disloyalty and perjury. Among these are the six violations of the Treaty of Vienna (1815), one of the Treaty of Paris (1856), and four of the Treaty of Berlin (1878), to cite only the principal European treaties of the century.

The World War made new records in the art of violating treaties. The belligerents indulged in an orgy of destroying these scraps of paper, and the defenders of law, of justice, and of civilization distinguished themselves particularly. To the violation of Belgium's and Luxembourg's neutrality by Germany M. Ebray opposes the violations by the Allies of the neutrality of Greece, of the perpetual neutrality of Corfu, and of international law at sea, the illegal financial blockade, the British protectorate in Egypt, the violation of Persian neutrality by Russia, Turkey, and England, and of the neutrality of the Aland Isles by Russia—a criminal series. But the crowning act is worthy of the beginning, and the "greatest scrap of paper" was the Armistice agreement of November 5, 1918, establishing Mr. Wilson's Fourteen Points as the basis of the peace. This contract the victorious Entente flagrantly violated in the Treaty of Versailles, and the Government of France in occupying the Ruhr even violated that. The book concludes with an exposé of the question of Free Zones and of the Franco-Swiss disagreement which followed the French denunciation of her former pledges.

The author of "Chiffons de Papier" deserves a special place among the defenders of reconciliation through truth. He has only contempt for the hostility and anger which his book may arouse. His one reply is: "The only question is whether I tell the truth." BARON BAUDRAN

A New Look at Cervantes

El Pensamiento de Cervantes. Por Américo Castro. Madrid: Casa Editorial Hernando. 11 pesetas.

THERE has been no memorable book on Cervantes. Like Shakespeare and Goethe he has been the victim of many dull commentators, but no work of interpretation has yet been written about him, while already more than enough exists in the nature of philological studies. This book is not, strictly speaking, such a work of interpretation—it is only incidentally so. Scholarly in the very best sense of the word, ingenious and profound in his approach, Señor Américo Castro is concerned explicitly with an academic question. But the problems which he suggests and on which he touches tangentially are of very wide reach.

It has long been the fashion to think of Cervantes as an unlettered man—"un espíritu lego"—whose greatness consisted entirely in his profound knowledge of human nature and his wide experience of the world. With his patriarchal authority Menendez y Pelayo placed the final seal of orthodoxy on this uncritical estimate of the author of "Don Quixote"; and not only Fitzmaurice Kelly but also many authoritative critics, foreign and Spanish, have helped it to gain currency. It was never suspected by these critics that lack of education and a profound knowledge of the world involved at bottom a contradiction. They never realized that such knowledge as they were willing to grant Cervantes implied a preoccupation with the intellectual problems which baffled the humanists. The fault lay, of course, in their own shallowness, in their own lack of philosophic insight, since they ignored the fact that intellectual problems have, as we would say today, pragramtic consequences, that they are therefore capable not only of philosophic but of dramatic treatment as well. It amounted to saying, as in fact Menendez y Pelayo did actually say, that Cervantes had no intellect because he left no system of metaphysics behind him. Furthermore, it never occurred to these critics that a man is great not only in so far as his expression of his own age is adequate and embracing—which, of course, implies a grappling with intellectual problems—but also in so far as he is able to transcend his age; that is to say, in so far as he is able to sound, and to some extent disintegrate, the popular dogmas and the fundamental abstractions under which he lives—which once more presupposes a mind consciously occupied with philosophic problems.

It has been Señor Castro's task to apply these criteria to Cervantes and to show how little justified, how superficial, has been the criticism of Cervantes until this very day. Taking concepts such as that of justice or love or that untranslatable Spanish "honor," studying parallelisms between Cervantes and Erasmus and other of the humanists, making also a careful study of Cervantes's aesthetic ideas as found expressed in his works, Señor Castro undertakes to show—and successfully shows—that Cervantes was a man of the Renaissance as much as any of the great humanists. He shows Cervantes as a man of profound intellectual preoccupations—of which he was fully [illegible]ous—and as a man of far wider culture than his critics heretofore have been willing to admit. He shows, for example, that his religious ideas were far from orthodox, that it was only [illegible] which saved him from the jealous guardians of the current orthodoxy. He shows—and very strangely students of Cervantes had never seen any significance in this—that his attitude toward sex morality and toward justice goes distinctly counter to the popular ideas of his time. He shows, in short, that Cervantes considered and reacted very quickly to every influence of the Renaissance, and that this reaction is not implicit but explicit in his work, and discernible to a reflective [illegible] with an idiosyncrasy all its own. For Cervantes, an aristocrat of the mind, never wrote for the unlettered mob.

Unfortunately, the book is only incidentally an elucidation of the genius of Cervantes. Unfortunately, too, it is only incidentally a very suggestive approach to the study of the method of Cervantes—the way by which he managed to translate into dramatic terms problems which were, to him, consciously, intellectual ones. Yet it is so rich in implications, it studies Cervantes from so unique an angle, that no student of Cervantes or of Spanish culture can overlook it.

ELISEO VIVAS

The Simple Savage

Die Malerei der Eiszeit. Von Herbert Kühn. München: Delphin-Verlag.

ARTISTIC expression is determined by two factors: ego and environment. The former of these, which builds its own world, results in art that is abstract, symbolical. Environment, on the other hand, extols here and now; the man governed by it seeks no hidden meaning behind obvious things. With this as his thesis, Herbert Kühn sets out to interpret the painting and sculpture of the Old Stone Age. He first corrects the error—made more often by historians than by scientists—that stylized art is primitive. Granted, it is the art of many savages; but savages may possess an elaborate and ancient culture. The evidence shows that stylized art is a product of the ego, the result of ages of cultural evolution, a companion of deep mysticisms and complicated philosophies. It is the precise opposite of primitive.

True primitive art, therefore, is realistic: the art of a moment in nature. Thousands of specimens of it hang on the walls of galleries, acclaimed by critics. Since it belongs to our age [illegible] primal relationships; were we less egocentric we should place it where it belongs—as a relic of the troglodyte age. But it is not of the salon that Kühn writes. The paintings which he analyzes rest on the walls of great limestone caverns where in dark, subterranean galleries survive the records of the Cro-Magnon race, dwellers in Europe when man fought the cave bear and hyena for possession of southern France.

Herr Kühn has selected several of these ancient pictures for detailed review—three bison from Altamira, two reindeer and a wolf from Font-de-Gaume, and several other important pieces. He shows the skill with which the paleolithic artists distributed masses of color to show power of movement in standing bodies or massed them to center force. He calls attention to effective devices of contrast and shading; points out vigorous modeling and skilful brushwork. In short, he proves that Cro-Magnard man was a capable painter, of impressionistic leanings, who did work that many a modern might envy.

In his analysis of sculpture and the earlier types of Cro-Magnon drawing, however, Herr Kühn is less convincing. Like many critics he seems to judge a picture by its size, accuracy of outline, and perfection of blending. Applying similar standards to sculpture, he finds slight merit in that of the paleolithic, which is small, simple, and none too realistic in details. Herr Kühn lumps sculpture with early drawings, and dismisses both as relics of an early and unimportant stage in Cro-Magnard artistic evolution.

This is unfortunate, for it chances that the very pieces which Kühn rejects are the ones which most attract the progressive artist of 1926. Impressionism, which Kühn praises so loudly, is at best a somewhat sublimated realism, comparing with the art of Chagall and Matisse somewhat as Hough compares with Theodore Dreiser. Therefore, when Kühn shows us that the Cro-Magnards became impressionists he does not take our breath away; we wonder if he can say nothing better of them.

Clearly, then, primitive Cro-Magnard art has much in common with that of the radicals of today. To my mind this indicates a defect in Herr Kühn's theory—it indicates that things are less simple than he makes them, and that his separation of ego and environment is artificial as well as arbitrary. I cannot believe that a man with the intellect of the Cro-Magnard would be merely a "creature of the environment," no matter how simple his life. Moreover, we know that this life was not simple: that it was characterized by religion and ritualism, and by elaborate magic. With this the case, what becomes of Herr Kühn's thesis?

Of course he avoids the difficulty by denying to Cro-Magnard man any formalization of life. He dismisses with a sentence the evidence of magic, assumes lack of religion without argument, insists on extreme simplicity of social organization and habit. Yet he does not argue against the evidence, and the graves, models, and pictured dancers and magician remain unanswered. In short, Herr Kühn has been carried away by his thesis, which leads him to deny wholesale the work of anthropologists. Artists have a way of doing this, just as scientists have a way of pooh-poohing or ignoring the ideas of artists. Both are wrong; the evidence is at hand, and must be studied fairly by anyone who would interpret the psychological background of Cro-Magnard art. That Herr Kühn has not done so is unfortunate, for the errors he recklessly makes do much to destroy confidence in what otherwise would be a most welcome book.

CARROLL LANE FENTON

Heavens Above and Earth Beneath

The World of William Clissold. By H. G. Wells. George H. Doran Company. Two volumes. $5.

WITH unnumbered reams of paper before him and the world's most rapid pen in his hand, H. G. Wells has begun once more from the beginning, determined that this time at least nothing from the Cro-Magnon man to Henry Ford shall escape him and that of one book at least he shall be able to say: "'Tis all ye know on earth or need to know." Here, prehistory and prophecy both have their place along with religion, science, economics, and sociology, and nothing that has been said before need on that account be left unsaid. Mr. Wells has written—and the world has read—some thirty-two novels and romances, an outline of history, and a dozen volumes of sociological disquisition, to say nothing of various miscellaneous works, but it does not matter. Everything that he has ever said before—provided he still believes it—must be said again, and though in the process his interest never fails, that of his readers sometimes does. Not only is the character of our civilization reanatomized and the meaning of history re-canvassed, but we are treated to the life of one more hero—is it the tenth or perhaps the twelfth?—who began a career in pure science only to discover that the need for woman forced him into a more lucrative career. In short "The World of William Clissold" contains, let us say, two hundred pages of reasonably fresh material and six hundred that are merely réchauffé.

Moreover all of it, the fresh and the stale alike, is written in that clear, facile, but debased style characteristic of its author. If the essence of the journalistic style is, as I take it to be, the sacrifice of every other virtue—beauty, conciseness, and accuracy—to what is called "readability," then Wells is the perfect journalist. Never once does he let us pause. Better three pages that can be skimmed with the eye than one phrase so apt or so compact that it must be weighed for an instant. There are some clever things cleverly said, but they are all but lost in a flow of words and a flood of sentences, always competent, seldom distinguished. Patiently, painfully clear, mercilessly explicit, and yet jaunty with the jauntiness of the popular lecturer desperately afraid lest his audience shall walk out in the midst of his most earnest plea, the book constitutes in itself the most damning arraignment of that popular education with which its author is so much concerned; it illustrates in itself all that vulgarization implies.

The work is called "a novel from a new angle." The historico-scientific and the politico-sociological disquisitions which constitute the bulk of the volumes are presented, so the preface states, merely as the opinions of the hero and hence an essential part of his character if he is not to be represented, like most of the characters in English and American novels, "as cleaned of thought as a rabbit is of his bowels." Yet what is one to say of a "novel" which proceeds after the following fashion: "In the next two or three sections I propose to write a short history of human society as a labor-money complex evolved out of the primitive patriarchal society"; and which, moreover, makes good this threat? What except that it is, the good intention of the author notwithstanding, no novel at all and that it fails as such, not because its hero has opinions, but because these opinions are not fused in any way with the other elements of the story? They are not integrated structurally because the narrative is merely abandoned from time to time that they may be interjected, and they are not integrated in any less tangible fashion because the majority of them exercise no determining influence upon the hero's life. The course of his career, amorous and commercial, would have remained quite the same even though he had never heard of the Cro-Magnon civilization or the Old Man of the tribe, and his opinions upon these topics are quite as irrelevant to them as they are to the fact that an automobile accident in the mountains cut short his life. The book is, then, not "a novel from a new angle" but merely the device of a conciliatory pedagogue who says: "Now if you will listen attentively to what I have to say, I will tell a tale before we go to the next lesson."

Only a very famous man would be permitted to ramble at so unconscionable a length, and the privilege is one of doubtful value. Buried in the two volumes are half a dozen good magazine articles, like the bitter analysis of the element of suppressed envy in modern socialism which ends with the frankest statement Mr. Wells has ever made of his lost faith in the mass and his prophecy of an "aristocratic revolution," and a score or more shrewd observations like that of the hero who remarks: "I will not say coarsely that I learned that women are to be bought, but I saw quite clearly that they must be paid for." Yet buried they are for the very reason that Wells, because of his great fame, may wander and repeat as he will in the full assurance that no publisher will dare to suggest that he change one word. He is a privileged talker, and the best of such suffer more often than not from their privilege.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Last Napoleon

Die Rheinpolitik Kaiser Napoleons III von 1863 bis 1870 und der Ursprung des Krieges von 1870-1871. Von Hermann Oncken. Drei Bände. Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt.

THIS new work on the Rhine policy of Napoleon III is monumental. Such a wealth of documents, most of them new, has seldom been devoted to one limited subject; while the introduction in itself is a complete book, clear, readable, and convincing. The fact is here brought home that the Spanish candidature was a mere episode—a pretext on which Napoleon seized. Already Lord Clarendon had warned Metternich that Napoleon's set purpose was to assure the future of his dynasty by obtaining an increase of territory. He thought to gain his goal with the aid of Bismarck. As soon as the Danish war was over he laid down the alternatives: compensation for France or war. He worked to bring about the war of 1866 for the double purpose of rendering Germany impotent and acquiring for France the Left Bank of the Rhine. We have the confession of Minister Drouyn de Lys that Napoleon's policy was to conclude a neutrality treaty with both sides, the price of which should be the coveted provinces. His demands varied according to circumstances; at one time he would have been content with the boundaries of 1814, at another with an independent buffer state. He sought an alliance with Prussia that would have given him Belgium.

Napoleon's persistency and his ingenuity in finding new expedients during the period covered by Oncken were amazing—amazing, too, the cold calculating spirit in which he reckoned on gaining his ends through a general war. He so influenced Austria that on the eve of her struggle with Prussia she consented to his price—this time the Rhenish buffer state. He had helped to bring Austria and the South German States together; he felt sure that the combination would win. All the more bitter was his disappointment at the outcome of the struggle. Revenge for Sadowa became the war cry of the French nation. Napoleon still tried to lure concessions from Bismarck: cooperation in invading Belgium and consent to the cession of Luxemburg to France. Bismarck went very far. If Napoleon wished to annex Belgium he would not stand in his way; but taking an active part in the matter was out of the question. Checked in every direction, facing overthrow at the hands of the disappointed militarists at home, Napoleon saw in war the only hope of propping up a falling dynasty. The years 1868 and 1869 are full of the attempt to close offensive and defensive alliances with Austria and Italy. An agreement was reached by which the three sovereigns felt morally bound, and in all three countries military reorganization was carried on with feverish haste. Then fell the bomb of the Spanish candidature. We have the confession from the French side that the chief grievance was that the incident came too soon. France already had a lead of ten days in war preparations; a few days more and she would have been invincible.

Among Napoleon's severest critics in the Spanish matter were the Austrians. Metternich asked Grammont why he did not go to war with Spain rather than with Prussia—told him he was merely jumping at a pretext for starting a war; and Beust thought that "appearances indicate a little too clearly that France wants to pick a quarrel with the Prussians."

The documents are full of interesting revelations, and they give a wonderful insight into the frame of mind of Napoleon and Eugenie. Metternich, whose dispatches are given, was his confidant and, despite his criticisms, his well-wisher. A French victory would have changed the whole course of history. But Austria, it is clear, was hampered by various considerations and by a wholesome fear of Prussia. These volumes are of the first importance to students of the relations between France and Germany in the nineteenth century.

ERNEST F. HENDERSON

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. This year in addition a second prize of $50 and a third prize of $25 will be offered. The rules for 1926 are

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Wednesday, December 1, and not later than Friday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page.

3. No manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poems will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 9, 1927.

7. Besides the winning poems, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Books in Brief

Spanische Wanderungen. Ein Reisebericht von Hans Roselieb. Berlin: Deutsche Buch-Gemeinschaft.

This earnest disciple of Montesquieu sets out to trace the influence of Spain's geographical, geologic, and climatic character on the nature and history of her inhabitants.

Pedro Calderon de la Barca. Von Dr. Max Victor Depta. Leipzig: Verlag Quelle & Meyer.

In this simple study of the second greatest dramatist of the Spanish Siglo de Oro, Dr. Depta has been as rigidly systematic as a dictionary-maker. But his manual will probably be much more frequently consulted by students of Spanish literature than more brilliant and more readable volumes.

Shakespeare, Wesen und Werke. Von Julius Bab. Stuttgart: Union Deutsche Verlagsgesellschaft.

Most interesting here is the listing of Shakespeare's great depreciators, Voltaire, Tolstoi, Shaw, in an effort to differentiate them from the unqualified admirers, Goethe, Hebbel, Swinburne.

Romain Rolland und die Erneuerung der Gesinnung. Von Eugen Lerch. München: Max Hueber Verlag.

Reinforced with forty pages of bibliography and notes, this work is sound and useful in spite of a tendency to uniform eulogy which is a little unfair to "Jean Christophe" and to the new, incredibly delicate, and beautiful "Soul Enchanted" serial. The final chapter of appraisement, envisaging Romain Rolland as repeating or renewing a Rousseauistic return of spontaneity, ends too abruptly for clearness.

Grabbe. Der Roman Seines Lebens. Von Paul Friedrich. Berlin: Concordia Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt. Engel und Toeche.

Paul Friedrich has done a great service to the memory of the Westphalian Shakespeare. He has edited his works, he has collected and published a Grabbe memorial volume, and he has sponsored stage performances of four or five of the most playable dramas. This volume is probably an additional service, although, apparently quite unintentionally, it confirms rather than confutes the charges of surly boorishness, obstinacy, and ingratitude commonly brought against the wretched, half-mad author of "Napoleon," "Hannibal," and half a dozen other astonishingly powerful and astonishingly bad plays of violent passion and contemptuous pose.

Le Walter Scott Normand. Barbey D'Aurevilly. Par Henry Bordeaux. Paris: Plon. 9 francs.

A pleasant volume on the regional novelist who immortalized in literature the little Cotentin peninsula which juts out northwest from Normandy. If M. Bordeaux adds to this generation's interest in a neglected writer, of whom Remy de Gourmont said truthfully that if a certain book of his had been written by Balzac it would be acclaimed as Balzac's greatest book, he will have done a real service.

Reise in Polen. Von Alfred Döblin. Berlin: S. Fischer Verlag.

A popular German novelist travels into the four corners of Poland, spends some observant days or weeks in each one of its six or eight principal cities, and writes keenly and sympathetically of what he sees and hears. More interested in human beings than in states, governments, and politics, he tells us considerably more about Poles than he does about Poland. When a German can write like this about Poland, there must be hope for Europe.

Richard Dehmel. Die Geschichte eines Lebens-Werkes. Von Julius Bab. Leipzig: H. Haessel Verlag.

Dehmel has been dead five or six years, but this painstaking life by Julius Bab was undertaken at his instance, and is informed with life and reality through the author's personal acquaintance with him. A rash, tumultuous, generous nature and a slowly ripening but at last magnificent gift are here evaluated by one of the keenest contemporary critics.

International Books in Brief

International Relations as Viewed from Geneva. By William E. Rappard. Yale University Press. $2.50.

A sympathetic but fair record of the League's work in executing the peace treaties, in promoting international cooperation, and in attempting to outlaw war, written by a philosophical Swiss professor.

The League of Nations at Work. By Philip Noel Baker. London: Nisbet and Company. 3/6.

An amiable account of the work of the League so short that, as the preface declares, its failures and mistakes are omitted.

Syria. By Leonard Stein. Adelphi Press. $1.50.

A brief history of Syria since it fell into French hands after the armistice. The author, being British, restrains his condemnation of the Mandatory Power.

Survey of International Affairs, 1924. By Arnold J. Toynbee. Oxford University Press. $8.50.

This invaluable reference book is full of meat. On West European affairs, and in its generous chapters on security and movement of population, it is excellent; but it is absurd that its data on Russia should be so largely based on gossip from the London Times.

Geneva Opium Conference: Statements of the Chinese Delegation. By Sao-Ke Alfred Sze. Johns Hopkins Press. $1.25.

A footnote to a dirty history.

Addresses. By Sao-Ke Alfred Sze. Johns Hopkins Press. $1.25.

The Chinese Minister to the United States graciously indicts the Western Powers and proclaims China's right to break their leading-strings.

Das Französische Gelbbuch von 1914. Edited by Alfred von Wegerer. Berlin: Deutsche Verlag für Politik und Geschichte.

When will the French dare open their war archives to the historians? Already Poincaré, and Viviani, and Bourgeois and Pagès, the French yellow book on the Balkan crises, and the Russian publications have brought to light essential documents omitted from the official "Yellow Book" that helped deceive us all in 1914. Dr. von Wegerer has collated the new documents with the old in an impressive exhibit of official text-twisting.

Von Bismarck zum Weltkriege. Von Erich Brandenburg. Deutsche Verlagsgesellschaft für Politik und Geschichte. Zweite Auflage. $3.

This is the second edition of what is today the standard volume of pre-war German diplomacy. Brandenburg's work does not lend color to the charge recently advanced by Professor Vermeil of the University of Strasbourg, that "Die Grosse Politik" tended to clear the Germans of all responsibility for the pre-war hatreds, the armed camp of Europe, and the outbreak of the war. His volume is at times very bitter in its criticism of official stupidity and lack of vision; but his references are in most cases to the published documents. Brandenburg's is thus not merely an excellent first-hand account of the pre-war situation but also the best check anywhere to be found on the published German documents.

Drama

Spiders

WHAT Bacon said quaintly of philosophers may be said of writers as well. Some are ants, laboriously accumulating material which remains an inert mass; some are spiders, spinning endless threads of gossamer extracted from their own bowels; and some are bees, ranging widely over the fields of the world but digesting what they find into honey. Bacon intended no disrespect (at least to the bees) when he employed this entomological metaphor, and I intend none now; but Luigi Pirandello, introduced to America some years ago with his "Six Characters in Search of an Author" and responsible for the newly produced "Naked" (Princess Theater), is an unmistakable spider. Long before he dreamed of turning dramatic author he was trained in that paradise of arachnids, the University of Bohn, and there he entangled himself, once and for all, in metaphysical webs. "Lost in Plato's honey head," eternally preoccupied with the relations of being and seeming, of reality and fiction, he spins endless subtle threads which no delicate endeavor of the mind can disentangle, but which the toe of Dr. Johnson's boot—that famous boot with which he endeavored to demonstrate the reality of matter—would find very immaterial indeed.

"Naked" is one of that whole series of plays in which Pirandello has endeavored to dramatize the relation between characters as they are and as they are supposed to be. Specifically it deals with the unsuccessful efforts of an unfortunate girl to achieve some definite existence in the mind of

Viking Books

"It will be remembered as long as [illegible] remembered and read." —New York Times

POWER

by Lion Feuchtwanger

This great romance of a Jew who courted power is beginning to win the wide recognition here which it received in Germany. "A perfect literary achievement."—Springfield Union. $2.50.

THE TIME OF MAN

by Elizabeth Madox Roberts

A Book-of-the-Month Club selection. "A wonderful performance." —Sherwood Anderson. "A work of genius" —Edward Garnett. "A beautiful work of art."—Carl Van Doren. The most talked of novel of the day. 47th Thousand. $2.50.

The SECOND BOOK of NEGRO SPIRITUALS

CARL VAN VECHTEN in The Herald Tribune: "I predict that this new collection will be just as popular as the first, and deservedly so." With 61 songs and an introduction. $3.50.

"We unreservedly recommend it as the season's biography." —The World.

Mahammed by R. F. Dibble

The ideal biography of the season for readers of The Nation—the story of the prophet-politician. "This gorgeous story Mr. Dibble tells robustly and shrewdly."—CARL VAN DOREN, The Nation. 2nd printing. $3.00.

From GOETHE to HAUPTMANN

by Camillo Von Klenze

LUDWIG LEWISOHN in The Nation says of this study of comparative literatures: "His vision sweeps Europe and America. His results are calculated to deepen and vivify the proper study of literature among us." $2.50.

30 Irving Place THE VIKING PRESS New York

herself and others, efforts which, beginning close to reality in an attempt to enter the categories of wife and mother, end in an ecstasy of pathological lying which makes her a seven-days' wonder in the newspapers and all but crowns her hope with the attainment of real being as a character in a novel. Each of the important personages of the play is multiple—what he is, what he wants to be, and what each of the others thinks him—and the action consists in the process by which these separate elements are in a certain measure distinguished from one another. It begins when the novelist, intrigued by the woman whom the newspapers have led him to suppose the heroine to be, takes her under his wing; and it ends when she has been stripped naked of all seemings, left a creature with no existence except as a certain quantity of flesh and bones and hence no longer real at all in any world that counts. Fate has blocked every one of her efforts to achieve a significance in either her own mind or the mind of others, and she takes poison in order that at least she may become "a girl who committed suicide."

The thing which distinguishes Pirandello's plays, which forces them upon even an unwilling attention, is the unexpected, almost inexplicable passion with which his fancies are invested and which leads him to the invention of strangely intensified characters upon whom metaphysical conceptions work with all the destructive force of the most elemental emotions. Every reflective mind has toyed at times with speculations akin to his, but there are few for whom they are very real, few who live as though such subtilties were important; and only very rarely does a mind like Melville's or like Pirandello's become mastered by them. For him the web has become a thing not of gossamer but of steel. Bound hand and foot in spider's silk, he struggles desperately to wrench himself free; cries of very real anguish, torment, and despair burst from his lips; and though all about him may protest that nothing really restrains him, that he needs only the movement which ignores their existence and which daily living every moment involves in order to snap the invisible cords which bind him, it is just that brutal physical movement that he cannot make. Hence it is that however intangible the substance of his plays, their emotion is very real and they have in consequence the power to hypnotize for an hour the spectators who watch them and to make gossamer seem irrefragable. Yet it is only for an hour or two at most that the spell lasts. Though the two chief characters in the present production are excellently interpreted by Augustin Duncan and Marguerite Risser, one leaves the theater rubbing one's eyes and content to be once more in a world where, for the sake of convenience, we generally assume that things are more or less what they seem and where, by consequence, people do not usually commit suicide except for fairly tangible reasons.

Ferenc Molnar, I have always maintained, is a writer whose world is completely confined within the framework of the proscenium arch and whom it is impossible to discuss in any terms save those which belong exclusively to the theater. He is a skilful puppet-master whose sole concern is with manipulation, and in "The Play's the Thing" (Henry Miller's Theater), the latest of his pieces to be performed here, he appears as frankly that. The story concerns a pair of playwrights, it involves a play within a play, and it takes its point from the way in which the author continually directs the attention of the audience to the ingenuity of his own devices. P. G. Wodehouse made the adaptation, and a good deal of the wit of the lines appears to be his. As ably acted and directed by Holbrook Blinn it furnishes an extremely amusing evening. "Head or Tail" (Waldorf Theater) is an excruciatingly undistinguished comedy-drama from the Hungarian, dealing with a jealous husband and a wavering wife.

"John Gabriel Borkman" and "The Little Clay Cart" have been added to the current repertories of, respectively, the Civic Repertory Theater and the Neighborhood Playhouse.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

The Neighborhood Playhouse, 466 Grand Street, N. Y. Telephone Drydock 7516

Evenings (Except Monday), Matinee Saturday

The Hindu Classic

THE LITTLE CLAY CART

Longacre Theatre, 48th St., West of Broadway. Evenings 8:30 Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30

THEODORE DREISER'S

AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY

"A PLAY WHICH IS BOUND TO WRENCH A MILLION HEARTS." —Journal.

DRAMATIZED BY PATRICK KEARNEY.

YIDDISH ART THEATRE

12th St. and 2nd Ave.

Opening Tuesday Evening, November 16th with

MAURICE SCHWARTZ PRODUCTION

OF ABRAHAM GOLDFADDEN'S

"THE TENTH COMMANDMENT"

Evenings 8.30 Matinees Saturday and Sunday 2.30

A Theatre Guild Production

Bernard Shaw's Pygmalion

GUILD Theatre, West 52nd Street. Evenings 8:30 Matinees Thursday and Saturday 2:30

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE 105 W. 14th St. Tel. Watkins 7767

EVA Le GALLIENNE

Thursday, November 18, "Three Sisters."
Friday, November 19, "Saturday Night."
Saturday Matinee, November 20, "Saturday Night."
Saturday Evening, November 20, "Three Sisters."
Monday, November 22, "La Locandiera."
Tuesday, November 23, "Master Builder."
Wednesday Matinee, November 24, "La Locandiera."
Wednesday Evening, November 24, "Three Sisters."
Evenings & Saturday Matinee, 50c to $1.50. Wednesday Matinees, 35c-$1.

LECTURES

SPECIAL LECTURE

Adjustments in the Family and Beyond

Dr. S. Ferenczi of Vienna

AUSPICES

Child Study Association of America, Inc.

Empire Room, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel

Thursday Evening, December 2nd, 8:30

Admission to members $1.00, to non-members $1.50

ENTERTAINMENT

Get out your smocks and boots for the

NEW MASSES

Workers' and Peasants' Costume Ball

Friday, December 3, at 9 P. M.
Webster Hall, 119 East 11th Street
Tickets now $1.50 at the door $3.00
On sale at Jimmie Higgins', 127 University Place
Rand School, 7 East 15th Street
or by mail New Masses, 39 West 8th Street Tel. Stuyvesant 4445

PUBLISHERS!

We have just begun the second volume of

Two Worlds Monthly

You can easily find the new number—

It is displayed on 22,000 news stands from the Atlantic to the Pacific Coast.

With this new number we throw open our pages to your advertising.

TWO WORLDS MONTHLY has proven a powerful advertising medium for our own books.

Its net paid circulation of 40,000 copies monthly makes it

THE GREATEST BOOK MARKET IN AMERICA

Write For Our Rate Card

READERS!

Beginning with the December Number, which is on the stands

Two Worlds Monthly

introduces three new Features

1. A Foreign Literary Letter;
2. A Review of Current Plays;
3. A Review of Current Books.

It maintains its old standard of publishing every month, in addition to the regular installment of a dozen brilliant, realistic stories from the pens of the most unsparing of contemporary story tellers. Among the writers in the current issue are: Arthur Schnitzler, Frank Wedekind, D. H. Lawrence, Ivan Bunin, Hugh de Selincourt and Philip Guedalla.

Joyce's "Ulysses"

If you are a subscriber, why not thrill a friend with a subscription?

If you are still on the outside, you can begin your subscription with Number ... Just clip this coupon, send it along with Five Dollars, and the first 5 numbers will go out to you immediately. The other 7, completing the first year and the whole of ULYSSES, will follow as they appear.

TWO WORLDS PUBLISHING CO.,
500 5th Ave. (Suite 405-8), N. Y. C.

Gentlemen: For the enclosed Five Dollars send the first 12 numbers of Two Worlds Monthly to

Name .....

Address .....

.....

.....

Foreign Rule in Shanghai

By JAMES H. DOLSEN

Shanghai, September 30

SHANGHAI, the great commercial metropolis of the Far East, suppresses all free speech on the subject which matters most to the mass of its citizenry—their ability to make a decent living for themselves and their families.

Working conditions are notoriously bad, as the Shanghai Child Labor Commission Report of two years ago revealed. An exhaustive investigation made this year under the direction of the industrial department of the National Y.M.C.A. Committee of China shows that there has been little, if any improvement. The wages of the overwhelming majority of the 450,000 persons engaged in this city in industry and transportation are below $12 a month. As wages are paid in silver ("Mex"), this reduces itself to $6 a month in American currency. The average income monthly of an adult male is estimated by M. Thomas Tchou, who was in charge of the Y.M.C.A. inquiry, at between $10 and $15 ("Mex"). Including the earnings of the wife and children, the latter of whom may start in the mills as early as six years of age, Tchou concludes that the ordinary family income does not exceed $20 a month.

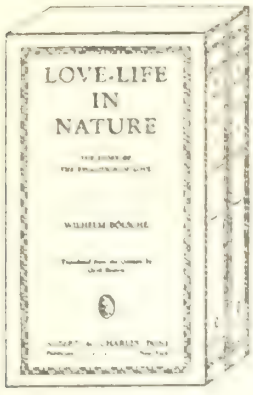
A study of estimates by Chinese and foreign authorities of budgets for typical Chinese families shows that a family consisting of the parents and two children—the reader will realize that the ordinary family consists of more children—reaches a total of from $21 to $23 a month. The following, which was used in a series of articles in the Shanghai Times, a conservative paper, reveals what a dreary existence is implied within such limits. In this case the family income exceeded the $20 a month income by a few dollars.

Food
[illegible]	$8.00
[illegible]	4.00
[illegible]	1.50	$13.50
Heat and lighting
[illegible]		1.50
[illegible]		2.00
Clothing		2.00
Tobacco and refreshments		1.00
Miscellaneous		1.00
Total		$21.00

Conditions last summer became worse because of the unprecedentedly high price of rice. As this is the staple food of the workers and in many cases practically their sole sustenance it is not remarkable that symptoms of discontent appeared among the masses. The normal price of rice ranges from $10 to $12 per picul (133 1/3 lbs.). In August it reached nearly $20 per picul. The rise of the general price level over last year's as shown by the official index numbers was then about 35 per cent.

Unrest in the factories became more pronounced. But the authorities of the International Settlement, advertised proudly as "the Model Settlement," within whose boundaries most of the mills are located declined to face the situation.

In the Shanghai Municipal Council Report for 1925, the secretary, E. S. B. Rowe, cites the following reply to a protest against police interference with a gathering to elect delegates to a national conference:



> The council has learned by experience that the introduction into the Settlement (city) of political questions, particularly where there are so many conflicting interests, is detrimental to its peace and order and to the best interests of its inhabitants as a whole, and it has therefore determined that so far as lies in its power it will preserve the Settlement from these incitements to disorder and trouble which unrestricted airing of political views inevitably provides.

A regulation of the Settlement Council requires a 48-hour notice in advance "of the intention to hold any meeting partaking of a political nature, so as to allow sufficient time for investigation and a decision as to whether such meeting may or may not be held."

The foreign council which rules Shanghai publishes a monthly Municipal Gazette, a large part of which is occupied with descriptions of how the Settlement police, composed of Chinese and Sikh patrolmen under British officers, help the local employers break strikes, as for instance: "Three of the mills affected [referring to the situation in July among the 19,563 cotton-mill workers then on strike] locked out the workers. This had the effect of reducing the latter to reasonableness in two instances. . . . " The reference is to the return of the workers in two of the Japanese mills when they could no longer hold out. One of the local English papers admitted the strikers had been starved into returning to work.

The acme of this anti-union attitude is contained in a memorandum which was sent to the mill-owners of this district by the Shanghai Municipal Police Department in July. It points out many of the ways in which the employers can help prevent strikes. The memorandum draws attention "to the employers' lack of precautions in not preventing agitators and other undesirable people entering their mills." It complains of the "failure of the employers to inform the police early enough when any dispute starts." The memorandum concludes that "a sterner front is necessary" in view of the capitulations made by the managements in recent strikes at Japanese mills. Such acts as refusing to charge rioters arrested or detained by the police, payment of wages to the workers for periods that they have been idle through their own fault, and granting interviews to agitators who profess to represent the workers are frowned upon as "a mistaken leniency." Under the latter classification are also included yielding to the agitators' demands and reengaging dismissed men.

It requires little foresight to see that under repression such as this, with the cost of living constantly rising and living conditions for the overwhelming mass of the working people insufferably bad, the whole state of affairs complicated by the growing resentment against foreign domination, a breaking-point must be reached where almost anything is possible. Ninety-seven per cent of the population of this tyrannized Settlement are Chinese. A few of the more thoughtful of the leaders of foreign opinion and the industrialists see the danger, but most do not, and the "diehards" dominate. They will surrender nothing except to a force greater than that which they can muster. Perhaps the Cantonese armies will awaken them at last.

THE MONUMENTAL MASTERPIECE

which sold over 150,000 copies in Germany

Some of the Subjects Treated:

Love and Religion; Love and Art; How Love begins in Art; The Meaning of the Chromosomes; How Old Is Man? The Love of the Ichthyosaurus; Relics of Primitive Love; The First Visible Evidence of Love on This Planet; The Nature of Emotion; The Law Against Inbreeding; The Love Romance of the Tapeworm; The Worm That Eats Its Mother After Birth; The Animal in Man; The Contrast Between Male and Female Love; Polygamy, Polyandry and Monogamy; Communal Marriage; Natural History of Prostitution; The Wonder of Creation.

LOVE-LIFE IN NATURE

by WILHELM BÖLSCHE

Two Volumes. Boxed, $10.00

Albert & Charles Boni — 66 Fifth Avenue, New York

Understanding Ourselves

THE FINE ART OF HAPPINESS

Understanding Ourselves

Dr. Dearden is a noted English psychologist, and his book comes to America with the praise of noted authorities and the gratitude of many thousands of English readers. It is a clear, frank, wise and intimately helpful book that offers veritable keys to happiness to those who find themselves their greatest problem.

BONI & LIVERIGHT
GOOD BOOKS

From the Contents

The Technique of Life Control
The Instincts
The Emotions
Running from a Weakness
Fear, Worry and Lack of Confidence
The Self, the Subconscious Mind, & Dreams
Insomnia
The Sex Instinct
Sexual Perversion
The Bachelor—Girl and Man
The Sexual Act
Impotence and Sterility
Marriage

Large 12 mo. Everywhere $3.00

The Fine Art of Happiness

The Art of Happiness, Dr. Dearden shows, is self-knowledge. Dr. Dearden teaches us how to understand oneself, how to account for one's strange actions, how to overcome fears and repressions, how to break through morbid states of mind, and by that mastery of the art of happiness, to win happiness.

Publishers
New York
GOOD BOOKS

WILLIAM MORROW & COMPANY

READ for yourself this living biography of the real Washington—judge whether it does not reveal a more human, lovable and greater personality than the plaster saint of the old histories.

George Washington

1732 — 1762

The Human Being and the Hero

by RUPERT HUGHES

"MR. HUGHES has taken the youthful Washington, a fading myth, and made him a red-blooded, lusty, gusty human being for the first time. A splendid, stirring story."—Claude G. Bowers in The Nation.

700 pages with many illustrations. Third printing. $5.00

Young Folk, Old Folk

by CONSTANCE TRAVERS SWEATMAN

"READS delightfully, somewhat like an older 'Seventeen'."—Los Angeles Record. $2.00

Wayfarer

by KATHLEEN MILLAY

"A STRONG, vivid, fascinating story, and full of dramatic power."—Boston Evening Transcript.

Second large printing. $2.00

303 Fifth Ave. New York

Japan's Alien Land Law

AN imperial ordinance providing detailed regulations for alien land-ownership in Japan took effect on November 10. A draft of this ordinance, settling a matter which had been in dispute for fifteen years, was summarized as follows in the Japan Chronicle (Kobe) for September 9:

1. Aliens or alien juridical persons belonging to the countries mentioned below cannot own land in the Japanese Empire: China, Persia, and Finland.

2. If aliens or alien juridical persons belonging to the countries mentioned below desire to own land in the empire, they must obtain the permission of the Minister of Justice and the Foreign Minister: Sweden, Norway, Poland, Holland, Haiti, Cuba, Brazil, Venezuela, and Chile.

3. Each State of the United States shall be regarded as a country, and in regard to the possession of land in Japan by aliens or juridical persons belonging to each State, the stipulation of Article 1 of the Alien Land Law shall be applied.

4. In regard to Japanese or alien juridical persons, a majority of whose members, shareholders, or executive officers, or more than one-half of whose capital or a majority of the votes of which belong to aliens or alien juridical persons as mentioned in Article 1 of the Alien Land Law, they shall be regarded as of the nationality of the countries whose nationals constitute more than two-thirds of these juridical persons, and as such Article 1 of the Alien Land Law shall be applied. For instance, if the number of the foreigners employed by juridical persons is in the proportion of 2 for Englishmen and 1 for Americans, this juridical person shall be regarded as a British concern, and shall be treated as such under the law.

5. Under Article 4 of the law, aliens or alien juridical persons are forbidden to own land in the districts mentioned below: (a) The strategical zones, (b) Sado Island, (c) Oki Island, (d) the Luchus, (e) the Idzu Islands, (f) the Bonins, (g) the Kuriles, and (h) the Korean border.

6. In case aliens or alien juridical persons have lost their land-ownership rights under the Alien Land Law, they must dispose of their land within a year, as otherwise their land shall be put to auction.

In commenting upon the law the Chronicle said:

The number of foreigners who will take advantage of the new law to own land in Japan will be very small—all the smaller because the one nation which has the greatest interest in owning land in Japan, the Chinese, is expressly excluded. The hesitation in granting land-owning rights to foreigners no doubt arose from the traditional fear of foreign domination. To allow a person of any other nationality to own a piece of the sacred soil of Japan seemed almost like sacrilege. On the other hand, there was the desire that Japanese subjects should be allowed to own land abroad and the desire to remove the reproach cast upon Japan, that while she claimed land-owning privileges abroad, she did not grant them to aliens in her own country.

China, it will be noticed, ranks with Persia and Finland among the countries outside the pale of land-ownership in Japan. It is a strange combination, but presumably the land laws of Persia and Finland also prohibit foreign ownership. To be quite fair the Japanese Government should have included in this list those States of America which also prohibit foreign ownership, since the regulations provide that each State of the United States shall, for the purposes of the law, be considered as a separate country. Article 1 of the Alien Land Law, it will be remembered, requires that persons belonging to countries which either prohibit the acquisition of rights regarding land by a Japanese subject or make their acquisition

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of graduate study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.

Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.

For further information, address the Director,

THE TRAINING SCHOOL
for
JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
210 West 91st Street, New York City

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

A LUNCHEON RESORT FOR THE DISCRIMINATING CLIENTELE—THOSE APPRECIATING UNEXCELLED CUISINE AND SERVICE.

EVENINGS—SPECIAL PARTIES ONLY. ANNIVERSARIES, BANQUETS, LADIES' NIGHTS, BEEFSTEAKS, SMOKERS, SUPPER AND DINNER DANCES.

OUR BANQUET DEPARTMENT SPECIALIZES IN SERVING
GROUP DINNERS UP TO 1000
AT $2.00 A COVER UP.

Ownership Management
by THEODORE KEMM

GRAMERCY 4900 to 4907

Sex Expression in Literature

by V. F. CALVERTON Author of THE NEWER SPIRIT

With an Introduction by HARRY ELMER BARNES

CONTENTS

1. Elizabethan England.
2. Sex in Puritan Esthetics.
3. Sex in Restoration Literature.
4. Social Change and the Sentimental Comedy.
5. Sex Expression in the English Novel.
6. Romanticism and Revolution.
7. Politics and Poetry.
8. The Viceless Victorians.
9. The Immoral Revolution.
10. Contemporary Sex Release in Literature.

THE next great battle between the forces of obscurantism and light will be over the attitude toward sex, writes Professor Barnes in his introduction.

It is likely that this book, clearly, and sanely written, describing the evolution of sexual attitudes and the growth of freedom of expression in our time will be one of the historic books of the conflict.

Large 12 mo., 367 pages, $2.50

BONI & LIVERIGHT NEW YORK

GOOD BOOKS

BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS

The fun of giving with none of the drudgery. Book gifts in imported decorative wrappings sent direct to your friends post free anywhere. Send for our illustrated Christmas catalog.

THE POST-BOX BOOK SERVICE Inc.
15 West 44th Street, New York

The Today and Tomorrow Series

"No one who is interested in today and who therefore has a stake in the things of tomorrow can afford to overlook these books."
—William Allen White.

Each volume $1.00 at any bookstore

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

"Belongs to all time"

FORTY IMMORTALS

by BENJAMIN DeCASSERES

The Story of the World's Great Civilizers

"'Forty Immortals' is one of the greatest books of criticism that I know. I have read nothing in criticism which is as condensed, as lyrical, as fulgurant, as intuitional. From the background of an imposing erudition there leap from each page lightning flashes which illuminate a complete literary landscape, a complete human soul, where they are seen for an instant as one could not see them in a year, perhaps in a lifetime of study. This book is not criticism; it is creation." — Maurice Maeterlinck.

Anatole France
Friedrich Nietzsche
Gabriele D'Annunzio
Percy B. Shelley
Walt Whitman
James B. Cabell
William Shakespeare
Gustave Flaubert
Thomas Hardy
Edgar Saltus

"Unhackneyed, brilliant." — H. L. Mencken.

"Invigorating, dazzling." — The Dial.

"You won't fall asleep over this volume." — Kenyon Review.

"In 'Forty Immortals' DeCasseres comes nearer to achieving the purpose of constructive criticism than anybody else we can recall to mind." — New York Times.

SEVEN ARTS
PUBLISHING COMPANY
160 Fifth Avenue, New York

YOUR LEISURE A PLEASURE YOUR PLEASURE A PROFIT

You can ensure yourself one evening's pleasant reading a week during the coming winter by devoting it to

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

You will like its freshness of viewpoint coupled with the accuracy of its facts.

It is a store-house of information on international politics, European trends of thought, current English literature, and cultural developments the world over.

The intellectually inclined in more than sixty countries depend on The Manchester Guardian Weekly to keep them furnished with reliable information on all important world happenings and on new trends of thought in various countries.

----------MAIL THIS COUPON----------

To The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
222 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a subscription for FIVE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed to me direct from Manchester, England.

Name .....

Address .....

conditional or restrictive, shall have the same or similar conditions or restrictions applied to them. Thus those States in the United States which prohibit land-ownership by aliens rank with China, Persia, and Finland in being excluded from land-ownership in Japan. Of course the difficulty here is that the United States courts are prone to make a difference between aliens who can acquire naturalization and those who cannot, a restriction which cannot be applied in Japan, where the naturalization law does not provide for any exceptions. In fact, the [illegible] the United States are concerned will be very difficult to apply. There is no system of registration in America [illegible] and the State to which any American belongs is thus difficult to determine, since he might be born in one State, and yet be domiciled in another. An American who happened to be born in a State which prohibited alien land-ownership but had passed his life in a State which had no such prohibitory legislation would consider himself [illegible] if he were told that he had no right to own land in Japan. Then there are the countries whose nationals are required to obtain the consent of the Minister of Justice and the Foreign Minister before they can own land in Japan. These include Sweden, Norway, Poland, Holland, and several South American countries. No explanation is given. . . .

The present law is better than the one which was passed some years ago, but never brought into operation, inasmuch as the Hokkaido is not excluded in its application. But nevertheless it is drawn up in a very niggling spirit, hardly in consonance with the high and lofty principles of racial equality which Japan ostensibly espouses. . . . Juridical persons formed by nationals who are not allowed by the regulations to own land in Japan will have to dispose of their property within a year, and the determination of the right of American juridical persons to hold property will probably give plenty of work to the lawyers. In the case of juridical persons formed of two or more nationalities there will be further complications. Thus the law, far from being an extension of privileges, is in some respects reactionary and will entail hardships. Japan's complaint against America is not that the States prohibited land-ownership but that once having granted it, they should withdraw the right without any consideration for the loss entailed by this change of policy. Japan herself, however, is following in the same path. After having granted foreign juridical persons the right to own land unreservedly, she now proceeds to put restrictions on such ownership. . . .

Contributors to This Issue

RAYMOND CLAPPER is the Washington correspondent for the [illegible].

LEWIS S. GANNETT, associate editor of The Nation, spent last winter in the Orient.

[illegible] THRAY is the author of "Primitive Hearths in the Pyrenees," to be published this winter.

B. W. HUEBSCH, the publisher, now associated with the Viking Press, is spending a year in Europe.

RENÉ LALOU is the author of "Contemporary Literature in France."

BARON BAUDRAN, a retired French army officer who now resides in Berlin, is deeply interested in bringing Germany and France together on the basis of perpetual peace.

ELISEO VIVAS, a frequent reviewer of Spanish books for The Nation, is now at the University of Wisconsin.

CARROLL LANE FENTON, paleontologist, is at the Walker Museum, University of Chicago.

ERNEST F. HENDERSON has made a study of war-origins, particularly in connection with Sir Edward Grey.

JAMES H. DOLSEN, now in China, is the author of "The Awakening of China."

True food is the foundation of Good health

Fresh Vegetables
Whole Wheat Products
Satisfying Diet for Diabetics
No animal fat used

Trufood VEGETARIAN RESTAURANT
153 W. 44th St., East of Broadway

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE
Program November 21-27
AT COOPER UNION
(8th St. and Astor Place)
At 8 o'clock ADMISSION FREE

Sunday, Nov. 21—Mr. G. F. Beck—"Democracy at the Cross Roads."
Tuesday, Nov. 23—Mr. S. H. Clark—"The Silver Box," by Galsworthy.
Friday, Nov. 26—Everett Dean Martin—"What Is the Matter With Modern Ideas? The Influence of Rousseau on Modern Ideas."

AT MANHATTAN TRADE SCHOOL
(Lexington Ave. and 22nd St., at 8 o'clock)
Single Admission, 25 cents
Reduction for Course Tickets

Monday, Nov. 22—Mr. Mark Van Doren—Literary Critics of Our Civilization—"Sinclair Lewis."
Wednesday, Nov. 24—Dr. Irwin Edman—Varieties of Metaphysical Experience. "Art and Reality."
Thursday, Nov. 25—No Meeting.
Saturday, Nov. 27—G. Kingsley Noble, Ph.D.—Evolution: Facts and Theories. "The life of the past."

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Porter. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.20 per Yard. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired

Want someone for a position
Want a position?
The responsive employer and the intelligent applicant for employment read The Nation. Write for rates. Dept. W, The Nation.

Accept nothing but
[illegible]
Midol for HEADACHE
GENERAL DRUG CO., 94 N. Moore Street, New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1926 No. 3204

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 547

EDITORIALS:

Laurels for Age; Checks for Youth 549

Long Service in Congress 550

General Wood Plays Mussolini 551

The Oath of Allegiance 551

EUROPEAN ARCHITECTURE. By Hendrik van Loon 552

THE MAKING OF A MILITANT. Anonymous 555

MONGOLIA: A NOMAD REPUBLIC. By Lewis S. Gannett 558

WHEN THE OIL GIVES OUT. By Jonathan Nelson Leonard 561

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 563

CORRESPONDENCE 564

BOOKS, ART, PLAYS:

Chant of the Old Men in the Woods. By Charles Norman 565

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 566

A Bishop Outside the Pale. By John Haynes Holmes 567

God and Mammon. By Stuart Chase 568

French War-Gold. By Ernest L. Henderson 569

A Friend of Labor. By H. S. Villard 570

Simpleton and Saint. By Mary Ross 571

Books in Brief 572

The Nation's Poetry Prize 573

Art: Brancusi. By Walter Pach 574

Drama: Nodding Homer. By Joseph Wood Krutch 576

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Mongolia's Constitution 579

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR
FREDA KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR
MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $6.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

TREASON HAS RAISED ITS HOARY HEAD in Washington, where it is openly muttered that President Coolidge's utterances on the question of tax legislation and tax reduction have "put the gang in bad" by his use of the word rebate. How can you defend an income-tax "rebate" when there happen to be seven corporations whose profits this year will be more than one billion dollars that would thereby receive a nice little gift of ten to fifteen millions of dollars which they do not need and had never expected or asked for; when out of $250,000,000 you propose to return $200,000,000 to corporations and individuals having an income of more than $50,000? Eighty per cent of the distribution would thus go to 1 per cent of the taxpayers. With these facts revealed it is not surprising that the President's choice of words has been criticized as very unfortunate. The Treasury is much more tactful in suggesting a "credit" on the first two income-tax payments of next year or a "six months' tax reduction." The big corporation pals of Coolidge and Mellon would get the swag just the same, but for heaven's sake, Why give it away by calling it a rebate? ask the embattled insiders in Washington. What is worse, the National Association of Manufacturers, representing twenty powerful business organizations, isn't satisfied with the rebate, but is supporting the Democratic leaders by demanding a revising downward of the entire tax schedule. The United States Chamber of Commerce, too, wishes no rebates, but a complete overhauling of the tax situation. Secretary Mellon, who has never failed to guess from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 out of the way in his annual forecasts of our national income, is still so uncertain about his outcome and outgo that he wishes the present rates continued.

SENATOR BORAH has a way of expressing American idealism reminiscent of the best days of Woodrow Wilson. His recent address on China before the National Council of Jewish Women was a stirring challenge:

> The nation [he said] which . . . invokes the brutal policy of force in China will be the deliberate assassin of justice in the Orient for decades and decades. It will dedicate that land to misery and bloodshed for years to come, and in the end it will settle nothing. Force never does. . . . China may furnish the acid test of whether the world has been converted to justice or whether it proposes to retain the barbarous creed of force.

What a stinging answer to the timid pessimism of Silas Strawn, American delegate to the Extraterritoriality Conference, who has been telling his audiences that since China is in civil war America must stand with the Western Powers and refuse to remedy the crying abuses of the unequal treaties. Mr. Strawn's policy of doing nothing now is a herald of the gunboat policy tomorrow. Our gunboats indeed already line the Yangtze, in silent defense of an unjustifiable status quo. Will not the State Department heed the warning?

DOLLAR DIPLOMACY at its worst is again uppermost in the conduct of our relations with Latin America. Our immediate recognition of Adolfo Diaz as President of Nicaragua, following his election by the Nicaraguan Congress, ended our long and quixotic course in refusing to acknowledge the regime of General Chamorro because it was based upon a coup d'etat. Such refusal was logical under our announced policy in Central America, but it went against the grain, because Chamorro was a Conservative and friendly toward the business interests of the United States. The outcome illustrates how impossible it is to carry out fairly a policy of refusing recognition to governments in Central America other than those which we regard as constitutionally elected. For it is a question whether Vice-President Sacasa, who did not resign but was forced to flee the country when Chamorro seized power, is not more constitutionally entitled to the presidency than Diaz. And who is Diaz? He is none other than the man who was made President of Nicaragua in 1911 by grace of our Department of State and the initiation of a policy which led to the occupation of the republic for thirteen years by our Marine Corps. Previous to his elevation to the presidency Diaz had been an employee of a United States mining corporation at Bluefields at $1,000 a year. He was not known to have other resources, yet he lent to the revolutionary movement behind him no less than $600,000.

AND WHAT DOES DIAZ, puppet and tool of the government and business interests of the United States, do as soon as he is recognized as President by Washington? He promptly asks for the return to Nicaragua of military forces from the United States in order to sustain him in office, indicating that his government, which we rushed to recognize, is no more established de facto than it is de jure. More mischievous still, Diaz complains that his adversaries are receiving assistance and inspiration from Mexico, thus opening the way for Secretary Kellogg to renew his quarrel with the Calles Government. That quarrel was dropped some months back simply because the sharp religious issue in Mexico made Washington feel that it was expedient to do so. To have continued to hound President Calles when under attack by the Roman Catholic church would have seemed to Protestants in this country too much like giving aid and comfort to the Pope. Now that the religious issue has subsided Mr. Kellogg leaps at the chance of resuming his attack on the ground that Mexico is trying to bolshevize the republics to the south. A great to-do has been started against an alleged "red drive" to capture Central America. Proof so far is lacking, but supposing the charge were true, who gave Uncle Sam any more right to interfere in Central America than Mexico has?

> WASHINGTON, Nov. 17.—Private advices received here indicate that, with the revolt of the Yaqui Indians still out of control, revolutionary movements of consequence are springing up in other parts of Mexico. General Gallegos surrendered unconditionally to President Calles the other day, but several other "generals" are reported in revolt. . . . Private dispatches received by banking circles in Washington today were to the effect that Chihuahua and Durango would be in revolt within thirty days.

VERY SIGNIFICANT, we call this dispatch from the New York World's Washington Bureau. "Banking circles in Washington" expect rebellions in Chihuahua and Durango within thirty days. When people know of revolutions ahead of time they are usually part of the plot. Who are these "banking circles in Washington" that are plotting against our neighbor Mexico? It seems to us the duty of the World, which has played an honorable part in the struggle for decency toward Mexico, to expose and denounce the sources of information of its Washington bureau.

OF THE VARIOUS PROPOSALS for saving the lives of Sacco and Vanzetti one of the best is the demand for a Congressional investigation. It is useless now to hope for anything from Judge Thayer. His latest decision proved that his mind was closed and prejudiced; his value as a judge is over. An appeal from Judge Thayer's ruling is now before the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, but that tribunal can pass only on the legal correctness of Judge Thayer's action; it cannot consider on their merits the reasons for a new trial. The suggestion of the Boston Herald that Governor Fuller appoint an extra-legal committee to study the case and make recommendations is excellent, as it would relieve him of the charge of acting under radical pressure, but Governor Fuller's only power in the circumstances is that of pardon—which ought to be a last recourse. Congress, of course, has no authority over the judicial machinery of Massachusetts, but in the interest of our federal administration as well as that of common fairness to two condemned men it ought to lay bare the sinister part taken by the Department of Justice, former agents of which have sworn that, in spite of a prevailing opinion in the Boston bureau that Sacco and Vanzetti had no connection with the Dedham murders, the bureau nevertheless assisted in, if it did not instigate, the prosecution as "one way of disposing of" two undesirable radicals. In the face of the legalized official conspiracy against Sacco and Vanzetti, it is pathetic to hear the president of the New York Bar Association protesting because the Harvard Law School has revived the statement made in 1905 by William Howard Taft that "the administration of the criminal law of the United States is a disgrace to civilization." It is more than that; it is a swindle and a perversion of justice.

THE SETTLEMENT between the International Ladies' Garment Workers and the "inside manufacturers" has brought near to an end the longest, costliest, and most violent strike in the history of the needle trades in New York. It was also, generally speaking, an unsuccessful strike. The union, having rejected the report of Governor Smith's commission even as a basis for negotiations, called out 30,000 men and women to fight for a set of demands on which in the end they were forced to compromise. The vice-president of the union, summarizing the terms of the settlement at a meeting of shop chairmen, said: "We had to accept reorganization. That was a defeat. On hours it was a compromise. We gained the right to organize examiners. We lost the designers. We lost on time guaranties." The union also won in the matter of wages, an increase of from $2 to $4 over the advanced rates suggested in the Governor's report. The "reorganization" referred to gives the employer a right to discharge up to 10 per cent of his force in a year. This is a serious blow to the union, which, for sixteen years, has been able to enforce a system of practically permanent tenure for its members. The forty-hour week was won for the future. During the next two years it will be fixed at forty-two, dropping to forty the third year. The strikers were also defeated on their demands for a guaranty of thirty-six weeks of work or pay during the year. The union is now faced with the difficult task of winning an agreement from the jobbers, who control the output of 70 per cent of the cloakmakers through innumerable small, fly-by-night manufacturers. Whatever its final effect may be, the struggle has been a valiant one. The workers who held out through twenty weeks against violence and judicial discrimination, and those who are still on strike, deserve continued support until the settlements are completed and the busy season opens.

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE STATE of New York honored itself two weeks ago in bestowing upon Miss Emily Howland the degree of Doctor of Letters. On the 20th of November Miss Howland celebrated her one-hundredth birthday. "A central New York school teacher," a dispatch declared her to be. She has been and is far more than that. Born a Quaker and true to that noble faith all her life, Miss Howland was one of the pioneers in teaching the Negro at a time when to do so one courted mob violence and, in Southern States, long terms of punishment. During the Civil War she took charge of one of the great camps for freed slaves and from that day to this has supported Negro education everywhere by her precept, her example, her large and generous financial gifts.

Side by side with this great service she fought for woman suffrage and temperance; her one great cause today is that of peace. At her great age she still manages two farms and a school and is a director in a bank. Best of all, her soul is as young and forward looking as ever. When the degree was conferred upon her on October 28, a similar honor was bestowed upon Dr. Frank Sheldon Fosdick, for fifty years a teacher in Buffalo schools and the father of Raymond and the Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick. By a happy choice the latter was asked to make the address upon this rare occasion. Among other things he said that:

> The end of all true education is to produce genuinely independent individuals capable of taking intelligent charge of their own lives. There can have been in history few times when an independent minority was more deeply needed than now—men and women who dare to think their own thoughts, stand on their own feet, take charge of their own lives. We need men and women who know that the economic order cannot remain as it is, that we must look forward to a more decent day when the profit motive sinks and the service motive rises into the ascendancy; men and women who see that a narrow nationalism will not do, that patriotism is not enough.

Dr. Fosdick must have had Emily Howland in mind as well as in sight.

Senator Henrik Shipstead of Minnesota, the lone Farmer-Labor member of the Senate, announced that he expected at an early date to hold a caucus with himself at which he would work out his program for the Seventieth Congress.—Press item.

FELLOW Progressives, Henriks all,
Let's do a little talking.
This is the time, in dreary fall,
When parties all are caucing.

And to our caucus I'll expound
Each Farmer-Labor tenet,
For I'm the leader well-renowned
Of my party in the Senate.

We'll fight the Court, the League, and all
Such frenzied superstitions.
We'll fight against our honest Cal
For uncoerced commissions.

We'll cringe to neither Dry nor Wet,
Nor patriot debater;
We'll recognize the Soviet,
Be nice to the Equator.

And Cal will ask us in to tea
And Mellon, out to dinner;
And we shall smirk with joy to see
Republicans grow thinner.

And Democrats will falsely smile
Or honestly look dour,
Because we still maintain, the while,
The balance of the power.

Fellow Progressives, let us all
Unite and act as one,
We'll answer to our country's call
And have a lot of fun.

I thank you for your patience, friends,
I love you as my life.
And now our party caucus ends
With no internal strife.

Laurels for Age; Checks for Youth

WHEN Anatole France received the Nobel prize for literature in 1921 he is said to have remarked, "I need neither the money nor the fame." Kipling might have said the same with almost equal truth, and now Bernard Shaw, who has just been chosen for it, responds in a similar strain: "My readers and my audiences provide me with more than sufficient money for my needs; and as to my renown, it is greater than is good for my spiritual health. Under these circumstances the money is a life-belt thrown to a swimmer who has already reached the shore in safety. I therefore respectfully and gratefully beg the Swedish Royal Academy to confer on me the additional and final honor of classing my works in that respect hors de concours."

These incidents are sufficient to raise once more the whole question of literary prizes, their purpose, and their usefulness. In the past the Nobel committee has been criticized for giving the prize to such people as Tagore, Heidenstam, and Benavente, while more distinguished writers were passed over, but there can, of course, be no such criticism here. Few will deny that the three men named above all "deserved" the prize. Many, in addition, will rejoice that it could be given to Shaw—to one whose opinions have been so divergent as were Shaw's, to one who, as late as 1914, courageously forfeited the measure of tolerance which he had won from the great public and began the struggle anew. And yet the sum involved, between thirty and forty thousand dollars, is too large to be wasted, and it is a pity that it should go, even occasionally, to those who have no possible need of it, when there are so many struggling writers to whom it might well make the difference between a life wasted in a continual battle with poverty and one devoted to the full development of a talent. There is, indeed, an initial confusion involved in the plan of the prize, since it fails to make any distinction between the occasions where homage and those where financial aid is appropriate. Honor belongs to those who have earned it; money to those who need it most. To age, secure in achievement, should go the laurel crown; to youth the check.

Shaw has agreed to accept the money temporarily, as otherwise there seemed to be no legal way of disposing of the cash. But he does not intend to retain it. He suggests that it be used to encourage "intercourse and understanding in literature and art between Sweden and the British Isles" and has proposed a fund to bring important Swedish books to England. It is true also that this is a fine gesture; but it was the intention of Alfred Nobel to encourage specific writers, and when Shaw gets the prize none is encouraged. Could not some arrangement be made by which the prize could be divided, the honor and the money going separately to those who deserve them most? Failing that, could not some American be found to offer a similar prize, not to the most distinguished but to the most promising writer, to the one whose work gave the best evidence that he could profit from the leisure which the prize would bring? For some reason, as yet unexplained, a man is the hardest "cause" to raise money for. We have now endowed "chairs" in plenty; why not also endowed men?

Long Service in Congress

THE death of Speaker Cannon brings to the front once more the special usefulness of the Congressman of long service. He may, like Mr. Cannon, be a reactionary and a whole-souled believer in government by, for, and with business, yet, if he is chosen from a safe Republican or Democratic district, he may become of special value merely by reason of his long residence in Washington. Speaker Cannon took his duties as a committee member very seriously; when it came to dealing with appropriations he was a veritable watch-dog of the Treasury. He, like Governor Smith in New York, had the business of the government at his fingers' ends, and his shrewd understanding of human nature helped him to gauge not only the necessity of the appropriations asked for but the reliability of the officials who came to ask for money. He once remarked, after such a session, that if the appropriations some bureaus had just asked for were to be granted the whole of the government's income would be used up. But he went on to say how much he liked the zeal of the petitioners, and how right it was that each one should think his work the most important undertaken by the government.

But if long service in Washington produces great familiarity with the workings of the political and governmental machine, our congressional system is none the less faulty and unfair. A good man from a closely contested district is likely to lose his seat at any time before he has acquired a valuable technique, or after he has made himself an authority. A Representative from a Southern State, or one from the heart of Republican Illinois, is certain to rise to a position of great committee influence, be he ever so lazy or lacking in ability, if his health is good. It is seniority which counts. On the other hand, it is almost impossible for a new man no matter how brilliant to make his mark at once. His speeches will not be reported unless they are sensational, and he counts for nothing in the committees until he has served several terms. In this respect, as in many others, the British Parliament is superior to our Congress. At Westminster a young man in his early twenties may make his mark at his first session and so focus attention upon himself as to compel his inclusion in the next cabinet. The younger Pitt did this at twenty-one and one-half years and Fox at nineteen; and in modern times Winston Churchill, who ranks now as probably the ablest debater in St. Stephen's, entered Parliament at twenty-six, made a name at once, and was in the ministry six years later. Long experience counts heavily there as well as in our Capitol. But for a new Congressman a career such as Churchill's is an impossibility. If his seat is safe he must none the less sit for years at the foot of committees and watch his elders and seniors decide party policies, and award, subject now to the budget, the various appropriations to the several departments of the government.

This is obviously in large measure due to our committee system. But it is also in considerable part due to that vicious unwritten law which requires that a Congressman shall be a resident of the district he is to represent. In England, as everybody knows, if a valuable member is defeated in one district a safe seat is found for him elsewhere. Here sectional feeling would, of course, prevent a Southerner's holding a Massachusetts seat in Congress, and vice versa. There ought, however, to be freedom of candidacy within a State such as New York. That would, for instance, give a Democrat who refused to bow the knee to Tammany Hall in New York City an opportunity to contest for a seat in some rural district, or some smaller city. As matters stand, if a man wishes a long congressional career, he must either become the henchman of a boss, as has Nicholas Longworth in Ohio, or, like Mr. Cannon, dwell in a State which is so overwhelmingly one-sided as to insure his return every two years. Plainly, the present situation limits severely the number of men among whom the wheel-horses of Congress must be found; it insures in most cases their being loyal and dull party henchmen.

The value of men of experience who have industry and a taste for details is enormous. New York has never had a Governor who so spent himself on the State's business as has "Al" Smith, and his extraordinary knowledge of every department of the State government has contributed greatly to his success. Similarly, in Washington Senator Wadsworth's coming departure from the Senate is an administrative loss—however one may feel about his politics and point of view—because he has mastered the technique of his job after holding it for twelve years, and because personal tastes have made him an authority in several fields. It is rare, indeed, that a new Senator or Congressman takes his seat with such an extraordinary equipment for it as has the present Senator La Follette, whose years of close association with his father gave him a training that enabled him to perform valuable service from the day that he was sworn in. He is the exception. It takes the average new Representative or Senator years to become valuable even if he has ability. He must learn the ropes on the administrative side even though he may be able to shine soon through his oratorical ability.

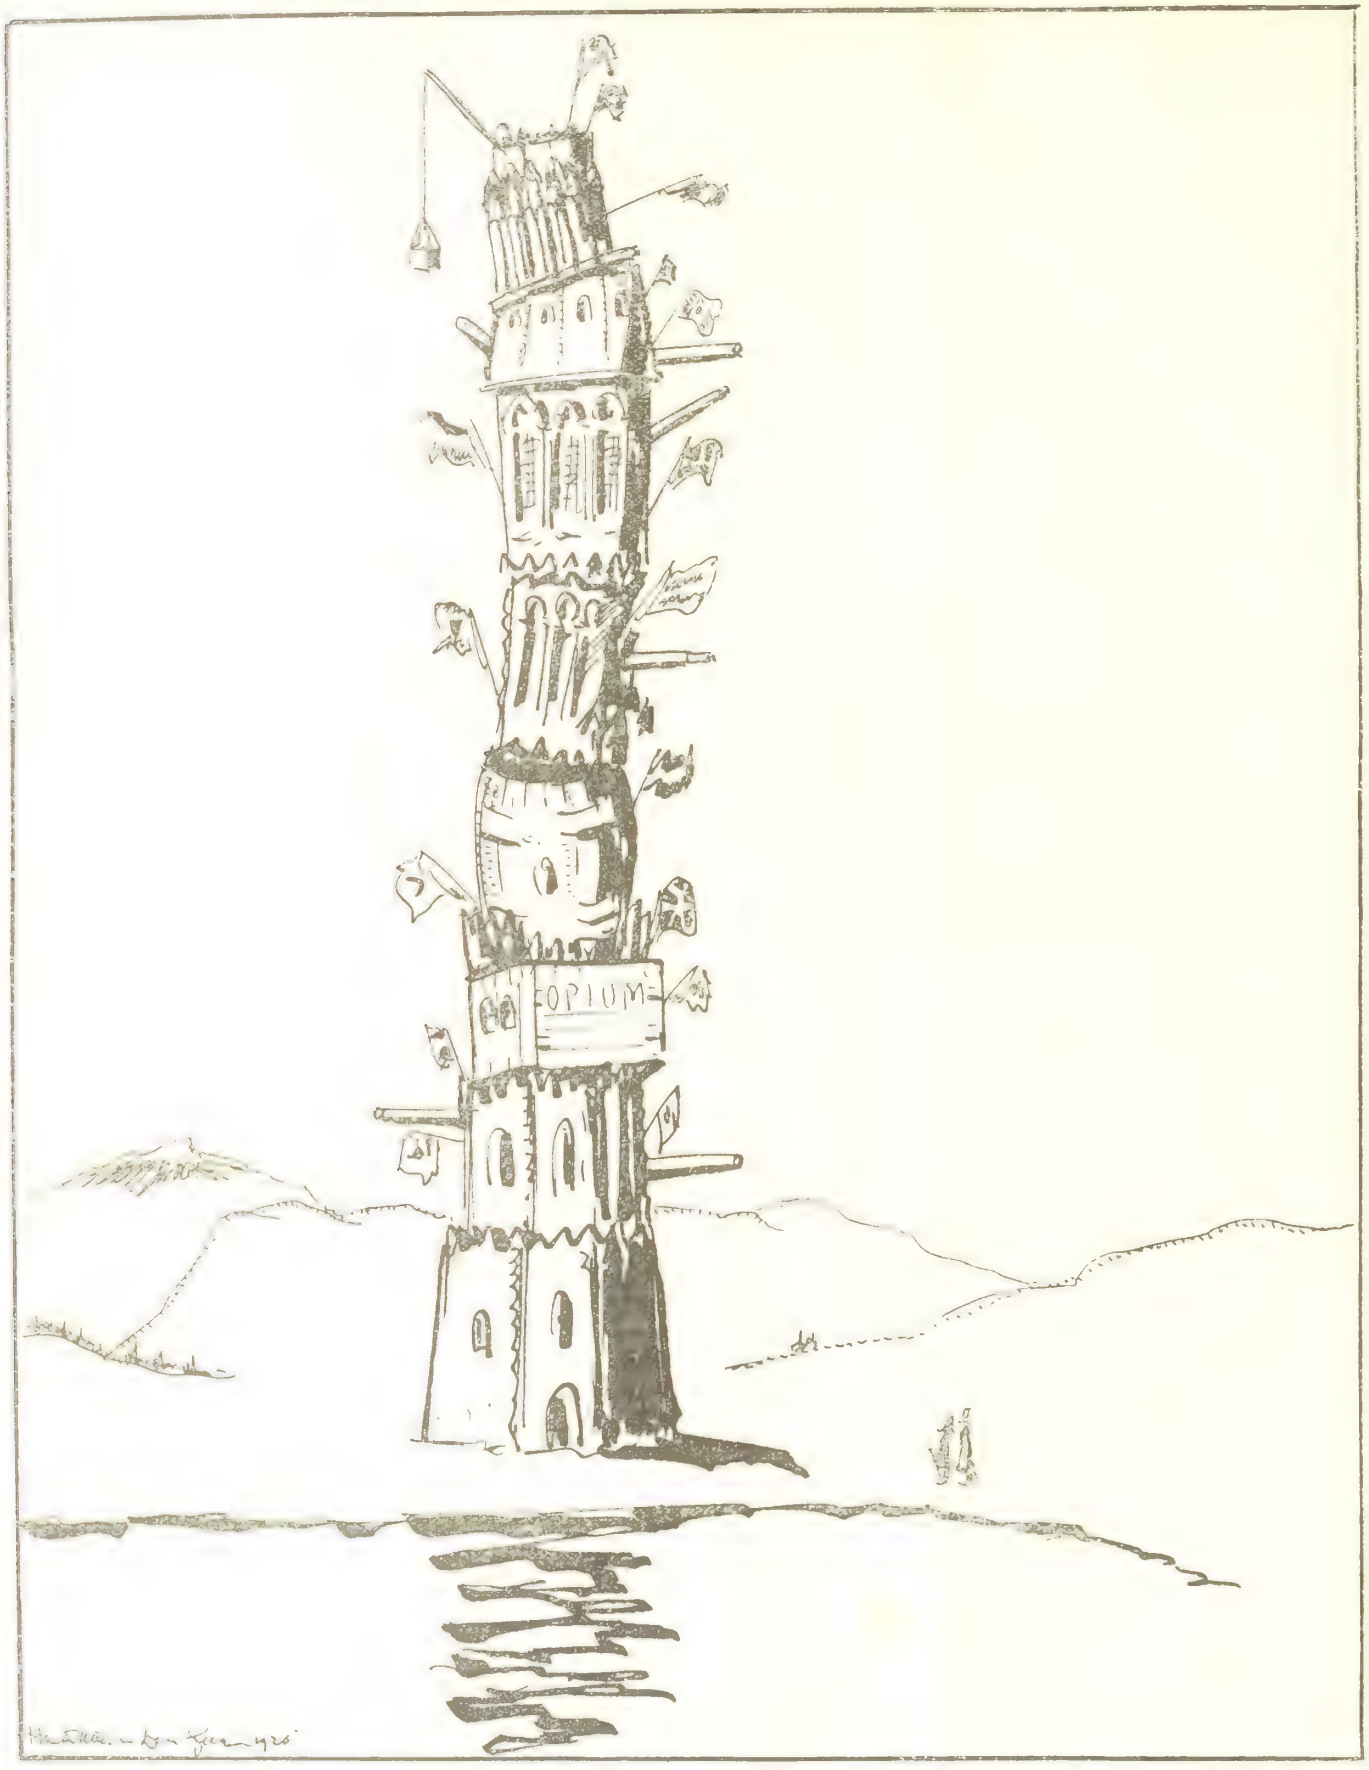
It is, therefore, obvious that, if our Congress were entirely elected in close districts with much electoral mortality every second year, it would be a weaker and less useful body than at present. There would be few veterans with facts at their fingers' tips and with years and years of experience to enable them to direct the machinery of government over which the legislature exercises far closer supervision than is generally understood or appreciated. Of course, the veterans can abuse their power, and often do. Their very knowledge of the details may enable them to starve a bureau or sidetrack righteous projects, or to maneuver themselves into strategic positions in which they can take advantage of their knowledge to pull the wool over the eyes of those with less experience. In regarding Mr. Cannon's long career it must not be forgotten that he used his experience and parliamentary skill to throttle the House of Representatives, with the result that there ensued the fight against his rules—a really vital, stimulating, and worth-while fight at the time, even though in retrospect it seems less important. Parliamentary experience is thus easily subject to abuse; but its value in Washington is such that when men like Wadsworth are driven from office their contributions to the administrative side should not be overlooked in estimating their total value to the government and the people.

General Wood Plays Mussolini

LEONARD WOOD, by executive decree, has abolished the Insular Board of Control. As Governor General of the Philippines he has fought the board for six years; now suddenly, aided by the Attorney General's office in Washington, he has invented the power to abolish it. When Burton Harrison was Governor the Filipinos, eager to develop the islands with native capital, invested government funds in the Philippine National Bank, in sugar centrals, in development of coal mines, and in a cement plant. When General Wood toured the Philippines in 1920 he immediately deplored these sad examples of "state socialism." He took no note of the fact that Japan had built up her industries with government support, nor of government patronage of industrial development in various British colonies. But he met a snag in the Board of Control, which had power over these government industries. As Governor he became ex officio one of the three members of this board, but in his desire to "get the government out of business" he was in a minority of one. To the Filipino mind the alternative was subjection to American capital, always more interested in overseas profits than in development of the islands for the islanders. For six years Governor Wood, enthusiastically supported by the American business interests and ardently opposed by a solid Filipino phalanx, has sought to take these enterprises away from the Philippine Government. Every decent method failed. So finally he has resorted to the good old technique of the Czar.

Opponents of Philippine independence talk much of the "separation of powers." President Coolidge, lecturing the last Independence Mission, seemed to make the "stable government" referred to in the Jones Act synonymous with separation of the functions of the legislative and the executive. It is doubtless true that in the Harrison period the Filipinos, acting through their Legislature, assumed a greater control of their government than Congress had contemplated. For our part, we honor them for so doing; we would despise any people which did not attempt constantly to encroach upon the powers of a dominant alien race. But surely if separation of powers means anything, it works two ways. By no possible interpretation of the law has Governor Wood, executive, the right to substitute himself for the courts and by executive decree declare legislative enactments unconstitutional; or suddenly to assume control of organizations created by the Legislature which have been functioning under its supervision for years. The courts are notoriously slow, but despite many sad disillusionments we still have faith enough to hope that the Filipinos will have recourse to them. Governor Wood's usurpation of power smashes the boundaries between legislative, executive, and judiciary as no act of the Filipinos has ever done. It is not administration.

For two decades we have been instilling into the Filipinos a respect for democracy and self-government. However blood-stained the origin of our rule, it compares favorably on the whole with that in neighboring colonies. There are, to be sure, some who argue that the Dutch, slower to develop schools and parliamentary institutions, have been wiser. The Javans, for instance, have clamored less for independence than have the Filipinos, but the recent bloody uprisings of the Javans might well serve as an object-lesson to these preachers of dictatorship.



The Oath of Allegiance

STRANGE decisions are made in connection with naturalization. The United States has a body of law on the subject, and an imposing array of regulations has been issued under it by the Bureau of Naturalization of the Department of Labor, which for some years has been trying to establish a uniform administrative practice for all applicants. But in this country, contrary to prevailing foreign practice, the making of a citizen is not an administrative act. The Bureau of Naturalization conducts the preliminaries and makes recommendations for or against citizenship; the final decision rests with the courts. They have no uniform system of practice except as understandings may be reached by judges in individual districts. The whim of a single judge is sufficient to establish the practice in any one court at any one time.

Take the case of Miss Mary King, an Irish Quaker, secretary of the Young Women's Christian Association of Portland, Oregon. When she appeared before the late Charles E. Wolverton, judge of the United States District Court, citizenship was denied to her because she refused to take the oath of allegiance to "support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign or domestic." She said that as a Quaker she would do everything in her power except bear arms, but, despite her argument that Quaker citizens are exempt from military service, her application was denied. In the course of two years the applications of a dozen other persons with conscientious scruples against bearing arms were denied by the same judge.

Judge Wolverton evidently insisted that the phrase "defend the Constitution" meant to do so with arms. There would seem to be no warrant for this interpretation in the words themselves, and the Passport Division of the Department of State does not construe them as having this meaning. As the applicant for a passport is required to take an oath of allegiance containing the same phrase, Roger N. Baldwin, director of the American Civil Liberties Union, recently wrote to inquire what interpretation was put on the words by the Department of State. "I am a pacifist who served a term in prison during the World War for my refusal to obey the Selective Service Act," he stated. "I am wholly opposed to bearing arms for any purpose or to aiding warfare." Mr. Baldwin received a reply from J. K. Anddle, chief of the Passport Division, which seems to us to express a reasonable and intelligent attitude:

> You are informed in reply that the department does not construe the oath or affirmation of allegiance prescribed by the passport regulations as necessarily involving physical defense of the Constitution and consequently does not perceive any good reason why non-resistants should decline to accept it, especially as it is administered to women and to children old enough to understand its nature. However, if you have conscientious scruples against taking the oath as it stands, the department will consider the matter of issuing a passport to you if you will file formal application for such a document supported by an oath or affirmation of allegiance to the Constitution in the following form:
>
> "Further, I do solemnly affirm that I will support the Constitution of the United States and will, so far as my conscience will allow, defend it against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; and that I take this obligation freely without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion. So help me God."

European Architecture

THE BUILDERS OF GENEVA: "Our plans were all right, but there seems to be something the matter with our little tower."

These Modern Women

The Making of a Militant

ANONYMOUS

We print herewith the first of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of women active in professional and public life. Our object is to discover the origin of their modern point of view toward men, marriage, children, and jobs. Do spirited ancestors explain their rebellion? Or is it due to thwarted ambition or distaste for domestic drudgery? The next article is by a woman who, though willing to fit into the conventional picture, found herself unable to do so.

I COME from the oldest American stock. I can say that with absolute truth and without implication of snobbery because one of my ancestors, on my father's side, was an Indian girl. On my father's side we are English and Scotch back to 1636, when his first ancestor in this country came from England. On my mother's side, we are, with the exception of an Irish great-grandmother, of unmixed English blood, straight back through a signer of the Declaration of Independence to an ancestor on the Mayflower. It is, I believe, my father's blood—a long line of farmers—which has most influenced my thinking and is responsible for a kind of militant idealism which marks many of my family. It is, I believe, my mother's blood—a long line of mill-workers and mill-owners—which has most influenced me aesthetically. That strain has given me an intense love of beauty; a feeling, more poignant perhaps, when beauty is expressed in color rather than form.

There are two stories, hang-overs from the Revolutionary period in my father's family history, which always glow in my imagination. One is the story of a woman and the other of a man. The woman was the wife of my direct ancestor of that period. On the morning of April 19, 1775, her husband was plowing. Suddenly a man on a sweating horse stopped on the road in front of the house and yelled to him: "To arms! To arms! The regulars are coming!" My ancestor dropped his plow, rushed into the house, put on his coat, seized his musket, and ran down to the road. Once there, it occurred to him that he had not said goodby to his wife. He turned to wave to her—she had already taken his place at the plow.

The other story concerns the same battle. Deacon Josiah, one of my collateral ancestors, followed the British for miles along the line of fighting. That night he did not return. The next day he was found dead behind a stone wall. He had shot his last bullet, for there was not one left in his pouch. He was eighty years old.

Those stories made a profound impression on me. Sometimes I have wondered if they were not the real reason why for years I—naturally the most timid of created beings—was always in one civic fight at least; often in two; sometimes in more.

My early life was passed in Boston. I received the education typical of the upper middle-class in Massachusetts a generation ago. I went to four public schools—primary, grammar, high school, and normal school. I went to Radcliffe College. We were poor; genteelly poor; not poor enough to live in the slums and to know the thrill of haphazard picturesque slum existence, but poor enough to float along at a dead level of a lamb-stew existence. Yet the family life was informed with that idea of plain living and high thinking which was the New England ideal fifty years ago. As I look back on my life, it seems to be bound by the Boston Transcript, the Boston Public Library, the Boston Symphony, and the Atlantic Monthly.

I am one of seventeen children—the progeny of two wives and one father. The lives of all those children, except three who died in infancy, would make novels. I can here give but a carved cherry-stone idea of my own.

My father was born in 1815. He remembered with perfect clearness sitting as a boy in the chimney corner, listening to the tales of the Revolution told by men who had fought in it, and to discussions of witchcraft by people who still believed in witches. Clearly, too, he remembered when at eight his father took him to Charlestown to see the laying of the corner-stone of the Bunker Hill monument. Lafayette spoke on this occasion, and Daniel Webster. My father was a handsome person, the black-haired, olive-skinned, gray-eyed type, with a figure like a blade of Damascus steel, romantic, chivalrous, gallant, gay—dashing was the word they used to describe him. When he was a half-grown lad, he used to walk a distance—roughly of fifteen miles—into Boston to purchase the Waverley novels as fast as they appeared; trudged the fifteen miles back. As a youth, he went on the stage. It was his boast that he played every minor Shakespearean part, and that he had danced with Fanny Ellsler. He and a half-dozen other young men formed themselves into a black-face company and went to England; the first to visit Albion's shores. This was in 1844. They used to tramp from town to town giving their show and then moving on. My father made pilgrimages to the homes of Shakespeare and Byron, and to all the places he could identify that Scott had mentioned in his Waverley novels. He had a picturesque career; as prison reformer—he was, so far as I know, the first prison reformer in this country—politician, lecturer, author, and traveler. As he grew older, that fire of his youth toned down to an extraordinary quiet. Always an agnostic, he became a confirmed pessimist, but a gentle and humorous one; he seemed to develop an extraordinary wisdom.

My mother was twenty-four years younger than my father, beautiful in a delicately robust way; temperamentally capricious; illogical; vain with that charming vanity of the mid-Victorian epoch. All these youngnesses were illumined by a natural instinct for beauty; and they were held together by a dominant quality, seemingly alien to the combination—common sense.

She was one of a large family of girls. Her mother died when she was ten. Her father immediately married again —the makeshift matrimony of a man left alone with an unsolvable problem. My mother brought herself up. Early she went to work in the mills which were owned by her uncles, and in which their relatives were both foremen and workers. It was the Lucy Larcom period in American industry; all my mother's fellow-workers were women of American birth. And there was no sense of social inferiority in working in a mill. One day, perhaps, some American novelist will reconstruct that interesting epoch. I remember her telling us that the year she was eighteen she hired a horse on the Fourth of July, and in a habit which she had made for herself rode from Lowell to Boston—to see the doings on Boston Common. When she was seventeen my mother heard my father make a speech. She came home, waked up all her sisters, and kept them laughing half the night in spirited girlish imitations of him. The next year she met him. A few months later they were married. He placed her immediately at the head of a large household, where life moved in a highly romantic manner. In winter she used daily to skate. This frivolity in a married woman appalled the close, conservative community in which she lived. She used to ride horseback almost up to the time her babies were born. And this appalled them even further. Subsequently my father lost his fortune, tiny for this day, but ample for those—and the bad times came. It was at their nadir that I was born; and my youth saw no amelioration of them.

Yet ours was a big family and an extremely gay one.

Two aunts were familiars of our household. One, my father's younger sister, was a remarkable person. She had been a school-teacher. At the age of fifty-odd she was offered the place of a man principal who had just resigned from the school in which she taught. However, when she discovered that she was expected to do all his work but would not receive anything like his salary, she refused the job. She entered a theological seminary, was graduated at the head of the class, the only woman in it—one of the first American women clergymen. She had a parish in each of two towns, north of Boston. She preached in one church Sunday morning and the other Sunday night. When she was over seventy she retired; returned to her native town. A year later a delegation of farmers waited on her and asked her to come back, naming any salary within reason.

The second household familiar, also my father's sister, was a strong spiritualist. For four summers in my teens I went with her to a spiritualist camp-meeting in Massachusetts. Every morning and afternoon there were lectures in what they called the "auditorium." There was absolutely nothing for a young person to do in the camp-meeting; and so, out of sheer ennui, I attended all those lectures. Looking back, it seems to me, I heard discussed there every possible system of ethics, every possible theory of humanitarianism. I was a passive creature. These drifts of thought seemed to float over my mind without touching it. I was conscious then of no impression. I realize now that they had a profound effect.

However, I was accustomed to hear all kinds of discussions between my father and my two aunts. My mother, who bore no direct part in the discussion, was always flashing into their abstractions the strong flare of her common sense, the sparkle of her mother-wit. From an early age I became used to ideas. I was at home with them. I don't remember ever having to think things out when new ideas were presented to me. I knew instantly whether I accepted them as truth or not. With an exception; one of the strongest convictions of my thinking life, feminism, was a gradual growth. Indeed, I don't remember hearing the word feminism until I got to college.

In regard, however, to that tiny practical aspect of feminism—the franchise for women—I became very early an instant and ardent disciple. The question was first put to me by an extremely able woman teacher in the grammar school. Immediately my mind accepted as truth the idea that women should become in the fullest sense—citizens. I remember taking my new-found theory to my clergyman aunt, thinking I was going to open up a new vista to her. "I have believed in woman's rights all my life," she commented tranquilly. "And so has your father." From that time on, with increasing closeness, I was to be connected with the suffrage fight—that long-drawn-out, all-absorbing, irritating, boring battle for an obviously just and tiny bit of human liberty. I became very impatient with the slowness of a struggle waged on such scrupulously polite lines, and when the first militant in England threw the first brick my heart flew with it. Thereafter I was a firm believer in militant tactics. Toward the end of the movement I was identified with the militant wing of the suffrage fight.

But although this struggle seemed to occupy the surface of my mind, I was faintly conscious of a vague but deeper unrest underneath. Away back in the early stirrings of my young-girl thinking I became definitely conscious of a growing impatience with the woman's lot. From the moment I was able to think for myself—and I suppose I could number on the fingers of one hand the women I have met in a lifetime who have not agreed with me—I regretted bitterly that I had not been born a man. Like all young things I yearned for romance and adventure. It was not, however, a girl's kind of romance and adventure that I wanted, but a man's. I wanted to run away to sea, to take tramping trips across the country, to go on voyages of discovery and exploration, to try my hand at a dozen different trades and occupations. I wanted to be a sailor, a soldier. I wanted to go to prize-fights; to frequent bar-rooms; even barber-shops and smoking-rooms seemed to offer a brisk, salty taste of life. I could not have been more than fourteen when I realized that the monotony and the soullessness of the lives of the women I knew absolutely appalled me.

This was, understand, life in the middle class. These were, understand, women without private means or without the capacity for earning money for themselves.

I saw that most of them enjoyed one brief period of budding and another of flowering; the romance periods of young love and early marriage. After that—my heart sank as I contemplated the picture. All about me I saw lovely young things marrying, producing an annual baby, taking care of too many children in the intervals of running their houses. It seemed to me that early they degenerated into one of two types: the fretful, thin, frail, ugly scold or the good-natured, fat, slatternly slut.

As I look back on those years, the mid-day Sunday dinner seemed in some curious way to symbolize everything that I hated and dreaded about the life of the middle-class woman. That plethoric meal—the huge roast, the blood pouring out of it as the man of the house carved; the many vegetables, all steaming; the heavy pudding. And when the meal was finished—the table a shambles that positively made me shudder—the smooth replete retreat of the men to their cushioned chairs, their Sunday papers, their vacuous nap, while the women removed all vestiges of the horror. Sunday-noon dinners! They set a scar upon my soul. I still shudder when I think of them.

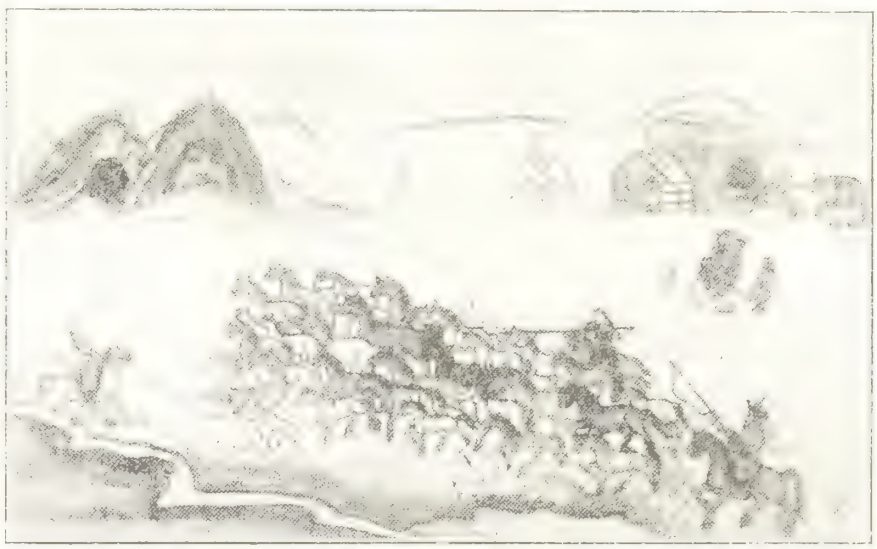
A profound horror of the woman's life filled me. Nothing terrified me so much as the thought of marriage and child-bearing. Marriages seemed to me, at least so far as women were concerned, the cruelest of traps. Yet most women married and all seemed to want to marry. Those who remained single often changed into something more repellent than those charmless drudges. I made all kinds of resolutions against matrimony. All the time, though, I was helplessly asking myself, how was I going to fight it—when I so loved companionship?

One way, I decided, was not to let myself get caught in any of those pretty meshes which threaten young womanhood. I made a vow that I would never sew, embroider, crochet, knit—especially would I never learn to cook. I made a vow that if those things had to be done, I would earn the money to pay for them. I married, but I kept my vow. I have always paid for them. Even in a young marriage, when income was very limited, I went without clothes to keep a maid. And although I happen to be extremely domestic in that I must have a home and much prefer to stay in it, I have always managed that the work of that home should be done by someone else, and that my clothes should be made outside it.

Through all this spiritual turmoil there had been developing within me a desire to write. And during all these years, I was making a tentative experiment with the august business of reflecting the life about me. Ultimately my first short story was accepted; more short stories; a book; more books. Except for three or four years, my mature life has been economically independent. I hope to be economically independent the rest of my days. When I look back on my fifty-odd years of life on this planet, I wonder what was the real inception of my desire to stand alone—fighting ancestry; liberal influences; discussion-ridden youth? Perhaps it was those Sunday dinners!



Mongolia—A Nomad Republic

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

[This is the second of three articles describing the author's trip across Mongolia from the Chinese to the Trans-Siberian Railway. The last article, Toward the Pacific Ocean, will appear in next week's issue.]

UDDE and Tuerin, on the way across the Gobi Desert, have been marked on world-maps for centuries, but they are mere clusters of yurts. Urga is the greatest city of Mongolia—a land vaster than the entire United States east of the Mississippi—and Urga has a population of perhaps forty thousand. It begins as a sort of Russian frontier town, with wooden houses strung loosely along a wide road; closes into a Mongol city, with yurts, tents, and more permanent structures hidden behind the tall log stockades that line the streets; twists, for a space, into a huddled Chinese town, and then climbs the hill, Mongol again, to the Lama City around the high temple where the mummy of the Living Buddha sits erect incased in gold when he died just two years ago. Over the occasional shops are vast signs—in stringy Mongol and chunky Tibetan characters, in the Greek letters of the Russian alphabet, and occasionally in the lovely forms of Chinese ideographs.

Urga's customs-house is a vast compound open to the sky. Snow was falling, and I attempted to carry my bags into the one covered shed. Three large Mongols rapidly removed me and my bags, to the vast amusement of the camel-drivers and idlers who seemed to spend their days placidly smoking and watching the encircling mountains. I was at a disadvantage because I could find no one who understood a word of any language that I knew. I could indicate by signs that the wet snow was not good for my clothes, but they were unimpressed. Slowly, with vast interest, they shook out my garments, one by one. They held up long woolen underdrawers for the amazed inspection of the considerable crowd that had gathered. They stopped to play with Chinese toys that I was bringing home to my small son. They tried on a necklace intended for my sister. Finally they came upon some letters, and these they stuck in their belts. Some of these were to Feng Yu-hsiang, the Christian general, who was then in Urga, and their seizure broke my patience. Loudly protesting in pigeon English as unintelligible to them as their Mongol was to me, I removed the letters from their belts and put them in my pocket. Their voices rose; the crowd increased. Finally I had an inspiration. With some of the letters I was done. So, ostentatiously, I divided the packet, presenting them with the larger share and keeping those I still needed; this they regarded as equitable, and we beamed agreement at each other. At that point I remembered my radiolite wrist-watch, and when I showed them that fascinating toy, peace was sealed. They did not even open my second bag.

From a water-color sketch by a fifteen-year-old schoolboy in Urga.

The Russian chauffeur reappeared and assured me that I could get my passport back tomorrow. I had already learned enough Russian to understand the word for tomorrow; and margash—tomorrow—was the first word of Mongolian that I came to understand. I doubted, but there was nothing to do but let it go, after an exhausting cross-examination in sign-language as to my age, marital condition, and number of offspring. The Mongols are having a fascinating time learning to be modern, beginning with passports and permits.

The Russian consulate was the next stop. The Consul was perturbed. He did not like Americans, but I had a friendly letter from Karakhan, the Russian Ambassador in Peking. And what was he to do with a man who spoke no Eastern language? Nikiforoff himself, I later learned, spoke Chinese, Mongol, Persian, Turkish, and several Cossack dialects, but he knew no French, German, or English. Fortunately he had a German secretary, and one of his assistants spoke some French. We finally agreed that I would seek out the Marshalls and hope for shelter there.

A page from a Mongolian schoolbook illustrating the fable of the mouse and the elephant—an Eastern version of the familiar story of the lion and the mouse.

Marshall is the last outpost of the West in Mongolia. Russian influence, aided by Chinese civil war, had made it almost impossible for British and Americans and other Westerners to do business via China. The trade now moves north, via Russia. But the International Export Company still maintains its compound, and exports a few skins; and Marshall and his wife and his assistant live in Urga as Englishmen do in their trade empire on which the sun never sets. The Marshalls even had a bathtub—the only bathtub in all Mongolia. They had a phonograph, too, and our car, apparently, brought mail for them from Tientsin, and a new record: "I want to be happy." I shall never be able to think of Urga without hearing the whining beat of that record. Every night, after supper, the sounds rang out with a kind of sinister precision. No one else in Urga spoke English; two of the Marshalls' three children had never learned the native tongue of their parents; Jimmy, the eldest, when I showed him a picture of my son, said: "I wish you had pulled Michael out of your pocket instead of his picture. I'd like to play with a little boy who talks my language." The long, cold winter tells on lonely Anglo-Saxons isolated there on the roof of Asia; and, it had not helped matters when, a few days before my arrival, Mrs. Marshall, entering the kitchen in the morning, had stumbled against the body of her lovesick Russian cook, hanging to a stove-pipe. They all wanted to be happy.

The Marshalls were hospitality itself, but politically their position in Urga was weak, and they did not know me. The Russian Consul was even more suspicious; and the task of seeing people in a strange city where hardly a soul spoke any Western tongue but Russian was complicated. Eventually I discovered a few possible aides. There was Domba Dordji, the president of the People's Party of Mongolia, who had learned a little English in Moscow; Dalai Badmadjopoff, son of the Minister of Justice, who had been to an American school in Tokio; Zaparin, the Russian trade representative, who spoke all the languages in the world and would have been more useful if he had not been presiding over a series of trade conferences which met three times a day; and Vsevsiatsky, a passionate Russian prison reformer, whose wife spoke German.

It is lonely in Urga. Mrs. Vsevsiatsky, for instance, was a high-spirited Russian girl who had almost finished her medical training in Petrograd when the war came near in 1920. She served as a doctor at the front; the bloody experience spoiled her for medicine, and she turned first to philology and then to natural science. She came to Urga as an expert attached to the staff of the explorer Kozloff; quarreled with him, fell in love with and married Vsevsiatsky, who had left his boys' penal colony in a Moscow suburb to help the Mongols work out their first written code of laws. And now she was tied down in Urga by her small daughter, named Gobi after the desert; and another child was on the way. Her career was gone. Would she die a provincial official's wife there at the end of the earth, she wondered? Vsevsiatsky's job was the compilation of codes, but his passion was prison reform. A genial, red-bearded, blue-eyed Russian, he had persuaded the Mongols to abolish corporal punishment from the statute-books, but wherever he traveled he found it still in vogue. He showed me photographs of the mogelun, the coffin-like box in which the Mongols used to incase their prisoners, with its single hole through which the prisoner received food and air and, occasionally, removed excrement. He had a little penal museum of rods and whips taken from provincial prison officials. He lamented the universal laments. "The old officials are hopeless," he said, "they do not even want to understand the new system, and the young men do not know enough and will not work."

Again and again in that week in Mongolia I found myself comparing Russian advisers with the Christian missionaries in China, trying to teach a people things it did not want to learn. The Mongols were enthusiastic about the Russian-conducted veterinary station, but they had no interest in agricultural experts. (They dread tillage, inclosure of the land, as a sure forerunner of loss of independence.) They welcomed Buriat Russian school-teachers, but the Russian doctor in charge of the Urga hospital complained that they had cut off his appropriation for training nurses, insisting that any Mongol soldier could nurse well enough without training.

School is a difficult problem in Mongolia. Under the old aristocratic regime* no one but the priests learned to read, and few of them. I brought back with me a copy of the first schoolbook ever printed in Mongolia, just off the new printing press, imported from Germany. A census of the ruling People's Party, which includes the progressive, thinking younger generation, had just revealed that even in that advanced group only 1,894 of 5,100 could really read; only 24 knew any language other than Mongolian. Many of the teachers are perforce Buriat Mongols from the other side of the Russian frontier. Pictures of Lenin and Marx were interspersed with drawings of Roy Andrews's fossil baluchitherium and of polar bears, with human skeletons and German butterflies on the walls of the two-story log-cabin schoolhouse which is the educational pride of Mongolia. This, the oldest school in Mongolia, has a history of five years; of its eighty pupils twenty were studying English, fifteen Russian, fifteen Chinese, and the rest were still struggling to master the wriggling letters of their native tongue.

Domba Dordji, struggling to exhaustion, in a manner that I understood only too well, to express himself in an unfamiliar tongue, told me of his party's fight to train a democratic younger generation able to replace the hereditary princes and feudal priest lords whose medieval domination still threatened the young [illegible] republic. He proudly showed me their first publications, introduced me to members of the cabinet—three former aristocrats, a teacher, a clerk, an ex-priest, and two who three years ago were tending flocks on the plains—and outlined the simple system of taxation. Poor people, which means people who own less than ten sheep, pay no taxes. Those who own between ten and a hundred sheep pay one sheep in taxes; those who own more than a hundred but less than a thousand pay ten; and so on. For purposes of taxation a goat is reckoned as the equivalent of a sheep; ten sheep make an ox or a cow; and two oxen a camel.

Old Tseren Dordji, the adventuresome Prime Minister who had managed to hold office under the Manchu emperors, under the Czarist Government of pre-war days, and under the free, so-called "Red" Government of today, proudly outlined for me the history of his people. They had twice conquered China, he said, and had never been conquered by them. Under the Manchus, he insisted, they had been allies; in recent years the Chinese had broken all agreements, and that was done forever. When I asked about the Russians he scowled, pursed his thick lips, raised his eyebrows, and then smiled a smile that broke into a laugh. "You foreigners think that the Russians are everything in Mongolia," he finally said. "It's not so. We Mongols have been left behind by civilization, and we need help. So we have invited Russians to aid us in building a national bank and an army, in organizing cooperative societies and a customs service. We like their experts; we trust them; but they will not always be here."

* Under the Manchus Mongolia was governed from Peking through its feudal chieftains. The Mongols refused to recognize the Chinese Republic in 1911 and declared their independence, which China, in a treaty which Russia also signed, recognized in 1915. This independence, however, amounted to acceptance of Russia's protection. After the Russian revolution China reasserted its control, but the Chinese troops were driven out in 1920. The White Russian regime which followed was overthrown in 1921, with the aid of Soviet Russian troops, and the present people's republic, opposed to rule of princes and priests, was established. Its constitution, adopted in 1925, is printed in the International Relations Section of this issue of The Nation.

When the Oil Gives Out

By JONATHAN NORTON LEONARD

THE life-blood of this country is oil. Every traveled highway demonstrates the fact as well as a mountain of statistics. Gasoline has become so much a part of our daily lives that we take this gift of nature as a matter of course. Although we are told over and over again that the supply is sure to fail sooner or later, such prophecies make little impression. Some weeks ago the Federal Oil Conservation Board reported that the total amount of petroleum in known fields in the United States would last at the present rate of production and consumption for only six years. This received the usual amount of newspaper comment and was forgotten. By this time we are nearly immune to such scares, and we probably shall refuse to wake up until the price of gasoline has risen out of reach and our twenty million carbureters are crying in vain for nourishment.

There are now four and a half billion barrels of oil left in the known fields. At the present rate of consumption this would last for six years. But since the total amount cannot be extracted in that time, the supply will begin to fail much sooner. The flow from a field is always greatest at first, for it depends on gas pressure. When this decreases the oil comes to the surface more reluctantly. If the supply is to be maintained after three or four years we must discover new fields. This has always been done in the past and certain optimistic persons get satisfaction from the fact that only 40 per cent of this country is geologically sure not to contain oil. But a large part of the remainder has already been prospected, and the proportion of dry wells is rising alarmingly. This dependence on new domestic fields is a gamble at best.

The Conservation Board does not attempt to estimate foreign fields. To the present time these fields have proved of much less importance than our own. The more accessible ones in Russia, Rumania, and Mexico are approaching exhaustion already. If we go further from civilization we run into difficulties of transportation and politics which may prove limiting factors. No matter how we look at it the day of the oil substitute is not far ahead.

At present there are three possible substitutes for gasoline—shale-oil, methanol or wood alcohol, and ordinary alcohol. Each has its interested advocates, and each figures largely in technical discussions. If the public is not alive to the situation the oil and chemical companies are. Any attempt to find the real facts about the commercial possibilities of these substances brings to light an amazing amount of contradictory opinion. Nine articles out of ten are written with some sort of bias. The oil interests, of course, want no change to be made; the States possessing large deposits of oil-shale publish volumes about its economic value; and each holder of patents wants to see his process in commercial use. New discoveries are being made in this field almost daily, for the vast importance of the matter has attracted research workers. There is a rumor, with few details to substantiate it, that the Germans have perfected a process which will supply all their future needs for fuel and lubricants. We do not know yet which substitute has the best chance of coming into general use, but the characteristics and advantages of the three mentioned above are better understood.

Shale-oil can hardly be called a petroleum substitute, for it is practically the same substance obtained by a different process. Little is known about the origin of oil and oil-shale, but probably petroleum is formed when shale is subjected to heat and pressure at great depths. Oil occurs in rocks and "sands" not at all resembling shale, but this is accounted for by the ease with which it "migrates" from one stratum to another more porous or under less pressure. Petroleum is a thick liquid when it gets to the surface, but in its original state it contains many volumes of dissolved gas, which make it more mobile than water or gasoline. This compressed gas is the force which drives the oil from the rock. Now, when the shale occurs near the surface it has not been treated by this process of natural pressure-distillation, and contains no oil but a complex organic substance from which oil is formed. This can be broken up by heat into something very like natural petroleum.

There is plenty of shale in this country to supply all our needs for years to come. The best fields are in the central Rocky Mountain regions, although large deposits also exist in Kentucky and other States. If a method should be developed of utilizing this reserve our oil worries would be over for another fifty or a hundred years. Unfortunately numerous obstacles appear in the way of this development. The process of getting oil from shale is by no means as cheap or as simple as drilling wells for it. Both the mining and the distillation are expensive, and the amount of oil recovered is not large—seldom as much as a barrel per ton. The by-products of the distillation, ammonia and water-gas, are not obtained in sufficient quantities to bear much of the expense.

Every discussion of shale-oil begins with the statement that shale is successfully mined and distilled in Scotland. This is misleading. The industry was established there before our petroleum came on the market, and it used a very rich kind of shale containing as much as three barrels of oil per ton. When this was exhausted the industry struggled along feebly, protected from competition only by a government subsidy. Even with this artificial assistance it has remained too small to supply the limited requirements of Scotland. We may, however, draw some interesting conclusions from the experience of the Scotch shale distillers.

A certain amount of the Western shale lies so near the surface that it can be mined by the economical open-cut method, which reduces mining expenses to a low level. Optimistic reports on the subject always assume that this condition is general. The fact is that these open deposits would be exhausted in a short time, and the shale would have to be mined from below the surface like coal or any other mineral. Since crude oil sells around two dollars a barrel and a ton of average shale contains seldom more than two-thirds of a barrel, the cost of mining a ton would have to be kept below a dollar. Even this would leave a dangerously small margin for the cost of distillation.

If the price of crude oil rises high enough to make the process pay, the amount of capital and labor required to run a full-sized shale-oil industry is tremendous. Calculating from the Scotch figures and allowing for superior American labor, we find that 5,000 miners and 210 million dollars are needed to run a plant producing 50,000 barrels daily. The United States uses 1,200,000 barrels a day. This means that it will take 120,000 miners and $5,000,000,000 to supply us with shale-oil. Taking into consideration the difficulties of transportation, thinly settled mining country, and the possibility that some new fuel may wipe out this tremendous investment overnight we begin to see why even those companies which own areas of favorable shale-land hesitate to go into the business.

The next substitute, wood alcohol or methanol, is in an entirely different class from oil. The old process of distilling it from wood made it an expensive substance, but recently a process has been developed by which it is made directly from coal. Steam is blown through heated coke and changed into a mixture of carbon monoxide and hydrogen. This in turn is forced at high pressure through a heated chamber containing certain catalysts which change it into methanol. The cost of production is hard to estimate, for the process is patented and the price of the product kept up to the market level of about 60 cents a gallon. But 15 cents a gallon is considered a reasonable estimate, and quantity production would probably reduce this still further.

Several countries which have no oil supplies of their own have experimented with this process and report encouraging results. The French Government announced recently that it would soon open a factory at Lens to produce methanol on a large scale. It confidently predicts that this will make France independent of foreign supplies—an important matter in war time.

Methanol is volatile and highly combustible, but it has several disadvantages as a fuel. It gives only half as much heat per gallon as gasoline; so methanol would have to be twice as cheap as gasoline to compete with it in the open market. In addition to this it is extremely poisonous. Its effects if taken internally are well known, but its vapor is also dangerous, particularly to the eyes. A garage where much methanol had been spilled would be an unhealthy place in which to work.

The third substitute, ethyl or grain alcohol, is in many ways the most promising. It can be made from every vegetable substance. Its raw material renews itself yearly and can never be exhausted. Alcohol is now made from molasses and various starchy foodstuffs like corn and potatoes, but it can also be derived from cellulose, the fibrous substance present in all plants. For several years alcohol from molasses was used as a fuel in Cuba. Since the advent of prohibition in the United States, however, the demand for alcohol has so increased that the supply of molasses has become insufficient. This illustrates a common mistake made by the alcohol enthusiasts. The Cuban Chamber of Commerce, for instance, is confident that alcohol can be produced in Cuba for from 5 to 10 cents a gallon. But in making this calculation they figured the cost of the molasses as almost nothing. Now molasses is a by-product of sugar refining, and if it sells for almost nothing the cost of its production has to be paid out of the profit on the sugar. As soon as molasses became valuable in its own right, the price rose so high that it killed the fuel-alcohol industry. There are many other by-products which can be turned into alcohol—saw-dust, for instance—but these must not be considered valueless. As soon as they find a sufficient market to rise out of the class of waste products their cost will have to be considered.

The process of making alcohol from straw and wood waste is being considered by several countries which have neither oil nor coal. The Australian Government has given a great deal of attention to the matter and reports satisfactory progress, although the process is not completely worked out. It is certain, however, that Australia could make enough alcohol out of its wheat straw alone to supply all its liquid fuel.

Alcohol is a satisfactory substitute for gasoline. Automobile engines can be adapted to its use with few changes and actually run more efficiently. It burns cleanly with no formation of carbon. Its heat value is 67 per cent that of gasoline, which means that a gallon and a half would drive an automobile as far as a gallon of gas. Calling it poisonous is only a figure of speech. What effect its common use as a fuel would have on the enforcement of prohibition is a matter of speculation.

In the Driftway

JOHN PHILIP SOUSA, although seventy-two years of age, has no intention of retiring as a bandmaster. He is quoted as saying: "The first you'll hear of Sousa's retirement is when you read 'Sousa's dead.' A man keeps going by keeping going. When he retires he vegetates. He dries up like a plucked flower and then he blows away." This is a frequently expressed American doctrine, and if Sousa feels that way about retiring it is a good thing for him not to do. It is a good thing for anybody who feels similarly—and there are many such in America—not to do. But as a philosophy it is open to devastating attack. It doesn't explain the situation to say that America is a nation of workers and anybody who quits his job finds himself isolated and neglected; that we lack Europe's leisure class and spirit of play. The man who upon retiring vegetates, as Sousa puts it, is as lost in Europe as here. The trouble lies not in lack of opportunities or company or the neglect of others, but in his own inadequacies. Anybody who withers like a plucked flower upon chucking up his job proves merely that he had no other vital interest. Few jobs are good enough to justify that, especially in a mechanical, competitive age when most of us work under orders from somewhere above, spending our days in a routine much of which is without any demonstrable usefulness save in bringing home the bacon on Saturday night. The average American male so overemphasizes his job that he not only gives it all his days but spends numerous evenings and noon-hours at dinners, conventions, or conferences, palavering with kindred workers—and calling it recreation.

LONG ago the Drifter adopted a better way. In order that—if somebody should leave him a legacy—he could retire without drying up and blowing away, he has never gone seriously to work. The pressure of landlords, milkmen, and such has from time to time driven him to a job. But he has never confused a livelihood with life, nor persuaded himself that he was doing what he wanted most to do if he wasn't. He has dodged promotion—this has seldom required heroic effort—whenever it seemed likely that he might thereby gain a position and a pay-check which he would hate to relinquish; he has stuck by a job only so long as he has felt that there was another just as good around the corner and that he could leave or be fired any day without a pang. If too glittering prospects are dangled before him, the Drifter at once decides to put temptation out of the way by walking into the office of the boss and calling him a big cheese.

* * * * *

BUT it doesn't usually work out quite that way. It has been with the Drifter's jobs as with his romances. He recalls a number of occasions when he felt that an affair with a young lady had gone far enough; he set about devising some kind and considerate way of cutting loose. But invariably before any plan occurred to him the young lady saved him the trouble by action more summary than kind or considerate.

AND in the same way, while the Drifter has been idling away his hours debating what kind of a big cheese to call the boss—gorgonzola, camembert, brie, or simply mouse—he has received notice that a suit of sackcloth would be ready for him at the end of the week.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Voice of Wanhsien

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Out of the many murderous acts committed by British vessels on China's inland waters the most outrageous is doubtless what has befallen and is befalling the people of Wanhsien, Szechuan Province. It is only a week ago that the S. S. Wanliu of the Butterfield & Swire Company swamped at Yunyang two Chinese junks with fifty-eight officers and soldiers of General Yang Sen's army, and $85,000 (Mex.). At Wanhsien, on the same date, General Yang Sen's inquiry was answered by letting loose machine-gun bullets from the British gunboat Cockchafer. Not a single shot was returned. The negotiations for a peaceful settlement were going on and had not ended when suddenly about 4 p. m. the Wanhsien people found themselves under heavy fire from the armed British merchantman Kiawo and the two British gunboats Cockchafer and Widgeon.

Shells dropped like showers. Houses crumbled like avalanches. The city went aflame at once. Women and children, if not burned alive or drowned, were torn into pieces. Thousands of lives and millions of property are lost. Yet several other British gunboats are reported advancing toward Wanhsien for another attack.

If there was ever vandal barbarism in history the British offenders are certainly trying to revive it. If there are still justice and humanity in the present civilization, our appeal for sympathetic understanding and fair judgment will certainly arouse the world's conscience. We are afraid of no extremes if driven to it. Nor shall we accept any settlement that does not remedy once for all the deep wound in our public sentiment. We therefore call upon you, in your effort to promote peace in the Far East, especially in your attitude toward this case, to stick to the principles of international equality and comity, which are so essential for a lasting peace in the world.

H. S. HSUNG,
Speaker, Wanhsien District Assembly
G. C. YANG,
Chairman, Wanhsien Educational Association
A. C. PAN,
Chairman, Wanhsien Agricultural Association
LUNPING LIU,
President, Wanhsien Chamber of Commerce
YUSUH HO,
President, Wanhsien People's League for Defense

Wanhsien, Szechuan, China, September 5

America's First Pacifist!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One of your correspondents cites an interesting early instance of pacifism in the peace plan of Dr. Benjamin Rush in 1831.

Dr. Carter Woodson's recent compilation of letters, "The Mind of the Negro as Reflected in Letters Written During the Crisis, 1800-1860," includes Benjamin Banneker's proposal of 1793 for an amendment to the Articles of the Constitution, to establish a "Secretary and Department of Peace in the Cabinet." Certain points of Banneker's plan, especially the details of symbolic peace frescoes for the walls of the offices of the Secretary of Peace, and peace odes and anthems to be sung every day at "certain hours by a group of young ladies, clad in white robes, in a gallery to be erected for the purpose," very circumstantially point to the Banneker plan as the point of origin for Dr. Rush's scheme.

Be that as it may, certainly it is most interesting and significant to note the yet unrealized ideals and objectives of the Foundation for the Advancement of Peace, the Society to Abolish War, the Society for the Abolition of Capital Punishment, and our scores of subsequent societies for promoting public and universal education, all so deliberately and confidently anticipated in 1793 by the Negro mathematician-astronomer of Maryland. To document his quite notable claim, let me quote his suggestions in detail:

> I. Let a Secretary of Peace be appointed to preside in this office, who shall be perfectly free from all the present absurd and wicked European prejudices upon the subject of government, let him be a genuine republican and a sincere Christian, for the principles of republicanism and Christianity are no less friendly to universal and equal liberty.
>
> II. Let a power be given to this Secretary to establish and maintain free schools in every city, village, and township of the United States; and let him be made responsible for the talents, principles, and morals of all his schoolmasters. Let the youth of our country be carefully instructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and in the doctrines of a religion of some kind; the Christian religion should be preferred to all others; for it belongs to this religion exclusively to teach us not only to cultivate peace with all men but to forgive—nay, more, to love—our very enemies. It belongs to it further to teach us that the Supreme Being alone possesses a power to take away human life, and that we rebel against His laws whenever we undertake to execute death in any way whatever upon any of His creatures.
>
> V. To inspire a veneration for human life, and an horror at the shedding of human blood, let all those laws be repealed which authorize juries, judges, sheriffs, or hangmen to assume the resentments of individuals, and to commit murder in cold blood in any case whatever. Until this reformation in our code of penal jurisprudence takes place, it will be in vain to attempt to introduce universal and perpetual peace in our country.
>
> VI. To subdue that passion for war, which education added to human depravity have made universal, a familiarity with the instruments of death, as well as all military shows, should be carefully avoided. For which reasons, militia laws should everywhere be repealed and military dresses and military titles should be laid aside; reviews tend to lessen the horrors of a battle by connecting them with the charms of order; militia laws generate idleness and vice, and thereby produce the wars they are said to prevent; military dresses fascinate the minds of young men, and lead them from serious and useful professions; were there no uniforms, there would probably be no armies; lastly, military titles feed vanity, and keep up ideas in the mind which lessen a sense of the folly and miseries of war.

This thoroughly uncompromising advocacy of peace at this early date may earn Benjamin Banneker the proud title of America's first pacifist.

Washington, D. C., November 15 ALAIN LOCKE

International Debt, New Style

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I call your attention to an item of cultural history not likely to be chronicled in your International Relations Section. I have on my desk eight translations into German verse of Fitzgerald's "Omar," all published within the past twenty years. And I have just completed a delighted reading of a ninth (Gustav Kiepenheuer Verlag, Potsdam, 1926). Good as most earlier versions were, this is much the best—in the subtle unison of epigrammatic thought and wistful melancholy, in clarity, in music (even to Fitzgerald's very cadences, so intimately familiar to English ears). It is the work of H. W. Nordmeyer, professor of German at Washington University in St. Louis. Germans in America have in past generations given the English world much of Germany's spiritual goods; here is a symptom of a new German-American movement—to give back to Germany more of our spiritual goods. Dr. Nordmeyer came to the University of Wisconsin some fourteen years ago, as a student from the University of Leipzig, and took his degree here. In fact, one of his examiners was your constant reader,

Madison, Wis., October 29 WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD

More Assets and Liabilities

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Drifter's list of American assets and liabilities gives me joy. They pretty nearly cover the ground, but here are just three or four additions, which can, if they meet your approval, be tacked on. Assets—The Nation, Franklin stoves, "delicious" apples, and the woods in the fall. Liabilities—Jazz, "over-stuffed" furniture, The Nation's prize poems, and all free verse, most of which ought to be locked up, unless the solution is given with the puzzle.

Zanesville, Ohio, November 9 MARY A. PATTERSON

A New Book by Vicente Blasco Ibáñez

A Novelist's Tour of the World

When a novelist is thrown among most of the strange peoples and lands in the world, one might expect a fascinating book to result. And when that novelist is the gifted author of "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," "Mare Nostrum," etc., his story is one which nobody will be willing to miss!

Fully illustrated. Price $6.00

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

"One reason why I like New York"

Nation Dinners

New York, Tuesday, Sept. 7—Some more reasons why time cannot wither nor custom stale New York's infinite variety: . . . . Because* The Nation has monthly dinners, vastly attended. . . . From The Daybook of a New Yorker, *by Burton Rascoe.

December 7
Prohibition
Clarence Darrow
"The Duty of Civil Disobedience"
Major William B. Wright, Jr.
Chief Enforcement Officer of Prohibition in Pennsylvania
"The Obligation of the Law"
Chairman: Arthur Warner
Associate Editor, The Nation

January 11
"Censor the Stage?"
Elizabeth Marbury
and
Joseph Wood Krutch
Chairman: Lewis S. Gannett
Associate Editor, The Nation

February 15
"Men—What of 'em?"
Ruth Hale
and Lorine Pruette
Chairman, Freda Kirchway
Managing Editor, The Nation

March 8
Songs and Dances by American Indians
Speakers to be announced on
"The Art of the American Indian"
Chairman: Mark Van Doren
Literary Editor, The Nation

April 12
"Who is Cal Coolidge?"
Frank R. Kent
and
William Hard
Chairman: Oswald Garrison Villard
Editor, The Nation

The Fifth Avenue Restaurant, 200 Fifth Avenue, 7 P. M.
Series tickets, $12.00; separate tickets, $2.75. Sold only to Nation Subscribers and their Guests.
With The Nation for a year: Separate tickets, $6.25; for the series, $16.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York.

Enclosed find $..... Send me The Nation for a year and reserve.....places at the..... dinner (or the series).

Name .....

Address .....

(Tickets will be mailed a few days before the dinner. Reservations made in order received.)

Books, Art, Plays

Chant of the Old Men in the Woods

By CHARLES NORMAN

We seek what no man has perceived by light
Of hundreds of slim candles in the night,
What no man with a piercing lantern swinging
Through darkness ever saw; though we go singing,
We have not seen.
Is none among us wearied yet?
The damp is in our bones; could we forget
The many years of nights among the trees,
Seeking as now, we would sail overseas,
Beyond the islands.
And we are tired.
We are grown old with what we have desired
Roaming through the darkness in this wood.
We would lie down to quiet, if we could
Lie down at night to sleep;
There is no sleeping
Yet. We will go on. Not only winds are creeping
From tree to tree, not only unicorns
Ripple the streams with starlight on their horns.
And there has been no lantern made, swinging
Through darkness, to light our way; but we go singing.

First Glance

I AM very fond of horses, but I shall never say why. In the first place I am ignorant of the reason, and in the second place I have too often seen lovers of dogs, explaining—as they thought—the cause of their attachment, confounded by lovers of cats. Lovers of cats despise both the horse people and the dog people, and do so from a single circumstance—that these people seem to be moved to affection by the docility of horses and dogs, by their dependence upon them. Cats, it is maintained, have not this docility or this dependence. Since the question whether dogs and horses do really have something in addition is somewhat too abstract for me, I shall not try to answer it, being content to watch and admire particular specimens of the two races as they walk or run before me. For that matter I like cats too, though not, as it happens, so well. I have never understood the war between cat people and dog people. Nor do I wish at present to start a controversy over the relative merits of horses and cows.

One reason that horses can be interesting is that we know so much about them—more, says Frederic B. Loomis, than about any other domesticated animal. The late W. C. Whitney was not only a fancier of thoroughbreds and a keeper of stables; he subsidized investigations into the history of the horse, sending expeditions to the fossil beds and tar pits of Western America for telltale bones. The result of such efforts, and of others over the world, is that we know a great deal about the distribution in place and time of this remarkably persistent, adaptable creature. At the Museum of Natural History in New York and at Amherst College one may read his history from charts, exhibits of bones, and restorations of bodies. It is from Amherst that Mr. Loomis writes his informing volume on "The Evolution of the Horse" (Marshall Jones: $3), showing with pictures and with text how our West, which hundreds of thousands of years ago nourished the earliest known ancestor of the animal we now have, lost contact with the species only to know it once more when a few horses, escaping from the Spanish explorers of the Mississippi Valley, pounded the earth there with new hoofs. The story takes Mr. Loomis also, of course, to Europe and Asia, and for the zebra and the ass to Africa. It is an exciting story, told soberly by a scientist for a popular audience.

Mrs. Lucy Sprague Mitchell tells it in another form, for children, in "Horses Now and Long Ago" (Harcourt, Brace: $3). Her book, for which much reading had to be done, is a collection of poems and tales designed to lure a child between eight and eleven to more knowledge of horses than he will get by looking at Dobbin in the barn. Mrs. Mitchell, sensibly enough, begins with Dobbin—who is named Dan—and works backward through centuries of change until she reaches the battlefield of Tours, where horses from the North encountered horses from the South. She goes back further still, and all in all she covers fascinating ground. I am glad that her book exists, and I hope that here and there it will find children not unwilling to look thus into the past of a familiar beast. That the horse is not so familiar as he was a few years ago is only another sign that the book should have been written. I am not so sure that children will like Mrs. Mitchell's exceedingly elaborate and exclamatory devices for attracting their attention to the subject in hand. But I shall not pretend to know just how the thing should have been done.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Bishop Outside the Pale

My Heresy. By William Montgomery Brown. The John Day Company. $2.

A BISHOP on trial for heresy is a startling spectacle. We do not know how many such churchmen have followed in the fiery footsteps of Cranmer, but they cannot be many. We have an impression that the Right Reverend author of this book is the only American bishop who has ever been unfrocked. How he chanced to fall upon such a fate is an interesting question. But first in order is the equally interesting question how on earth he ever came to be made a bishop.

He was not a great preacher. He was not a scholar. It is his own testimony in this book that he was an "ignoramus"; and his own account of his education and of his state of mind when he wore the miter goes far to confirm his judgment that he "did not know anything." He was a saint, to be sure. He does not say this, for Bishop Brown is the most humble of men; yet every page of his autobiography is like a mirror wherein shine reflected the saintly virtues of simplicity, gentleness, charity, and abounding love. But how many saints have been bishops; when was Francis of Assisi granted ecclesiastical honors?

No, there must be other reasons for Bishop Brown's elevation. And potent ones, too, for the road was a long one, with a sharp ascent. Determination was there, and ambition, zeal, devotion, character. But these were not the decisive factors in the story. O, no! Dr. Brown became "a man of great influence in church affairs," first of all because "he had married the adopted daughter of a great Episcopalian philanthropist." Again, he became "a man of wealth." Still again, he proved to be a great success in the missionary work which he chose as his "specialty" in the ministry. He went hither and yon starting new churches and reviving old ones, until it was said admiringly of him that he "was making Episcopalians out of fence-posts." "I was by no means big," says Dr. Brown, but "I was successful." Just the man for a bishop, obviously! "I achieved wealth," says the Bishop, summing up his career, "because it was given me, honor because I had a pull, and success because I did not know what I was doing."

One would have to look far to find a more terrific indictment of the church than is contained in this guileless narrative. Yet not so far, after all, for the sequel of the story is even more damning than the introduction. The trouble began with the fact that Bishop Brown, as he puts it, was not only ignorant "but—honest." Even this rare virtue might have proved harmless had not the Bishop broken down from overwork and thus been forced to desist from the ceaseless activity which had for years left him too busy to read, or study, or think, or indeed do anything but build and dedicate churches. In his retirement he picked up, at the suggestion of a physician, Darwin's "Origin of Species"; later on he found himself reading Karl Marx's "Das Capital." Thus within a few months he was brought suddenly, and without preparation, into contact with the two greatest intellectual revolutions in modern thought. Instantly "the world that I had lived in up to that moment just disappeared. It did not merely fall into ruins," he says. "It collapsed, without leaving any ruins." It was not even darkness he was stumbling in. "The darkness was not there. It had popped into nothingness, as darkness is likely to do when the light is turned on suddenly enough."

But the gulf must be bridged! Men must be Christian and they must accept Darwin. "Could I not go ahead with my studies," queried the Bishop, "believing literally everything which I discovered to be literal truth, and interpreting symbolically every creedal statement which conflicted in any way?"

His interpretation, as he finally formulated it in his symbolical creed, is one of the most moving religious documents of modern times. But it left not even the "ruins" of Christian doctrine. And the Bishop was cited for heresy!

The resulting trial was one of the tragic farces of ecclesiastical history. There was no question as to whether Bishop Brown believed or did not believe. He denied everything! But how much do you believe, he asked the lord bishops, his judges? Do you believe all the creed—"he (Jesus) descended into hell," for example, or "the resurrection of the body"? Not literally, of course, but symbolically! Which brought the whole thing straight down to the question, "How unorthodox can a churchman be?" It was a reductio ad absurdum of the whole case for the symbolical interpretation of dogma. There is a rule of common sense in this matter, says a recent apologist for the court. But whose common sense—Bishop Brown's or his accusers'?

Never was there such an exposure of the utter bankruptcy, intellectual and spiritual alike, of organized Christianity. Here in this life story, told with utter simplicity yet with playful irony, piercing wit, and unfailing gentleness and good-nature, Bishop Brown "spills the beans," to quote his own words. Four things he makes plain forever: (1) That the church, in its sectarian activities, is willing to use every standard of mere worldly success to attain its ends; (2) that Christian faith has no more place in the contemporary world than the cult of Dionysus; (3) that the symbolical method of saving the faith is a device which destroys what it seeks to save; (4) and that, in any final clash between spiritual sanctity and doctrinal conformity, it is belief and not life which the church finds important.

During the famous trial the Episcopal bishops said with amiable contempt that their colleague was crazy. If there is a saner man than the author of this book, we have not found him; if there is an insaner story than this which the author has to tell of American Episcopacy, we can't imagine it. These bishops convicted their colleague on the charge that he had lost his faith. If what he lost is faith, and what he found heresy, then God help the church! When Bishop Brown was a prelate, petted, pampered, and praised, he had no more real religion than a totem-pole. When he was a heretic, hated, hounded, and hunted, he had found a religion as genuine and terrible as the Sermon on the Mount.

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

God and Mammon

Religion and the Rise of Capitalism. By R. H. Tawney. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

MR. TAWNEY is the author of "The Sickness of the Acquisitive Society"—duly softened by his American publishers to "The Acquisitive Society," on the assumption perhaps that the element of sickness applies to Great Britain alone. That book impressed some of us as the most lucid and penetrating arraignment of capitalism ever written. In its pages critical intelligence was substituted for dogma, while the patient was diagnosed not from the basis of a set of ill-digested moral and ethical considerations, but from the clean-cut standard of a functional society. This bench mark remains an unforgettable quality of the book.

In the present work Mr. Tawney undertakes to tell us how we got that way—how in the last 250 years property has come to take precedence over function, and the way of profit over the way of life. It is an absorbing story. To it the author brings a scholarship and a profundity of research seldom equaled in economic writing. There are no archives—early Christian, Medieval, Reformation, early Puritan, the economic Fathers—which he has left unturned. So thorough is his analysis of sources that the story largely tells itself. From St. Francis to Lloyd George the record runs.

And the essence of the story seems to be this. The medieval church conceived of life as a whole as being subject to the moral principles of Christianity. "To such a temper, all activities divorced from religion are brutal or dead, but none are too mean to be beneath, or too great to be above, since all, in their different degrees, are touched with the spirit which permeates the whole." To the lay world the church declared in no uncertain terms the sin of usury, of profiteering, of hoarding, of exalting property over living. The modern hard-boiled business man in such an environment would have been an object of horror, loathing, and summary banishment—by means more or less painful—because of his total disregard and defiance of the accepted Christian way of life. He would have shocked and outraged medieval society much as a naked man making obscene gestures in the middle of Main Street would shock 1926 America.

Puritanism, coinciding with the beginnings of the industrial revolution, broke this medieval unity. It introduced a philosophic, and a practical, dualism.

> It regards the secular and the religious aspects of life not as successive stages within a larger unity but as parallel and independent provinces governed by different laws, judged by different standards, and amenable to different authorities. . . . Thus the conflict between religion and those natural economic ambitions which the thought of an earlier age had regarded with suspicion is suspended by a truce which divides the life of mankind between them. The former takes as its province the individual soul, the latter the intercourse of man with his fellows in the activities of business and the affairs of society. Provided that each keeps to its own territory, peace is assured. They cannot collide, for they can never meet.

With this fissure in the function of religion, with individual salvation substituted for social salvation, the whole attitude toward profit, interest, property, and even poverty underwent a rigorous revision. What had been wrong became right; what had been dereliction became duty. Poverty, instead of furnishing a presumption of virtue, began, after 1700, to furnish a presumption of slackness, laziness, and refusal to make the best of one's opportunities. High profits were a sign of high diligence. Legislation for the protection of workers in those first awful factories was an impious defiance of the benign workings of natural law.

What Tawney traces is one of the most interesting sublimations that history has to record. With the dawning of new industrial methods, of new and appetizing ways of making money, the whole superstructure of religion was neatly shifted out. But lest such procedure should bear any mark of impiety, a new concept, the Puritan, was erected to canonize the change, with rituals, observances, devotions all of its own. No less strict and no less weighty were these observances, save that they left the lay world clear for the transactions of profitable business. Sunday belonged to God with three long sermons a day, but Monday saw an equal devotion to the counting house. With odds of six to one, the counting house won hands down. And still continues to win.

It is more than possible that invention and science could never have come with the rush that they did, had not the grip of the church over secular affairs been broken. The industrial revolution might never have been more than a still birth. But the price that has been paid for the economic freedom of the entrepreneur has been a grievous one; the underlying population has paid the bills, and the books are far, far from closed. The rise of capitalism has kicked the Christian way of life, as it was known for a thousand years, into a dustbin. Whether or not it belongs there is another question, outside the province of the specific research to which Mr. Tawney has so skilfully and so entertainingly addressed himself.

STUART CHASE

French War-Gold

Facing Europe. By Frederick Bausman. The Century Company. $3.

JUDGE BAUSMAN'S book will be welcomed by those who are opposed to the cancelation of America's European debts, and it will convert some of the undecided. The main thesis is that Europe has behaved so outrageously as to forfeit any claim to our leniency, is so incorrigible that our sacrifice would do no good. The book has failings and errors, but the contentions are sound and the case is not overstated.

Possibly Judge Bausman should not have called Sir Edward Grey a hypocrite. Hamilton Fyfe considers him merely a muddle-headed, ill-informed, well-meaning English gentleman unfit for his post and involved in a poisonous net of intrigue from which he was unable to extricate himself; and Bernard Shaw relates how he mentally raised his hands to heaven when some one called Grey a great statesman and a true friend of Germany. Judge Bausman drives a new puncture into the Grey myth. But the chapters that deal with Wilson, Page, and House are the best. Here the author has found his stride. The evidence is well marshaled and there is keen analysis. Less good are the chapters dealing with war origins and propaganda.

Judge Bausman does not seize all of his opportunities. He neglects Clemenceau, for instance, next to Northcliffe the greatest propagandist who ever lived. Clemenceau "ran" Caillaux's own foreign minister, de Selves, and Caillaux tells us that he likewise "ran" the French press. Maxse, the editor, tells us in so many words that Clemenceau "ran" the National Review, the sheet which did more than any other to poison the mind of the English against Germany. Clemenceau likewise "ran" the Alliance Française, one avowed aim of which was to influence women in favor of France's national aspirations. The Alliance, according to its own statutes, was to act in place

"The essential objection to feudalism was that it imposed degrading acts and attitudes upon the vassal; the essential objection to democracy is that, with few exceptions, it imposes degrading acts and attitudes upon the men responsible for the welfare and dignity of the state."

Says

H. L. MENCKEN

In His Most Important Book

NOTES ON DEMOCRACY

A devastating polemic on democratic government and an illuminating analysis of its practice in America.

Second large printing
$2.50 at all bookstores

Just Out:

PREJUDICES: Fifth Series

By H. L. MENCKEN

Essays on Birth Control, Comstockery, Capital Punishment, and War: Conrad, Hergesheimer, Lardner, and Masters, William Jennings Bryan, Beethoven, The Last New Englander, Edgar Saltus, etc. $2.50

Predjudices, Gift Edition 5 vols. boxed, $12.50

ALFRED A. KNOPF

730 Fifth Avenue - New York

In Canada from The Macmillan Co. of Canada, Ltd., St. Martin's House, Toronto

BORZOI BOOKS

of the French Government where there was danger of the Government's compromising itself. One should study Clemenceau's articles in the Homme Libre for the week preceding the Austrian ultimatum to Serbia. He sees war coming, and with an unholy joy he urges the French to be not merely heroes but conquerors. This in the week before the ultimatum to Serbia! André Chéradame is another neglected child of Judge Bausman's. Contributor to thirty-five newspapers and periodicals and author of fifteen volumes, Chéradame had a hand in every anti-German enterprise.

Judge Bausman should give more study to French financial history in this period. A good book on the subject would be of the greatest interest. At every political juncture Russian aid was bought by huge loans. In 1914 almost every Balkan state was being financed by France—Bulgaria, even, being promised a loan if she would conduct her policies "within the orbit of the Triple Entente." France would have been richer today by over a hundred billion francs but for her policy of cornering Germany. And we are to make good the deficit! In Chéradame's "Douze Ans de Propagande Balkanique" we can follow the French endeavors from year to year, can see their fruition at the Slavic Sokol Fest in 1912 at which 53,000,000 Slavs were represented. Chéradame is jubilant over the honors paid to the French delegation. The fame of the demonstration in France's favor has spread through the Slavic world, has "had an enormous effect on the Slavic countries." France has "merely to continue the work so well begun"; it is "destined to have the happiest results." Germans can simply be starved out by a boycott from on all sides. France has been waiting for Alsace-Lorraine these thirty years. Her sword is now forged; when will she draw it? "A political upheaval among the Slavs of Central Europe is of vital importance for the Triple Entente." In this same year appeared the third edition of a book by Ernest Lemonon, dedicated to Paul Cambon and with a preface by Paul Deschanel, which was crowned by the French Academy. It contains this passage: "To force Germany to adopt a policy based on the principle of European equilibrium to curb her appetite for world hegemony, not only must the Triple Entente constantly tighten the bonds that form it, not only must it increase its armaments . . . it must in every way favor the formation of a Balkan League." . . . "Serbia especially must be given the means to arm and recuperate. For a strong Serbia would be a dagger in the flank of Austria." Later we find a loan to Serbia given preference over a French internal loan.

Although Judge Bausman carries us far, and every one should read his book, he does not carry us far enough.

ERNEST F. HENDERSON

A Friend of Labor

A Son of the Bowery. By Charles Stelzle. George H. Doran Company. $3.50.

ALTHOUGH born and bred in the poverty of New York's Lower East Side, and devoted, in maturity, to the welfare of the workingman, Mr. Stelzle is not, as one might assume, anti-capitalist. Nor is he fanatically pro-Labor in his interesting autobiography. Rather does he picture the case for employer and employee from the critical standpoint of the sociologist, basing his observations on a study of social conditions during long personal contact with the masses as a factory hand and later as a church worker. His anecdotal and somewhat discursive narrative gives one a new insight into the old problems of the welfare worker through the strength of character and purpose of the man himself. Mr. Stelzle is entirely free from the suspicion with which so many moral "uplifters" are regarded; one cannot help admiring the courage of a man who left a promising career as machinist to tread the rough path of press agent for the laboring classes.

The author will be best remembered as the originator of [illegible] to the achievement of his ambition for "a church for the average workingman" through such principles as he expounds therein. Realizing that "the more intelligent workingmen become, the less they become interested in the Gospel," the result of his varied experience leads to definite conclusions. He ascribes labor unrest largely to the idealism engendered by libraries, art galleries, universities, and, interestingly enough, to advertising. He counsels organized labor to [illegible] character training and industrial education. But the greatest menace to our American institutions, he affirms, is in "the self-satisfied middle class, the standpatters," and in the most reactionary individual of all, "the retired farmer in the small town."

H. S. VILLARD

Simpleton and Saint

Harmer John. By Hugh Walpole. George H. Doran Company. $2.

HALF Swede, half English, Hjalmar Johanson comes to the Polchester of which his mother had talked in exile, resolved there to kindle that spark of beauty which will fire a new world. Once he took a plate of blue pottery to his room in Copenhagen. Its glow made the rug seem drab and dingy, so he bought a new rug. Then in turn the walls lowered about him, so he moved to a new room and made it all white and clean, with only lovely things. So, he dreams, an impulse of good-will may circle outward, stirring men to sweep away sordidness and misery. He will begin by making bodies beautiful, for he is a gymnastic instructor.

Polchester of the narrow streets and towering cathedral takes him in, half foreigner that he is. So long as he talks of bodies—of excess pounds and flabby muscles—it can understand. But the soul is harder to stir, and its motion more painful. Like his prototypes in greater stories of the tragedy of unworldliness, Harmer John runs afoul of the malice and greed of the powerful few, the fear and distrust of the many. They cast him over the river wall of the disreputable slum for whose regeneration he has abandoned sweetheart, livelihood, and friends. And six years later they raise a tablet to his memory on a row of ugly, smug, but sanitary little houses which civic pride now sees as more suitable than the slum to Polchester's well-being.

Thus in a garrulous, clubby, and often obscure first person Hugh Walpole retells a story of the mob and the messiah, as it might have been enacted in an English provincial town, A.D. 1907. His picture of simple uncerebral goodness will give comfort to the hopeful, while his acid etchings of narrow spirits offer an entertaining opportunity to see the neighbors as others see them.

MARY ROSS

Books in Brief

A Dictionary of Modern English Usage. By H. W. Fowler. Oxford University Press. $3.

To anyone who imagines that a dictionary of usage must necessarily be a commonplace, somewhat pedantic, perhaps sometimes helpful work of reference, Mr. Fowler's latest book will come as an agreeable shock. It is miles above the meager and graceless "handbook of composition" thumbed by stenographers and college freshmen. No other work in its field presents such a mass of useful information about English usage. The longer articles, which are made readily accessible by a separate index, are especially noteworthy. Taken together, they constitute a treatise on literary taste that is fresh, vigorous, and sensible. Moreover, the book as a whole is entertaining; page after page can be read with unflagging interest, for the author has not only erudition but a vivacious style and a flair for satire.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. This year in addition a second prize of $50 and a third prize of $25 will be offered. The rules for 1926 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Wednesday, December 1, and not later than Friday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page.

3. No manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poems will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 9, 1927.

7. Besides the winning poems, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Art

Brancusi

IN 1913, when the Armory Show gave to America its first sight of the post-impressionist schools, two men attracted most attention: Marcel Duchamp, the painter of The Nude Descending a Staircase, and Constantin Brancusi, the sculptor of Mademoiselle Pogany. It was not by chance that the two artists were thus singled out for the indignation of the majority and for the enthusiasm of a very few. It is not by chance that they are associated again in the exhibition of Brancusi's work which Duchamp has organized and which is now on view in the Brummer Gallery in New York. As different in temperament and method and result as they are, they represent the same tendency, that of expression by non-realistic means. Indeed they may be taken as the two exponents of the idea who have held to it the most consistently, for Picasso has made several excursions into naturalism, Braque seems completely to have resumed that formula, while Matisse and Derain show each year more clearly that their splendid ideal is bound up with the world of the eyes—their work with abstract forms having been done in a spirit partly of adventure, partly of discipline.

Brancusi's art has become increasingly clear and strong with the passing of the years. His exhibition includes an early work of that Rodinesque type with which the best men of his generation began. Where are the Rodin followers who have held to the type? They exist, by the hundred, as every big Salon shows, but one is at a loss to recall their names; which does not prove that Rodin was bad; the present time is merely different from his. By the very extreme to which he went, he made sure that his true successors should take a different course. What folly it is to see disrespect in the act of an original man! His is the truest homage to the greatness of the past: he has given new testimony to the essentially creative quality of the older artists, for incomplete work alone admits of perfecting; the work of the masters does not.

And so, as rapidly as his medium permitted, Brancusi turned from the indirect methods of the impressionistic generation to that more immediate attaining of the qualities of art which has characterized his own. Instead of a head, a hand, or a leg which, by fineness of observation and force of rendering, goes beyond the anatomical fragment into the realm of the idea, this sculptor by mass and volume gives a sense of largeness, of space, of mystery; by simple and yet infinitely subtle planes he carries you along in his mood of surprise at the unending diversity and harmony of the world. How he loves the good things it has to offer us! Even the most adverse of his critics, when they have some understanding of sculpture, will admit that there is no one equal to Brancusi in the handling of materials: the stone has all the beauty of its grain, the marble is different from it and assumes a more suave accent and gesture, wood is warmer and suggests ideas connected with its growth and fiber; brass, being produced by man, may be used more freely according to his desires—now it flashes, now it is muted by a mat surface, again it becomes a thing almost freed from surface, like a flame which is everywhere and nowhere. And by some magic of his own, Brancusi uses all these qualities at once, and through them gives that affirmation of the greatness of our time which startled so many people in 1913, and has delighted so many people since then.

"And what is to become of the Greeks and Michelangelo?" asks a troubled voice. They are not in the slightest danger. I cannot say as much for certain men who are decorating public buildings in various parts of the world with more or less skilful pieces of pseudo-taxidermy. However vehemently these persons claim to represent tradition, they have no letters of recommendation from the masters. And so my guess is as good as another when I say that the great ones on Olympus are enjoying the Brancusi show at this very moment and saying what old Galileo told the men who would have the earth stand still: "E pur si muove."

WALTER PACH

Drama

Nodding Homer

THE fable of "Pygmalion" (Guild Theater) is obviously not one calculated to display the most important of Shaw's talents. In the first place this story of a practical phoneticist who made a flower girl into a duchess is (as a lady once said of "The Ancient Mariner") "improbable"; and in the second place it would not be fraught with any very profound significance if it were true. Even Shaw, whom nothing infuriates quite so much as the exculpatory statement "You can't change human nature," would hardly maintain that it can be changed so expeditiously or so completely as is here represented; and even if the play be considered as farce its implied moral—that Susan O'Grady and the Colonel's lady are sisters under the skin—can hardly be set down as one of the most original or important of its author's contributions to contemporary thought.

A more than usually irrelevent preface on phonetics affixed to the printed play indicates that it was actually with this subject that he began, and the truth is that Shaw, like many lesser men, has been unable, on occasion, to detach the subject of a work from the thing which happened first to suggest it. Obviously what is done to Eliza Doolittle's soul is more important than what is done to her vocal chords, but the plot is so arranged that the more significant things are only incidentally referred to, while the lesser ones are displayed at full length. Shaw, in other words, though he wished to write a comedy which should analyze the meaning of manners, was betrayed into a farce which is often no more than superficial extravaganza.

To say, however, that a play is not Shaw's best is far from saying that it is bad. Even when Homer nods he does not actually snore and "Pygmalion" is always diverting, first, because it is one of the paradoxes of its author's nature that he enjoys clowning almost as much as he enjoys thinking and that his unfailing high spirits are always in evidence; second, because there are in it passages which transcend the general level of the piece and which show how impossible it is for a mind as strong as Shaw's to keep from soaring. Eliza's father is, for example, not strictly necessary to the plot. He is, indeed, a more or less gratuitous addition; and yet this bit of inspired caricature is the finest thing in the whole play and the speech setting forth the advantages and irresponsibilities attendant upon being one of the "undeserving poor" is as brilliant as anything of the kind which Shaw has ever written. So, too, the concluding passages in which the philologist mocks Eliza's ideal of "warm human relations" and caricatures her conception of a passionate lover as one who "spends half his time sniveling over you and the other half giving you black eyes" are intense beyond the real demands of the plot, but they are interesting as constituting one more defense of the author's austere intensity against those who believe that only a certain animality is "human." One has, to be sure, heard these things before and heard them, perhaps, in more appropriate connections, but they are always fresh because they are not the repetition of a formula but outbursts of passionate conviction. Passion is always new as long as it continues to be real.

The Theater Guild has produced the play with all the skill acquired by long experience with Shaw's plays, and in a generally adequate cast two members—Lynn Fontanne and Henry Travers—stand out brilliantly. Mr. Travers has made the various incarnations of Shaw's "true-born Englishman" so completely his own that they are difficult to imagine apart from him, and Miss Fontanne, if not perhaps a powerful actress, has, beside her charm, a vitality which makes most of those essaying similar roles seem feeble. Incidentally it may be remarked that in "Pygmalion" Shaw showed himself a prophet even in minor things. When he made his flapper, mistaking Eliza's calamitous use of "bloody" for a new advance in smart unconventionality, promptly imitate it, he wrote a scene which seemed as startling as Jules Verne. Now, I fancy, English maidens use the word with the sweet unconcern of an American flapper availing herself of that erstwhile tabooed vocable which happens also to begin with "b."

The Provincetown Theater which last season devoted itself chiefly to disastrous experiments in expressionism has now provided its hard benches with cushions and gone in for the Commedia dell' Arte. As its first offering of the season it is presenting a Russian version of "The Princess Turandot" which Carlo Gozzi wrote for an eighteenth-century band of improvisatori. The company has a long way to go before it can equal the somewhat similar efforts of the Neighborhood Playhouse with "The Little Clay Cart," but its high spirits give the air of a lark to the performance and make it good fun.

"The Squall" (Forty-eighth Street Theater) is a determinedly sultry drama setting forth the havoc wrought in a respectable Spanish household when a gipsy dancer plays fast and loose with all the male members. It is not a profound drama but it combines obviously "dramatic" situations with a liberal supply of sex and is probably destined to considerable popularity.

"Old Bill, M. P." (Biltmore Theater) provides for a return of Mr. Coburn in the role of the well-known cartoon character.

"Gay Paree" (Winter Garden) presents little novelty but it does extremely well all the things which revues usually do. "Chic" Sale contributes some excellent character bits.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

The Neighborhood Playhouse, 466 Grand Street, N. Y. Telephone Drydock 7516
Evenings (Except Monday), Matinee Saturday
The Hindu Classic
THE LITTLE CLAY CART

Longacre Theatre 48th St. West of Broadway Evenings 8.30 Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2.30
THEODORE DREISER'S
AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY
"A PLAY WHICH IS BOUND TO WRENCH A MILLION HEARTS." Journal
DRAMATIZED BY PATRICK KEARNEY.

YIDDISH ART THEATRE
12th St. and 2nd Ave. Stuy. 7195
MAURICE SCHWARTZ PRODUCTION
OF ABRAHAM GOLDFADEN'S
"The Tenth Commandment"
Evenings 8.30 Matinees Saturday and Sunday 2.30

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE 14 W. 14th St. Tel. Watkins 7957
EVA Le GALLIENNE
Saturday Evening, November 27, "La Locandiera."
Wednesday Evening, December 1, "La Locandiera."

THEATRE GUILD PRODUCTIONS
SIDNEY HOWARD'S COMEDY
Ned McCobb's Daughter
JOHN GOLDEN Thea. 58th St. East of B'way. Matinees THURS. and SAT.

BERNARD SHAW'S
PYGMALION
"The most refreshing intellectual shower bath on Broadway, with the tingling drops of Shaw's wit to tickle the spine." Evening Telegram.
GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Matinees THURS. and SAT., 2.30.

LECTURES

SPECIAL LECTURE
Adjustments in the Family and Beyond
Dr. S. Ferenczi of Vienna
AUSPICES
Child Study Association of America, Inc.
Empire Room, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel
Thursday Evening, December 2nd, 8:30
Admission to members $1.00, to non-members $1.50

REAL ESTATE
—If you have a house or property to sell or lease, try The Nation classified advertising section.
—If the experience of other advertisers of real estate is a guide, your advertisement in The Nation will pay.
—Write for rates to Dept. R., The Nation.

WHAT SHALL I GIVE?

Here is a happy solution to that ever-puzzling question:—

A gift that is different—

A gift that is stimulating—

A gift that is subtly complimentary—

THE AMERICAN MERCURY as a gift is always in good taste—formal enough to send to a business acquaintance, intimate enough to give to one of your own family.

Just before Christmas we shall send to the recipient an antique green, deckle-edged card, appropriately inscribed, announcing your gift.

Give a Subscription to

THE AMERICAN MERCURY

We will accept subscriptions at the following special rates for a limited time:—

2 years (or 2 subscriptions) for $ 9.00 saving $1.00
3 years (or 3 subscriptions) for 12.50 saving 2.50
4 years (or 4 subscriptions) for 15.00 saving 5.00
One year for $5.00, as always.

THE AMERICAN MERCURY ❦ 730 Fifth Avenue ❦ NEW YORK CITY

Please send THE AMERICAN MERCURY to

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
NAME .....
ADDRESS .....

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
NAME .....
ADDRESS .....

Sender's Name ..... Address .....

Canadian postage, 50c. Foreign, $1.00 per year

Enclosed $..... N12-1926

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

International Relations Section

Mongolia's Constitution

IN accordance with interests of the broad masses of the people as revealed in the Revolution of the Eleventh Year (1921), when the people, revolting, banished the foreign oppressors, and on account of the death, on the seventeenth day of the Fourth Moon, of the Bogdo-Khan Damba Hutukhtu, who, up to that date, had served as chief of the state, the Ministry elected by the revolutionary people has decided:

1. To put the seal of the Bogdo-Khan in the keeping of the Ministry;

2. To introduce a republican form of government, without a president, and to transfer the supreme authority to the Great People's Horaldan and to the Cabinet elected by the latter;

3. To celebrate the anniversary of the Mongolian People's Republic simultaneously with the anniversary of the creation of the Mongolian state on the sixth day of the Sixth Moon of each year;

4. To date the history of the republic by the years of Mongolia's independence instead of by the years of rule of the Bogdo-Khan, counting from this, the Fourteenth Year [1925].[1]

The Great People's Horaldan, today assembled for the first time, confirms these decisions of the Government, and establishes the following basic law of the Mongolian People's Republic. This basic law is to be made public by the central and local authorities and displayed in all public institutions. The Great Horaldan instructs the Government to make the principles of this Constitution part of the instruction in all schools and military units.

Article I

Declaration of Rights of the Toiling People of Mongolia

1. Mongolia is proclaimed an independent people's republic, all authority being vested in the toiling people. The people exercises its supreme authority through the Great People's Horaldan and the Cabinet elected by it.

2. The fundamental task of the Mongolian Republic is to abolish the remnants of the feudal-theocratic regime[2] and to strengthen the foundations of the new republican order by complete democratization of the administration.

3. In order to establish the authority of the people in the administration and to maintain the national order here proclaimed, the following basic principles are established:

(a) All land and underground riches, forests, waters and their riches within the territory of the Mongolian People's Republic, in accordance with the existing common usage of Mongolia corresponding to the principles of the established order, are the heritage of all the people; private ownership of such is not permitted, and they are entirely at the disposal of the toiling people;

(b) All international agreements and loan obligations concluded by the Mongolian authorities before the Revolution of the Eleventh Year[3], being exacted by force, are considered annulled;

(c) Owing to the fact that the indebtedness of private persons and institutions to foreign usurers, which had been incurred in the times of foreign supremacy, on the basis of a pledge of general responsibility, has been a heavy burden on the national economy of the country and on the mass of the people, the decision of the Cabinet adopted in this, the Fourteenth Year, concerning the annulment of the remnants of said indebtedness, and that adopted in the Eleventh Year concerning the repeal of this system of pledges of general responsibility, are confirmed;

(d) The supreme policy of the country shall be concentrated in the hands of the state and a monopoly of foreign trade established, as one of the conditions for the liberation of the mass of the people and for the assertion of the popular authority;

NOTE: The monopoly of foreign trade is to be introduced gradually.

(e) In order to insure the full power of the toiling people and to eliminate the possibility of a restoration of the power of foreign and internal exploiters, the arming of the masses, through the Mongolian National Revolutionary Army and through universal military training of the toiling youth, is confirmed;

(f) In order to insure freedom of conscience for the toiling masses, the church is separated from the state, and religion is proclaimed the private affair of each citizen;

(g) In order to insure real freedom of expression of opinion, the Mongolian People's Republic shall organize the press and place it at the disposal of the toiling people;

(h) In order to insure real freedom of assembly, meetings, processions, etc., the Republic shall place at the disposal of the toiling people for popular gatherings halls with the necessary conveniences and equipment;

(i) In order to insure freedom of association for the toiling masses, the Mongolian People's Republic shall give the poor of the country (the arats and artisans) every material and other form of assistance for association and organization;

(j) In order to insure the privileges of knowledge the Mongolian People's Republic shall make it its task to organize for the toiling masses the fullest, most comprehensive, free education;

(k) The Mongolian People's Republic recognizes the equal rights of all its citizens without discrimination as to nationality, religion, or sex;

(l) The Mongolian People's Republic, in keeping with the interests of the toiling people, may deprive or limit the rights of separate persons or groups of persons, if they use their rights to the detriment of the Republic;

(m) The titles and ranks of the former princes and noblemen, as well as the possessive rights of the Hutukhtus and Hubilkhans are abolished;

(n) In view of the fact that the toiling masses all over the world are striving toward the abolishment of capitalism and the achievement of socialism, the People's Republic of the toiling masses is to conduct its foreign policies in accordance with the interests and the basic problems of the revolutionary workers of all the world.

NOTE: The possibility, in accordance with current events, of establishing friendly relations with various foreign Powers is not excluded; but any attack upon the independence of the Mongolian People's Republic must be met with decisive resistance.

Article II

The Supreme Organs of Authority

4. The supreme authority of the Mongolian People's Republic is represented by the Great People's Horaldan[4], when it is out of session by the Small Horaldan; and when the latter is out of session, by its Praesidium and the Cabinet, jointly.

5. The scope of the supreme organs of authority in the Mongolian People's Republic includes:

[1] Mongolia refused to accept the Chinese revolution of 1911 and on December 1 of that year declared its independence.

[2] Mongolia under the old regime was dominated by lama-priests, some of whom held large feudal estates in which virtual slavery was practiced.

[3] In the Eleventh Year (1921) the Government established by bands under Baron Ungern-Sternburg, a White Russian leader, was driven out with the aid of Soviet Russian forces, and the present "People's Government" established in power.

[4] A Horaldan is an assembly.

(a) Representation of the Republic in international relations, the conduct of diplomatic relations, the conclusion of political, commercial, and other treaties with foreign states;

(b) Changes in the frontiers of the Mongolian Republic, declaration of war and conclusion of peace, ratification of international agreements;

(c) The contracting of foreign and internal loans, payment of interest and capital on such loans, questions of remission or delays of such loans, and the granting of foreign loans;

(d) Regulation of foreign trade and of the rules of domestic trade;

(e) Elaboration of the plan of the national economy of the Republic; granting, changing, and annulling concessionary monopoly rights;

(f) Organization of the transportation and post and telegraph systems;

(g) Organization and leadership of the armed forces of the Mongolian Republic;

(h) Adoption of the budget of the republic, determination of taxes and revenues;

(i) Establishment of the monetary credit system, issue of paper currency, and decisions concerning the minting of coin;

(j) Settlement of the general principles for the use of land, as well as determination of the borders of aimaks and hoshuns,[5] establishment of the rules for the use of the subsoil wealth, forests, and other natural riches;

(k) Regulation of judicial organization and procedure, as well as the criminal and civil legislation of the Republic;

(l) Institution of the system of public education;

(m) Institution of general measures for public health;

(n) Establishment of a system of weights and [illegible];

(o) Organization of the statistics of the Republic.

6. Confirmation of and amendment to the basic laws of the Republic are the exclusive province of the Great Horaldan.

The Great Horaldan

7. The Great People's Horaldan is composed of the representatives of the aimaks and of the urban population, as well as of military units, in proportion to the population of the election districts; the deputies are elected for the term of one year.

NOTE 1. If no convention is held by the aimak, representatives shall be sent from the hoshuns.

NOTE 2. Elections to the Great Horaldan are conducted on the basis of the rules laid down in the special regulations.

8. Ordinary sessions of the Great Horaldan shall be convened annually by the Small Horaldan.

9. Extra sessions of the Great Horaldan shall be convened by the Small Horaldan either upon its own initiative, or at the demand of one-third of the population of the Republic.

10. The Great Horaldan shall elect the Small Horaldan, with a membership of 30.

11. The Small Horaldan is responsible to the Great Horaldan.

The Small Horaldan

12. The Small Horaldan shall issue laws, regulations, and orders, coordinate the work of the highest organs of the Cabinet, and determine the scope of activity of the Praesidium of the Small Horaldan and of the Cabinet, fix the general direction of the activities of the Cabinet, and supervise the execution of the basic laws of the Republic and of the decisions of the Great Horaldan.

13. The Small Horaldan shall assemble at least twice a year.

[5] Outer Mongolia under the old regime was divided into four aimaks, each ruled by a Khan and including from 19 to 24 hoshuns each.

14. Extraordinary sessions of the Small Horaldan shall be convened upon decision of the Praesidium of the Small Horaldan, upon the recommendation of the Cabinet, or at the demand of one-third of the members of the Small Horaldan.

15. The Small Horaldan, at its sessions, shall elect its Praesidium of five members, the Cabinet, and, in case of need, working committees.

16. The Small Horaldan shall report to the Great Horaldan upon its activities, policies, and special questions.

17. The members of the Small Horaldan shall work in the Praesidium or in other positions as assigned by the Praesidium.

NOTE: Rules and regulations concerning the rights of the members of the Small Horaldan shall be issued by its Praesidium.

The Praesidium

18. The Praesidium of the Small Horaldan shall conduct the sessions of the Small Horaldan.

19. The Praesidium shall prepare material for the sessions of the Small Horaldan.

20. The Praesidium shall introduce draft decrees for the consideration of the plenum of the Small Horaldan.

21. The Praesidium shall supervise execution of the decisions of the Small Horaldan.

22. The Praesidium shall direct the activities of the Cabinet in local and other questions, communicate with the corresponding institutions through the Cabinet, or, in important cases, directly.

23. The Praesidium shall decide questions of general and individual amnesty.

24. Between sessions of the Small Horaldan, the Praesidium shall confirm laws and decisions, return for revision or hold up decisions of the Cabinet, referring these to the next plenum of the Small Horaldan, appoint and discharge individual ministers.

25. Questions and conflicts between ministries or complaints against ministries shall be settled by the Praesidium.

26. The Praesidium is responsible to the Small Horaldan and shall report to it on its activities.

The Cabinet

27. Within the scope of the Cabinet is the general administration of the affairs of the Mongolian People's Republic. The Cabinet is made up of the Chairman of the Cabinet, the Deputy Chairman, the Chairmen of the Military and Economic Councils, the Commander-in-Chief, the State Comptroller, and the ministers of internal affairs, foreign affairs, military affairs, finances, economy, justice, and education.

28. The Cabinet has charge of the questions enumerated in the special regulations upon the scope of the Cabinet.

The Economic Council

29. In order to coordinate all economic measures, the Economic Council of the Mongolian People's Republic is instituted within the Cabinet in accordance with regulations.

ARTICLE III

Local Self-Government

30. Local horaldans in aimaks, hoshuns, somons, bags, ten-households, and cities are organized on the basis of the local self-government law.

31. For current administrative and economic work the local horaldans elect from among their members the executive organs of the local authorities, for the term of one year.

32. The executive organs are responsible to the local horaldans which elected them.

33. Aimak-, hoshun-, bag-, and ten-household assemblies and their executive organs shall act in accordance with the local self-government law.

H. G. WELLS' MASTERPIECE

In a New, Elaborately Illustrated Edition

The New Pictorial

Outline of History

"If you start at the first page and read slowly and sympathetically to the last, you will not only have a vast grasp in your ignorance, but will also place whatever you do happen to know in some relation to the rest of human life."—Walter Lippmann in Vanity Fair

NEW TEXT: The original "Outline" has been completely recast or rewritten and new material added throughout. The post-war chapters are entirely new.

NEW ILLUSTRATIONS: The story of man is told in pictures as well as words—the author has searched the world to make the pictorial record complete.

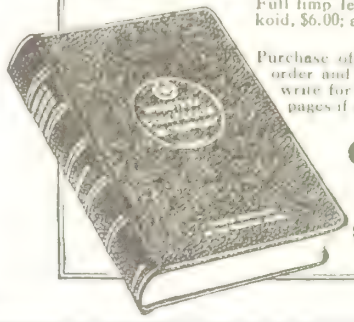
NEW PRINTING: The litho offset process of reproduction makes this a beautiful book, easy to read. The format and binding are new.

See this New Outline at your bookstore; full description on request. 2 vols. $15.00

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

New York Boston Chicago Atlanta Dallas San Francisco

For Christmas—
The Treasured Gift



For a gift of permanent value; a tribute to the good taste of the one who gives and the one who receives, Webster's Collegiate Dictionary is ideal. It is a gift to delight anyone who reads, writes, or studies, for it is a constant source of the information needed most frequently. This Christmas give the handsome Bible-Paper edition of

WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY

The Best Abridged Dictionary

It Is Based Upon Webster's New International

A gift of lasting, everyday value with its vocabulary of 106,000 words, its Biography, its Gazetteer department, its rules of punctuation, use of capitals, abbreviations, its foreign words and phrases, its wealth of other information. A handsome book with 1700 illustrations. 1256 pages; printed on Bible Paper. Full limp leather, $7.50; flexible fabrikoid, $6.00; art canvas, $5.00

Purchase of your bookseller; or send order and remittance direct to us; or write for information. Free sample pages if you mention The Nation.

G.&C.Merriam Company

Springfield, Mass.

Conveniently located
Modern fireproof
Last minute efficiency
Elaborate cafe
Systematized operation
Select accommodations

Washington boasts many hotels, but the Brighton is unique in combining the best quality of all.

It is a mark of distinction to stop at the Brighton Hotel in Washington

—the Brighton offers you real Southern hospitality plus every modern convenience of a beautifully appointed fire-proof hotel. Here you find an atmosphere you expect at the National Capital. Each guest gets courteous personal attention under our system. The Brighton is within a few minutes of Government activities, parks, clubs, embassies, shopping district, golf courses, bridle paths, and the business section.

Rates $2.50 and up per day.
Booklet mailed on request.

THE BRIGHTON HOTEL

2123 California St., N. W. Washington, D. C.

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT

200 FIFTH AVENUE

NEW YORK

A LUNCHEON RESORT FOR THE DISCRIMINATING CLIENTELE—THOSE APPRECIATING UNEXCELLED CUISINE AND SERVICE.

EVENINGS—SPECIAL PARTIES ONLY. ANNIVERSARIES, BANQUETS, LADIES' NIGHTS, BEEFSTEAKS, SMOKERS, SUPPER AND DINNER DANCES.

OUR BANQUET DEPARTMENT SPECIALIZES IN SERVING
GROUP DINNERS UP TO 1000
AT $2.00 A COVER UP.

Ownership Management

by THEODORE KEMM

GRAMERCY 4900 to 4907

ARTICLE IV

The Right to Vote and to Be Elected

34. The following citizens of the Republic of both sexes, who at the day of elections have attained the age of 18 years, are eligible to vote and to be elected to the horaldans (Great, Small, and Local):

(a) Those who support themselves by their own work, or are engaged in work in their own households;

(b) Soldiers of the National Revolutionary Army.

35. The following may not vote or be elected:

(a) Persons supporting themselves exclusively through the exploitation of other persons for gain;

(b) Traders and usurers living on the work of others or on interest from capital and earnings;

(c) Former princes, hutukhtus, and members of the clergy living in monasteries;

(d) Persons recognized as mentally diseased or insane;

(e) Persons who have been convicted of vicious or profit-seeking crimes.

36. Elections shall be conducted in accordance with the special law on elections.

[Article V deals with the budget.]

ARTICLE VI

The State Seal, Coat-of-Arms, and Flag

47. The seals of the Great Horaldan, of the Cabinet, ministries, and other institutions shall be quadrangular; in the center of the seal the symbol soyunba (representing independence) is to be carved, and on the two sides the name of the institution.

48. The national coat-of-arms consists of the symbol soyunba with, below it, the figure of the flower badmalinhova.[6]

49. The national flag is red, with the coat-of-arms in the middle.

50. The sessions of the Great Horaldan are convened in Ulan-Bator-Khoto[7] (formerly Urga).

This constitution was confirmed at 4:17 on the 30th day of the Tenth Moon of the Mongolian State at the 14th session of the Great Horaldan of the Mongolian People's Republic.

Chairman of the Horaldan, DJA-DAMBA
Deputy Chairman of the Horaldan, BADARKHO
Secretaries GUELEXENGE
DUGARJANTZAN

[6] The badmalinhova is a kind of lotus, the sacred flower of Buddhism.
[7] Named after the Red Chief (one of Mongolia's epic heroes of the past).

Contributors to This Issue

LEWIS S. GANNETT, associate editor of The Nation, spent last winter in the Orient.

JONATHAN NORTON LEONARD is a journalist who writes on scientific subjects.

[illegible], a New York poet, is the author of "Tragic Beaches."

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES is pastor of the Community Church of New York and author of "Patriotism Is Not Enough."

ERNEST F. HENDERSON has made a study of war origins, particularly in connection with Sir Edward Grey.

H. S. VILLARD is a young journalist of the third generation of his name.

MARY ROSS is associate editor of The Survey.

WALTER PACH, painter and critic, is author of "The Masters of Modern Art."

The author of The Making of a Militant is a well-known novelist and writer of short stories.

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of graduate study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.
Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.
For further information, address the Director,
THE TRAINING SCHOOL
for
JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

True food is the foundation of Good health
Fresh Vegetables
Whole Wheat Products
Satisfying Diet for Diabetics
No animal fat used
Trufood VEGETARIAN RESTAURANT
153 W. 44th St., East of Broadway

Get out your smocks and boots for the
NEW MASSES
Workers' and Peasants' Costume Ball
Friday, December 3, at 9 P. M.
Webster Hall, 119 East 11th Street
Tickets now $1.50—at the door $2.00
On sale at Jimmie Higgins', 127 University Place
Rand School, 7 East 15th Street
or by mail New Masses, 39 West 8th Street Tel. Stuyvesant 4445

DINNER OF THE
BROTHERHOOD OF SLEEPING CAR PORTERS
YORKVILLE CASINO, 210 E. 86th ST., NEW YORK
Tuesday, November 30th, 1926
PAUL ROBESON, famous baritone, will sing several songs
SPEAKERS will include Samuel Untermyer, James Weldon Johnson, Eugene Kinckle Jones, Hugh Frayne, the Rev. A. Clayton Powell, Robert L. Vann.
Make reservations, $2 a cover, at the office of the Brotherhood, 224 Seventh Avenue.

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Porter. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 847 East Ohio Street, Chicago

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Maker at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.20 per Yard. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired

accept nothing but
Non-Depressant nor Habit Forming
In Convenient Aluminum Boxes
Midol
for HEADACHE
GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1926 No. 3205

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 577

EDITORIALS:

Nonsense 579

Storm Signals in Mexico 580

Britannia Still Rules 581

Midway in the Season's Books 582

Ghosts at the Horse Show 583

WHY I EARN MY OWN LIVING Anonymous 584

THE HALL-MILLS CASE IN THE NEWSPAPERS By Silas Bent 585

JEFFERSON'S DISCIPLES—1926 MODEL By Henry S. Pomeroy 587

JEFFERSONISM IN DENVER DEMOCRACY RECEIVES A QUEUS 589

TOWARD THE ARCTIC OCEAN By Lewis S. Gannett 590

GASLESS AMERICA By Stuart Chase 592

THE NEW GENERATION By Mathias A. Alber 593

IN THE DRIFTWAY By the Drifter 595

CORRESPONDENCE 588

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

The British Commonwealth of Nations 597

HOLIDAY BOOK SECTION

THE IMPORTANCE OF PAUL VALERY By René Lalou 597

REDISCOVERING THE SPIRITUALS By Alice Nolan 600

THE CRITIC'S ANSWER By Elinor Vreas 600

NOT TO YOU ONLY, O PYTHIAN. By Mary Austin 601

BOOKS:

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 601

The Complete Die-Hard. By Keith Hutchison 602

Mr. Mencken's Best. By Joseph Wood Krutch 602

State and Government. By Harold J. Laski 603

Seeing Things. By Donald Douglas 604

Mr. Eddison's Second. By Abbe Niles 605

Fremont Older and Jack Black. By R. L. Duffus 605

What Price Happiness? By John Haynes Holmes 606

A Philosophical Poem. By Mortimer J. Adler 606

Below Par. By William MacDonald 607

Disraeli and Gladstone. By J. A. Hobson 607

Man versus Nature. By Alice Beal Parsons 608

Thick and Thin. By Lenore G. Marshall 608

Deep as First Love. By Donald Douglas 612

Why Women Are Seabs. By Paul Blanshard 612

Harsh White Noon. By Gerald Carson 613

New England. By Alice Beal Parsons 614

Religious Problem in Mexico. By Carleton Beals 615

Mostly Fudge. By R. F. Dibble 616

Once More the Impossible. By Sidney R. Packard 617

The Nation's Poetry Prize 618

A Library List of Children's Books 619

Books in Brief 619

Music: Music and Common Sense. By R. H. Haggin 621

Drama: "The Witch." By Joseph Wood Krutch 622

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

"THE MORAL CRISIS OF PROHIBITION" is the title of an editorial in the Christian Century, which comes close to being the most Christian church periodical in America. This paper attacks the political methods of the Anti-Saloon League, saying:

> If the churches are to continue to support prohibition as a moral issue they cannot do so on a basis which is itself morally questionable. Prohibition is a moral issue, not the moral issue. It does not transcend nor fuse into itself all the other moralities. . . . Almost without knowing how it happens they [the churches] find themselves walking arm in arm with the Ohio gang, with a Len Small-Frank Smith gang, with that most cynical, most sinister of American figures, the "political Dry". . . . While the church is being maneuvered into alliance with political infamy, laws may stand or laws may fall, but the moral authority of the church cannot survive.

This is refreshing candor, and indicative, perhaps, of a new awakening. Since the Christian Century's editorial was written we have had two more exhibits of "political Dryness." The first came in the story of the arrest of the Governor of Alabama at a liquor-drinking party. The dispatches report that a Negro servant, after receiving a promise of pardon from the Governor, long an ardent political Dry, assured the court that the liquor was his and that he was giving it to the Governor and his friends. The other and more encouraging exhibit is a speech by Governor Pierce of Oregon, who is said to be personally as well as politically Dry: he calls for a new campaign of education, charging that the attempt to browbeat people into Dryness has failed. "We cannot legislate people into being moral and temperate," he says. And he is right; this country has had too much political and not enough personal Dryness.

ANOTHER ELECTION SCANDAL has bobbed up to bother the Republicans—this time in their own State of Maine, where Arthur R. Gould, a rich Republican, was elected as United States Senator against Fulton J. E. Redmond, Democrat. The first charge was that Mr. Gould went far beyond the legal limits of primary expenditures in his recent campaign. This was declared unproved by the Secretary of State. Worse than this, his Democratic opponent has brought out the fact that Mr. Gould in 1918 paid $100,000 to the then Prime Minister of New Brunswick, Mr. Flemming, during the construction of the St. Johns Valley and Quebec Railway, of which Mr. Gould was the leading spirit. This was termed an act of bribery by Chief Justice Harrison A. McKeown of New Brunswick and, because Mr. Gould had been held personally guilty of this bribery, he was non-suited in the effort made by him and his associates to recover $335,000 which they claimed was due them from the Province. Mr. Gould admits that the $100,000 was paid, but asserts that it was done against his protest by his associates, that it was not a bribe but a political assessment demanded by the Premier as the price for the continuance of this American enterprise. Subsequently, Mr. Gould declares, another demand was made for $50,000, and when this was refused his company was put out of business. Since he adds that every American enterprise in New Brunswick was similarly held up by politicians, it is evident that we have here a first-class scandal which should be investigated by the authorities in Canada as well as by the Senate of the United States.

SECRETARY HOOVER rejoices, and well he may, that in the fiscal year 1925-1926 prosperity in the United States reached a point never before attained in the volume of production and consumption, in the quantity of exports and imports, and in the rate of wages. He admits that there are three or four bad spots—the New England textile industry, the bituminous coal fields, and, "in two or three sections," the agricultural industry. On the whole, he declares, "the country was able to maintain the highest standard of living in its history—a standard far above that in most other countries of the world at this or any other time." Since the close of the last fiscal year, however, the agricultural distress, which was never confined to only two or three sections, has grown steadily worse, particularly among the cotton growers. In Iowa the situation is alarming; no less than nineteen banks failed there in one week, all in agricultural sections. In North Dakota, where 600,000 persons inhabit a State larger than New York, conditions are equally harassing, while in the East the farmers are just about able to hold out, though making no money. On the same day that Mr. Hoover declared that agricultural conditions were improving, Senator Brookhart of Iowa declared that "America's much-vaunted prosperity means sheriff sales for the farmer." A million farmers, he asserted, have lost their homes during the Coolidge and Harding Administrations. Laws, he added, have created this situation and only new laws can remedy it. As a matter of fact, the worst offenders are the tariff laws; we are seeing now the fine flowering of the protective tariff system which has exalted manufacturing at the expense of agriculture. Perhaps the Business Men's Commission on Agriculture, which has so wisely chosen Charles Nagel as its chairman, will see and recognize this truth.

THE REVOLT OF THE JUDGES will doubtless result in the modification of some of the more hysterical provisions of the Baumes laws in New York. Designed to reduce crime they are succeeding most effectively in reducing justice. They have so completely robbed the courts of their discretionary powers in sentencing offenders previously convicted for felonies that one judge after another has protested. Judge Taylor's refusal to give a life sentence to a Negro with three previous convictions, who had been induced by the District Attorney's office to plead guilty as a first offender, will be reviewed by Justice Lewis of the Supreme Court. Following Judge Taylor, but employing opposite tactics, Judge Collins in the Court of General Sessions sentenced a man to life imprisonment and then publicly denounced the Baumes laws as "inflexible, arbitrary, mandatory" and plainly suggesting "mob philosophy in the enactment of legislation." The prisoner had been sentenced to five years for the offense in question—an assault with a knife during a drunken brawl—but had been remanded for resentence when a third conviction was found in his record. A few days later Judge Allen similarly increased the term of a prisoner from eighteen months to life imprisonment with reluctance and a vigorous attack upon the mandatory features of the laws. Even a few district attorneys, including Love of Monroe County and Banton of New York, have expressed disapproval of the mandatory life sentence for offenders who have already committed three felonies. When the rest of this hard-boiled brotherhood suffers a similar change of heart we may hope for a reversion to justice.

WE HAVE LONG been skeptical about the alleged superiority of Jersey justice, as our readers who have followed our comments on the Passaic strike must be aware. Now, having watched the conduct of the Hall-Mills murder trial, we are emphatically of the opinion that whatever the verdict another severe blow has been dealt to the judiciary in that State by the conduct of the case. In common, we are convinced, with multitudes of people, we have found ourselves disgusted by the antics of the prosecuting attorney, Mr. Simpson, who has only himself to thank if the average newspaper-reader considers him a mountebank, a play actor, and a low-grade politician with no regard for the standards and ethics of his profession. But what shall one say of the judges who permitted this prosecuting attorney to turn upon Henry Stevens and ask him whether his mother was a virtuous woman and whether his brother was not the bastard child of a mulatto? No one can pretend that these questions had the remotest connection with the guilt or the innocence of the Stevens brothers. No judge who respected his ermine would have permitted them to be asked. Such a happening would have been unthinkable in an English courtroom. The tables are turned when well-to-do and cultivated people thus suffer the treatment accorded to Negroes, radicals, and friendless folk in general, but the dignity of the courts is not enhanced nor is the cause of justice served.

IN OUR ISSUE of February 18, 1925, we told how Rothschild Francis, editor of the Emancipator of St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, had been prosecuted for libel because of a criticism—which to us seemed quite within bounds—of the local police force. He was declared guilty by Judge George Washington Williams, sitting without a jury. When in a subsequent issue of his newspaper Mr. Francis took exception to this conviction he was again haled before Judge Williams, who sentenced him to jail and a fine for contempt of court. Mr. Francis took an appeal from both convictions to the federal courts in this country, where the conviction for libel was overthrown but the sentence for contempt was upheld. A. A. Berle, Jr., carried the latter decision to the United States Supreme Court in behalf of Mr. Francis, but that tribunal recently refused to review the case. When news of this action reached the Virgin Islands Judge Williams clapped Mr. Francis into jail for the thirty days to which he had been sentenced and, as the editor did not pay the $100 fine which was a part of the punishment, 100 more days in prison were imposed on that account. With fine courage and appreciation of the principles involved, Mr. Francis refused to ask the Governor for a pardon or commutation of sentence.

THAT A MAN of such mediocre abilities and temperamental unfitness for the bench as George Washington Williams should occupy the highest judicial post in the Virgin Islands is due to their remoteness from our continental press and a lack of local democratic control. That Judge Williams should be able to vent his spleen upon so devoted and unselfish a popular leader as Mr. Francis—who had incurred judicial displeasure by opposing the reappointment of Judge Williams—should be an argument in Congress for ending the anomalous and autocratic "temporary government" by naval officers that has spelled political dissatisfaction and economic disaster for the islands since we acquired them almost ten years ago. Incidentally the sentence of Mr. Francis calls attention to the unfairness of compelling a man to work out a fine at the rate of $1 a day. The extreme penalty for contempt of court in the Virgin Islands is thirty days in jail, but to this may be added a fine of $200, which if not paid means 200 days' additional imprisonment. The era is far in the background when even the humblest worker's time could be rated at $1 a day. Prisoners ought to demand a more adequate rate. If necessary to obtain it, they would be justified in walking out.

THE SALE OF THE WHITE STAR LINE to the Royal Mail Steamship Company interests consummates a deal which will be of considerable value to that lame duck, the International Mercantile Marine, an organization to dominate the North Atlantic trade formed by the elder J. P. Morgan on an economically unsound basis. It has been attacked from the beginning as an organization inimical both to American interests and to British interests, for it has meant the operating of ships under three flags by one company. For a long time past the sale of the White Star ships has plainly been called for, but for some mysterious reason the bargain arrived at between the International Mercantile Marine and the Furness-Withy interests, outlined in our editorial of May 12, 1926, failed to go through. The acquisition of the White Star vessels makes Baron Kylsant the world's greatest shipping operator, controlling, as he now does, 538 ships—he bought his first steamer in 1889. Since he became chairman of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company in 1902 it has acquired the fleets of the Pacific Steam Navigation Company, the Glen Line, the Shire Line, the Lamport and Holt Line, the Forwood Line, the Shaw, Savile, and Albion Line, the great Union Castle fleet of fifty vessels, the Elder, Dempster Line, and now the White Star Line. If Baron Kylsant continues absorbing fleets we may yet see almost a monopoly of British shipping in one man's hands.

IN 1895 A MARRIAGE was contracted and solemnized at St. Thomas's Church in New York City. In 1920 the marriage was dissolved and each of the divorced pair married again. In 1926 the original marriage was annulled, declared never to have existed, by the Rota, high court of the Roman Catholic Church. This apparently superfluous formality was carried out in order to regularize in the eyes of that church the second marriage of one of the persons involved, whose Catholic husband was not permitted to marry a divorced woman. If the existence of the second marriage was to have religious recognition the non-existence of the first marriage had to be established. And so the court at Rome annulled, on the ground of coercion, the marriage performed in New York by a Protestant Episcopal bishop. A case of bad professional manners, no doubt, and a silly business all around. But when the ministers of various sects in the United States, from John Haynes Holmes and Harry Emerson Fosdick to John Roach Straton, support Bishop Manning in his denunciation of this infringement of Episcopalian and American rights we are astonished. If Consuelo Vanderbilt, in order to satisfy the demands of her present marriage, finds it necessary to have a previous marriage wiped off the ecclesiastical record why should anybody regret that the legal system of the Church of Rome permits so elastic an interpretation of the marriage vow? But we cannot accept the optimistic belief of the Living Church (High Church Episcopalian) that "marriage standards in Rome and Soviet Russia appear to be approaching a common plane."

Nonsense

OLD China, struggling to give birth to a modern nation, is in a stage of pernicious convalescence. She has been begging the Powers to leave her alone, to stop dosing her with their medicine. And at a moment when she seems to have some hope of pulling herself together, when the Canton group is at last quitting the country, the Powers, deaf these many years, suddenly present their report, which says in effect: We will not change our tactics until you get well. The Extraterritoriality Commission, with Silas Strawn as chairman, having spent some months studying China, notes her chaotic condition and coolly concludes, if the preliminary summaries are to be trusted, that this is no time to change medicine. In the future, maybe, if conditions mend, perhaps, the Powers will consider, possibly, local changes in their claims of extraterritoriality.

This is nonsense. It exhibits an appalling lack of sense of proportion. Here is a solemn report, signed by the representatives of Italy, Spain, Portugal, Japan, Belgium, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, France, the British Empire, and the United States—the "Treaty Powers." Italy, Spain, and Portugal are ruled by military juntas, Japan by a despotic clique; Britain holds India by force alone; Belgium and Italy have compounded their debts, but France is simply stalling, with no apparent intention of paying her debt to the United States; and the United States seems utterly incapable of solving its own gunman and lynching problems. Yet the representatives of these nations presume to sit in judgment on China, to complain that she is governed by military leaders, that her treasury is depleted, that "the extension and protection of the new legal and judicial systems are being retarded," and smugly demand that China reform herself. Before the Powers withdraw their claims to separate jurisdiction in China, they assert, China must reform her police, her prisons, her commercial code ("including negotiable-instruments law, maritime law, and insurance law"), establish modern detention-houses, and so on through a long string of requirements to the condescending conclusion that > After the principal items thereof have been carried out the Powers concerned, if so desired by the Chinese Government, might consider the abolition of extraterritoriality, according to such progressive schemes (whether geographical, partial, or otherwise) as may be agreed upon.

Preposterous as this is on the face of it, it is even more ridiculous in view of the facts of the Chinese situation. China is in civil war; but in her attitude toward foreigners she is united. "The gravest situation since the Boxer uprising," British dispatches call the present patriotic effervescence. The Powers are in no position to dictate to her, partly because there is no government to dictate to, still more because they have no power to coerce four hundred million people scattered along the river valleys of a nation as big as a continent, feeling, thinking, and acting—toward the foreigners—as one. One American diplomat put it thus: "We Westerners are like a man tied to the rear platform of a moving train and trying to keep his footing." China, huge, apparently chaotic, is driving powerfully toward independence. Bit by bit she is destroying the shackling treaties. The Powers can accept gracefully now or, later, yield clumsily; to attempt to refuse is to ignore dynamic facts.

Storm Signals in Mexico

NO, not Mexican signals, but United States signals, and for the fourth time in 1926. Secretary Kellogg has broken loose again. He has, first, inspired a vicious press attack on Mexico apropos of Nicaragua, so that for several days our highly reliable dailies were filled with assertions that from Mexico, that hotbed of Bolshevism, a most dangerous communistic and anti-American propaganda was going all through Central and South America. This he followed up by similarly inspired suggestions that if Mexico persisted in her course in regard to her constitution and land laws there was every prospect that there would be a rupture of diplomatic relations. Simultaneously with this appeared the stories of various minor revolts and of impending revolts in Mexico to which we have already referred. Never was there a clearer case of government-inspired propaganda, and, to our regret, we must record that the Associated Press lent itself to this outrage by carrying the sensational anti-Mexican matter without citing the source. Hitherto it has been Associated Press policy, according to our understanding, to state the origin of a story in order that no charge of being used for propaganda purposes might lie against it.

We regard these developments as serious despite the fact that this is the fourth flurry in this year and that the English oil companies in Mexico have announced their acceptance of those provisions of the Mexican petroleum laws which have so excited our State Department under Messrs. Hughes and Kellogg. Our anxiety is due to the fact that the foreign policy of the United States is in the hands of two exceptionally weak men, Mr. Kellogg and Mr. Coolidge, the latter of whom has, if Washington dispatches are to be trusted, about made up his mind to attempt to break the third-term tradition by becoming a candidate for the Presidency in 1928. Weak men are more to be feared in our foreign affairs than strong men—witness the readiness of William McKinley to plunge this country into war with Spain purely for partisan reasons, to which fact the historian James Ford Rhodes is the latest witness. We are well aware of the high-sounding words used by President Coolidge in regard to our foreign affairs, to which the New York World calls attention in this connection. He said to Congress that for a hundred years we had been pledged "to the peaceful settlement of controversies between nations; by example and by treaty we have advocated arbitration." He also told Congress in his last message that "the policy of our foreign relations, casting aside any suggestion of force, rests solely on the foundation of peace, good-will, and good works." But coming from Mr. Coolidge these sentiments are nothing but the ordinary politician-bunk. They mean nothing. They afford not the slightest guaranty that our policy toward Mexico and Nicaragua will be decent or humane, for Mr. Coolidge is the tool of big business and what big business wants he will do. If our capitalists who have investments in Mexico do not desire to be reasonable and sensible, like their British brethren, we shall undoubtedly have a rupture of diplomatic relations and a policy based upon force—perhaps even a nice little war.

We therefore urge all who have the interest of both countries at heart to rouse themselves once more to make it known in Washington that they do not propose to have the United States play the bully and put itself in the position of attempting to dictate to Mexico what her laws and her constitution shall be—a policy we should never dare to assume toward any country of our own size. Right now is the time to make those protests felt in Washington, not after the breaking off of relations. This time those who deliberately seek strife with Mexico are reinforced by many thousands of our countrymen of the Catholic faith who, not without some reason, feel themselves outraged by the policy of the Mexican Government toward the Catholic faith. President Coolidge wisely refused to make this religious issue the basis of a remonstrance to the Mexican Government—a fact we are glad to record to his credit even though we cannot help suspecting that he was more afraid of the Catholic issue than inspired by a desire to keep his hands off a purely domestic Mexican issue. But multitudes of Catholics will stand behind Congressman John J. Boylan of New York in his announced determination to compel the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House to act upon his resolution for the severance of diplomatic relations with Mexico. Fortunately Senator Borah has spoken out well and refuses to be stampeded in this direction.

Again must we call attention to the deliberate propaganda to get us into war with Mexico. The worst offenders are the owners of the Chicago Tribune and Liberty, men who in their callous disregard of justice and right-dealing are constantly urging upon the United States the forcible annexation of Mexico upon the purely materialistic ground that the Mexicans are not exploiting their natural resources and that therefore we should. Liberty has just been caught printing a picture which purported to portray "Catholics Withdrawing Deposits from the Bank of Mexico in Protest Against the Seizure of Church Property," whereas it was a picture taken and published eleven months before the attempted boycott, in fact before the troubles with the Catholics began, and represented persons depositing instead of withdrawing funds. It is thus that feeling is aroused against Mexico, and always these inciters to strife assume that the United States is inevitably and invariably right, and that we have the power, the right, and the duty to supervise her conduct of her own affairs and even of her foreign relations.

The assertion that Mexico is bolshevik and is spreading bolshevist propaganda is the merest nonsense. Under President Calles, as we have repeatedly pointed out, there is being carried on a progressive, social policy in the interest of the Mexican masses, which the United States in some respects ought rather to be imitating than criticizing. Least of all should there be criticism of her oil laws at the moment when Fall, Sinclair, and Doheny are on trial for alienating part of the birthright of the American people. If certain Mexicans choose to supply arms to revolutionists in Nicaragua, they are merely imitating what United States citizens have been doing in most of the republics to the south of us for the last hundred years. Blustering against Mexico and the threats against her can have only one effect—the rousing of all the Central and South American republics against us.

Britannia Still Rules

THE British Empire has been indulging in a mild session of psychoanalysis. The result is a document which indicates no profound change in the relations of the component parts of the empire, but a considerable gain in self-knowledge. The assembled imperial statesmen admit on paper conditions which already existed in fact. They prove themselves true to the British tradition of writing constitutions only after muddling them out in practice.

We print in the International Relations Section this week the first part of the report of the Inter-Imperial Relations Committee of the Imperial Conference. It has not yet been accepted by the governments concerned, but in view of the fact that the prime ministers of every Dominion participated in its sessions there can be little doubt that the report may be accepted at face value. It declares that "Great Britain and the Dominions" are > autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by common allegiance to the Crown and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

This recognition of the independence and sovereignty of the Dominions is essentially a mere formulation of a fact made evident by the separate membership of the Dominions in the League of Nations, by Canada's independent negotiation of a treaty with the United States, and Ireland's and Canada's appointment of their own ministers to Washington. But it is new as a formulation of a principle which had been growing without definition. To realize how new is the acceptance of that formulation it is only necessary to recall the furore aroused by General Hertzog's speech at Stellenbosch last May (reprinted in The Nation for July 14), when the South African Prime Minister said:

> Each Dominion is, by virtue of its self-governing constitution, created a free, independent state, with the right to international recognition by foreign Powers; but with a common connecting link between itself and Great Britain, centered in the King. . . . All unity among the Dominions themselves and between the Dominions and Great Britain must originate in agreement and cooperation.

For that speech General Hertzog was denounced by the British in South Africa as a traitor to the empire, and at the opening of the Imperial Conference he was treated by the London press as a dangerous wild man. It was not yet permissible to assert in plain words what was already in fact the practice of half the Dominions. Yet after weeks of earnest study the committee has reached a formula which can scarcely be differentiated from General Hertzog's.

It must be recognized that the British Empire is still a dual organism. Recognition of the independence of the Dominions, with a home population essentially similar to that of Great Britain itself, does not alter by one iota the far-flung structure of the great red empire on which the sun never sets. Gibraltar, Malta, Cyprus, Suez, Aden, India, Singapore, Borneo, Hongkong, the Sudan, East and West Africa, Kenya, Rhodesia, the Falkland Islands, the British West Indies, and the rest—they remain as before, outposts of an empire which rules them primarily in its own interest. Nowhere in the report is that harshest of imperial problems, the color line, touched upon. South Africa may, conceivably, have a little freer hand than before in holding down her natives and barring the Hindus; India remains precisely where she was. Some of these domains may be conceived, as Mr. Zimmern optimistically paints them, as part of a parade of colonies marching upward toward dominion status, self-government, and eventual independence, but the Imperial Conference changes their status only in so far as it alters the position of the Dominions, which may be regarded as theirs ideal.

While this long report deals with the intricate questions of independent and semi-independent treaty-making, of dominion merchant marines and of dominion consuls in foreign countries, of conflicts of dominion legislation and of appeal to the Privy Council as a sort of Supreme Court for the empire (characteristically sidestepping this stumbling-block by a thoroughly ambiguous form of words), it nowhere touches upon the questions of imperial preference and of imperial economic unity. The emphasis has shifted since the early post-war days. Then there was talk both of preference and of a joint imperial foreign policy for which the Dominions would share responsibility. Times have changed; the Dominions have in practice worked out their salvation, and in the main this document accepts their independence.

It is an impressive object-lesson in political evolution without the rumble of threatened armed conflict. Since the war the Dominions have grown mightily, and Britain, with some anguish of soul, has had the good sense freely to recognize their new stature. The chief troubles of empire have come not from those regions to which the greatest autonomy has been granted but in those where the ruling country still tries to sit on the lid.

Midway in the Season's Books

THOUGH only one-half of the books announced by American publishers in their fall lists have yet been issued, it is now possible to survey the season with a degree of understanding which will justify generalizations. The first of these is that the much abused two-volume biography is holding its own, at least with the publishers. Poe gets two long biographies almost simultaneously, Hervey Allen and Mary E. Phillips entering into competition for the honor of having written the most exhaustive life of that unhappy man. John Wanamaker, as will be seen in the literary supplement to the present issue of The Nation, gets another without exactly deserving it; it remains to be seen whether Joseph Conrad is worth the two volumes promised by G. Jean Aubry. There can scarcely be a doubt that Asquith and Ex-Secretary Houston in their memoirs, and H. A. L. Fisher and Francis Hirst in their lives of Lord Bryce and Lord Morley, and Sidney Lee in his continuation of the "Edward VII" will make contributions to the history of politics and political theory. Cobden-Sanderson and Rider Haggard, lately dead, have left copious autobiographies. Rupert Hughes's recent volume on George Washington was only the first, presumably, of several which he will publish; and there is still to come an extensive work on Washington —a "pictorial biography"—from Joseph Dillaway Sawyer. Then Walter Edwin Peck will devote two volumes to Shelley, and Percy MacKaye two more to the life of his father in the American theater. The two-volume form, it would seem, is still anything but vanquished.

In the department of literary criticism two developments are particularly noticeable. The American critical renaissance bears fruit this season in three anthologies of contemporary reviews and articles prepared by William A. Drake, Lewis Worthington Smith, and James Cloyd Bowman. The range of theme and skill exhibited by the three volumes will surprise any reader who has not been aware of the strides made within the past five or six years by the Tenth Muse in the United States. In the second place there is a notable increase in the number of volumes devoted to figures in French literature. W. F. Giese's "Hugo," Cleveland B. Chase's "The Young Voltaire," E. B. D'Auvergne's "Pierre Loti," René Benjamin's "Balzac," John Garber Palache's "Gautier and the French Romantics," and Ernest Boyd's and Robert Sherard's studies of de Maupassant—no such attention is being paid just now to any other foreign literature; and while this list may be more or less an accident of the current season, it seems that the younger American writers are set upon making themselves acquainted with both past and contemporary France. The newest idol of all, Paul Valéry, succeeding, as it seems, Anatole France and Remy de Gourmont, is represented by "Variety," a collection of his essays. Anatole France himself, though he is honored with one more volume of reminiscences in the worshipful vein—Kemeri's "Rambles with Anatole France"—hears this year the first echo in America, in a book by Barry Cerf, of the detraction which has been his fate in France almost from the day of his death.

In fiction and poetry we find, as always, old names riding the top of the wave and new ones rising into recognition. This season brings novels or stories from Anderson, Bennett, Cabell, Willa Cather, Zona Gale, Dreiser, Hamlin Garland, Ellen Glasgow, Hergesheimer, Kipling, Maugham, May Sinclair, Van Vechten, Walpole, Wells, and Elinor Wylie. And that might seem to be the whole story—except for the certainty that among the novels by less known persons there are a few which will one day be considered as having made the literary history of 1926. Some of these, it is likely, have received little notice or none; and guessing who of all the newcomers will survive longest is extremely hazardous business. Will it not be, however, one of the following: H. E. Bates, E. R. Eddison, "H. D." (as a novelist), Ernest Hemingway, Frances Newman, Elizabeth Madox Roberts, E. H. Young? As to poetry, the crop is the poorest in years—collections and selections predominating in the list and thus attesting better than anything else could do the lack of current enterprise.

New publishing houses continue to spring up over night. Most interesting this fall are the John Day Company and the Vanguard Press. The first, in accordance with what has come to be the conventional practice, drew much of the talent for its staff from older houses; and its program, so far admirably carried out, is to issue only a few books each season, to see that as many of these as may be are good, to print them well, and to keep their dust-jackets innocent of meaningless superlatives. The Vanguard Press will sell all of its books at cost; and its aim will be to furnish cheaply the means of a radical education. Its reprints from Karl Marx, Ruskin, Tolstoi, Lenin, Kropotkin, Wells, Henry George, Thorstein Veblen, William Morris, Upton Sinclair, Edward Bellamy, Benjamin R. Tucker, Darwin, Haeckel, Buckle, and Lecky promise much in this direction; of the volumes which contain new material time and criticism will have more to say.

Ghosts at the Horse Show

THERE were ghosts at the forty-first annual exhibition of the National Horse Show Association of America, Limited, held in New York the week of Thanksgiving. There was the ghost of Eohippus, rabbit-sized, five-toed, monkey-toothed, tapir-nosed, scurrying about under the flat-backed draft horses. There were the ghosts of Orohippus and Mesohippus and Parahippus and Merichyppus, tossing their fossil heads and prancing on feet which in one stage after another came nearer to the hard, single hoofs of Equus caballus. There were the ghosts of the descendant horses which men learned first to eat, then to draw on the walls of smoky caves, then to ride, then to hitch to carts and plows and chariots and wagons and carriages, and finally, as at the Horse Show, to make the playthings of prosperous leisure. There were the ghosts of chargers screaming on battle-fields, of ponies deep underground in laborious mines, of stallions matched in bloody conflicts for the sport of Vikings, of wild horses sweeping over wilder plains in swift freedom, of mangy, beaten plugs, and of philosophical Houyhnhnms. The two thousand actual horses which trod the neat floor of the arena were but a handful to the ghostly tribes which drifted through and over it.

Not even the elaborate specialization which always marks the Horse Show could drive the ghosts out of mind. Officers' chargers, horses suitable to become hunters, hackneys in harness, novice saddle horses, artillery teams, four-in-hands, ladies' qualified hunters, novice five-gaited saddle horses, thoroughbred hunters, geldings under saddle, tandems, hunt teams, pairs of roadsters, pairs of wagon horses, polo mounts, children's ponies, green hunters other than thoroughbreds—what were all these but the heirs of Eohippus? And what was the intense, patient curiosity of the spectators but a survival of the centuries of interest in man's most diversified servant and pet?

Perhaps acquired characteristics are not inheritable, and perhaps a fondness for horses has not really been handed down from father to son in the human cells themselves. And yet the feeling for horses has so long been so profoundly a part of human culture that a generation of automobiles has only begun to root that feeling out. Even when the last man who ever rode or drove a horse is dead there will still be literature and oral memories. In the meantime, plenty of horses still live to preserve the ancient tradition. They keep to the side of the road while motors rush by them. They have given over to steam and gas the work of drawing the heaviest loads. But on soft ground they have no serious rivals; on the hunting field and the race course they have no rivals to speak of; and in a large department of human affection and concern they have no rivals at all. They are the most splendid playthings ever used by men. If horses should become entirely useless, there would still be men who could not be quite themselves away from stables and paddocks. "The first money I laid out," said Lemuel Gulliver on his return from his travels, "was to buy two young stone-horses, which I keep in a good stable, and next to them the groom is my greatest favourite."

Those ghosts at the Horse Show were not merely shadows out of history. They were strands woven into the complex constitution of mankind itself.

These Modern Women

Why I Earn My Own Living

ANONYMOUS

[This is the second of a series of anonymous articles giving the personal backgrounds of women active in professional and public life. Our object is to discover the origin of their modern point of view toward men, marriage, children, and jobs. The next article is by a lawyer who was brought up in the South.]

FOR thirty years I walked primly, directing my course by the social guide-posts set up in a New England town for the direction of well-born, well-bred little ladies. Then I broke loose. My former friends consider me a sort of wild woman because I earn my own living, do not take my husband's name, and have been known to live in strange, dirty neighborhoods where the rents are lower. To myself I seem much the same person who used to leave properly engraved visiting-cards on proper occasions at proper houses.

I earn my living as a matter of course now, but the habit started from a childish sense of guilt at making my parents so much trouble. My mother took life rather hard. She was extremely sensitive to responsibility; she hated routine duties, but her conscience forced her to perform them scrupulously. Again and again she gave up the nerve-racking struggle and took to her bed, discovering nervous prostration long before it was recognized by the medical profession and taken up generally by distressed gentlewomen. Both she and I thought that taking care of me was what made her sick.

Like all children I was a complete egoist. My world revolved around myself and when it was a clouded world I assumed that I was to blame. There was always in the foreground some naughtiness like screaming against bedtime, demanding a toilet where there was none, refusing to wear a certain dress, or being impertinent. I could not comprehend that my parents' gloom came as much from being married to each other as from being my father and mother. Early in life I figured out that the least I could do for two people who had done so much for me was as soon as possible to earn my own living. I hoped thus to lessen my sense of guilt in living at all. Some of my playmates, now middle-aged, have tried to assuage a similar feeling in a different way; they have continued in their childhood homes instead of forming independent ties and their parents have become their children.

Later on, I carried over into my marriage the old, illusive sense of guilt and a passionate desire to be no trouble to my husband. I had the naive belief that men loved best women who were no bother to them. I had the curious idea that my husband would admire my power to earn money and be proud of my standing in my profession.

The working-for-wages habit was well established before I turned critical eyes on the courtship, engagement, and marriage customs of my town. In the large city where I had received a school appointment after graduating from college, I "poured" at "receptions," played atrocious bridge, went to dances, taught in Sunday school, and expected to marry a pleasant house with steam heat, electricity, and a husband. Until I was more than thirty years old I restrained from thoughts about sex because "there is time enough for that after you are married."

Through the printed word I escaped the dreary commonplace. The verses of Hovey, Carman, and Le Gallienne were my creed. I soaked up the saccharine art of the Pre-Raphaelites in English galleries and mooned about the English Lake district, tested life by the philosophy of Hall Caine and Marie Corelli, adored Maude Adams and Sothern (before he took to Shakespeare), and wrote diluted love lyrics.

The girls of my little group of young folks were all weltering in sentimentality, but they were mostly able to distinguish between reality and fantasy. The other girls didn't try to make an apple-pie by the rule for a sonnet. They wrapped their affections about young men who had what was called "character" in distinction to "personality." After marriage they discarded romantic fancies and stagnated in mild discontent. But I had only one foot firmly planted on solid respectability; the other was sliding round on romance. You recognize this situation as what we now name "a conflict of desires."

The romantic side of my nature led me to pick out a charming man in the city where I was teaching. Or did he pick me out? I do not know; it was love at first sight; and, looking back, I would not have missed it for the world. The practical side of my nature compelled me to take him home to my parents to be approved. They refused their approbation. The man had been divorced, he was a Socialist, and had been brought up as a Catholic. My home circle was monogamous, Republican, and Protestant. One marriage, one political party, one church were the portion of one individual in those days.

My parents declined to accept my man as a son-in-law. I would not marry him without their consent because "a bad daughter makes a bad wife"; yet I wouldn't give him up because life without him was too utterly dreary. The outcome was that he went back to the city to make a fortune as a substitute for "character," while I returned to teach school in my home town. In those days an engaged girl stayed with her parents during her engagement because she was so soon to leave them. I spent my leisure filling my Hope Chest. All my lingerie was made by hand. It took longer than we expected for my fiancé to make a fortune and I watched myself grow older.

My man actually did make a fortune. But he married a woman who, I afterward learned, had been working and living with him during his long, hard pull. Everyone was satisfied but me. I was mad clear through. I had been a good daughter and had lost my lover thereby. I had no desire to be anything but good, but I did not want to be punished for it. Reviewing the affair, I could not see that anyone was to blame. The code had let me down.

Then and there I renounced allegiance to ready-made codes. I again left my home town and went away to work out my salvation or destruction. I had to be free to study what had happened to me and to figure out a working plan for my life. Being self-supporting I was able to move about. Even now I do not like to recall the suffering of that period. For several years the world was a gray fog spinning about me. Every guide-post by which I had directed my course had been swept away. I had lost, not a lover but a universe.

Intense curiosity awoke in me. Always I had repressed questionings because they led to criticism of the fundamentals of society. The brain cannot function if it is not allowed to question, and my intelligence was as weak as that of a new-born babe. I got a job reading in libraries, gathering material for a writer. Seven hours a day I put in on the assigned subjects and the rest of the time I read about anarchy, sex, votes-for-women, education, divorce, and similar topics. I read till my eyes puffed out and my head was splitting. I went to university lectures and also met soap-box orators. I gobbled ideas.

Books were not enough. I went in for people, plunged headforemost into crowds. I lived in a tenement, worked in factories, and went to meetings and meetings and meetings. The sweat, the vulgarity, the commonness of humans in the bulk were both a horror and a pleasure to me. I experimented conscientiously with being "wicked," and was keenly disappointed to find so little excitement in sinning and so little sense of guilt.

The driving emotion of that period of my life was curiosity. I was insatiable concerning every subject with which I came in contact. I even got jobs to investigate wages, prostitution, fire-escapes. Because I had known so little I wanted to know everything. I prowled the world like a cat on the housetop. Along with curiosity went pity. My own suffering had opened my eyes to the suffering all about me. Working conditions, living arrangements, the general social code seemed to me extraordinarily stupid. I discovered that I was not the only woman uncomfortable in the world. The office charwoman's cracked hands were dyed brown from washing filthy floors; growing girls lugged heavy babies about the playgrounds; prostitutes complained because they had to hand over their earnings to pimps; virtuous women shriveled at their desks; men got the good jobs.

I flung my puny strength into the fight for social legislation. Occasionally the group with which I worked got some well-intentioned law passed, but immediately a new condition arose which was different but quite as intolerable. My reaction to the suffering which I could not assuage was similar to my attitude toward my broken heart; since I could do nothing about it, I would pass on.

I reacted violently at that time against all established institutions, like marriage, spanking, meat diet, prisons, war, public schools, and our form of government. The mere fact that a condition existed was evidence to me that it was wrong. Yet as I watched the lives of those radicals who dared live their rebellion, the rebels appeared to get no more satisfaction than did the conformists and smugness seemed equally common among both extremes. I did some experimenting myself, and never have I found any completely satisfactory arrangement of financial, social, or personal relationships. The wise course now seems to me to decide what one wants, whether one can get it, whether or not it is worth the price that must be paid, and then to go after it. "Will it work?" is my moral code.

Although I supported myself in the beginning because I thought it was my duty it has become a matter of course. I have no principles on the subject but I prefer money-earning to being dependent on a father, a lover, or a husband. Dependent women seem hampered even more than wage-earning ones. Likewise I hold no brief for or against marriage, having tried celibacy, free union, and marriage.

I do not know what woman's job in life is, any more than I know what man's job is. And I feel it is rather silly to drag sex into the matter. My journalistic career, the fact that I have turned to account in printed word and cold cash the curiosity that drove me in my groping middle years, is the source of a certain pride and self-confidence which is the springboard for my future. Now, at forty-odd, I stand where the young man of thirty stands, with enough solid achievement behind me to nourish an ambition to do still bigger things. I see quite plainly that it is the fact of my being a woman which has delayed me fifteen years in reaching this point. It is nobody's fault; I was born in circumstances which our generation has helped to destroy. The younger women seem able to get away to a start without so much muddling.

The Hall-Mills Case in the Newspapers

By SILAS BENT

NOT since Harry Thaw killed Stanford White has the American press found crime news so much to its taste as the Hall-Mills mystery. Tons of white paper have been covered with trivial details about clothes, with personalities and highly colored descriptions of individual deportment in the courtroom. Somerville, N. J., is by journalistic consent the news center of the world. The New York Times has already devoted to the trial (which is by no means completed as this is written) more words than Theodore Dreiser needed for the development of his monumental novel, "An American Tragedy." The others have not been idle. Enough words have been sent out of the Jersey village to fill nine volumes of the "Encyclopaedia Britannica."

A giant telegraph switchboard, incorporating 120 "positions," has been rigged up in the basement of the courthouse. The daily capacity by Morse code is half a million words, and the telephone company has imported eight additional operators to help move the spoken load. A noteworthy aspect of this trial is the variety of "trained seals" who are helping to report it. The daughter and widower of Eleanor Mills, one of the murder victims, are signing stories for a syndicate, but do not write them. Mrs. Henry Stevens, wife of one of the defendants, is writing for Cyrus H. K. Curtis's papers, which have also assigned to the case Dorothy Dix, their staff counselor and consoler of the lovelorn. The reverend fundamentalists, Billy Sunday and John Roach

Straton, are moralizing for the public benefit on the sudden death of their fellow-clergyman, Edward W. Hall. For a time former Police Commissioner Enright contributed stodgily to the Hearst string; but the brunt of this work is now being done by Rita Weiman, a playwright; Louella Parsons, a movie reviewer, and Damon Runyon, a sports writer. (Reporters are in the minority, apparently.) The Hearst papers are also represented by specialists on "heart interest," legal aspects, features, defense, prosecution, and so on. The number of employees, counting photographers and messengers, is seventeen. The News, which serves also its elder brother, the Chicago Tribune, has a staff of nineteen on the job, and is signing half a dozen names. The reams printed in the Times are ground out by anonymous dru[illegible]

The Hall-Mills case affords an excellent opportunity to observe the methods and practices of metropolitan newspapers. I have measured the space given to news and pictures of the trial in three representative journals: the Times, which advertises that its circulation is "among intelligent, thinking, substantial persons, a quality of readers not equaled by any other newspaper"; William Randolph Hearst's American; and New York's most widely read tabloid, the Daily News. These three have a combined average morning circulation of more than a million and three-quarters, and they are not overlapping circulations. A tabulation of the three for twenty days (including three Sabbaths, Armistice Day, and one suspension on account of a witness's illness, when no court sessions were held) shows the following results in column inches for news and illustrations, and in total number of words:

	News	Pictures	Words
Times	4,893	2,90.5	338,000
American	4,656.5	1,903	232,800
News	2,991.5	2,138.5	149,000

The American ran second to its picture paper competitor in the space accorded to photographs, drawings, and maps, and second to the Times in the number of column inches devoted to news. The Times used fine type plentifully, and squeezed in more words to the column inch than any of its competitors. The News was chosen for this examination instead of the competing tabloid picture paper, Hearst's Daily Mirror, because the Mirror, having turned up the case, and having gathered practically all the evidence on which the prosecution relied, had the inside track. The News plunged knee-deep into the story with unblushing gusto; both the Times and the American honored it with editorial clarification—or justification. "It is to the public interest," said the Times, in a dignified half-column editorial, "and not merely because it is a 'celebrated case,' that there should be a full report in the newspapers of the trial of Mrs. Hall and her brothers. . . . His [Special Prosecutor Simpson's] inquiry was conducted with all the help he could get from the press, because it was Mr. Simpson's theory that publicity might encourage witnesses to come forward." And so on. (The Mirror had found the witnesses.) The American came out flatly: "If ever publicity was warranted, it is here. Human interest is instinctively keen over money, sex, and religion." Arthur Brisbane, in his signed first-page editorial column, saw no need of defending the journalistic ethics involved. "This horrible case," said he, "will again remind men that whoever stirs up jealousy stirs up danger."

The Times ran no first-page head more than three columns wide, but used eight-column streamers inside. The Mirror ran a streamer across the top of its first page every day, whether or not there was any news, as did the American, except that the streamer was sometimes only six columns wide.

After the Armistice Day interlude the Times led Page One with a sympathetic forecast of the defense, although there were still seven days to come of testimony for the prosecution. The first object of attack, the Times story said, would be a calling-card found at the clergyman's feet, bearing a finger-print identified by State witness as Willie Stevens's. The Times spoke of the finger-print as a "black smudge, a vague and partly obliterated mark." The News devoted less than one hundred words to the testimony of Philip A. Payne, managing editor of the Mirror, who took the stand for the prosecution and who was responsible for damaging its rival's circulation and prestige.

It is impossible to accord the palm for thrilling narrative to any one of the three papers I have been studying. Take your choice, for example, of these selections from the news of a single day, the day an effigy of Mrs. Mills's head was exhibited:

From the Daily News:

> Mrs. Hall went to a matinee yesterday.
>
> The rich widow who is battling for her life . . . attended a hideous exhibition staged for her benefit. . . .
>
> But she could not look at it.
>
> Her brothers looked. The show fascinated them.

From the American:

> Ah, yes, this Mrs. Frances Noel Stevens Hall is human, after all. . . .
>
> Human—and a woman!
>
> She showed it yesterday afternoon.
>
> The proud, stoical front she has been presenting to the world as she sits in the little chapel-like courtroom in Somerville . . . was shaken by a distinct shudder.

From the Times:

> Shudders passed along the rows of spectators as the doctor marked in red crayon the entry point of the bullets, or in a sweeping motion of the crayon showed how the choir singer's throat had been cut. . . . Mrs. Frances Stevens Hall had shot a second's glance at the exhibit and had averted her eyes. When it was placed on the witness stand railing, directly in her line of vision, she reached quickly into her pocketbook and began to examine the documents. She dropped coins, one by one, into the black leather purse; she looked fixedly at the back of the room, then her eyes traveled to one of the small galleries. She seemed to be counting the spectators.

The tabloids are reviving an obsolescent form of journalistic activity. In the days of the Guldensuppe case, for instance, the Times and World and Sun did their own investigating, and murder mysteries were solved. How much real newspaper work was done on the Elwell murder mystery? It remained unsolved. The standard-sized newspapers appear now to be too lazy or too respectable for that sort of thing. They wait for a "privilege of publication." They wait for dunderheaded policemen to do the work, and apparently the work doesn't get done. Perhaps the despised and irrepressible tabloid has more to its credit than we suspected. Whether right or wrong in its facts, the Mirror followed a long journalistic tradition. If the accused were innocent, they should have been cleared four years ago; that the case came so late to trial is due not only to the defects of "Jersey justice" but to the change in the press.

—by Harry S. Bressler

Jefferson's Disciples—1926 Model

DENVER WELCOMES QUEEN MARIE

THE DENVER POST

CITY

ROYAL GUESTS GIVEN GREAT OVATION BY CITY THRONGS

Auditorium Is Filled At Reception for Sovereign

VISITORS DELIGHTED

MARIE CLIMBS INTO LOCOMOTIVE'S CAB

Inspects Mysteries Of Engine During Stop in Canon

VIEWS HOT SPRINGS

THE WEATHER

FAIR

THE POST Telephone Main Six Thousand

TODAY

(By Arthur Brisbane.)

QUEEN MARIE TALKS TO CROWD OF 14,000 AT CITY AUDITORIUM

Even Sun Welcomes Me in Denver, She Says—Thanks Citizens for Turning Out to Meet Her

COOK REFUSES TO TELL WHAT QUEEN ATE FOR BREAKFAST

DENVER PLANE SETS NEW ALTITUDE MARK

TO MARIE, RUMANIA'S GLORIOUS QUEEN:

ALL DENVER WILL CELEBRATE EIGHTH ARMISTICE ANNIVERSARY

Monster Parade to Feature Day—City to Observe General Holiday and Period of Silence To Honor War Dead.

CORONER'S JURY BRANDS ROSSI WIFE MURDERER

Shot Her Five Times as

FIFTEEN CHILDREN DIE AS TORNADO LEVELS SCHOOL

Twister Cuts 500-Yard-Wide Path Thru Small Town in Maryland.

MARIE WRITES FOR THE POST

They are the only published statement... that come directly from

Jeffersonism in Denver: Democracy Receives a Queen

Toward the Arctic Ocean

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

[This is the last of a series of three articles describing the author's trip across Mongolia from the Chinese to the Trans-Siberian Railway.]

THREE days were usually needed to obtain permission to leave Mongolia, but Nikiforoff, the Russian Consul, was eager to be rid of a troublesome visitor, and sent his secretary with me to make the rounds of the magnificent collection of secret-service, passport, and police departments with which the would-be modern Mongols toy. Cars started for Siberia, so read the announcement in the Russian newspaper of Urga, every Saturday at nine. At 9:30 a boy came to inquire whether I really wanted to leave that day. They would rather, he said, wait until Monday. I explained that I wanted to catch the weekly Trans-Siberian express on Wednesday. The boy took the message; an hour later he returned to say that the ice on the rivers was breaking, and it was doubtful whether we could make the Wednesday train anyway. I replied that I was more than ever convinced that we had better start at once and be sure of the next week's train. And finally, after long discussions, it was so agreed. The nine o'clock car called for me at half past two. The chauffeur, Mikhail Vassilievich, was an American-type lad, clever with his hands and quick at invention; the other passengers were his sister, returning to Moscow; Bajin, a merchant, and a peasant who lived eighty versts from Urga. None of them spoke any Western language but Russian.

Down the side-valleys into Urga thousands of ox-carts were pouring—long caravans of two or three hundred, each cart loaded with a huge section of tree-trunk, or with chunks of charcoal, the last two or three with hay to feed the oxen on the long trek from the forest to the city. The Holy Mountain across the river is tree-covered with the only trees for forty miles, but the wood of the sacred mountain may not be cut. Until dark we tugged up through one rolling bare valley after another, lifeless except for a single covey of ptarmigans. The brown sweep of the hills reminded one of those magnificent pictures of more Western hills in "Grass." We crossed three passes before dark, always to find new mountains opening before us. The road was a camel-track, sometimes barely wide enough for a car, sometimes broadening hundreds of yards wide across the meadows where camels and ox-carts had sought fresh routes in place of trodden mire. Sometimes it disappeared in hard hummocky meadows or hillsides of jagged rocks. The driver, who had never been over the route before, kept his eyes glued on the ruts of a previous car.

It was nine o'clock when we came to a river—and the tracks were lost. The ice was broken; melting snow had swollen the current. Passengers piled out; we hunted the valley up and down for a possible ford, or for tracks of the preceding car. But it had done as we—crawled to the edge of the river at a score of points, and then backed out. At one point the ice seemed safe; our peasant-passenger tried it—and broke through, above his waist in ice-water. It was midnight before we finally found automobile tracks that entered the river; we tested the depth with a stick, slipped gently into the stream, and roared safely up the opposite bank with a cheer. And it was after midnight when we routed out the Chinese keepers of a lonely mountain inn and had a belated supper.

We rose at four the next morning, and were off soon after five, with tea and bread inside us. About ten we came to the home of our peasant-passenger, a lone pioneer log cabin away up in one of the high Mongolian valleys. He had hauled his wood thirty miles, built his own house and barns, and was enormously proud of his work. Even his furniture was home-made, except for an American Singer sewing machine! He gave us fresh boiled eggs, and fresh milk, and soft home-made bread, baked from his own wheat flour. There are scores of such Russian frontiersmen pushing their way into Northern Mongolia, and a few Chinese farmers; but the Mongols, desperately afraid that their grazing-land will be lost, oust them on any excuse.

The mountains lay cold and bare to the south but warmly birch-wooded on the northern slopes. We ran smoothly from one valley to another, then down to the ford of the Khara-gol River. But the ice was out at the edges and the water flowing swiftly. A lone Mongol on horseback made his way through the water and across the ice, but there was no hope for a heavy car. We backed off and tried again, and again. But the spring warmth was against us, and the black water turned us away. Twenty miles downstream, the Mongol told us, was a wooden bridge—almost the only bridge in Mongolia.

We found the bridge but could not get to it. One route after another across the soggy meadows proved impossible. The road for a mile short of the bridge was a canal of deep, soft, moving mud. We tried it once, and worked for an hour to back the car out of the slippery ooze. Deep ditches three feet wide, with swirling water, ran on either side of it, and shallow mud-lakes lay beyond these. Finally Bajin and I, prospecting on foot, worked out a route which lay across meadows part of which were under water but at least seemed snow-covered or grassy, not mere mud. The car maneuvered into position, attacked the course, ran half way smoothly, then stopped, up to the hubs in ice-water. There was nothing to do but push—not a living soul within twenty miles; not a service-station within three hundred. Bajin and I rolled our trousers to the knees, which was sometimes not enough, took off shoes and stockings, and for the next two hours waded among ice-cakes, adding our feeble man-power to the sturdy engine of the car. By mid-afternoon we were within a few yards of the bridge—with the swirling ditch still in front of us. We spent the rest of the afternoon tearing up a corduroy road and building a bridge across the ditch. Almost at sunset we rolled blithely across the river, and sped, at a perilous angle, along the edge of the mountain, across the valley, the road being deep in water; then turned north again, over more Alpine passes. I have seldom seen a lovelier sunset than that night, the sky's fire reflected from a thousand pools in the river-bottom—but the chauffeur, who knew that the road lay through those flaming pools, was utterly unmoved when I pointed to the reflections.

Four more rivers we crossed the next day. The ice was gone from the first, and the stream was too deep for a Dodge unaided. We unlashed the bags from the running-boards and piled them high inside the car, took out the carbureter, greased the rest of the engine, and hired two horses to haul us through. The second river we boldly forded. The third, after long hesitations and soundings, we crossed on the ice—safely. The fourth, the Ura, was a longer story. The ice was out and the river ran free along both shores, but the center ice seemed solid. From the near shore the Mongols had built a log bridge out to the solid ice; on the north side the ice came so close to the sloping shore that it seemed safe. We reinforced the log bridge; the car gently slid across it, raced across the ice for the far shore, when—crack! the Dodge plunged through, whirred a moment, and lapsed into discouraging silence. And there it sat, in the river above the hubs, water flowing through the bottoms of both my bags. Fortunately, we were close to a Mongol village, and they had a boat. We were ferried to dry land; again we rolled up our trousers and waded in; we hitched a dozen ropes to the car, and Mongols, Russians, and American slowly hauled the car out of the river and up on the sand.

Toward evening I saw mountain-peaks to the north which looked blue instead of brown; and suddenly I became aware that their skylines were fuzzy, like the skylines of the wooded mountains at home. The ranges flattened out and the country softened. Aspens, birches, and pines mingled with one another—occasionally we actually ran through forest, as one never does in lowland China or in high Mongolia. We passed tiny villages of Russian pioneers—pushing into the wilderness, building their own houses, and contriving their own machinery, self-dependent and resourceful—the Americans of the next century. That third night we reached Troitskosavsk, the frontier town, and slept, with an army of cockroaches, in a Russian inn.

Customs officials cannot be hurried. It was easy enough to get out of Mongolia, but it took most of a day to get into Russia. Every parcel and paper was pried into. With some difficulty I conveyed the idea that I still hoped to catch the weekly train next afternoon, and at length we got out again. More rolling, treeless country that evening, and more deep sand. It seemed strange but friendly to see occasional bits of plowed land and even fences. Toward midnight, just short of the great Selenga River, we roused a peasant village and found a family willing to take us in for the night and give us tea. The [illegible] struck me in the face as the door opened. It must have been carefully preserved all winter—and eleven people were more or less asleep on the floor, including a sick baby; but when I attempted casually to lean against the door and keep it open for a minute they came to me and pointed out that the malinka was ailing and must not suffer fresh air. I slept in the car, and got four and a half hour's better sleep than I had had since Urga. Mongol huts have one advantage over Russian—they leak air.

The great Selenga River lay ahead, a big navigable stream, to be crossed twice. But the Selenga ice was [illegible] than we knew. It had broken a bit at the edges, but log bridges had been laid, and we were past the first crossing before six. We passed Selenginsk—a little one-story town dominated by two huge green-roofed, blue-bulbed churches—and then wandered miles out of our course. But finally we came upon the new road which marks the route of the future Trans-Mongolian Railroad, and while it was soft and unfinished, most of the lesser bridges had been built and were usable. Wind drove the loose sand into our faces, but we were covering the miles. Our long detour and the bad roads, however, had cost us so much gas that the chauffeur was doubtful whether we could get through. At 1:30 we were only thirty versts from the goal, the meter showed one and a half gallons of gas, and we stopped to eat. Five miles short of the railroad the meter showed zero, but the car puffed on, and we caught the weekly train with half an hour to spare! And that is the route over which some say Russia ships great quantities of munitions to her friends in China!

A pro-Russian Mongolian poster showing England reaching over the Himalayas, knife and telegraph in hand to ensnare and threaten Tibet; the Chinese colonizer enters from the East; Mongolia tends her sheep; and Red Russia stands guard.

Six days crossing the snowy plains of Siberia—endless, half-cultivated, still in the log-cabin stage, but looking forward to a boundless future with a boundless self-confidence. Siberia is American in its spaciousness, its optimism, its faith in its future.

Four days in Moscow, where Henry Ford and Lenin are enshrined as twin gods, where a cult of American mechanism is arising, along with new skyscrapers, electric sky-signs, and even talk of a subway, and mingles its familiar jargon with the lingo of communist ideals.

Two more days, and I was back in Western Europe, where frontiers huddle on frontiers, where men bathe and talk familiar languages and wear familiar clothes—a land achingly nostalgic, living on memories of the good old days before the war, praying for *re*storation, *re*construction, *re*building, always looking backward. A continent where the great races of the nineteenth century do not know that their moment of history is done.

China still slumbers, perhaps—but she has never lost faith in herself, and today, with the weapons of the West in hand, retains her ancient pride in the power of her four hundred million citizens; Mongolia is an interlude, a dying race that once ravaged a continent awakening, as all Asia will awaken, and rubbing its eyes in a new dawn; Russia is a bridge between East and West, enormous, a young people four times as numerous as America was a half century ago and as sure of an infinitely expanding future—and the little crowded countries that have made history on that Western plain of Europe, blinking behind their customs frontiers and separate armies and diplomatic staffs and mutual hates and jealousies, seem pitiful, lost, unimportant in comparison with these mighty peoples.

China, Russia, America—these are nations of the future. They are none of them meek, but they will inherit the earth.

Gasless America

By STUART CHASE

OUR culture complex—as the anthropologists say—is changing, nay, has changed. While England and Germany still remain coal civilizations, the United States has become, with unheard-of rapidity, a gasoline civilization. The acid test of a culture complex is the nursery. In American nurseries the choo-choo gathers dust on the topmost shelf while the red racer holds the position of honor on the floor. Little Archie can tell you on the nail the make of every car that passes him. The grocer boy will call it a day any time to help you change a tire. Where is the urchin who has not mastered the calisthenics of the traffic cop?

Of a Sunday, in front of the Church of the Immaculate Conception in Pittsburgh one may behold an impressive ceremony. One by one, all day long, motor cars draw up before the church door. A priest sprinkles each with holy water and pastes upon the car a seal which insures automobile, driver, and passengers the protection of St. Christopher, lately appointed the patron saint of motor cars.

Ten years ago the consumption of gasoline in the United States was 300 million barrels; today it is 800 million barrels. Ten years ago there were two million cars in the country; today there are over twenty million. It is gasoline which has girdled the country with 300,000 miles of magnificent highways; decreased distances between communities as no other form of transportation has ever done; and with the shrinkage, stamped identical habit patterns upon the citizens of Boston, New York, Atlanta, New Orleans, Kansas City, Salt Lake, Los Angeles, and Seattle. It is gasoline which now propels, in motor trucks, more gross tonnage of freight than the railroads move. The Florida boom would have been unthinkable without gasoline. In the last few years has appeared the strange phenomenon of gasoline gipsies—uncounted thousands of families on the march from one automobile camping ground to the next, the country over. It is gasoline which has made possible the mass production of week-ends—the synthetic gin is only a by-product—which has made the reclamation of abandoned farmhouses by city folks a major industry; which has quadrupled the radius between the skilled worker's home and his job; which has built golf courses and demoralized the working schedules—to say nothing of the pantaloons—of practically the entire business world above $7,500 a year; which has in the guise of the tractor revolutionized farming methods; which has created the road house, the night club, put the hot-dog industry on its feet, added stupendous efficiency to the art of banditry. No saxophone blows without a faint whiff of gasoline behind it; no silver screen can flicker without its parking lines outside. It is gasoline, not cosmetics, which has given the flapper her final polish, and made the boy friend what he is.

Which brings us to the folkways of courtship. No longer do we love by dim gaslight but by dimmed headlights —and gasoline. Cruise around the outskirts of any city or town on a summer night and note the parked and silent monsters up every lane, before every vista where moonlight sparkles on the water; tail lights glowing, and kisses warm above the steering wheel.

Dr. Watson holds, not without some show of reason, that what chiefly marks off man from the other animals are language habits. The influence of gasoline on the American language is profound. A whole new dialect of slang has been created, much of which in due time will force its way into accredited forms of speech. Coming down Tuckerman's Ravine on Mount Washington the other day, we overtook a girl in riding breeches, resting on a rock. "Pretty stiff drop," said we, obeying the courtesies of mountain trails. "Tough on the brake bands," said she with equal courtesy. "Step on it, kid"; "park your hat here"; "I've been goin' it on high for a month"; "aw, put it in reverse"; "a regular self-starter"; "flivvered out"; "throwing the Rolls Royce"; "you've got water in your mixture"; "a six-cylinder guy."

Gasoline will start the next war; gasoline in airplanes carrying poison gas will win the next war—or end the career of homo sapiens—it is not quite clear which.

And now comes this aggregation of flat tires, the Federal Oil Conservation Board, and wants to conclude it all by giving us only six more years of gasoline production at the present rate in America. The threat is grotesque, inconceivable. A law must be rushed through Congress prohibiting it. From the roar of the gusher and the shrieks of the spectators to the last flying explosion in the muffler, gasoline runs—the heart's blood of the nation. Six years—and then a gasless America! The mind reels at the contemplation of it. What? No taxis, traffic cops, Dixie highways, one-way streets, better Buicks, Standard Oil companies, filling stations, schoolgirl complexion billboards, airplanes, football stadia (for how could they be filled?), five-ton trucks, Klaxon horns, 25,000 new graves a year, Saturday Evening Post advertising, Fifth Avenue buses, road maps, dash-board architecture, lubricating oils, four-wheel brakes, Diesel engines, instalment selling, "Punkville 4 miles, Goodrich Tires," Tumble Inns, submarines, Ye Olde Antique Shoppes, gunmen in Packards, back-seat driving, back-seat kisses?

America without gas is a pipe without tobacco, a hearth without a fire, a suit without trousers. . . . Death rather!

The New Generation

By MATHER A. ABBOTT

[An address delivered by the headmaster of Lawrenceville School before the Rotary Club of Trenton, New Jersey, on Armistice Day, 1926.]

AS I looked over my boys this morning, when we were celebrating Armistice Day in chapel, I said to myself: "The war is an ever-present evil with me. I suffered so much during my three years in the navy—we all suffered so much—that we can never forget it. But not one of these fellows knows anything about it. The oldest boys were only ten years old when the Armistice was signed." Then I saw a picture. I saw a picture of myself at eighteen, and the world as it was then, and a picture of this maelstrom of a world in which our boys are now placed. Think of it, and remember your youth. In the last eight years we have had:

1. Prohibition and all it entails.
2. The ubiquitous automobile.
3. The cheap theater, especially the movies, with its sex problems.
4. The absence of parental control.
5. The ignoring of religion.
6. The emancipation of womanhood, combined with the modern dance.

There are just six things. Now, when we were eighteen, liquor was hardly thought of. We knew there were certain boys that used to drink and we did not often associate with them. As for carrying a pocket flask, it was practically unknown. When we took a girl out for a drive, we had to hire a one-horse rig and we were all properly chaperoned and looked after. We had no cheap theaters and no movies. Our parents were addressed as "sir" and "ma'am," and their word was absolute law. God was an ever-present power, whom we held in deadly awe. Imagine our feelings if a lady, with a cigarette in her mouth and drinking a cocktail, should have shown herself at one of our dinner parties thirty years ago! That sort of thing we relegated to certain streets which had red lights. And the modern dance I saw first in 1902, when I went up the Nile, in certain Ethiopian villages where the tomtom was no louder than the present-day drum! Into this maelstrom the modern youth has come, knowing nothing else, and you and I and all the members of this parental generation are absolutely responsible if youth is going to the devil. But it is not!

I have been in the business of teaching boys for thirty years. I have at present under my charge 540 boys collected from nearly every State, and I have never known a more truthful, clean-living, honorable set of young men. They are different from the boys of my youth as the sun is from the moon—full of nonsense, full of passion, headstrong, mischief-loving, but five times as decent, as truthful, and as manly. Let me describe them to you:

In the first place, their leading characteristic is that they must prove everything by trying it. They do not begin where we leave off, as we want them to do; they must go through every experience themselves. They take nothing for granted. They want facts, not camouflage. They can see the false through a ten-inch board. They have an almost devilish intuition—I say "devilish" because I have been caught so often! They will have nothing of what they call "bull" on the part of an older person. I would rather talk to five thousand people of your age than I would to my five hundred boys. I have to be so abominably careful that I can prove every word I say!

Secondly, the absence of religious instruction in their youth. Unfortunately, the mothers are too busy to give the fireside and bedside talks that they used to give the little fellows, and the fathers are too busy in business even to tell them the truth about the sex problem. Now you cannot prove the other world and you cannot prove God, and the modern generation will not accept anything you cannot prove. So, though "the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom," the modern generation is practically without it. Since the great fear which held us is absent, these boys, having the spiritual longings that all boys have, are restless. Unwilling to face the deep questions of life, they try to seek happiness in the material, and most of this desire that we hear so much of for a thrill, for breaking the law, and so on, comes from an unanswered longing within, which they think they are going to satisfy with material things, only to find that the material things cannot satisfy. So these lurid tales we hear are usually caused, not by any evil in the boy or girl, but by the untrammeled pursuit of truth which is so evident in all the young of our generation. They want to realize everything and, of course, you and I, in our maturity, know that very few things in this world can be realized. In this connection, I wish to use a place nearby as an illustration. This town has suddenly become notorious, but I believe there are 20,000 people in it who are not notorious, who are living lives that are decent and straight and true. But the news of a certain family in the town blackens every paper every morning. So it is with these stories of the youth of today. They are frightful stories, absolutely true, most likely, but I do not believe that 10 per cent of our youth could be thus characterized. If we looked upon the notorious happening in that town as the rule, where would America be going? But it is the great exception. So with these lurid stories; they, too, are the great exceptions.

Now, lastly, the equalization of the sexes: When you and I were boys, woman was on a pedestal; we worshiped her. There was pursuit; there was mystery; there was worship. Did we worship that which was true or that which was false? The worship has gone, disappeared, and I am told that modesty, too, has gone. Perhaps it has, but we are getting at facts; we are getting at companionship; we are getting at the truth. The double standard has vanished. Of course, there are terrific calamities, terrific failures, but out of them there is going to come something remarkable.

To sum up, therefore, what do I find? First, a truth-lover. Second, a word of honor that is never broken. Third, a reasonable being that will not take a rule as final until it is approved. Fourth, and most astonishing, on the whole, a clean-minded individual. And then—what will always happen where God is not regarded as supreme, what has happened throughout history where a nation has given up its God—a restlessness that is always unaccountable, a dissatisfaction of mind which makes the youth probe into things we never thought of going into, which we took on faith. Also, many failures, many disasters, as there always are in a great upheaval, where freedom gets confounded with license. No, gentlemen, the youth of the present generation, as far as I know, and I know five hundred of them very intimately, are on the way to great discoveries, have made a step toward happiness and a step toward self-government far ahead of anything we had in our youth. They need very careful handling. They need all the love and affection that a man can give them, and they are going to bring this old world of ours one step nearer heaven in the end.

In the Driftway

THE death of Leonid Krassin of pernicious anemia in London last week sent a pang of regret through the Drifter's breast. He recalled Krassin's first appearance in London as a Soviet envoy when the Drifter, too, happened to be sojourning in London. Krassin was in looks anything but the typical Bolshevik. Quiet, reserved, unassuming, and obviously in delicate health, he seemed the student and teacher. Yet many people then, as now, expected that because he was a Bolshevik he must have the mustachios of a pirate, long, flowing and unkempt hair, a bomb in one hand and a dirk in the other. Instead, he was a modest, accessible diplomat who differed in no wise in his personal appearance from the conventional Russian gentleman.

* * * * *

NATURALLY Mr. Krassin's first appearance in London was not altogether easy nor without uncomfortable happenings, even beyond the nasty editorials in the conservative press. But sometimes there were rays of light and little experiences which greatly smoothed the road for this representative of the Soviet. Thus, the Drifter recalls Krassin's experience when he undertook to give a dinner to which he invited some of the men most prominent in British public life, including Lloyd George. He was at first at a loss to know where to give the dinner, but finally decided to try one of the great hotels in the Strand. He interviewed the maitre d'hotel with distinct uneasiness. He explained that he wished to give a large dinner party, but desired to have it understood in advance that if the hotel agreed to take the dinner it would give its word to live up to its agreement and to let nothing interfere. The puzzled maitre d'hotel, piqued, declared that his hotel did not break its word. "Wait a minute," said Krassin, "you do not know who I am. I am the Bolshevik envoy, Krassin. I do not wish you to say you will serve me and then have your managing director tell me three days before the dinner that you cannot serve Bolsheviks." The maitre d'hotel smiled skeptically. "You are not Krassin?" "I am," replied the envoy, and reinforced his statement with his passport and other official documents. The maitre d'hotel looked at them and turned upon Krassin. "Do you mean to say that you wish this hotel to serve a dinner for you? Well, Mr. Krassin, I wish you to know that I shall consider it the greatest honor I have ever had."

* * * * *

DESPITE this welcome Krassin felt uneasy until the repast was over. Afterwards he told the Drifter that never had he eaten so fine a dinner, and never had he dreamed that a dinner could be so perfectly served. "The most interesting thing about it," he added, "was that we had a new set of waiters for every course. Later I asked the maitre d'hotel why that was. He laughed and said 'So many of them begged the privilege of serving you that I had to compromise by letting a new crew serve each course!'" And then comes the most remarkable part of it. Mr. Krassin confided to the Drifter that he could not prevail upon a single waiter to accept a tip! There is no doubt in the Drifter's mind that that incident brightened life for Krassin for many a day and offset some of the coldness he encountered when he was first received as a diplomat and people did not know whether to regard him as a wild animal or an escaped convict. If what has since been widely reported is true, Krassin steadily made his way wherever he went, because of his ability and his modesty and his quiet devotion to his job. And that is also the belief of his acquaintance,

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

In Defense of Fascism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Able and efficient government can never be attained through the head nor through the heart, but only through the hide. Even your distant proteges in Russia have been compelled to see the wisdom thereof, and, chop as much logic as you will, you cannot disprove it. Force, brute force, is the one and only method toward efficacious government.

How can you dare to assert that Fascism and its philosophy are inferior to our much-mooted democracy and liberty? Pray, where is that democracy, that liberty? In Prohibition, perhaps, or the Teapot Dome, or the crookedest Cabinet in the history of the American Presidency? By what heavenly sign has the divine right of the majority been established? Why the right of the majority any more than the similar right of kings?

It is evident (to me, at least) that our theory of government is fallacious as well as inefficient. We rule, not by the ablest, but by the most popular. At election time it is not the man who can best fulfil the desires of the voters, but the man who spends the most money in advertising, who brays the loudest, that wins. The record of Congress scarcely displays any signs of intelligence, let alone of brilliance.

Granted that free speech is denied in Italy—what good does it do us here? Has it helped with Prohibition? Has it prevented such outbreaks of delirium as were witnessed in Tennessee and, more recently, in Boston during the Mencken-Mercury altercation? It is much like having an expensive automobile when you haven't the money to buy gasoline.

In brief, Fascism places the needs of the nation above all—above the individual, above the group, above the interests of either capital or labor. When, in 1921, all industry, all production was at a standstill in Italy, because of the bickerings of the laborers and the manufacturers, the Fascists, the middle class of Italy, rose and forced the workers to work and the capitalists to pay. Then why this outburst?

New York, November 12

VICTOR ZORIN

That Glorious Word—Damn

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your symposium on profanity is of great interest. Once Lord Tennyson discanted to me at great length on the silliness of profanity—its "feebly-forcefulness," etc. Then, after a silence of half a minute, or more, his whole face lit up and he exclaimed enthusiastically: "But that word "Damn" is a glorious word, is'nt it? Often, nothing else can take its place, or express the exact shade of your feeling"!

Columbia, S. C., November 13 Y. S.

And What About Europe?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Have you ever considered the tremendous target offered by the City of New York to an enemy's attack? It would be impossible to miss such a mark. It is close to the sea: it is almost as high and wide as a mountain; and it is as destructible, for modern artillery, as a glass house, or a china shop. A single first-class enemy ship could destroy the city on Manhattan Island, in half an hour, from a distance of twenty miles. Each high-explosive shell would pass clean through the skyscrapers, and blow them into ruins of twisted steel and shattered concrete; and every shot would cost us thousands of lives and millions of dollars. Fire would complete the work of destruction.

The City of New York is the heart of America, and should be defended, as men defend their own hearts. The approach of an enemy by sea or by air should be made impossible. An attack from the air, with the use of poison gas, might be even more disastrous than a bombardment. America should not disarm. America should double her armaments by sea and by air. She should have a navy and air forces capable of stopping the combined fleets of Europe in mid-Atlantic.

Chicago, October 26 Bertrand Shadwell

Mr. Bruce Spills

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In an interview obtained recently by the New York Evening Enquirer, W. P. Bruce, a geologist of Boston, spills the beans. Mr. Bruce has been seeing Venezuela, and what he has seen puts Mr. Bruce fearfully in the dumps. Was Mr. Bruce moved by the sardonic mischief-making of those who put up innumerable monuments to Simon Bolivar and put down with iron heels the consequences of Bolivar's passion? Was he stirred by the realization that Venezuela through all the days of Gomez's dictatorship has been suffering an unending Santa Marta? No, it is oil that afflicts Mr. Bruce so profoundly—oil and the bad state of health of that humanitarian, Juan Vicente Gomez. Here are Mr. Bruce's own words:

> Yes, General Gomez is failing in health, and I fear is failing fast. It is said that he has Bright's disease or nephritis, and you know what that means. However, credit must be given him for the way he has developed Venezuela's natural resources, especially her oil fields. What will happen down there if he should happen to pass out, the future only knows. I rather dread to think about it, because there is no one qualified at the present time to step into his shoes. Just how capital views the situation, I am really at a loss to understand, because all the oil concessions have been granted by the Chief Executive himself, and therefore are illegal under the laws of Venezuela, and will necessarily be subject to future revision. Here is a problem confronting not only American capital invested there, but British as well. I really see nothing but chaos ahead.

It is perhaps bad manners, but what makes Mr. Bruce sad gives us uncommon joy. Imperialistic capital in Venezuela is coming to an impasse, and it is aware of the fact. It is confused, and brought to confession. "All the oil concessions have been granted by the Chief Executive, and therefore are illegal under the laws of Venezuela, and will necessarily be subject to revision." Indeed, they will be, Mr. Bruce. And other things will be subject to revision, a drastic change. And on that purgative day Simon Bolivar will return to Caracas, to a new [illegible]

Brooklyn, N. Y., October 7 Maurice Tenney,
English Secretary, The Venezuelan Labor Union

Encouragement

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have read "Music and the External World" to a number of visitors; it always provokes discussion, and it is interesting to see just where the individual begins to accommodate. I hope B. H. Haggin will continue.

West Medford, Mass., November 14 H. H.

Contributors to This Issue

Silas Bent was formerly associate editor of the National Business.

Lewis S. Gannett, associate editor of The Nation, spent last winter in the Orient.

Stuart Chase is the author of "The Tragedy of Waste."

Mather A. Abbott is headmaster of the Lawrenceville School.

René Lalou, author of "Contemporary Literature in France," is engaged upon a study of Paul Valéry to be published soon in Paris.

Abbe Niles, coeditor with W. C. Handy of "Blues," has made a special study of Negro folk-music.

Eliseo Vivas was the author of the anonymous article, The Unknown Critic, which closed the Critic's series in The Nation two years ago.

Mary Austin, author of "The American Rhythm" and many other books, now lives in Santa Fe.

Keith Hutchison is the author of "Labor in Politics."

Harold J. Laski, of the London School of Economics, is the author of "The Grammar of Politics."

Donald Douglas is the author of "The Grand Inquisitor."

R. L. Burgess is on the staff of the San Jose News, San Jose, California.

John Haynes Holmes is pastor of the Community Church of New York.

Mortimer J. Adler is a member of the department of psychology, Columbia University.

William MacDonald is the author of "A New Constitution for a New America."

J. A. Hobson, the noted British economist, is a frequent contributor to The Nation.

Alice Beal Parsons is the author of "Woman's Dilemma."

Paul Blanshard is a trade-union organizer and author of "Outline of the British Labor Movement."

Gerald Carson is a New York business man and literary critic.

Carleton Beals is the author of "Mexico—an Interpretation."

R. F. Dibble's most recent biography is "Mohammed."

Sidney R. Packard is a member of the department of history, Smith College.

B. H. Haggin, a musician of New York, is contributing a series of articles to The Nation.

The author of Why I Earn My Own Living is a well-known magazine writer.

International Relations Section

The British Commonwealth of Nations

WE print below the opening sections of the report of the Inter-Imperial Relations Committee of the Imperial Conference, issued November 19, as cabled to the New York Times.

I.—Introduction

We were appointed at a meeting of the Imperial Conference, October 25, 1926, to investigate all questions on the agenda affecting inter-imperial relations.

Our discussions on these questions have been long and intricate. We found on examination that they involved considerations of fundamental principles affecting the relations of the various parts of the British Empire inter se as well as the relations of each part to foreign countries.

For such an examination the time at our disposal has been all too short, yet we hope that we may have laid a foundation on which subsequent conferences may build.

II.—Status of Great Britain and the Dominions

The committee are of the opinion that nothing would be gained by attempting to lay down a constitution for the British Empire. Its widely scattered parts have very different characteristics, very different histories, and are at very different stages of evolution, while considered as a whole it defies classification and bears no real resemblance to any other political organization which now exists or has ever yet been tried. There is, however, one most important element in it which from a strictly constitutional point of view has now as regards all vital matters reached its full development—we refer to the group of self-governing communities composed of Great Britain and the Dominions.

Their position and mutual relation may be readily defined. They are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by common allegiance to the Crown and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

A foreigner endeavoring to understand the true character of the British Empire by the aid of this formula alone would be tempted to think that it was devised rather to make mutual interference impossible than to make mutual cooperation easy. Such criticism, however, completely ignores the historic situation. The rapid evolution of the oversea Dominions during the last fifty years has involved many complicated adjustments of old political machinery to changing conditions. The tendency toward equality of status was both right and inevitable. Geographical and other conditions made this impossible of attainment by way of federation. The only alternative was by way of autonomy and along this road it has been steadily sought. Every self-governing member of the empire is master of its destiny. In fact, if not always in form, it is subject to no compulsion whatever.

But no account, however accurate, of the negative relations in which Great Britain and the Dominions stand to each other can do more than express a portion of the truth. The British Empire is not founded upon negations. It depends essentially if not formally, on positive ideals. Free institutions are its lifeblood; free cooperation is its instrument. Peace, security, and progress are among its objects. Aspects of all these great themes have been discussed at the present conference. Excellent results have been thereby obtained, and though every Dominion is now and must always remain the sole judge of the nature and extent of its cooperation, no common cause will, in our opinion, be thereby imperiled.

Equality of status so far as Britain and the Dominions are concerned is the root principle governing our inter-imperial relations. But principles of equality and similarity appropriate to the status do not universally extend to the function. Here we require something more than immutable dogmas.

For example, to deal with questions of diplomacy and questions of defense we require also flexible machinery—machinery which can from time to time be adapted to the changing circumstances of the world. This subject also has occupied our attention. The rest of this report will show we have endeavored not only to state political theory but how to apply it to our common needs.

III.—Special Position of India

It will be noted that in previous paragraphs we have made no mention of India. Our reason for limiting their scope to Great Britain and the Dominions is that the position of India in the empire is already defined by the Government of India Act of 1919.

We would, nevertheless, recall that by resolution of the Imperial War Conference in 1917 due recognition was given to the important position held by India in the British Commonwealth. Where in this report we have had occasion to consider the position of India we have made particular reference to it.

IV.—Relations Between Various Parts of the British Empire

Existing administrative, legislative, and judicial forms are admittedly not wholly in accord with the position as described in Section II of this report. This is inevitable, since most of these forms date back to a time well antecedent to the present stage of constitutional development. Our first task, then, was to examine these forms with special reference to any cases where want of adaptation of practice to principle caused or might be thought to cause inconvenience in the conduct of inter-imperial relations.

A—Title of His Majesty. The title of His Majesty the King is of special importance and concern to all parts of His Majesty's Dominions. Twice within the last fifty years has the royal title been altered to suit changed conditions and constitutional developments.

The present title, which is that proclaimed under Royal Titles Act of 1901, is as follows: George V, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions Beyond the Seas, King, Defender of Faith, Emperor of India.

Some time before the conference met it had been recognized that this form of title hardly accorded with the altered state of affairs arising from the establishment of the Irish Free State as a Dominion. It had further been ascertained that it would be in accordance with His Majesty's wishes that any recommendation for a change should be submitted to him as a result of the discussion at the conference.

We are unanimously of the opinion that a slight change is desirable and we recommend that, subject to His Majesty's approval, necessary legislative action should be taken to secure that His Majesty's title should henceforth be: George V, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions Beyond the Seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India.

B—Position of Governors General. We proceeded to consider whether it was desirable formally to place on record a definition of the position held by the Governor General as His Majesty's representative in the Dominions. That position, though now generally well recognized, undoubtedly represents a development from an earlier stage when the Governor General was appointed solely on advice of His Majesty's Ministers in London and acted also as their representative. The Governor of Newfoundland is in the same position as the Governor General of a Dominion.

Here Selfishness and Unselfishness Go Hand in Hand.

FOR your benefit we have here gathered together many suggestions for Christmas gifts to yourself, your family and your friends.

WE have the good fortune to be alive during an important and one of the most interesting and fastest moving periods in the history of the world. We all want to relish it and to comprehend it as fully as possible

THE WORLD TOMORROW is for people who want to live fully and act intelligently on opinions formed from facts and reflection. It supplies data for examination of the elements of our political and social life. Under the topical plan of arrangement, THE WORLD TOMORROW covers in each issue the important material of one particular subject. Twelve careful studies of the more vital problems of our times are thus made each year.

January—"The Mind of Youth," in which we publish the eight prize winning essays of our Youth Contest.

February—"The Philippines".

THERE must be many of your friends who want THE WORLD TOMORROW during 1927 and would appreciate your thoughtfulness in giving it to them for Christmas this year. And you may have been wanting one of these several books. You can subscribe to THE WORLD TOMORROW for your friends and get the books for yourself and at the same time save a great deal of money. An appropriate card will announce your gift.

THE WORLD TOMORROW	Regular Price	Our Price
with George Washington, the Image and the Man, by W. E. Woodward	$6.00	$4.50 with The Story of Philosophy, by Will Durant	7.00	5.50
with Religion and the Rise of Capitalism, by R. H. Tawney	5.50	4.25 with The Man Nobody Knows, by Bruce Barton.	4.50	3.50
with Collected Poems of Carl Sandburg, by Rebecca West	4.00	3.25
with Her Son's Wife, by Dorothy Canfield Fisher.	4.00	3.25 with The Time of Man, by Elizabeth Madox Roberts	4.00	3.25 with The Second Book of Negro Spirituals, by James Weldon Johnson	5.50	4.00
with Education and the Good Life, by Bertrand Russell	4.50	3.50
with An Old Man's Folly, by Floyd Dell	4.00	3.50
with Preface to a Life, by Zona Gale	4.00	3.50
with Fire, a quarterly devoted to the Younger Negro Artists, premier issue	3.00	2.25

YOU may have a subscription to THE WORLD TOMORROW and you want a subscription to one or more of the magazines listed here. Why not send THE WORLD TOMORROW to one or more of the many friends who would enjoy having it and get the other magazines for yourself? An attractive Christmas card will announce the gift and the name of the giver.

THE WORLD TOMORROW	Regular Price	Our Price
with The Bookman	$6.00	$5.00
with St. Nicholas	5.00	4.00
with Harper's	6.00	5.00
with The Intercollegian	3.25	2.00
with The American Mercury	7.00	6.00
with The Atlantic Monthly	6.00	5.00
with The Century	7.00	6.00
with The Christian Century	6.00	4.00
with The Dial	7.00	6.00
with The Nation	7.00	6.00
with The New Republic	7.00	6.00
with Survey	7.00	6.00
with The Survey Graphic	5.00	4.00
with The Youth's Companion	4.00	3.50

INSTEAD of Christmas cards, which can not carry your whole thought and affection, we suggest that you send six months' subscription to ten or more of your friends. These you can have for $1.00 each and secure "Preface to a Life," by Zona Gale, for yourself or as a gift for someone else. These Christmas card subscriptions will be announced appropriately.

THE WORLD TOMORROW, Inc.,
52 Vanderbilt Avenue,
New York City.

For the enclosed $_____ please enter my order for your special combination offer checked above. I enclose in addition names and addresses for the books and magazines I want sent as Christmas gifts to my friends.

Name_____

Address_____

N 12-8-26

In our opinion, it is essential in consequence of the equality of the status existing among the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, that the Governor General of a Dominion is a representative of the Crown, holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in a Dominion as is held by His Majesty, the King in Great Britain, and that he is not a representative or agent of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain or of any department of that Government.

It seemed to us to follow that the practice whereby the Governor General of a Dominion is the formal official channel of communication between His Majesty's Government in Great Britain and his governments in his Dominions might be regarded as no longer wholly in accordance with the constitutional position of the Governor General.

It was thought that the recognized official channel of communication should be, in the future, between government and government direct. The representatives of Great Britain readily recognized that the existing procedure might be open to criticism and accepted the proposed change in principle in relation to any of the Dominions which desired it. The details were left for settlement as soon as possible after the conference had completed its work, but it was recognized by the committee as an essential feature of any change or development in the channels of communication that the Governor General should be supplied with copies of all documents of importance and in general should be kept as fully informed as is His Majesty the King in Great Britain of Cabinet business and public affairs.

C—Operations of Dominion Legislation. Our attention was also called to various points in connection with the operation of Dominion legislation which, it was suggested, required clarification:

The particular points involved were:

(1) The present practice under which the acts of the Dominion Parliaments are sent each year to London and it is intimated through the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs that His Majesty will not be advised to exercise his powers of disallowance with regard to them.

(2) The reservation of Dominion legislation in certain circumstances for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure which is signified on advice tendered by His Majesty's Government in Great Britain.

(3) The difference between the legislative competence of the Parliament at Westminster and the Dominion Parliaments in that acts passed by the latter operate as a general rule only within the territorial area of the Dominion concerned.

(4) The operation of legislation passed by Parliament at Westminster in relation to the Dominions. In this connection special attention was called to such statutes as the Colonial Laws Validity Act. It was suggested that in the future uniformity of legislation as between Great Britain and the Dominions could best be secured by the enactment of reciprocal statutes, based upon consultation and agreement.

We gave these matters the best consideration possible in the limited time at our disposal, but came to the conclusion that the issues involved were so complex that there would be grave danger in attempting any immediate pronouncement other than the statement of certain principles which, in our opinion, underlie the whole question of the operation of Dominion legislation. We feel that, for the rest, it would be necessary to obtain expert guidance as a preliminary to further consideration by His Majesty's Governments in Great Britain and the Dominions.

On the questions raised with regard to disallowance and reservation of Dominion legislation, it was explained by the Irish Free State representatives that they desired to elucidate constitutional practice in relation to Canada, since it was provided by Article 2 of the articles of agreement for the Treaty of 1921 that "The position of the Irish Free State, in relation

For Your Christmas Giving

THEY STILL NEED YOU

The Passaic Textile workers are still on strike.

They are waging a courageous battle against industrial autocracy.

They look to you, the readers of THE NATION, to support them in their struggle for decent American living conditions.

Will you continue your support of these fighters for democracy and help their children have a happy Christmas by sending your contributions to

H. S. RAUSHENBUSH, Treasurer
Emergency Committee for Strikers' Relief
ROOM 638, 799 BROADWAY
NEW YORK CITY

Special Milk Fund Committee
Norman Thomas, Chairman

Forrest Bailey
Roger N. Baldwin
Harriot Stanton Blatch
Susan Brandeis
Mrs. George Burnham, Jr.
Rev. Edmund B. Chaffee
Stuart Chase
Herbert Croly
John Dos Passos
Mary E. Dreier
Elizabeth Glendower Evans
Elizabeth Gurley Flynn
Elizabeth Gilman
Arthur Garfield Hays
Rev. John Haynes Holmes
J. A. H. Hopkins
Florence Kelley
Paul U. Kellogg
Dr. Henry R. Linville
Rev. J. Howard Melish
Dr. Henry Neumann
Mrs. Gordon Norrie
Amos Pinchot
Evelyn Preston
Samuel Untermyer
Oswald Garrison Villard
Lillian D. Wald
James P. Warbasse
Bertha Poole Weyl
Mrs. Stephen S. Wise
And Others

Emergency Committee for Strikers' Relief
799 Broadway, Room 638, New York City

Enclosed is check for.....dollars for the Passaic strikers and their children.

Name .....

Address .....

Endorsed by The Nation

$100 WORTH of BOOKS for $5

IN THE FIRST SIX NUMBERS OF TWO WORLDS MONTHLY

ULYSSES by JAMES JOYCE which cannot be purchased for less than $50 in the Paris Edition, is appearing serially in TWO WORLDS MONTHLY;

MAGGIE: A GIRL of the STREETS

Stephen Crane's great novel, obtainable in book form only in a set of 12 volumes (the author's collected works) selling for $90, appears complete in the 4th number of TWO WORLDS MONTHLY.

BROKENBROW: A Play in 3 Acts by ERNST TOLLER is obtainable only in a Nonesuch Press Edition selling for $5—it appeared complete in 3rd number of TWO WORLDS MONTHLY.

60 SHORT STORIES

by such distinguished writers as D. H. Lawrence, Norman Douglas, Arthur Schnitzler, Giovanni Verga, T. F. Powys, Hugh de Selincourt, Frank Wedekind, T. S. Eliot, Ludwig Bird and Cunninghame-Grahame.

75 DISTINGUISHED POEMS

by Carl Sandburg, Richard Le Gallienne, D. H. Lawrence, James Joyce, A. E. Housman, A. E. Coppard, E. Powys Mather, Ezra Pound and others—making two remarkable anthologies—one of the best modern short stories, the other of the best modern poems. If you hurry you can still begin your subscription with Number One. You will not easily forgive yourself if you fail to get a complete set of TWO WORLDS MONTHLY.

TWO WORLDS PUB. CO.,
500 5th Av. (Suite 405-8)
New York City.

Gentlemen: For the enclosed $5 kindly put me down as a subscriber to the first 12 issues of TWO WORLDS MONTHLY, beginning with No. 1.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation to the Imperial Parliament and Government and otherwise shall be that of the Dominion of Canada."

On this point we propose that it should be placed on record that apart from the provisions embodied in the constitutions or in specific statutes expressly providing for reservation, it is recognized that it is the right of the Government of each Dominion to advise the Crown in all matters relating to its own affairs. Consequently it would not be in accordance with constitutional practice for advice to be tendered to His Majesty by His Majesty's Government in Great Britain in any matter appertaining to the affairs of a Dominion against the views of the Government of that Dominion.

Appropriate procedure with regard to projected legislation in one of the self-governing parts of the empire which may affect the interests of other self-governing parts rests on previous consultation between His Majesty's Ministers in the several parts concerned.

On the question raised with regard to the legislative competence of members of the British Commonwealth of Nations other than Great Britain and in particular to the desirability of those members being enabled to legislate with extraterritorial effect, we think that it should similarly be placed on record that constitutional practice is that legislation by the Parliament at Westminster applying to a Dominion would only be passed with the consent of the Dominion concerned.

As already indicated, however, we are of the opinion that there are points arising out of these considerations and in application of these general principles which will require detailed examination, and we accordingly recommend that steps should be taken by Great Britain and the Dominions to set up a committee with terms of reference on the following lines: To inquire into and report upon and make recommendations concerning, first, existing statutory provisions requiring the reservation of Dominion legislation for assent of His Majesty or authorizing disallowance of such legislation; second (a), the present position, as to competence, of the Dominion Parliaments to give their legislation extraterritorial operation; (b) the practicability and most convenient method of giving effect to the principle that each Dominion Parliament should have the power to give extraterritorial operation to its legislation in all cases where such operation is ancillary to provisions for peace, order, and good government of that Dominion; third, principles embodied in or underlying the Colonial Laws Validity Act of 1865 and extent to which any provisions of that act ought to be repealed, amended, or modified in the light of existing relations between the various members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, as described in this report.

[Sections on Merchant Shipping Legislation and Appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council are here omitted.]

V—Relations with Foreign Countries

From questions especially concerning the relations of various parts of the British Empire with one another we naturally turned to those affecting their relations with foreign countries. In the latter sphere a beginning had been made toward making clear those relations by resolution of the Imperial Conference of 1923 on the subject of negotiation, signature, and ratification of treaties. But it seemed desirable to examine the working of that resolution during the past three years, and also consider whether the principles laid down with regard to treaties could not be applied with advantage in a wider sphere.

A—Procedure in Relation to Treaties. We appointed a special subcommittee, under the Chairmanship of the Minister of Justice of Canada, the Honorable E. LaPointe, K. C., to consider the question of treaty procedure. The subcommittee, on whose report the following paragraphs are based, found that the resolution of the conference of 1923 embodied, on most points, useful rules for the guidance of the governments. As they became more thoroughly understood and established they would prove effective in practice.

Some phases of treaty procedure were examined, however,

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of graduate study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.
Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.
The winter quarter begins January 3, 1927.
For further information, address the Director,

THE TRAINING SCHOOL
FOR
JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
210 West 91st Street, New York City

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

A LUNCHEON RESORT FOR THE DISCRIMINATING CLIENTELE—THOSE APPRECIATING UNEXCELLED CUISINE AND SERVICE.

EVENINGS—SPECIAL PARTIES ONLY. ANNIVERSARIES, BANQUETS, LADIES' NIGHTS, BEEFSTEAKS, SMOKERS, SUPPER AND DINNER DANCES.

OUR BANQUET DEPARTMENT SPECIALIZES IN SERVING
GROUP DINNERS UP TO 1000
AT $2.00 A COVER UP.

Ownership Management
by THEODORE KEMM

GRAMERCY 4900 to 4907

in greater detail in the light of experience in order to consider to what extent the resolution of 1923 might with advantage be supplemented.

B—Negotiations. It was agreed in 1923 that one of the governments of the empire contemplating the negotiation of a treaty should give due consideration to its possible effect upon other governments, and should take steps to inform all governments likely to be interested of its intention.

This rule should be understood as applying to negotiations which any government intends to conduct so as to leave it to the other governments to say whether they are likely to be interested.

When a government has received information of the intention of any other government to conduct negotiations it is incumbent upon it to indicate its attitude with reasonable promptitude. So long as the initiating government receives no adverse comments, and so long as its policy involves no active obligations on the part of other governments, it may proceed on the assumption that its policy is generally acceptable. It must, however, before taking any steps which might involve other governments in any active obligations, obtain their definite assent.

Where by the nature of a treaty it is desirable that it should be ratified on behalf of all the governments of the empire the initiating government may assume that the government which has had full opportunity of indicating its attitude, and has made no adverse comments, will concur in the ratification of the treaty. In the case of a government that prefers not to concur in the ratification of a treaty unless it has been signed by a plenipotentiary authorized to act on its behalf it will advise the appointment of a plenipotentiary so to act.

C—Form of Treaty. Some treaties begin with a list of the contracting countries, and not with a list of the heads of states. In the case of treaties negotiated under the auspices of the League of Nations adherence to the wording of the annex to the Covenant for the purpose of describing the contracting party has led to the use in the preamble of the term "British Empire," with the enumeration of the Dominions and India if parties to the convention, but without any mention of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the colonies and protectorates. These are only included by virtue of their being covered by the term "British Empire."

This practice, while suggesting that the Dominions and India are not on a footing of equality with Great Britain as participants of the treaties in question, tends to obscurity and misunderstanding and is generally unsatisfactory.

As a means of overcoming this difficulty it is recommended that all treaties (other than agreements between governments), whether negotiated under the auspices of the League or not, should be made in the name of the heads of the states, and if a treaty is signed on behalf of any or all of the governments of the empire the treaty should be made in the name of the King, a symbol of the special relationship between the different parts of the empire.

British units on behalf of which a treaty is signed should be grouped together in the following order: Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and all the parts of the British Empire which are not separate members of the League; Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State, and India. A specimen form of treaty as recommended is attached as an appendix to the committee's reports.

In the case of a treaty applying to only one part of the empire it should be stated to be made by the King on behalf of that part.

The making of a treaty in the name of the King as a symbol of the special relationship between the different parts of the empire will render superfluous the inclusion of any provision that its terms must not be regarded as regulating inter se the rights and obligations of various territories other than that on behalf of which it has been signed in the name of the King.

In this connection it must be borne in mind that the question was discussed at the Arms Traffic Conference in 1925, and

WHERE TO BUY BOOKS

BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS

The fun of giving with none of the drudgery. Book gifts in imported decorative wrappings sent direct to your friends post free anywhere. Send for our illustrated Christmas catalog.

THE POST-BOX BOOK SERVICE Inc.

16 West 44th Street, New York

GOOD CHEER, COMRADES!

Daca sells you all books 20 to 80% off list: Durant, Cabell, Schnitzler, Mencken, etc. Many unusual items. Come on over to THE NEW DOOR, 4 Christopher St. (W. of 8th St. and 6th Ave.), N. Y. C., where Mascheld worked. Open evenings.

GERMAN BOOKS IN NEW YORK

ALL KINDS, LITERARY, ARTISTIC, SCIENTIFIC

B. WESTERMANN COMPANY, Inc.

13 WEST 46TH STREET, NEW YORK

BOOKS

A MAN'S GIFT

"Women haven't it; it's the chiefest of the virtues—a sense of humor."

Encourage it!

The TOASTER'S HANDBOOK and MORE TOASTS are collections of "well selected" bits of humor classified by subjects.

"Christmas Gifts."

Little six-year-old Harry was asked by his Sunday-school teacher: "And, Harry, what are you going to give your darling little brother for Christmas this year?"

"I dunno," said Harry; "I gave him the measles last year."

Humor is just as catching. Give a man TOASTER'S HANDBOOK and MORE TOASTS—$1.50 per volume, only $2.50 for both.

Another handbook commended by The Harvard Review is SELECTION AND CARE OF SOUND INVESTMENTS, by Arthur Herschel. This book, written by an investor for investors, is of particular "use as a handbook to the individual who wishes to gain a common knowledge that will assist him to make his investments in an intelligent manner."—Harvard Review. 400 pages; price $4.00.

THE H. W. WILSON COMPANY

971 UNIVERSITY AVENUE NEW YORK CITY

A MOSCOW DIARY A graphic human-interest story of the life of the people in Soviet Russia today, by Anna Porter. Cloth, $1.00 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO. 847 East Ohio Street, Chicago

INSTINCT IN THE CELL AND ORGANISM

(Descriptive Table of Contents Free)

THIS volume of NEANDER P. COOK is a survey of the instinctive reactivities of the living organism. Based upon the most recent biological discoveries, it is an amazing revelation of the hidden powers that drive the living world onward and upward, from its lowliest beginnings in the Protozoa to its highest achievement in man. Though written for the scientific investigator, it comes in language and illustration so simple, that any intelligent reader, desiring first-hand knowledge, need not miss a page of it. $5.00 postpaid. THE WEIMAR PRESS, Alhambra, Calif.

REAL ESTATE

—If you have a house or property to sell or lease, try The Nation classified advertising section.

—If the experience of other advertisers of real estate is a guide, your advertisement in The Nation will pay.

—Write for rates to Dept. R., The Nation.

that the Legal Committee of that conference laid it down that the principle to which the foregoing sentence gives expression underlies all international conventions.

In the case of some international agreements the governments of the different parts of the empire may be willing to apply between themselves some of the provisions as administrative measures. In this case they should state the extent to which and the terms on which such provisions are to apply. Where international agreements are to be applied between the different parts of the empire, the form of treaty between the heads of states should be avoided.

D—Full Powers. Plenipotentiaries for the various British units should have full powers issued in each case by the King, on the advice of the government concerned, indicating and corresponding to the part of the empire for which they are to sign. It will frequently be found convenient, particularly where there are some parts of the empire on which it is not contemplated that active obligations will be imposed, but where the position of British subjects belonging to these parts will be affected, for such government to advise the issue of full powers on their behalf to a plenipotentiary appointed to act on behalf the government or governments mainly concerned. In other cases provision might be made for the accession by other parts of the empire at a later date.

E—Signature. In a case where the names of countries are appended to signatures in a treaty different parts of the empire should be designated in the same manner as is proposed in regard to the list of plenipotentiaries in the preamble to the treaty. The signatures of the plenipotentiaries of the various parts of the empire should be grouped together in the same order as is proposed above.

Signature of a treaty on behalf of a part of the empire should cover territories for which the mandate has been given to that part of the empire unless the contrary is stated at the time of signature.

MOTION PICTURE

"ARMORED CRUISER POTEMKIN"

The Sensational Russian Film [illegible] all Europe by storm.

"GREATEST MOTION PICTURE EVER MADE"
Say DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS, EMIL JANNINGS and MAX REINHARDT
"[illegible] all other films."
—Evelyn Gerstein—New Republic.

CHANIN'S BILTMORE 47th St., W. of B'way | Twice Daily, 2:30-8:30 Sunday, 3 and 8:30 | All Seats Reserved Tickets Now on Sale

LECTURE

OPEN FORUM
The [illegible] for Ethical Culture, 2 West 64th St., New York City, Sunday, Dec. 5, at 8 P. M.
Frank Tannenbaum on "MEXICO"

SUNDAY, DEC. 12, AT 8 P. M.
"Tendencies in the Modern Theatre"
SPEAKERS, HENRY G. ALSBERG, Translator of "The Dybbuk" and adaptor, with Isaac Don Levine, of "Turandot."
JAMES LIGHT, of the Provincetown Playhouse, Director of "Hamlet in Modern Dress," "Beyond the Horizon," etc.
Questions and Discussion. Public is invited

Reserve your places now

Nation Dinners

December 7

PROHIBITION
Clarence Darrow
"The Duty of Civil Disobedience"
Major William B. Wright, Jr.
Chief Enforcement Officer of Prohibition in Pennsylvania.
"The Obligation of the Law"
Chairman: Arthur Warner, Associate Editor, The Nation

January 11

"CENSOR THE STAGE?"
Elisabeth Marbury, Joseph Wood Krutch
Frank Gillmore
Executive Secretary, The Actors' Equity Association
Chairman: Lewis S. Gannett, Associate Editor, The Nation

February 15

"MEN—WHAT OF 'EM?"
Ruth Hale, Lorine Pruette
Chairman: Freda Kirchwey, Managing Editor, The Nation

March 8

Songs and Dances by American Indians
Speakers to be announced on
"THE ART OF THE AMERICAN INDIAN"
Chairman: Mark Van Doren, Literary Editor, The Nation

April 12

"WHO IS CALVIN COOLIDGE?"
Frank R. Kent, William Hard
Chairman: Oswald Garrison Villard, Editor, The Nation

ALL DINNERS WILL BE HELD AT THE FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE, AT 7 P. M.
$2.75 per plate. $12 for the series of five.
Tickets may be bought only by Nation subscribers, although each subscriber may bring as many guests as he wishes.

—If you are not a Subscriber—

You may have The Nation for a year (regular price $5) with a ticket for the first dinner for $6.25, or with a ticket for the five dinners for $16.00.

The Nation
20 Vesey Street, New York
Send me The Nation for a year
Reserve ..... places for me at
The First Dinner ☐
The Series ☐

Name .....

Address .....

Tickets will be mailed a few days before the dinner.

The Importance of Paul Valéry

By RENÉ LALOU

PAUL-AMBROISE VALÉRY was born in 1872. A friend of Pierre Louys, he contributed several poems to the symbolist reviews from 1889 to 1895; and he was then considered as the most promising disciple of Stéphane Mallarmé. He also published two prose works, "Introduction à la méthode de Léonard de Vinci" (1895) and "La Soirée avec M. Teste" (1896), whose importance was to be fully realized only twenty years later. At that early time nobody seemed to understand that he had given in the two books both a clue to his problem and an explanation of the silence which was to ensue for more than fifteen years. Van Bever and Leautaud, the authors of the best symbolist anthology, found much difficulty in accounting for what they thought to be mere perversity. "Paul Valéry," they wrote, "has given himself for several years to extra-literary researches which it is not easy to define, as they seem to be grounded on a premeditated confusion of method between exact sciences and artistic instincts." This definition was not quite clear; yet there was something in it, as will appear hereafter.

In 1917 Valéry published "La Jeune Parque," a poem of some five hundred lines which created a stir in literary circles; others followed till 1922, when they all were collected in a volume significantly called "Charmes" (Carmina). Each of them was hailed as a masterpiece; Valéry's old work in prose and verse was studied anew; and he now offered several essays, two Socratic dialogues, and some fragments of his notebooks. His fame was spreading rapidly, not only as a poet but also as a master of French thought and as one of our intellectual leaders. His election as a member of the Academy honored that institution rather than added new glory to his name.

The reason for Valéry's extraordinary success must be sought in those very researches which perplexed his former critics. His problem is the highest problem, the problem of the mind. He has stated it unequivocally: "The things of the world interest me only in their relation to the intellect. Bacon said this intellect is an idol. I agree, but I have never found a better one." From his youth Valéry has been busy answering that ever-recurring question: What can man accomplish? What is he master of? His intellect being his only weapon, where does that lead him? Can the unity of the mind prevail over the diversity of things? Can the mind form that "decisive image" to which it aspires and classify things "according to their facility or their difficulty"? The aim of the intellect is an infinite extension of continuity; can it create a continuous universe?

The struggle, at first glance, seems best exemplified in those we name our great men. The "Introduction" is the study of a great man who stands as "a complete system in himself" and who possesses the secret of "recovering relations between things whose law of continuity escapes us." For we must notice that genius is something logical, not at all mysterious: "Where others had not yet seen anything, he had already looked, combined, and did no more than read in his mind." In the note he added in 1919 to his "Introduction" of 1894, Valéry explains why he chose Leonardo for his hero: "I felt that this master of his means, this possessor of drawing, of images, of arithmetics, had found the central attitude starting from which the enterprises of knowledge and the operations of art are equally possible." He elected Leonardo for his champion because Leonardo had proclaimed: "It is one's duty to make oneself universal."

Too easy, indeed, in such a conception; hence arose a new scruple. One has to find a central point in the mind where all its powers, scientific or artistic, passive or creative, are united. Valéry was entitled to write: "Genius is easy, fortune is easy, divinity is easy. I simply mean I know how they are comparable." To become universal is not difficult; the hardest task is to remain so, never surrendering the relentless ideal of precision. Is that the case with our famous men? Of course not. As Valéry writes in "La Soirée," "every great man is tainted with an error, . . . the initial error which made him famous." The "great man" belittles his greatness in order that the crowd may perceive it. This led Valéry to imagine that the greatest among mortals are not the acknowledged great men but some unknown individuals who will die without having ever confessed their superiority. To embody that truth Valéry invented Edmond Teste.

"La Soirée" is the intellectual biography of Edmond Teste, a solitary man whose dwelling is "analogous to the any-point-whatsoever of the theorems." There he reaches the highest degree of consciousness, the most refined sense of liberty: "He was the being absorbed in his variation, the man who becomes his system, who gives himself entirely to the dreadful discipline of the free mind, who makes his joys kill his joys, the weakest murdered by the strongest." M. Teste "defeats everything except the suffering of his body beyond a certain intensity." He can do everything, but he would lose that universal power if he attempted to do anything. A lordly, comprehensive inaction was the last word of Valéry's second witness, the testis of his desperate distinctness, of his murdering lucidity. The same obstacle had blocked his way both as a writer and as a thinker: "Whenever I began throwing the dice on paper, I produced only words witnessing the impotence of thought: Genius, Mystery, Profound. . . . I replied so promptly with my pitiless sentences to my nascent propositions that the sum of my exchanges, at each instant, was nothing." Silence was the only issue left.

In his retirement, however, Valéry kept faithful to "the obstinate rigor" of Leonardo; he could then notice that "once rigor has been instituted, a positive liberty becomes possible." He studied the exact sciences, which brought him the certainty that the human mind cannot err as long as it confines itself to the arbitrary systems of its own making. A correct mathematician is infallible provided he strictly obeys the laws of the abstract game. Cannot a poet do the same, work on relations only, thus reaching an equal degree of immaterial reality? The "mechanical sieve" which Teste was demanding Valéry found in language with its two uses, practical and poetical, and its two values, intellectual and sensuous. What Valéry has called "pure poetry" (a much-misunderstood expression) requires two conditions: a perfect lucidity excluding all instinctive enthusiasm and a coherent "language-machine." Firmly convinced that "learned poetry is a profoundly skeptical art," Valéry planned his "Jeune Parque" as an exercise and cast it in the molds of the classical language-machine. The writer, he asserted, must feel himself at the same time "source, engineer, and agent of constraint." As a source, he must use his inspiration without ever allowing himself to be carried away by it. As an engineer, he must proceed to a kind of mental alchemy, creating both the work and the emotions that the work will suggest to the future reader. As an agent of constraint, he will augment the power of his fire by submitting it to a system of coherent contrarieties. For a French poet such a system is not to be invented over again; our classical prosody offers it, strengthened by the efforts of several centuries. "The obligatory numbers, the rhymes, the fixed forms, all these arbitrary elements once for all adopted and opposed to ourselves, have a certain philosophical beauty of their own."

That philosophical beauty is always present in the work of Valéry. His poems rank already among our most precious treasures. Even those romantics who complain about a haughty disdain of sensibility in his pure poetry willingly agree that his dialogues and essays make him a master of French prose, not only for the strength of his argument but also for the matchless grace of his style. Valéry indeed is a Mediterranean; if he is always painting the incessant struggle of the mind, he embodies it in beautiful images. Beauty with him is not an abstract idea but a sensuous form. Edgar Poe and Mallarmé taught him the charm of music; from the Greeks he has learned the splendor of architecture; his creation aims at the combined beauty of the two arts. He knows what danger threatens the intellect. "Nothing," he says, "leads us to absolute barbarity more surely than an exclusive love for pure mind." That is why he honors the human body, which holds the soul "as the anchor holds the ship." If we are allowed to use as convenient landmarks the names of Plato and Keats, we may say that Valéry is the equivalent of either and covers the interval between.

During the war some people discovered that, twenty years before, Valéry had contributed to the New Review an article which William Henley had published as The German Conquest. The article of 1895 looked so much like a prophecy for the readers of 1915 that it was reprinted under its true title, A Methodical Victory. In 1919 the Athenæum printed La Crise de l'Esprit, another essay by Valéry. It opened with impressive words: "We, civilizations, know henceforth that we are mortal. . . ." It concluded with a solemn query. Would Europe, Valéry asked, keep her place at the head of the civilized world or would she become in every regard what she is geographically, "a small cape of the Asiatic continent"?

Most of his admirers will declare that he is the answer to that question, that Europe has lost nothing so long as it remains capable of giving birth to men like Valéry. No one will deny that there is something typically French in his personality, in the way his art harmonizes symbolism and classicism, his thought reconciles the intellect with the senses. But the French tradition he revives is that of the seventeenth century, when French thinkers often were the leaders of European opinion. In every European country where he has been invited to lecture, Valéry has been revered as a kind of unofficial ambassador, standing for the most exhaustive analysis of the human mind that has been attempted since the days of René Descartes. At a time when what we call, on this side of the Atlantic, Western civilization is reacting against all the Asiatic mysticisms as well as looking somewhat distrustfully at the industrialization of the mind in business-like America, the importance of Paul Valéry in European thought can hardly be exaggerated.

Rediscovering the Spirituals*

By ABBE NILES

LIKE a poor congregation's church, the now general recognition of the Negro's contribution to American music through his religious songs was a long time building. Mr. Fisher[1] seems correctly to credit H. T. Burleigh[2] with ushering in the good day when in 1916 he published "Deep River," but fails to note that not this, but certain of the examples in Krehbiel's[3] study of two years earlier, constituted the first arrangements of spirituals for solo voice and piano; nor does he mention the part played by Homer Rodeheaver[4] in introducing some of these songs to Billy Sunday's hundreds of thousands, scarcely habitués of concert halls. For the rest, thank an already waning fad which leaves behind a solid body of knowledge and beauty for the constant.

Several myths have been dispelled; others are tottering. Item: that the Negro merely filched, say, from the pale and flabby "gospel hymns." Krehbiel commenced and Ballanta[5] has completed the demolition of this absurdity; Mrs. Burlin[6] has summed up the facts:

> . . . the characteristics which give to his [the Negro's] music an interest worthy of particular study are precisely those which differentiate Negro songs from the songs of the neighboring white man; they are racial traits, and the black man brought them from the Dark Continent.

It is becoming less and less easy to pirate the aesthetic product of the blacks and simultaneously dub them "the most imitative race on earth." Item: that the spirituals were "group compositions," each a sort of monstrous coincidence. Not the accumulation of collections will dispel such a fallacy, but the repetition of even such qualified dissents as James Weldon Johnson's[7]:

> My opinion is that the far greater part of them is the work of talented individuals influenced by the pressure and reaction of the group.

Some, indeed, are too elaborate to have been born otherwise than in solitude. Item: such expressions as Henry O. Osgood's[8]:

> The spirituals have a great vogue today, one that is hardly justified by the aesthetic value of any except a very small group of them.

today indicate merely that the speaker has not taken the little trouble necessary to acquaint himself with more than a small group. More can be asked from no body of folksong than may be found among the spirituals. More, by the way, need not be aspired to by their admirers. Specifically, it is difficult to appreciate Mr. Johnson's[9] concern that Negro themes should be commonly employed in this country as material for music in the larger forms; an anxiety underlaid by the idea which comes out in grosser form in Paul Whiteman's[10]

> What folksong would have amounted to anything if some great writer had not put it into a symphony?

Dvorak's use of Negro themes doubtless helped the spirituals toward recognition, but the weaving of an integral living thing like a folksong into the structure of a symphony may place, even invigorate, the latter only at the expense of the former; it is by no means written that the "New World Symphony" will outlive "Go Down, Moses." Item (but this one still debatable): the theory gently questioned by Mr. Fisher:

* This is the first of several articles which will appear in the book numbers of The Nation on contributions to American literature and art from other than Nordic sources.

> Writers (usually not musicians) speak of preserving the "original harmony" of the spirituals. Is there any to preserve?

The truth, as the writer then points out, is that two collections which painstakingly record the four parts as sung by Negroes exhibit except for a few features the most conventional harmonizations, contrasting with the many and often striking peculiarities of the melodies themselves. But Mr. Fisher does not discuss in this connection the harmonies recorded with equal care in the new compilation from the little South Carolina island of St. Helena; these indeed are often both alien and stirring in a harsh wild way, and coming from this isolated spot they help suggest the answer "some" to Mr. Fisher's question. And while the possibly opportunist Snyder collection[11] demonstrates that the simplest voice-and-piano settings will pass, Mr. Fisher's is a dangerous question, for future arrangers may read in its implied negative an unmeant permission not merely to discard such racial earmarks as are available, but to produce 'spirituals" suggesting Les Six, or another blonde smiling at the front rows over her manuscript. Not every accompaniment in his own volume avoids such a horror.

On the constructive side, through Krehbiel[3] we have acquired as illuminating an analysis of this body of song as could be hoped for from a white man; in particular, the classification of over five hundred specimens which revealed that the oft-mentioned effect of "sadness" derives not from the use of the minor mode (actually uncommon) but from the raising, flatting, or studiously avoiding certain tones of the scales familiar to us, intensifying by strangeness to Western ears a melancholy otherwise dependent on deeper secrets of melody, rhythm, and form. Krehbiel's illustrations are a treasury of the weird, and while comparatively few, assay higher (see "Dig Ma Grave," the passionate and somber "You May Bury Me in de Eas'," and "Come Tremblein' Down," anomalous for its triple time and uncannily suggesting a primitive English carol) than any other substantial collection. Krehbiel's method has now been applied to new material by Mr. Fisher, whose volume[1], with its historical and critical introduction, bibliography, and notes to every song, is a model for future editors. The songs themselves—the several work of no less than ten musicians—are naturally of uneven merit as arrangements, but many are excellent and a number new, while particular attention is due the heavenly "Sail Over Yonder" (Grant-Schaefer); Mr. Fisher's versions of "Give Me Jesus," "Don't Be Weary, Traveler," and "Troubles Gwineter Weigh Me Down"; the majestic "Ride On, King Jesus" (Gaul) and "Walk Together, Children" (Rosamund Johnson); and two notable newcomers from Tennessee splendidly arranged by Charles Fonteyne Manney. With Krehbiel's and Fisher's must be considered a third work[5], in reviewing which a well-known sociologist (himself coauthor of a volume on Negro songs containing no note of music) permits himself to say:

> Ballanta's foreword is hardly the kind of foreword which the average person who is interested in Negro song could comprehend. His ultra-technical discussion of rhythm, scales, and tones, his theorizing on the characteristics of and differences between African and American Negro music are hard enough for a musician to digest, much less the ordinary devotee of Negro song. A few words about the people of St. Helena Island, their songs, customs, and the like would have been much more appropriate for the part of collection which Ballanta made.

[illegible] winningly naive exposure of the mind of the specialist in A(1) contemplating an original and momentous excursion in field A(2). It is true that this explanation by a native African of the racial concepts back of the rhythmical and melodic phenomena which Krehbiel merely noted and classified is abstruse, but any inquiring musician would welcome it though tacked on to a seed catalogue. Moreover, the hundred-odd songs in this book are presented in a form more adapted for students and prospective arrangers (Rosamund Johnson has already used a dozen or more to great advantage) than for the "ordinary devotee." With a few exceptions their poetry is below the average; the accompaniments uncompromisingly follow the parts in which they are sung in St. Helena; this is a musician's collection and most appropriately prefaced, although "I'm a Runnin' Fo' Ma Life" as it stands would bring shouts of joy from most audiences, and though no arranger's finger is needed to point out the stern beauties (what bassoes must inhabit this islet!) of "Eagle's Wings," "Too Late," "Way By-and-By."

The first Johnson volume[7] has had the lion's share of public notice and has deserved it as the first token of an attempt at something definitive, though as such both it and its successor exhibit the inexplicable defects of omitting any disclosure of the birthplaces and histories of the several songs. Mr. Johnson's forewords are too nearly briefs—very excusably so, but the spirituals are their own best advocates and one grudges the space which might have gone to supplement such authoritative portions as the general discussion from the poetical viewpoint, with definite information about the tunes and poems themselves. Here must be confessed a disappointment with the arrangements in the first volume which may be largely due to the difficulty (alone, at the piano) of combining these accompaniments with the airs; at any rate the writer found these settings, while always competent and sometimes—as par excellence in "Jacob's Ladder"—brilliant, often thin or distracting, while he found his judgment reversed as to almost every one he heard played and sung by the arranger himself and Taylor Gordon. In the second volume[9], on the other hand, the keenest private pleasure is to be found, and it is unreservedly recommended to the voiceless pianist, especially for such examples of unearthly melancholy and charm as "Chilly Water" or "Death's Gwineter Lay His Cold Icy Hand on Me," such a creation (the word is advised) as "Daniel Saw de Stone," for the gloomy agitated rhythms of "I Want to Die Easy," the tempestuous brief cry "My Lawd Says He's Gwineter Rain Down Fire," the finality of perfection in the version of the St. Helena Charleston-spiritual "Same Train." Emmett Kennedy's[12] text is not informative; his arrangements are distinguished and uniformly imaginative and original. His material—found in Louisiana—is mostly unpublished elsewhere (though it is amusing to find that our old friend "Frankie and Johnny" takes for Mardi-Gras the mask of "My Baby in a Guinea-Blue Gown" and deceives Mr. Kennedy himself); and at least one song, air and setting, touches the heights: "If You Can't Come Send One Angel Down."

But too little, if anything, has been written about the two modest paper-covered Frey collections[13], one the first of all the recent company. Mr. Frey, best known as the composer of such witty and melodious ragtime as "Shakespearean Love," "Havanola," "Calicoco," thus meets one of two near-requirements: color, and a term served writing for Broadway (Mr. Johnson, writer of "My Castle on the Nile," meets both). If his work is properly light-footed, it displays also the feeling and understanding necessary to convey no less of dignity, sorrow, or exaltation than his subject requires, and while space permits mention here only of that free deep flow of rueful grace, "The Lonesome Valley," it seems to the writer the outstanding collection by any white man, and his the happiest guises in which a number of those [illegible] have found themselves.

form.

[illegible] New edition.

[illegible] G. Schirmer. $2.

$5.50

Jack Snyder Company. 75

By Hugo

The Critic's Answer*

By ELISEO VIVAS

GRANTING that the American artist can be productive [illegible] the most important question of all remains yet to be answered. For it is [illegible] that the artist can create in America. One need only consult the [illegible] New York publishing houses to be convinced that the spring of artistic production which before the war was becoming a flood has already become a drizzle and that it peters with time. But if we are to understand the problem of art in America, we must first answer the question in different terms from those in which it has already been answered. For what we really desire to know is whether conditions of life in America in any way hinder the artist's expression. And this we cannot find out until we have ascertained whether that which the artist has been creating in this country in modern times is great. If it is, we must ask how, then, does it compare with the product of the past? Further, if it does not compare favorably, why not? And on the answer to this question, I think, we have the key to the whole question.

To answer such questions, however, one must go much further than the personal and limited experience of the artist. For this reason I believe the critic should be allowed to have his say. For one has to study questions and conditions with which the artist is seldom concerned, and which may seem to him of little relevance to his own creative process. One must investigate ideals, [illegible], philosophic and spiritual currents playing on the artist, and one must seek to discover exactly what influences institutions exert on him and on his material.

It must already have become apparent that in order to answer the question fully it is not sufficient to point out, as Mr. Dreiser and Mr. Masters have pointed out, that the American scene is varied and rich enough for any art—none richer today. Of course it is, to the American artist. The truth is that the scene of life, no matter in what country, at what date of its history, in life's eternal flux and in the paradoxical recurrence of permanent yet seemingly ever new manifestations, never for one instant ceases to be a fitting subject for the artist. The artist who says (if any such ever existed) that the life of his age has ceased to interest him, that he would like to have been born in another age, and that the dulness which he encounters around him is the reason why he does not create, is simply and obviously shifting the responsibility for his own sterility. Nor may we escape this truism by speaking of a period of decadence. Decadence is too vague a term and no one has yet successfully defined it. Decadent in what? Do we mean that the human spirit, at certain periods of history, enters into a lethargy? The idea of decadence with which we love nowadays so much to toy has no scientific validity. It seems rather more plausible to say that the human spirit (relatively constant in its powers, for we have absolutely no data on which to rest the belief that the Periclean age had more brain content than that of 700 A.D. or our own) meets occasionally with conditions and circumstances so complicated, so utterly beyond its control, that it cannot grapple with them.

Now here, indirectly, we have come to the crux of our problem. The question we have asked is really whether conditions in our times in America are such as to allow the birth of great art—and what greatness they do allow.

I do not alone mean by "conditions" such obvious and superficial manifestations of our age as industrialism. These can be easily recognized and evaluated. I mean also conditions emanating from the philosophic structure of the age: the dogmas, the prejudgments, the spiritual as well as intellectual or material forces which govern us. Dogmas and currents from which the age draws its color and acquires its temper. And which draw the artist into their vortex more violently than he ever knows and more inexorably than he would be willing to admit.

The answer to the question, I may say immediately, is a negative one. Great art, that is to say, art which can compare with that of Aeschylus or Euripides, with that of Shakespeare or Rabelais or Cervantes, is not possible in America today. And I say today because I do not yield second place to any one in my faith for the potentialities which lie hidden in the soul of this empire. I may further point out, before I attempt to defend my belief, that the art of America today is of importance, and perhaps will live, not as art, intrinsically, but as an index of an important civilization in its early stages of development. We may here without danger of confusion or vagueness yield to the popular clichés and say that the soul of Europe is impotent, that such strange and indefinable products of its genius as "Ulysses" and "A la recherche du Temps Perdu" are the last rich fruits of an arbor already dying. For though these phrases do not explain much in reality, they bear a sediment of demonstrable truth.

But my contention that we cannot produce art of the first magnitude should need no defense, nor can I here furnish an elaborate one. Yet if we take our contemporary masterpieces it will be easy for us to see that, measured by the criteria with which we judge those of the masters, they fall into the category of minor works of art. There is no doubt that Edgar Lee Masters has written in the "Spoon River Anthology" something which will baffle the efforts of oblivion. One feels something in it which is of permanent and universal human interest. And the same is also true of "Winesburg, Ohio," and, in spite of its slipshod form, of "Sister Carrie." It is not as apparent, perhaps, of "Jurgen." But shall we say that these, the greatest works of art of contemporary America, compare with "Hamlet" or with "Don Quixote"? With "Rabelais" or with "King Lear"? Are they as significant, as profound, as unmistakably works of genius—so that it can be said that they will live as vigorously as they do now outside of the peculiar material and ideal conditions which saw them born?

* This is the subject of a series of articles by American writers, appearing in the light of their several experiences in America. Can an artist function freely in the United States? Mary Austin, Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, Zona Gale, Edgar Lee Masters, Ludwig Lewisohn, Floyd Dell, Waldo Frank and Hiram Motherwell and Ralph M. Pearson have [illegible] contributed.

And why not? Not, it seems to me, because their creators are smaller than the masters. Again such a facile answer leaves everything to be explained. Nor should we enter into futile and perhaps even odious comparisons of the moderns and the masters. On that score I would not venture an opinion. But whatever their relative merit, it must also be borne in mind that our artists are laboring under circumstances which they cannot, for the present, expect to control, of which they are, and must for some time yet remain, the victims.

Exactly what are these conditions? It will be sufficient for our purpose to say that the artist here is not able to create great works of art because, no matter what degree of detachment he could achieve from the contemporary scene, no matter how far he could recede from the crazy pageantry which constitutes his material, even under the most auspicious circumstances he could not expect to digest that scene totally, he could not expect to see it, that is to say, steadily and wholly under the light of a unifying principle. The confusion of our age is too great, too loud is its din and too quick its tempo, for us totally to master its intricate pattern. And without the mastery of the details of life and a complete cognizance of the forces that guide it, we can never hope to express it fully. We may today, it is true, take a small section of existence and say of it, it is thus and so, we can perceive such and such forces playing in it for good or evil, such forces carrying it hither or thither. In so far as we are able to do this we will dimly foreshadow, as Dreiser and Masters and Anderson have already foreshadowed, some qualities of life which justly appear to us to be permanent and radical characteristics of existence, independent of superficial manifestations and impervious to superficial pressures. But until we are able to see the whole phenomenon of life as a unit, and until our understanding of the forces which move it becomes so thorough as to play freely, the creation of great masterpieces—the advent of Hamlets or Quixotes, of Gargantuas or Fausts—will be denied us.

Our age obviously does not lend itself to such an understanding. Are we not proud of its confusion? And to believe that one could express confusion is to fall into a sad contradiction in terms, to say the least. For to express is to define and limit something in the phenomenal world first, that is to say, to understand it and then to render it symbolically. But how can we express contemporary life if its most radical characteristic is its confusion, if it is not amenable to be understood and defined and limited? That is to say, how can we express it if we cannot analyze it, and, having analyzed it, we lack a concept—philosophical or religious or moral—through which we can achieve a synthesis?

Not to You Only, O Pythian

By MARY AUSTIN

Not to you only, O Pythian,
Out of rock crevices,
Out of earth's sacred middle
Where the ancient spore of the Sun
Still works in her,
Comes madness.

Here, out of Arroyos Hondos,
Between the prevailing
Stiff stems of the junipers,
Dream shaping vapors set back the moonlight,
Here from the wine red rift of the rim-rock,
Weighting the eyelids,
Out of the Grand Canyon's motionless unreality,
Visions prophetic.

Not to you only, the wish-colored
Word Hieratic,
Not solely at Delos, O Pythian,
But here at the desert's fire new edges,
Inebriate of the earth, to the Sun corybantic,
The god with my voice declaring
What I discern not.

Books

First Glance

"BENEATH the organized vivacity of our American communities, who is not aware of a blankness, a sterility, a boredom, a despair?" Lewis Mumford asks this question at the end of "The Golden Day: A Study in American Experience and Culture" (Boni and Liveright: $2.50), and does not wait for an answer. He does not wait for an answer because he has given one in the form of an explanation. His book, which starts from a feeling that life in America is unsatisfactory today, is an investigation of our past undertaken with a view to discovering in the first place whether we ever were happier than we are now and in the second place whether, if there is a reason for our spiritual condition, that reason can be followed back to its roots. Mr. Mumford did something of the same sort of thing in "Sticks and Stones," taking his departure there from architecture as it has revealed, generation in and generation out, our weaknesses and our occasional strength. Here his material is literature. In appearance a series of essays on American authors who would be significant in such a study, "The Golden Day" is in reality all one essay, all one cry of hope mingled with despair. It is intensely unified—wherefrom comes its charm and wherein lies its error.

Mr. Mumford's error is that he too much suffers in the presence of error—which he defines in too strict terms. Like Van Wyck Brooks, from whom as critic he stems, he makes too fine a demand upon both books and men; and though there is certainly nothing amiss in a beautiful idea—Mr. Mumford's central idea is a veritable gem, polished needs to be written with a rougher hand. Mr. Mumford looks for evidence that America once possessed a literature which expressed the single portion of her soul he likes to contemplate. This is the mystical portion—the portion having to do with those states of being in which the whole of experience is transformed in the mind and made to glow there with a pure white light. Mr. Mumford dismisses under the head of error every book which has failed to participate in this vision or has succeeded incompletely. He asks first what the American experience is, and the answer takes him back at least into the history of European culture of which we seemed to promise an improvement. He asks next what the American mind, working freely and passionately, can do with such experience, and the answer takes him up and down our literature. His criticism of most American literature is that it has done nothing with American experience; the pioneer, far from facing the Nature he came to seek, merely evaded society and became a savage; and since the Civil War we have merely debauched ourselves with externals—been pragmatists of the cruder sort—or preferred looking back to Europe which, unfortunately, is dead, for relics of its culture to plow in our museums. Only once, in a golden day which lasted twenty years, did we get life whole. That was the day of Emerson, Thoreau, Hawthorne, Whitman, and Melville. Those men opened their eyes and saw "a new America"—the America which we have not yet realized.

I am far from denying the importance of Mr. Mumford's golden five, but I am far from believing that they or any other five are a charter of inclusions by which earlier and later men can be evaluated. Mr. Mumford, blinded by their light, misses a large part of Jonathan Edwards, Mark Twain, and Theodore Dreiser, to name only three authors whom his eyes were not built to see. "Emerson achieved nakedness," he insists with some pleasure. There is the trouble. I like clothes, too, even when they are absurd and awry.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Complete Die-Hard

England. By the Very Rev. W. R. Inge, Dean of St. Paul's. The Modern World Series. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

DEAN INGE has for many years enjoyed distinction as a churchman and a scholar. Recently, however, he has developed the qualities which brought his sermons to admirably, and has devoted some part of his talents to journalism. In this field, too, he has speedily completed a very profitable term. His specialty is gloom. He essays to be the Jeremiah of the British Empire, bewailing its lost glories and prophesying its downfall; but, unlike his ancient prototype, he is not stoned by his fellow-countrymen. There is no martyrdom coming to him, unless the enthusiastic approval of the Daily Mail be counted such; only generous royalties. For the English have always rewarded and honored those who tell them they are degenerate and their country going to the dogs.

In this newest addition to the Modern World Series the Dean sets out to give a picture of England today as he sees it. His artistic methods are simple and sweeping. He has no use for half-tones. In the center of his picture is an oak-tree. It has been a splendid tree in its time, but now it is looking distinctly wilted. Round the trunk and reaching into the upper branches climb parasitic plants, nasty poisonous-looking things. The biggest of these is an insidious red creeper labeled Syndicalist Trade Unionism. Another plant with luxuriant, gaudy foliage is indicated as Roman Catholicism, while a third bears an unmistakable resemblance to the shamrock. Round the base of the tree and gnawing busily at its roots is an army of repellent-looking animals, instantly recognizable as of Russian origin. A little to one side is another tree—a very curious specimen. It apparently began life as an oak, but it has somehow turned into a hybrid unlike any other tree in the world. It is very healthy, nevertheless, with a profusion of golden leaves, and it is growing so rapidly that, although younger than the oak, it is considerably higher and is robbing its neighbor of light and air. In the background of this tragic picture is the setting sun trailing clouds of glory; the foreground, in strong contrast, consists simply of a deep, deep, black shadow. In creating this masterpiece the Dean has made no pretense of an objective approach. "I have tried," he says in his preface, "to be candid; I have made no attempt whatever to be impartial." And indeed he hasn't!

His main thesis is that England is tottering to her fall because of "the anti-social and unpatriotic sectionalism which is the curse of industrial civilization." So far it is possible, if not to agree, at least to sympathize. "Unpatriotic sectionalism" is a phrase that might cover a multitude of sinners—coal-owners, for instance. But one soon realizes that the section offensive to the Dean is nothing less than the whole British working class. Since 1880 or thereabouts they have deteriorated rapidly. Their days are spent, not in honest toil but, egged on by those who are plotting the ruin of industry, in contriving ingenious methods of ca'canny and sabotage. They have used their political enfranchisement to hold the propertied classes to ransom, securing for themselves all manner of doles and pensions. They are reluctant to emigrate (and so relieve the pressure of population at home) "while a grateful country provides them with the means of leading a parasitic existence, battening on the rates and taxes." They breed like rabbits, while the "better stock" are so burdened that they have almost ceased to reproduce.

It is true that at one point the Dean relents slightly. The average worker is not, in himself, anti-social. He is "a good-natured, humorous, kindly, and sensible fellow." But that is irrelevant, because "the syndicalist leaders." ("Syndicalist" is a favorite abusive adjective with the Dean; it covers apparently every kind of radical leader from Philip Snowden to Lenin) "have made the discovery that the opinions of the vast unconscious mass need not be taken into account." These leaders will be amazed to learn that they hold the workers to their sinister purposes by the exercise of an "iron discipline." They are the more easily able to do so because "the army of rebellion" includes, in addition to the unconscious mass of decent workingmen, a horde of the submerged—"a large number of degenerates who might have been eliminated under ruder social conditions, but who are now encouraged to live and multiply. Some of these are imbecile, neurotic, half-insane; others are chronic invalids; others are psychopaths with some morbid strain in their character." This formidable force is led by "renegades from the ranks of civilization. These leaders are often brilliant men with a fatal moral and mental twist, really insane, but with a frightful method in their madness."

I have quoted this description of the British labor movement because it illustrates perfectly the turgid depths to which the Dean can fall when he forgets that he is a Christian, a scholar, and a gentleman. One cannot argue with the Dean, for he lives in too remote a world; one can only be a little sorry for him. His primary grudge is against heaven, which decreed that he should be born into a twentieth-century civilization equipped with an excellent but entirely out-of-date mind. How happy he might have been as an eminent ecclesiastic of the first Georgian era! Then there was none of this silly talk about democracy; industrialism had not yet cast its shadow and perverted the proletariat by cheapening the luxuries which were the prerogative of the wealthy and well born; Americans were still colonists and of no account at that. What a pleasant world! Society was an efficient and well-oiled mechanism and there was no need for a dean to neglect his cloistered studies to point out what was wrong with the works.

Dean Inge is so completely overwhelmed by his prejudices that although he is terribly in earnest his book cannot be taken as a serious contribution to current politics. As a revelation of the complete die-hard it is indeed worth skimming. As an attempt to carry out the purposes of the Modern World Series it is nonsense. One must regret that the editor and the publishers of the series, which has included some admirable volumes, should have been tempted by a big name to lower their standards.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Mr. Mencken's Best

Prejudices: Fifth Series. By H. L. Mencken. Alfred A. Knopf. 2.50.

Notes on Democracy. By H. L. Mencken. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

MR. MENCKEN has achieved, in spite of himself, more than a measure of popularity. To admire him ceased, several years ago, to confer distinction, and accordingly all those who would rather be wrong than go with the crowd ceased to admire. It has become smart to say that he is overrated; it is merely flat to call him great; and yet the fact remains that he has grown steadily in strength and that he is, today, one of the very best writers America has produced—grotesque, of course, but with as good a right as Mark Twain ever had to be so if such is his nature. With the content of the two present volumes—the one a collection of short pieces upon very varied subjects, the other a Rabelaisian disquisition which begins with a delighted analysis of the moral and intellectual depravity of the average man and proceeds to a rapturous account of the absurdities of our national political life—I have no immediate concern; but with their manner I have, for it is Mr. Mencken at his very fine best.

This style of his seems easy to imitate. Many have imagined that they had caught the knack when they had sprinkled their pages with a few favorite words like "bilge" and gaudy" and with perhaps a phrase or two from the German as well; but imitation Mencken is very sorry stuff indeed, and the reason is simply that from the diverse and apparently base elements which make up his style he has forged a weapon—sword or bludgeon—which only he can wield. Menckenese is not something to be put on or discarded at will but, instead, like every true style, the perfect expression of a mind and temper. It is not sufficient to have the desire to share his popularity or even the willingness to slash as he slashes. To write like him one would have to have, in addition, his thoughts and his feelings; one would have to share his exuberant interest in the contemporary scene and catch at the same time the glad irresponsibility which enables him to find in fools nothing but amusement; one would have, in a word, not merely to imitate or admire but actually to be Mencken.

And hardest of all to catch would be the joyousness of his polemic. "Bitter" is the adjective which has been chosen to describe on the jacket the book on democracy, but it is just one of the most essential of his characteristics that he is never near enough to frustration to be bitter. The words flow so freely and the epithets are so adequate that emotion is purged away and he is, as a writer, too triumphant to be bitter. Damn him up, take away his superlative gift of words, make him feel that his contempt was greater than he could express, and he would grow savage; but as long as his language does not fail vituperation will keep him sweet and laughter, not rage, will continue to be the fundamental note of his work. Every fresh outrage to sense which he can discover adds to the hilarity of his mood because it furnishes another occasion to which he knows he can rise. The worse things can be shown to be the more obvious are his high spirits, and thus, to him, even democracy is justified by its absurdity. Of Bryan's failure to get himself elected president he says:

> Dullness has got into the White House and the smell of cabbage boiling, but there is at least nothing to compare to the intolerable buffoonery that went on in Tennessee. The President of the United States may be an ass, but at least he doesn't believe that the earth is square. The Golden Text is not painted serially on the Washington wall, and there is no proof to every intelligent visitor while Pastor Simpson of Smythville prays for rain in the Blue Room. We have escaped something—by a narrow margin but still we escaped.

One wonders if he is really glad.

My case must rest ultimately upon a quotation, and I choose one—from the "In Memoriam" on Bryan in the "Prejudices"—which is quieter than much of Mr. Mencken's writing. It has its touches of the grotesque but it does not depend upon them alone. In it, besides the humor, is the steady march of great prose: the quiet, confident progression which is the mark of the strong writer who knows his strength. Of its kind it is as fine as anything written in America. Here it is:

> There was something peculiarly fitting in the fact that his last days were spent in a one-horse Tennessee village, and that death found him there. The man felt at home in such simple and Christian scenes. He liked people who sweated freely, and were not debauched by the refinements of the toilet. Making his progress up and down the Main Street of little Dayton, surrounded by gaping primates from the upper valleys of the Cumberland Range, his coat laid aside, his bare arms and hairy chest shining damply, his bald head sprinkled with dust—so accoutred and on display he was obviously happy. He liked getting up early in the morning, to the tune of cocks crowing on the dunghill. He liked the heavy, greasy victuals of the farmhouse kitchen. He liked country lawyers, country pastors, all country people. He liked country sounds and country smells. I believe this liking was sincere—perhaps the only sincere thing in the man. . . . The simian gabble of the cross-roads was not gabble to him, but wisdom of an occult and superior sort. . . . And toward the end, as he gradually forsook mundane politics for more ghostly concerns, they began to elevate him in their hierarchy. When he died he was the peer of Abraham. His old enemy, Wilson, aspiring to the same white and shining robe, came down with a thump. But Bryan made the grade. His place in Tennessee hagiography is secure. If the village barber saved any of his hair, then it is curing gall-stones down there today.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

State and Government

The Modern State. By R. M. MacIver. Oxford University Press. $7.

NO student of political science can afford to leave this book unread. It presents, in reasonable limits, an admirable and suggestive view of the whole range of problems raised by the modern state; and there are few of them, indeed, upon which it has not something wise to say. I am tempted, indeed, to say that there has been no book quite like it since T. H. Green. It lacks something of the latter's superb moral insight; and it does not dig so deeply. But it has breadth, learning, and clarity. It is written in an interesting style, and it has the great quality of raising the ultimate questions in a significant way. Were I a university president (there is no danger of the event) who desired to have political philosophy taught in the grand style, I should not leave Professor MacIver long at Toronto.

The period since the war has seen a large effort at the revision of accepted notions in political science. In almost every country there have arisen groups of thinkers who insist that the complex of powers summarized under the name of sovereignty cannot be thought of in the old way. Its defenders have retorted with vehemence; and the debate has now assumed formidable proportions. Professor MacIver may be said to occupy a middle position between the contestants. On the one hand he insists on the unique position of the state as a legal fact; on the other he admits that this is a historical category subject to change in a changing world. His method is to trace the development of the state through the historic period, to seek from its history the clue to its powers and functions, to discuss the bearing of form and organization on its purpose and operation, and finally to explain what he believes to be the truth in the present chaos of conflicting opinions.

Briefly, his position is somewhat as follows. He will have nothing to do with the equation of state and society. The state is an organ of the community the function of which is to maintain "the universal external conditions of social order" by means of coercive power. It has the authority necessary to this end, but no more. It is not sovereign in the sense of being omnicompetent. Other bodies are as original and real as itself; and, like them, it is dependent upon the opinion of its members for its well-being. The order it maintains does not mean merely the absence of violence. It is an order which embodies the protection and development of personality; all, accordingly, that affects these comes within the sphere of the state. Professor MacIver discusses the mechanisms it requires for this purpose; and he concludes, broadly, in favor of representative democracy based upon the party system as the most useful and satisfactory. He denies that the state is merely power. He will have nothing to do with theories of contract. The state for him is the agent of society in the creation of rights; and he faces the dilemma of how a power which has rights can itself have obligations by arguing that behind the state is the community, and that it is the common interest of the latter which gives the state-power its nourishment. The community, in other words, as the source of organization gives to all its instruments the value which enables them to live. The state has high value, but upon the grim condition of deserving it. Its power is subjective, is set by men's opinions, and is not independent of them. The more the state lives by winning their allegiance, the greater its power, because the greater thereby is the unity of society.

Much of Professor MacIver's thesis I should venture to indorse from a different angle. I see no reason why anyone should respect the state as such; it is entitled to my allegiance only by what it shows itself able to perform. I am entitled to judge it, and, if need be, to condemn it, because, in the last analysis, it lives neither for nor to itself but to me. The great merit, as I see it, of Professor MacIver's book is that it states the results of what it is now customary to call the pluralists in sociological terms. If I indicate some difficulties that I feel, these are rather problems upon which I am anxious for enlightenment as to Professor MacIver's views than attacks upon his position. I cannot, in the first place, understand what he means by words and phrases like "society" or "common interest"; I see no unity of any kind in society except what is put there by men, and I see none possible of achievement except by a complete reconstruction of the foundations of the present order.

Professor MacIver seems to me to write as though there is somehow a unity in society which a force called "progress" or "evolution" is unfolding; I cannot see that this is so. In the second place, he seems to me to use the term "state" where a political scientist would often replace it by "government"; and in these instances the functions he attributes to the state seem to me to bear much less real relation to the facts than he admits. And, as a corollary to this view, he seems to lay far too little emphasis upon the importance in the social order of the system of property. It is, in fact, from the rights annexed to property that a social order takes its color. Society may make its impact upon the state; but the state also makes society, and the whole process of life is set in the context of what its property-system implies. Rights, for instance, which Professor MacIver admits the state exists to maintain are always, in fact, relative to property, whether it is freedom of discussion, equality before the courts, or a living wage that is involved. The result of unequal property is, accordingly, that the state exists actually to protect unequal rights and in "maintaining the universal conditions of social order" it is, again in fact, maintaining unequal rights. This is the great truth in the communist answer to the classical political philosophy. There is a real sense in which the modern state is substantially the "executive committee of the capitalist class." To those of us who believe that the present system involves the class-war as its inherent logic, this aspect of the problem is urgent, and needs more discussion than Professor MacIver has devoted to it.

HAROLD J. LASKI

Seeing Things

A Million and One Nights: The History of the Motion Picture. By Terry Ramsay. Simon and Schuster. Two volumes. $10.

NOT so long ago when you lived in Cairo (Ill.) or Brazil (Ind.) you had to content your desire for the play with attendance at heart-rending performances of "Hamlet" or "The Minister's Sweetheart" given by incidental traveling companies dignified with the poetic name of hams. Now you can live in Carthage (Ind.) or Centralia (Mo.) and observe the Fall of Babylon or the domestic habits of pythons or "This Side of Paradise" or the other side of Dante's "Inferno" or the impressive public appearance of Calvin Coolidge in a silk hat. It is all the fault of the moving pictures that dull lives may witness the blood-lust of romance and go on vicarious galleons to the uttermost parts of the sea and watch Douglas Fairbanks take himself seriously as a black pirate.

It is common enough to find deep-browed intellectuals who deny art to the moving pictures and weep for the glad times when little children read the complete works of Charles Dickens instead of shivering at the great stone face of William Hart. They protest that people no longer read books or go to the theater. They get as much shocked at the scandalous private lives of Hollywood mummers as the good Elizabethan burghers got shocked at the abuses of the theater and the ribaldries of the Mermaid Tavern. They see Douglas Fairbanks turn the Three Musketeers into acrobats or read that "Cyprienne" is to be called "Don't Tell the Wife"; and they go away quite angry. They believe ingenuously that the public which now adores so many silly movies really did read Shakespeare and Meredith once upon a time. They love the blood-boltered Elizabethan dramatists and refuse to be serious about "The Perils of Pauline" or "The Iron Claw" or "The Exploits of Elaine" or the other heart-shuddering serials of the golden age.

The most casual glance at Mr. Ramsay's pages will of course prove the intellectual's case against the motion picture industry, but also it may remind him that at its best the motion picture does what no book or play or picture can ever do. It can show action in visible terms of motion; and even if it can not plumb the soul or write blank verse it can body forth panorama and landscape and mountain range and medieval battle and the unhappy lives of Keystone cops on a scale and magnificence impossible in the theater. It may be no more than gesture and pantomime; and yet "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari" is just as grisly and artistic as Poe's "Mask of the Red Death"; and the Babylon episodes in "Intolerance" and the sea-fight in "Cabiria" dazzle the eye and rouse the blood to an excitement at least as great as the best pages of Dumas and Tolstoi. That is the final argument for the art of the movies. I for one am merely bored by Mr. Ramsay's multitudinous references to every lawsuit and personal interview and salary contract that ever happened for the past fifty years. It is much more chronology than it is history. It is amusing enough, and often Mr. Ramsay is extremely funny and penetrating, but it is too choked with heaped facts like faggots piled up to hide the face of a cathedral. It tells everything and thereby it does not tell enough. It is a mine of information; but I wish that some one would analyze fully the change which has come over American motion pictures since the golden age of the crook serials to the bourgeois morality which now dominates the screen.

No one can deny all the bloated finance and corruption and evil which have festered in the motion pictures just as they fester in any art where the producer or publisher wants artists to serve as pimps to the lowest grade of public taste. No one has suffered more than I have suffered from uncounted spectacles of incredible dulness and silliness. Yet I cannot see why the average novel or play or biography is any less corrupt and imbecile than the average motion picture. What else can you expect in an art accessible to everybody? What else can you hope for in a land of sumptuary laws and democratic ideals of art? That is no argument against "Intolerance" or "Peter the Great" or "The Last Laugh" or "The Mark of Zorro" any more than Harold Bell Wright is an argument against Theodore Dreiser. After all, to read even the best pages of "War and Peace" is not quite the same thing as seeing those terrible battle pictures in the "Birth of a Nation." It is one function of every great novelist to make you see. I think the artist himself would be the last person to deny the virtue of an alien art which can do things he cannot do and show so poignantly all the gestures of visible life caught in the net of passionate action.

DONALD DOUGLAS

Mr. Eddison's Second

Styrbiorn the Strong. By E. R. Eddison. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

SOMETHING of the elder Norse hung over the battles of "The Worm Ouroboros"; here we have it neat in the author's own saga built up on the fragments of information available concerning the great son and nephew of the Swede-Kings Olaf and Eric, who lived, harried, and gloriously died in twenty years of the tenth century. The first and least thing which the reader notes is a manner of discourse: how the writer reproduces the tones and cadences of the bards, talking their talk without accent or self-consciousness the while he pictures for modern readers scenes, looks into subtleties of motive and character, as to which through use or indifference those ancients might have remained silent. More important in itself than with reference to any such standard is this astounding prose, changing hue with its changing subjects, flashing here and there with half-forgotten words which, like steel that for a while has rested, have thereby a keener edge; the word, moreover, the phrase, the incident, held back, timed, balanced, then thrown unerringly where it inevitably belongs and utterly realizes its value.

That is method only, but this, a small book, is a spacious legend. If, as may be, Mr. Eddison is oppressed by the petty and transitory, he will not do it the honor of an offended reproduction in his pages. If of the figures—virtuous or evil—that stalk through those pages too few by our experience are meanly so or unworthy a share of their creator's love, he errs on the neglected side, and we have need of more who are acquainted with nobility, to remind us of its lineaments. But hastily be it said that these are men and women of flesh and blood, and violent, headstrong, proud, or surly enough in all conscience to satisfy all demands of the current realism save that one rejected.

"A strange unlucky tale," full of the sea and the vikings' ships and the tall, arrogant, eager, figure of Styrbiorn drawing love and hate from every hand, shining in the light and at last, to a curious wrench of the heart, darkened by the dust of Fyrisfield: to a wrench for whose pain one is somehow jealous to the point of rejecting and regretting the comfort of the magnificent final picture, Valhalla. Mr. Eddison himself has written elsewhere: "I have known Juss and Gorice for some 35 years; Styrbiorn, etc., only 25." Few minds could have afforded space at once for more than the vast round conception of "The Worm," and "Stybiorn the Strong" is distinguished where that, it is submitted, was great. But distinguished it is, and of a royal breed apart.

In a handsome volume one regrets only the fewness of Keith Henderson's designs, their reproduction without a credit line, and the anonymous anachronism of Arthurian knights in panoply on the jacket.

ABBE NILES

Fremont Older and Jack Black

My Own Story. By Fremont Older. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

You Can't Win. By Jack Black. The Macmillan Company. $2.

IN San Francisco they tell you that Fremont Older first moved heaven and earth to get Abe Ruef into the penitentiary, and then moved earth and heaven in a vain effort to get him out. Now, they add, Fremont Older rarely sits down to a meal without having some ex-convicts at the table. At this point the tales diverge, one man telling you that Older is a dangerous anarchist and another insisting that he is one of the saints of democracy.

In "My Own Story" Mr. Older tells how he developed from "a young man with a nose for news" into a self-righteous crusader bent on throwing grafters into jail, and how, finally, he developed into that gentler being who said: "I shall never forget the morning that Ruef started for the penitentiary. All the bitterness and hatred of all the years of pursuit came into my mind to reproach me. I thought, 'Is this success or is it utter failure? Is this a real victory or an appalling defeat? After all the years of mad pursuit, is this the harvest? The imprisonment and branding of one poor, miserable, helpless human being.' "

To this ramping Western editor long accustomed to wielding a newspaper as a spiked club there came, then, a vision such as came to Francis of Assisi when he met the leper, or such as came to the man-hunter on the road to Damascus. But instead of founding a monastic order or a new religion Mr. Older began, with that "nose for news" still guiding him, to make his newspaper a confessional where the poor and broken and outcast told their stories to all San Francisco. There, after some years, he joined them with his own story, which, after becoming part of the legend of San Francisco and being read with eagerness in a limited edition by students of journalism and politics, is now a book for the public.

The rise in California of the Progressive movement which resulted in Hiram Johnson's governorship and senatorship is told in "My Own Story," as it was the prosecution of Abe Ruef, the San Francisco boss, which brought to a head the indignation resulting in the successful drive of 1910 against the Southern Pacific's political domination of the State. There are many famous names in this portion of the story. Scheming, manipulating, hating, electioneering, lambasting scorch the pages. Not earthquake, not fire, could halt the ruthless charge of Mr. Older and his crusading associates, nor could the corruption they fought be checked by the ruin of a city. Here the tale moves like a whirlwind against a background of conflagration.

Turning from the relatively respectable political world, in the latter portion of his book Mr. Older tells story after story of burglars, dope fiends, women of the streets, of their agonies and clutchings after happiness, and, only too often, of their failure to be anything in the end but what some strange twist of soul had made them from the beginning. But Mr. Older does not walk in this museum of the underworld like a Barnum pointing out freaks. He loves and sympathizes with each one of these distorted creatures.

One of the outcasts was Jack Black, whom Older found he could not classify with other criminals he had known, declaring: 'He is in a class by himself. That is why he is so interesting." When Older first met Black, the latter had lain six years in a San Francisco jail, neglected and forgotten because the records of his case had been burned in the great fire of 1906. Black was under sentence of twenty-five years for highway robbery, and so did not press his case. If he got out of the jail he would go to the penitentiary, so why bother? But he was given his chance to reform, and he reformed. For years now he has been librarian of the paper of which Mr. Older is editor, the San Francisco Call.

"You Can't Win" is a story told, as Robert Herrick says in the foreword, by a man who has "an instinct for realities." Jack Black tells his tale straight on, marching with a firm tread and with very little sentimentalizing through an account of highway robberies, safe-crackings where his fellow-yegg was killed by pursuers, penitentiary horrors, violent deaths by accident in boxcars and by murder beside jungle campfires, and opium dens. The tale takes hold of the teller and he sweeps along, never asking whether this or that incident will help or hinder the propaganda of his friends, the prison reformers. But despite the fascination of these picaresque adventurings, the most nobly exciting thing in the book is the revelation it gives of the unbreakable spirit of Jack Black himself. Here is a man tramping the most devious byways, but always with his head held up and his spirit firm within him. There is no moral to the tale save that some souls are strong, unquenchably so.

R. L. Burgess

What Price Happiness?

[illegible] of a Happy Life. By William Lawrence. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

[illegible] a witty naturedly Bishop Lawrence has had "a happy life." Born to the purple, raised to the lawn, heir of wealth, culture, social standing, dowered with physical health, personal charm, a good mind, successful as the world counts success, companion of the great and powerful, now coming to life's close with > . . . that which should accompany old age,

> As honor, love, obedience, troops of friends,

[illegible] he has been "blessed beyond measure."

Were this the life-story of any other than a distinguished Christian leader, we should read it with joy, perhaps with envy, certainly with admiration. Bishop Lawrence found his appointed work early, and has labored at it diligently through more than fifty years. His chief thought has always been his diocese, and in this vineyard he has brought forth abundant harvests. Outside he has been busy also, raising the Harvard [illegible] and the Church Pension Fund, sitting on innumerable boards and committees, participating in public affairs of large importance, traveling widely for business as well as pleasure. This man has been no idler.

[illegible] fatal word!—there is something wrong. What is it if not a complacency, not with himself and his work, for the Bishop is a modest man, but with the world in which his lot has been so happily cast? What right has any religious leader to [illegible] with things as they are, to adapt himself so easily to the wealth and power of his time, to move so easily among politicians (Henry Cabot Lodge), millionaires (J. P. Morgan), kings (Edward VII), to be so conspicuously a member of a class and that the upper class of such a society as ours? There have been great labor troubles in the Bishop's day—one unforgettable strike in his own feudal barony (Lawrence, Massachusetts)—but, barring a few casual lines, they are not mentioned. There have been vast political struggles for larger freedom and fuller life for the people but they do not intrude upon this world. There have been three wars—and they are received as natural, even glorious events, and valorously supported. Not since the fall of Rome has there been such a rocking of the social fabric, such a challenge to civilization, as in this age—yet one feels scarce a tremor in this narrative.

Bishop Lawrence has lived a happy life primarily because he has adapted himself successfully to his narrow, highly prosperous, perfectly protected social group. He has accepted the world as good because it has been good to him. Christian leaders have not always been so conventional, and not always therefore so "happy."

John Haynes Holmes

A Philosophical Poem

Love-life in Nature. By Wilhelm Bölsche. A. and C. Boni. Two volumes. $10.

PROPHECY is doubly an act of daring. The prophet must be strong in the loneliness of his vision; but courage also is required of him who has heard the seer, and will cry "Lo! it is here. The day is come!" Santayana, finally evaluating Lucretius, Dante, and Goethe, beheld them fulfilled in a fourth philosophical poet who would add Goethe's immediate sense of human experience to the Roman poet's conception of nature, and who would comprehend in a cosmic epic man's fullest knowledge of the universe, and the widest diversity of human values. "Throw open to the young poet the infinity of nature: let him feel the precariousness of life, the variety of purposes, civilizations, and religions even upon this little planet; let him trace the triumphs and follies of art and philosophy, and their perpetual resurrection." Should that poet have genius, "a taste for the world in which he lived and a clean view of it," he might write the great poem of Nature, having the double insight of Lucretius and Goethe. He could "reconstruct the shattered picture of the world. He should live in the continual presence of all experience and respect it; he should at the same time understand nature, the ground of that experience; and he should also have a delicate sense for the ideal echoes of his own passions, and for all the colors of his possible happiness." Wilhelm Bölsche is this poet, and "Love-life in Nature" is the great philosophical poem of naturalism.

De Amorum Natura. That title reveals the altered metaphysical perspective. Lucretius wrote of the things of nature, dead bits of "solid singleness," the atoms that in their local and universal movement produced mechanically the changing aspects of substance. It is the procession of these changes that Lucretius draws upon his canvas. This is a picture for Democritus and Newton, but not for Darwin. Biology and psychology have gone beyond the old physics, have added to the picture in terms which are not incompatible but which rather enlarge and transform it. The treatment of the great suns and stellar systems, of the earth and of all that is thereon, as organisms which have been formed from other organisms, as living beings which have a pattern of growth and decay, and a force to recreate new forms—this is the metaphysical outlook of our age, based in the biological sciences. It is of all Nature thus conceived that Bölsche writes, and he has chosen as his central theme the fact of love which is present in all natural life as the fact of creation and recreation, love in the sense of life itself governed by its essence, yearning to live and increase life.

Bölsche has written this epic, as Lucretius did, with the concrete panorama forever in the foreground; never, on the other hand, blurring the magnificently clear outlines of the whole. But in the two thousand years between them more has changed than viewpoint. Lucretius had to learn only what Democritus and Epicurus could teach; but Bölsche faced, and has mastered, the incomparably greater task of rendering the vaster store of our knowledge of the universe and of man in a coherent form, not only accurate before scientific standards but throughout transcending mere investigation and reasoning in the achievement of insight, or what Santayana calls "theory—a steady contemplation of all things in their order and worth." It is for this reason that Bölsche is a philosophical poet, having turned "his practical and passionate imagination on the order of all things, or on anything in the light of the whole." The fullest enumeration would fail to indicate the diversity of the particulars which Bölsche has informed with the significance of order. Perhaps it will suffice to say that he has employed the materials afforded him by astronomy, astral physics, physical chemistry, bio-chemistry, geology, paleontology, all of the biological sciences, cytology, protozoology, genetics, embryology, psychology, and anthropology. This survey is no mere gesture in the direction of science. The facts are numberless. On the other hand, Bölsche never loses his fundamental philosophical attitude. "The material that science gives us," he says, "is absolutely free. All you have to do is accept it. What use you make of it is your own affair."

But even more than that. The poet of our civilization must encompass not only its knowledge but its wisdom and its art, especially if his theme be Nature, for man and all his works cannot be divorced from the main currents of life. Human culture cannot be reported as science can, by inventory of fact. It must be reflected as in the "Divine Comedy." "Love-life in Nature" succeeds here, catching the values of art and philosophy in its cosmic network, and making them luminous with the meaning of the whole.

The reader can be instructed here only in the most general structure of the work. Like a great symphony it plays myriad variations upon a few inescapable motifs. The opening theme is the dominant, the evolution of love-life, of organic form and creative force, from the day-fly, to use Bölsche's metaphor, to the Madonna. The elements later to be encountered are here intimated. Succeeding sections develop the outlines of this epic story of the growth of worlds within worlds, always keeping the meaning of human love as the focal point of the vision, and enriching that meaning by the accumulated force of factual reiteration in endless variety of detail. The method Bölsche employs in doing this is that of a kaleidoscope. It brings picture after picture into view without obvious arrangement and yet the sequence moves onward to the final completed view in ever-broadening circles of comprehension.

Mr. Cyril Brown's translation suggests the passion and sweep that the original German prose must possess with even greater dignity. Bölsche through 1,400 pages is in conversation with his reader concerning love, and the exposition always maintains the personal directness of that manner. Even more extraordinary is the way in which complicated metaphors are elaborated, with clear accurate imagery sustained for pages. It is this power which enables Bölsche to substitute the magnifications of light-imagery for the microscope, and to throw immense spaces into defined perspective. Without suffering confusion or aimlessness, the reader travels through aeons of time, through stellar distances, and to all nooks and crannies of the terrestrial globe, and witnesses the wildly superabundant variegation of life upon this planet in all of the concrete phases of its cyclical manifestation.

This is undoubtedly a great work. To evaluate it thoroughly either as a work of art or as a philosophical expression would require more extended criticism. Enough if to Bölsche's prospective readers it be suggested that here is an epic over whose composition the spirits of Plato, Lucretius, Spinoza, Goethe, Schopenhauer, and Darwin must have presided.

MORTIMER J. ADLER

Below Par

Congress: An Explanation. By Robert Luce. Harvard University Press. $1.50.

THE substance of this book, originally prepared as a series of five lectures on the Godkin Foundation at Harvard, may not inaptly be characterized as a plea of confession and avoidance. Surveying the everyday work of Congress from the standpoint of an experienced member of the House of Representatives, Mr. Luce does not seem to go far beyond asking the reader: "What would you do if the job were yours?" Congress, he tells us at the outset, "is not to any material extent an originating body," far the larger part of the bills that come before it being prepared by, or in response to the wishes of, interests or departments which want this or that done. It could not well be much of an originating body, however, even if it so desired, since the aggregate of its knowledge is hardly sufficient to compass all that the public or the interests want, while to pass expert judgment upon the details of all that is asked would be impossible. Debate on the floor is grievously restricted, what is said by members at public hearings is largely for public consumption, and the real work is done in committees behind closed doors, where inconspicuous members shine; but the calendar is overcrowded, the really important committees are swamped, and amendments carried in open session are, on the average, few in number and of no great consequence.

Mr. Luce enumerates the arguments in favor of a budget system mainly to refute them, but he nevertheless believes in the system, defends Congress against the charge of extravagance, shows how many formalities must be complied with before the lid of the pork barrel can be lifted, and insists that the real struggle for economy is between the President and the department officials. For none of these shortcomings does there appear to be an assured remedy, although Mr. Luce, like a number of other writers who seem still to feel the spell of Gamaliel Bradford, thinks it worth while to discant upon the possible advantages of seating Cabinet members in either house. The book is full of information, but it does not dispell the conviction that while the average quality of members of Congress may perhaps be as high today as ever, as Mr. Luce feels confident that it is, their efficiency as a legislature is a long way below par.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Disraeli and Gladstone

Benjamin Disraeli. By Sir Edward Clarke. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Disraeli and Gladstone. By D. C. Somervell. George H. Doran Company. $3.50.

WHILE few Englishmen will agree with Sir Edward Clarke that his hero was "the greatest Englishman who was born and died in the nineteenth century," most will admit that Disraeli was the most romantic figure in the drab politics of that century. The long official biography of the statesman-novelist will be read in America only by expert historians, but many readers may be found for this vivid and entertaining story of the young Jew who, by sheer dint of ability and persistence, forced himself into the leadership of the Conservative Party, remodeled its policy, set the nation on its imperialist career, and won the heart of Queen Victoria and the almost abject veneration of the aristocracy of England. The political struggles and issues will be of little interest to most readers in comparison with the problem of personality—the combination here of an extravagant fop and poseur with an enthusiast and tireless toiler in the art of political intrigue and management.

A radical, a Chartist in his early sympathies, and the author of "Sybil," a truly revolutionary novel, Disraeli never shed the sort of sentimental socialism of his youthful outlook, but simply allowed it to be displaced by new enthusiasms better accommodated to the conveniences of his career. The passages here chosen from his speeches to illustrate his extraordinary vigor and felicity of expression go far to explain the mastery of the House of Commons he attained in a period when oratory was less suspect than now. He spoke for hours upon intricate issues without a note, but with careful preparation and with lively sallies of wit and invective. Less verbose than his great opponent, Gladstone, his utterances better stand the test of time, and Sir Edward Clarke can rightly claim for them that they contain a better and fuller exposition of modern British Conservatism than can be found elsewhere. There was private romance as well as political in Disraeli's life, and we have here a delightful picture of his happy married life with an elderly wife, together with the extraordinary philandering of his later years.

In Mr. Somervell's brilliant duo-biography Americans will find all the essential facts of the public careers of the great Mid-Victorian antagonists, with some penetrating glances at their strangely contrasted characters. How the "rising hope of the stern unbending Tories" became the accepted leader of British liberalism for thirty years without shedding any of his deeper conservative convictions, and how the dandiacal Jew radical novelist obtained an ascendancy over the aristocratic conservatives of England which passed into worship and is still enshrined in "Primrose Day"—this pair of paradoxes furnishes a most illuminating commentary upon what upon the surface seems the haphazard opportunism of British politics. Gladstone was au fait a moralist and preacher, Disraeli an actor-artist, and each found a place for his peculiar gifts in the least expected quarter. Disraeli's was the more extraordinary achievement, Gladstone's the more serviceable. Each had remarkable intellectual powers, but Disraeli's wit gives a higher survival value to his utterances. Even in the realm of literature Disraeli's "Sybil," and perhaps his "Coningsby," will live, whereas the volumes upon Homer and theology which occupied Gladstone's leisure never achieved more than a passing [illegible].

J. A. Hobson

Man versus Nature

The Book of Marriage. Arranged and Edited by Count Hermann Keyserling. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

"In every society, its civilization is the territory conquered in its contest with nature." So Tagore writes in his contribution to this polyphonic symphony of Count Keyserling. "It [illegible] in the age which has now come upon us, man is giving up the desperate hope of victoriously maintaining this constant struggle. He would now make his peace with Nature—and that duty has been intrusted to science. But the marriage system of every society belongs to an age when, in the parliament of life, man was sitting on the opposition benches against Nature's government. And Nature has ever retaliated against his obstructive tactics. Thus far they have nowhere come to any satisfactory agreement. That is why these ubiquitous attempts at the external regulation of man's most intimate relations have been insulting his best feelings and degrading the greatest of his institutions, all over the world."

The majority of the contributors to this symposium are still sitting on the opposition benches against Nature's government. For although their task was supposedly to locate marriage in Time and Space and so necessarily involved a description of the various attempts at regulation made by different peoples at different times, this task was dealt out to them by a very active director of the polyphonic orchestra, who, among other things, writes in his letters patent that "in spite of its polyphonic modulations . . . the entire work is attuned . . . and should always return," and who therefore furnished his collaborators with his definition of the "conventional marriage" to which it should return. "By 'conventional marriage' I mean, in accordance with its original and correct sense, marriage as the body of a specific ethos, the ethos of a definite cultural order, of a definite 'standing' in the cosmos." Who further illuminates his definition by interesting sidelights like the following: "The possibility of remarrying every year ruins marriage much more fundamentally than even the most frequent practice of adultery, for the latter does not at all affect marriage as such, but only offends against certain of its components, whereas divorce lays an ax at its roots. . . . Adultery existed all through the ages and was never looked upon as a real danger to marriage, in spite of the stringent protective and deterrent measures that were continually in force, for good reasons of their own; whereas facilitating divorce does seriously threaten marriage." Who asserts that "man is a human being only if he conquers Nature by spirit," and who sees in Nature's retaliations upon man for his obstructive tactics chiefly a superb opportunity for the practice of that renunciation through which alone, he believes, man can attain full spiritual development, though he concedes that "there is no need to marry in order merely to gratify one's passions. Whoever does so sins against himself as a human being."

There is also to be considered Marriage as an Eternal Problem, and I advise any reader who may find himself staggering faintly through Time and Space to persevere until he reaches this section. For though it is full of contradictions, of non sequiturs and of unscientific dogma, it is its great merit that it touches, sooner or later, on every complexity of this subject so overwhelmingly interesting to the modern man, or let us say the cultivated man, since marriage becomes a problem in proportion as personality develops. "The person who feels inclined to live on a plane too high for him becomes a dangerous fool," Jung observes in a particularly thoughtful essay. Havelock Ellis discusses Love as an Art and various psychologists discuss love as a science. So discord is allowed to function in our polyphonic symphony, but it recurs to its credo that sensual desire is the poorest possible basis for a successful marriage, and the nays have it.

Probably with justice, completely as the average modern may disagree with the particular steps that here lead to nihilism. For suppose the act of sexual union were to be considered so much more important than the institution built about its fragility that the latter must be dissolved when it no longer functioned naturally and happily, suppose the spirit were considered more important than the word, suppose, in short, man moved freely from one love to another—how many people would be hardy enough to endure being thrust out naked into the world after each new experience? Obviously the emotional focus that marriage supplies fills so universal a need that if the institution were destroyed today we could expect a new one very like it to take its place tomorrow. It has, in fact, so many mundane justifications that it hardly needs the mystical ones offered by these philosophers, who are perhaps confusing the case for those simple souls, after all the majority in every country, who accept with a literalness—that leads to even greater suffering than the vagaries of the human heart would naturally entail—postulates meant for philosophical consumption. For after all these gentlemen do not mean that man should contend too fanatically with nature; only that he should continue to maintain, at whatever cost, the appearance of contending. The women contributors, being, as a sex, new to thought and experience, are all for honesty and courage, for making their peace with Nature. When they have once looked full in that face, they too may recur to a form within whose walls their hesitant spirits may move—a little freely, perhaps, but with shelter at hand. Unless, by chance, they, like some men, are artists. Artists, at least, in life.

Alice Beal Parsons

Thick and Thin

Dark of the Moon. By Sara Teasdale. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

Flying Fish. By Grace Hazard Conkling. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

These two volumes are as different as a thin single strain of melody and a body of rich orchestration, the purity of the one shining against the intricacy of the second. Yet their writers have in common a constancy to themselves and to the individual qualities which marked them from the start; they have grown within the boundaries originally set, though they have not been able to transcend them. Strangely enough the two books leave one with the same feeling—a sense of beauty being captured, of warm response to life—and the feeling that the poet should, and could, have gone one step further.

"Dark of the Moon" gleams without color; Miss Teasdale is so engrossed in the pursuit of pure beauty that she seems to peer through a shielding veil at all objects. She is a lithe,

BORZOI BOOKS

LANDMARKS OF A MEMORABLE SEASON

BIOGRAPHIES

EDISON
The Man and His Work
By George S. Bryan

"Extraordinarily capable and interesting. It is brief, well planned and not too technical for a popular audience. It explains Edison as well, probably, as the man can be explained."
—New York Sun.
Illustrated. $4.00

GUY DE MAUPASSANT
A Biographical Study
By Ernest Boyd

The most absorbing of all Maupassant's stories is the story of his life, as told by Ernest Boyd in this authoritative and pioneering work. Illustrated. $4.00

(Ernest Boyd is the editor of The Collective Novels and Stories of Guy de Maupassant, complete in eighteen volumes. Critics have left no doubt that this is the definitive English edition of Maupassant. $2.00 a volume.)

Give a
BORZOI BOOK
for Christmas

Recent BORZOI Fiction

MY MORTAL ENEMY
By Willa Cather

"'My Mortal Enemy' is a brilliant study of temperament. Nothing that Miss Cather has written—not even A Lost Lady—has more vitality; and nothing is more relentless. . . .

"'My Mortal Enemy' shows Miss Cather's power at its most concentrated, and has passages of a clear, etched beauty. It is a fine piece of art."—Atlantic Monthly.
THIRD LARGE PRINTING $2.50

THE ORPHAN ANGEL
By Elinor Wylie

"The story is charming and engrossing even without reference to the subtle lacquer of its whimsical satire, without knowledge of its imperceptible heightenings and broadenings and delicious humors, without recognition of its wink at history, which makes it every step of the way a two-faced shield of fancy and fact."—New York Times.
THIRD LARGE PRINTING $2.50

A DEPUTY WAS KING
By G. B. Stern, author of "The Matriarch"

"G. B. Stern is a creative artist indeed. . . . No writer of our generation has achieved anything more marvelous in the way of character building than 'the Matriarch' whom we met in the novel of that name and meet again in 'A Deputy Was King.'"
—Rebecca West.
SECOND LARGE PRINTING $2.50

TAMPICO
By Joseph Hergesheimer

"'Tampico' is an absorbing picture of the picturesque, sanguine and dangerous life."—Burton Rascoe.
$2.50

NIGGER HEAVEN
By Carl Van Vechten

"I read straight through from the first page to the last without putting it down. 'Nigger Heaven' is an amazing thing, vivid, barbaric, and so alive that it bleeds."—Ellen Glasgow.
SEVENTH LARGE PRINTING $2.50

AT ALL BOOKSTORES

TO STIMULATE THINKING

ALCOHOL AND LONGEVITY
By Raymond Pearl

Director of the Institute for Biological Research, Johns Hopkins University, and author of "The Biology of Population Growth"

A sound scientific study of the effect of alcohol on the individual and on the race.

"There is nothing essential in Pearl's book which is beyond the average comprehension. It put the burden of proof on the prohibitionists as never before."
—H. M. Parshley, in the N. Y. Herald Tribune.
$3.50

CONCERNING IRASCIBLE STRONG
By William H. Smith

"I rejoice that a man has at last been produced who can see the evolutionary facts of nature and depict them so clearly, so humorously, with such mathematical precision and accurately in accord with the thought of the best modern thinkers on the subjects of evolution and social progress. I believe your book will have a tremendous circulation and receive a hearty welcome."
—Luther Burbank. $3.50

Give a
BORZOI BOOK
for Christmas

ALFRED A. KNOPF, Publisher BORZOI BOOKS 730 FIFTH AVENUE, New York

Havelock Ellis

One of the most enduring of all of Ellis' studies, "The Soul of Spain," a brilliant volume on Spanish history, psychology and character, is now issued in popular edition, uniform with "The New Spirit," in which Ellis discusses Heine, Whitman, Ibsen, Tolstoi and Diderot.
Each, $2.25

Jefferson and Hamilton

Claude G. Bowers

The intimate account of one of the most memorable struggles in history. "No lover of American history can afford to overlook it."—John W. Davis. $5.00

Richard Kane Looks at Life

Irwin Edman

A finely tempered philosophy of youth which "puts Mr. Edman in the class of Santayana and James."—Buffalo Times. $2.50

On the Stream of Travel

James Norman Hall

A modern Odyssey which takes the wanderer from Tahiti to Iceland. "His prose is smooth and facile, his love for beauty genuine."—New York Herald Tribune. $3.00

The Social Worker in a Hospital Ward

Elsie Wulkop

An invaluable book with comments by Dr. Richard C. Cabot which illuminates the extensive possibilities of social service. $3.00

The Little Blue Man

Giuseppe Fanciulli

A book for children between 5 and 10 by one of the best Italian story-tellers. Illustrated. $1.75

The Pueblo Boy

Cornelia James Cannon

A thrilling story of the Spanish conquest of America with a sound historical background. Ages 8 to 14. Illustrated. $2.00

Letters of a Roman Gentleman

Arthur P. McKinlay

A particularly happy selection of Cicero's letters which gives a classic picture of this very human and very modern Roman orator. $4.00

Gift Books for

Fr

HOUGHTON M

2 Park Street, Boston, Mass.

Free copies of our Holiday ar

Gamaliel Br

The life story of the man who "made heaven a laughi both live and luminous by his psychological mode of a a dispassionate zeal that stimulate the reader and give

Heart of Emerson's Journals

Bliss Perry

The quintessence of Emerson's Journals is now access ble in a single volume. "Here is a book that deserves place beside Will Durant's 'Story of Philosophy.' It loaded with nuggets."—New York World. $3.0

Falodon Papers

Viscount Grey

"As a contribution to the understan ing of the true character of an emine statesman, these essays are invaluable
—The Independent. Attractively illu
trated from woodcuts. $2.5

Streets in the Moon

Archibald MacLeish

In harmony with its distinction, this new volume poems by "the most significant figure among the young generation of American poets" is issued in limited ed tion, beautifully printed and bound. $5.0

Intimate Papers

The best of all gift books, the most thrilling, absorbing understanding of the war as is the map of Europe."—J the 'Arabian Nights.' "—Claude G. Bowers in the New —Chicago Post.

ATION Readers

t of

LIN COMPANY

16 East 40th Street, New York

's Catalogs will be sent on request.

rd's Darwin

d heaven a dream." "Mr. Bradford makes biography nd he writes with an unembellished facility of style and of clarity and security."—New York Times. $3.50

Making of the Modern Mind

John H. Randall, Jr.

ohn Dewey calls this "the only history of modern ought and philosophy which puts their development in e proper perspective." "Anything better . . . could ot well be imagined."—Boston Transcript. $5.00

Demosthenes

Georges Clemenceau

Has taken on the proportions of a eat event."—New York Times. "Pasges of imaginative beauty but rerained by reason are scattered roughout."—New York Post. $2.50

Thiers & the French Monarchy

John M. S. Allison

n illuminating portrait of the life of this most gifted d interesting literary statesman, from 1797 to the revotion of 1848, drawn from an extensive study of original aterials. $5.00

Colonel House

rtant of all the books on the war. "As necessary to an Gerard in the Bookman. "As stirring as a story out of ld. "Will revolutionize the history of 1912 to 1917." Two volumes. $10.00

Lady Murasaki

"more suavely potent

Each, $2.25

George Rogers Clark

Temple Bodley

A vivid and striking account of one of the most picturesque men who helped push forward the early American frontier. $5.00

The Yankee Whaler

Clifford W. Ashley

The most sumptuous volume on whaling, whale scenes and whale men that has ever been published. Lavishly illustrated in color. $20.00

East Wind

Amy Lowell

"Seldom if ever has Miss Lowell so completely revealed her depth of human feeling and sympathy. . . . The poet's consummate art never falters."—New York Times. $2.25

My Ántonia

Willa Cather

A new revised edition of Miss Cather's masterpiece which led H. L. Mencken to say: "No novel ever written in America by man or woman is one half so beautiful." $2.50

Palimpsest

H. D.

This first novel by a distinguished contemporary poet thrusts forward the established frontiers of prose fiction. $3.50

Other People's Daughters

Eleanor Rowland Wembridge

"An unusual book written with the psychologist's scientific knowledge of human nature."—New York Times. $2.50

William Jackson, Indian Scout

James Willard Schultz

This story of one of the most famous scouts in the Indian wars is an ideal book for boys from 10 to 16. Illustrated. $1.75 simple, spontaneous lyricist, her voice remaining as pure as it was ten years ago but carrying a maturer note. Always in such a personal collection there is the danger of monotony, and Miss Teasdale does not wholly avoid this; the same exquisite melancholy touches each poem, she is too clear to be subtle, her mood seldom varies. Her poems should be read singly—one at a time they sometimes touch perfection.

Mrs. Conkling by contrast is opulent and resonant and highly conscious. She reveals a carefully balanced, intelligent design, lavish in its variety, abundant in its detail, daring and luminous in its imagery. "Flying Fish" is better than the author's previous work. Her tendency has always been to thicken with a quantity of color, to confuse and stifle with a luxuriance of beauty, but in this latest volume she has resisted more than ever before the surfeited picture and the prodigal description. Even this book would be better for some further pruning, although the group of poems called A Child in the Mexican Garden is free of all obstructions. It is, however, significant that Mrs. Conkling's first lines are usually her best. The continuing cadences sometimes get out of hand, run off into words, lose their first clarity. Undoubtedly she has recognized this herself, since she has so greatly improved; since also she admits:

Their wisdom later.

LENORE G. MARSHALL

Deep as First Love

Mitya's Love. By Ivan Bunin. Translated by Madelaine Boyd. With an Introduction by Ernest Boyd. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

ONE is often given to marvel at the legend which describes youth as a time of gay and careless rapture and dignifies the birth of passion with the sacramental name of "calf" love. The thing is said to offer no more serious a vision than a moon-calf bleating for the stars; and especially in these years the habit of patronizing the calf with a lecture on the proved triviality of love has become a literary business with the intellectuals. Armored in a thick hide of corrupt frivolity they go about being very wise and witty about the facile penalties of young love and solving every obscure entanglement of the soul with a nice logic. It is no longer fashionable to be serious about trivial matters, and to be serious about a serious matter like adolescence is an unpardonable blunder in literary etiquette. One is also given to marvel whether there was ever an age wherein so many wise men were so rooted in their own wisdom and their liberty to advise the young about experience. Elegant bigots are really quite sure that Tristram was no better than a neurotic fool to let himself be doomed by passion. Mary Stuart was born too early to profit by the "Book of Knowledge"; and Cleopatra really died from a bad cold. The Shropshire Lad had no business having those thoughts which put lads in their graves. Men have died and the worms have eaten them, but not for love: no doubt from suppressed desire.

They understand these things better in Russian novels; but, of course, Russian novels are rotten with morbid passion and Russian students who kill themselves never had the chance to go to state universities where informed pedants teach healthy-minded boys and girls how Medea should have "risen above" her passion and resolved all her tearing riddles by studying psychology, or perhaps have given up the adolescence of love for the maturity of a career in interior decorating. The young man in "Mitya's Love" meets betrayal in first love and after a horrible torture of isolation puts a revolver in his mouth and pulls the trigger. No wonder Russia needs civilizing!

There is nothing "new" in Bunin's haunting and exquisite story of Mitya's awakening to the world's painful beauty through his infatuation with Katya and his subsequent long-drawn torment and sudden death. The theme is as threadbare as the continued presence of tragic love in a world so wise that it has already suggested every expedient for remedying the mistakes of lovers who take passion as seriously as they take death. The story shows the familiar process of a young man caught in all the agony of the damned and all the ecstasy of the blessed by discovering life and death and the aching wonder of natural beauty through the involuntary agency of a quite ordinary young girl. It has none of the spectacular melodrama of "The Gentleman from San Francisco" or the descriptive sociology of "The Village." It avoids the virginal poetry of Turgenev's "First Love" and the deep purple of Compton Mackenzie's "Youth's Encounter." It has nothing stronger to recommend it to wisdom than its profound evocation of those years when girls really are wounded with beauty of the summer night; and when young men enter through the scorching magic fire into the enchanted circle which rims the world and conjures up the divine and terrible goddess shaped like a young girl and holding in her sorcery all the illusory phantasms of heaven and all the infernal racks of hell.

DONALD DOUGLAS

Why Women Are Scabs

The Woman Worker and the Trade Unions. By Theresa Wolfson. International Publishers. $1.75.

THE best American women in the labor unions are Russian Jewesses; the hardest women in American industry to organize are the 4,567,346 Anglo-Saxons who are going to marry the district attorney. Labor organizers have discovered after bitter experience that most American girls are too stupid, too ladylike, or too suppressed to join labor unions. The reasons for all this have now been explained by an insider in the labor movement, Dr. Wolfson of the International Ladies Garment Workers' Union. Her book is both an analysis of theory and a manual for practical work, a thoroughly satisfying book which should become the authority in the field.

Of the 8,500,000 working women in the United States only 250,000 are organized in trade unions. Why is the union representation so small? Dr. Wolfson goes back to the position of women in the home. "The linking of the woman to her home has undoubtedly secured the perpetuation of the family, but it has at the same time created a state of introversion, an interest in her immediate surroundings and herself, which forms a real obstacle to any attempt at trade-union organization when the woman enters the industrial field." The suppression of women in industry is partly a carry-over from their suppression in the home.

Women are generally classed as unskilled workers and it is a common assumption that they receive low pay because they are unskilled. Perhaps they are classed as unskilled because they receive low pay. Dr. Wolfson at least raises the question. Are chocolate dippers, she asks, any less skilled than garment pressers? It takes about the same time to become proficient at either job, but the girl chocolate dippers receive much lower pay than the men pressers. The average earnings of women in American industry are only one-half to three-quarters the earnings of men. Give a skilled job to a woman and pretty soon it is classified as "semi-skilled."

The efforts of the American Federation of Labor to organize the women workers have been pitifully inadequate. Craft jealousy has played a large part in keeping the women unorganized; resolutions passed at annual conventions about equal pay for equal work have been "wish fulfillments." The Executive Council of the A. F. of L. has never had a woman member; the annual sessions of the Federation are smoke-befogged male monopolies with a few women delegates even more inconspicuous than the women of the British Trades Union Congress. The intelligent efforts to organize women have come chiefly from the New York needle-trades unions, which owe their spirit to European socialism rather than to the A. F. of L., and from the Women's Trade Union League, which is fostered largely by middle-class sympathizers. Dr. Wolfson does not directly attack

HERE ARE IMPORTANT SCRIBNER BOOKS FOR HOLIDAY GIFTS

The Silver Spoon

By John Galsworthy

"I had just finished three improbable but exciting detective stories, and I found 'The Silver Spoon' more difficult to lay down than any of them."—William Lyon Phelps. $2.[illegible]

The Golden Key

By Henry van Dyke

"These are all stories of [illegible] kind of peril or perplexity or bondage," says Dr. van Dyke. "A speech pat- [illegible] brass. [illegible] $2.[illegible]

East of the Sun and West of the Moon

By Theodore Roosevelt and Kermit Roosevelt

"The adventurers describe with fervor and power their incursions into India . . . . The narrative is clear, concise and graphic."—Philadelphia Record. Illustrated $3.50

Cynthia Asquith's

The Treasure Ship

The work of famous authors and illustrators, a superb book for boys and girls. $2.50

Our Times: THE TURN OF THE CENTURY

By Mark Sullivan

This unusual history is a book for every home. It will be an indispensable book for your Christmas gift list. Readers of middle years find especial delight in it.

[illegible] paper. 213 illustrations. $5.[illegible]

Ernest Hemingway's

The Sun Also Rises

"A truly gripping story, told in lean hard, athletic prose."—New York Times $2.[illegible]

Ignatius Loyola — By Paul van Dyke

A comprehensive and impartial biography of a great world figure. $3.50

England — By the Very Rev. W. R. Inge

An honest and courageous view of England's present and future. $3.00

Our Mobile Earth — By Prof. R. A. Daly

A foremost geologist tells the fascinating story of the earth's formation. Illustrated $5.00

Beyond the Milky Way

By George Ellery Hale

The very latest discoveries and researches in astronomy. Illustrated $[illegible]

The Pulse of Progress

By Ellsworth Huntington

An eminent geographer's conclusions as to the real causes of progress in civilization. $5.00

Foundations of the Republic

By Calvin Coolidge

The President's views on fundamental American principles. $2.[illegible]

The American People: A History

By Thomas Jefferson Wertenbaker

A one-volume, readable history written for the adult mind. An answer to the plea for interesting histories. $5.00

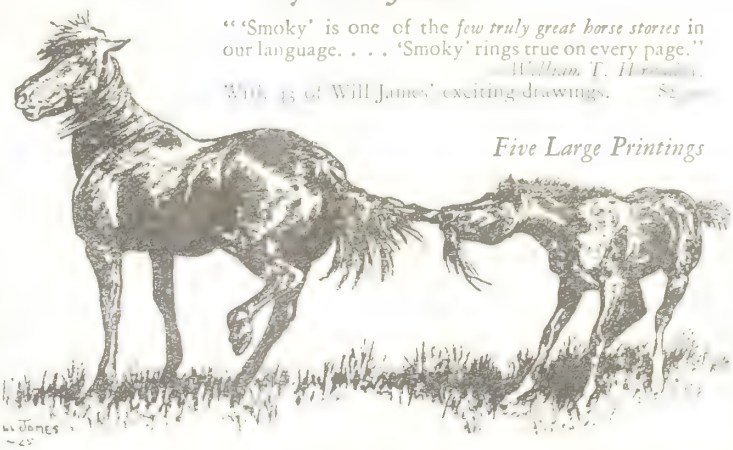
Excellent Fiction

HEAVEN TREES
By Stark Young
Charm and serenity in a novel of the old South. $2.00

SEA WHISPERS
By W. W. Jacobs
A famous story-teller's first book in seven years. $2.00

SUSAN SHANE
By Roger Burlingame
"An undiluted American novel," says Wm. Lyon Phelps. $[illegible]

PAGE MR. TUTT!
By Arthur Train
The delightful and canny old lawyer in a new book. $[illegible]



Smoky: THE STORY OF A ONE-MAN HORSE

By Will James

"'Smoky' is one of the few truly great horse stories in our language. . . . 'Smoky' rings true on every page."—William T. Hornaday.

With 43 of Will James' exciting drawings. $2.[illegible]

Five Large Printings

FAMOUS PRINTS
Edited by Frank Weitenkampf. Limited to [illegible] copies. One of the most beautiful books on art ever issued in America. $[illegible]

THE COPELAND READER
Prof. C. T. Copeland's [illegible] anthology of [illegible] poetry and prose. $[illegible]

ADVENTURES AND CONFESSIONS
Rear Adm. Wm. H. P. Blandy calls this his most controversial book. $[illegible]

FIX BAYONETS!
[illegible] $[illegible]

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

the A. F. of L. for negligence, but her description of the situation constitutes an indictment of the policy of the A. F. of L. and of the general anti-feminism of American trade unions.

The choicest example of the stupidity of old-line craft unions in facing the woman problem is afforded by the barbers' union. The barbers were having a hard struggle to maintain their union. Suddenly a heaven-sent opportunity was presented to them in the world-wide movement toward bobbed hair. Beauty parlors began to spring up everywhere and women barbers knocked at the door of the union. What did the male barbers do? They fought the entrance of women at every opportunity; the lady barbers of Chicago, Seattle, and Portland were refused charters and defiantly continued as non-union. One of the reasons quoted by Dr. Wolfson was: "In view of the fact of her physical make-up is it not a fact that if she were comely to look upon and possessed extreme charm, would it not have a tendency to create discord among the men who, up to the time of her admittance to membership, were real working brothers?" Now the barbers have lowered their bars to women members, but it is too late; the beauty parlor of the future will be a scab shop.

Can American women be organized in spite of their "well-padded group loyalty to the boss"? Dr. Wolfson says, Yes, on four conditions: if the union broadens its structural boundaries to include the unskilled workers, if the union officials appreciate in their organization campaigns the psychology and racial traditions of the women to be organized, if the union does not give its benediction to the existing differential in wages between men and women, and if the women workers generally will learn to consider themselves a permanent group in industry despite the impermanence of the individual.

PAUL BLANSHARD

Harsh White Noon

Through Many Windows. By Helen Woodward. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

IT is an old pleasantry among temperamental conservatives to say that the ranks of political and economic radicalism are recruited from among those who have lacked the competence to thrive under the beneficent regime of the established order. Mrs. Woodward is avowedly and determinedly radical and in her business life she decidedly make a go of it. Thus the autobiography of her business life affords a pleasing disharmony in any old tune which, since people are traditionally conservative, is inconsiderately lodged in the common mind.

Mrs. Woodward's business life lay within the confines of the first quarter of this century, and her success lay in advertising—not merely in writing words which sold books and cosmetics, but equally in selling her own community advertising itself—and in managing the complex human relationships which are involved in the pleasant occupation of dispensing someone else's money for words and pictures to influence the public to demand, or accept, one article over another. Mrs. Woodward grew up in a radical Jewish household, but, by that dispensation whereby each generation turns its hand against the truths of the elders, she took refuge in reaction. It was purely an affair of the interplay of natural forces within the family group. When the family group no longer mattered she swung sharply toward the left—"my weakness is always to like the new"—and there she resided.

It was during her conservative period that Mrs. Woodward stepped forth into life, with a wide-eyed "faith in the cool, bright perfection of American business." The moment taxes severely the historical imagination of a generation that is incapable alike of wide eyes or acts of faith. At this time advertising was the youngest of businesses. That meant that it was full of color and personality, but deficient in organization, prestige, or ethics. As it became more respectable, more codified, more ethical, Mrs. Woodward found herself less and less in sympathy with advertising and with the established economic order. Order and dignity are incompatible with joustings and excitement, and smug Hypocrisy, she observed, attends closely upon Ethics.

Writing as an uncompromising realist, Mrs. Woodward refuses to regard business success as worthy of such terminology as "achievement" or "career," nor will she have any other epithet for it which evokes the suggestion of the use of creative faculties. Business has only to do with raking in cash, and he who is cutest accumulates the most counters and is declared to have won the game, which is played without rules.

Epochal changes have come over the philosophy and practice of business in America during Mrs. Woodward's connection with it; but since it occasioned her no pleasure to reflect that she had a part in making them, she took consolation, as realists so often must, in entering joyously and completely into the ebb and flow of each day's event and circumstance. She liked the noise and stir, the authority, the application of her own powers to specific problems, the dust and affray and frenzy with which her daily work was invested. In short, business afforded her a life of adventure, each moment to be lived for itself, and the structure of her occupation to be supported only by the philosophy that there was no philosophy. Indubitably many thrills and a certain qualified happiness are possible under such an arrangement; under some such charter, indeed, most modern intellectuals live out their tale of days, waiting for a new faith.

Activity for its own sake is not satisfying ultimately. Mrs. Woodward became impounded by a sense of the futility and determinism of life, which whirls intelligence "like chaff before the winds." Gently and not too happily she slipped out of the harness, her "success in life" deeply impaired by her devotion to an occupation in which she couldn't believe.

I have tried to indicate that this business autobiography is really a spiritual and intellectual autobiography, for in that direction lies its importance. Twenty years is a long time to spend living in the world yet denying it. Mrs. Woodward did it and preserved her integrity. But the price was high. She closes with these cryptic words her interesting account of a rather significant life: "So at last I made up my mind just to stop and drift. That would be enough. I was mistaken."

GERALD CARSON

New England

Early Autumn. By Louis Bromfield. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.

AGAIN, in this third of his series of panels of the American scene, Louis Bromfield conveys a sense of life, diverse and warm. If that sense is thinner than in the first two books, it is because he conceives of the New England spirit as thin and wintry, just as he sees, most extraordinarily, the rich New England countryside as bleak and unbeautiful, and just as he patronizes the New England deities to whom he refers as Mr. Emerson and Mr. Longfellow and Mr. Lowell. His conception of these last is evidently that formed by a very small boy from the pictures on the cards of his game of authors. Longfellow, the first daring young American literary expatriate who brought back to his country the best in European literature; Emerson, from whom an enterprising author today could still cull a five-foot shelf of high explosives, these he does not know, but only white-haired gentlemen whose clothes are amusingly out of date.

He seems as little conversant with the individual New Englander, that astonishing blend of passion and mysticism, of inhibitions that spring more often from a philosophic fatalism than from respect for social regulations, that poignant burning creature from whom I suspect we shall hear again in American life, even though today he may be frustrate. The very capacity for frustration involves a spiritual and emotional ardor that these people of Mr. Bromfield do not know.

Yet they are people who are to be found everywhere. I will grant them their collective power to thin the atmosphere around us and to deaden the sky, if the author will first remove the New England label. They are to be found in Boston, of course, but also in New York and Chicago and San Francisco. They form, as Mr. Bromfield rightly assumed, a disturbing background for living passion. But here again one stumbles. It is Mr. Bromfield's chief virtue that he sees the romance in human nature. It is his increasing defect that he brings this out for the reader by sentimental exaggerations of certain heroic traits, rather than by scrupulous respect for all the divergent qualities that enter into every human being. No woman was ever so consistently brave and patient and beautiful and self-denying as his Olivia; and yet any old doddering charwoman one shoulders on the street is more interesting, if one can catch her living and whole.

Mr. Bromfield still leaves the impression with me that he is one of the most richly gifted of our novelists. But in this book he seems definitely to have chosen to let himself off rather easily.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

The Religious Problem in Mexico

Church and State in Mexico, 1822-1857. By Wilfrid Hardy Callcott. Duke University Press. $4.

THE title of this book is justified only to the extent that in the period under survey the Church-State relation gave rise to the most outstanding political issues and because the two commanding historical peaks are the reform laws and decrees of 1833 (pushed through by that remarkable personality, Valentín Gómez Farías) and the reform constitution of 1857 that "caught the principles of democracy which the Mexican people for half a century had been working out and . . . expressed and crystallized them in a great legal document." Mr. Callcott's book is a scholarly and occasionally vivid account of the political manifestations of these multitudinous tendencies and ideas which disrupted the social and political fabric of Mexico for nearly half a century. It could have been no easy task thus to trace the tangled threads of the conflicting forces at play during the chaotic years when Mexico first tested independence, threads further snarled by rampant personal ambitions, foreign intrigue, and lack of racial and geographic cohesion; but Mr. Callcott capably accomplishes this by sketching the key-pattern of the Colonial régime at the time of Independence and thus tacking each unruly thread to its proper starting point.

Mexico was not merely attempting to become a nation with a stable government; she was obliged to face the major problems which had agitated Europe most violently since before the Renaissance, a collective task complicated by stubborn indigenous difficulties quite beyond the ken of Europe. Mud-pie simple were the problems of the Thirteen Colonies in comparison to those of that harried country to the south of us, which under the régime of Iturbide was "the third largest empire in the world." We started relatively with a clean slate. Mexico inherited the worst evils and most chronic conflicts of the Old World. From many angles its independence movement was but an attempt to shut out the French enlightenment. In the political field Monarchism was still a vital issue. Freedom (sic) began with a Spanish emperor, Iturbide. At least three subsequent heads of the Government, Alamán, Paredes y Arrillaga, and Santa Anna, favored the overthrow of Republicanism. As late as 1854 Santa Anna, supported by the Clergy, sent a representative to Europe to scare up a foreign prince; and even after the Juárez Reform Laws of 1859, Mexico was to be ruled by a Hapsburg. Monarchism vs. Republicanism, Centralism vs. Federalism, Democracy vs. Class-rule, Church vs. State were still bellicose problems not simplified by foreign intrigue, American aggression, militarism, geographical separatism, financial instability. Institutionally, racially, culturally,

Viking Books

POWER

by Lion Feuchtwanger

"The story of a soul as great in its degradation as in its heroism. . . . A tremendous allegory of power; a magnificent synthesis of melodrama and philosophy . . . a book for all of us."—The World. $2.50

The SECOND BOOK of NEGRO SPIRITUALS

Carl Van Vechten in The Herald Tribune: "I predict that this new collection will be just as popular as the first, and deservedly so." With 61 songs and an introduction. $3.50

THE TIME OF MAN

by Elizabeth Madox Roberts

A Book-of-the-Month Club selection. "A wonderful performance."—Sherwood Anderson. "A work of genius."—Edward Garnett. "A beautiful work of art."—Carl Van Doren. The most talked of novel of the day. 47th Thousand. $2.50

TRANSITION

by Edwin Muir

Illuminating and wise essays on the most baffling and interesting figures in contemporary literature: Joyce, Lawrence, Strachey, Huxley, and many more. "He is the only critic who has succeeded in grasping the modern situation as a whole."—The Nation. $2.50

SATIRICAL POEMS

by Siegfried Sassoon

One of the best and most popular of the younger English poets breaks a silence of seven years with this new volume of verse. $1.50 economically Mexico was a super-charged, unstable complex.

30 Irving Place THE VIKING PRESS New York

To consider these and other factors in their just relations has been the praiseworthy achievement of Mr. Callcott, who surveys the broad river of what he calls "the liberal movement" of the nineteenth century in Mexico, a movement that carried upon its widening current the germs of race and class liberation, twisting in and out through the preliminary yet significant church struggles of the 'thirties and the 'fifties, finally to flow into the broad harbor of the 1857 Constitution. Yet while this constitution magnificently closed an era and paved the way for a long peace, Mr. Callcott, with less of an historian's eye and with more sensitivity to the bitter irony of Mexico and its repeated frustrations, well might have carried his study over into the temporary debacle of democracy and religious liberty—the Maximilian régime. It is to be hoped that he will use his impartial talents to give us a treatment of the subsequent era from 1857 to the present, with similar emphasis upon the Church-State relation. Had such a volume been at hand during the recent religious crisis, we might have had fewer newspaper scareheads and editorial superlatives.

CARLETON BEALS

Mostly Fudge

John Wanamaker. By Herbert Adams Gibbons. Two volumes. Harper and Brothers. $10.

HERE they come again—those "two fat volumes" which Mr. Strachey deplored a few years since. These particular twins are dressed up in a luxurious and yet dignified fashion that would befit a great subject and a great biographer. Had Caesar been the theme, and Plutarch the author, the publishers could hardly have bettered their end of the business. This is not to say that either the subject or the author is negligible. John Wanamaker may have been as great a man as Mr. Gibbons so staunchly believes and tries to prove through more than 800 detailed and painstaking pages; he may have been as important as some thousands of Americans believe. To some others, however, this story which rings all the familiar changes on a threadbare topic—the rise of a poor American boy from the position of a brick-worker to the eminence of a great American merchant—appears about as drab and dispiriting as any Horatio Alger masterpiece. Here, for the hundredth or thousandth time, are concretely illustrated those sterling (catchpenny, one might say) American virtues of grit, thrift, spunk, "money back," "infinite capacity for detail," and, of course, piety. No matter what Wanamaker did—whether he passed around those religious tracts with which his pockets commonly bulged; whether he had a "fine talk" with Queen Victoria's daughter, the Princess Louise ("My, but I enjoyed it!"); whether he continued the salaries of his employees who volunteered for the Spanish-American War; whether his account book and his New Testament perpetually jostled each other in his inside pocket; whether he tried his "best to buy in falling markets"; whether, in visiting the Holy Sepulchre, "yielding to an irresistible temptation, I stretched myself out on the tomb"; whether he served efficiently as Postmaster-General under Harrison; or whether, at eighty-four, he "jumped out of bed eager for the day's work"—he always did those things that the average American most heartily applauded and most wished that he himself might do. And yet, despite the fact that his life was "radiant adventure, always, always, always," his greatest desire remained unfulfilled. "In each man's soul is some cherished dream or purpose that he confides to none. Mr. Wanamaker's dream was to write a life of Martin Luther." There were times, indeed, when his optimism ("Pollyanna," next to the Bible, was his best-loved book) almost failed him. On July 4, 1903, he wrote: "The pity of it all forever to drudge and never to budge from mostly fudge!"

Mr. Gibbons has done his job with appalling thoroughness —no one, it is safe to say, will ever be tempted to write another two-volume life of Wanamaker. Yet it seems that the author is still unsatisfied with his labors, for in one place he darkly com-

Clergymen and laymen alike, atheists as well as the devout, join in praise of

MY HERESY

by Bishop William Montgomery Brown

The story of a man who lost a religion and found a faith.

John Dewey says: "The movement which the book records has a typical significance which is absent from most heresies."

Rev. William Norman Guthrie says: "A bit of palpitating humanity."

Herbert Asbury says: "A sparkling and witty account."

Dudley Siddall says: "Takes on the character of a Holy Revelation."

The New York Evening Post says: "Likely to keep anyone who begins it in the evening up all night."

A 272-page book, but priced at $2.00—far below the usual scale—to keep it within reach of the widest possible number of persons seeking new faith.

NEW SCHOOLS IN THE OLD WORLD

by Carleton Washburne,

Superintendent of Schools at Winnetka, Ill. in collaboration with MYRON M. STEARNS

Report and comment on twelve progressive schools in Europe. $1.75

"No one interested in educational methods, either in theory or practice, can fail to find it richly stimulating."—New York Times.

"Here's a fresh wind to blow upon this discussion of what to teach our children in the public schools —and how. To a layman like myself the book is interesting on every page."—Harry Hansen in the New York World.

A CHILD'S MAP OF THE ANCIENT WORLD

by Alice York

Designed by ILONKA KARASZ

For the first time, the ancient world of myth and history is graphically presented in a pictorial map, done in six colors. Bright and decorative, to quicken youthful imaginations, it is designed to serve as a guide to fascinating discoveries. Folded, in envelope, $1.50.

At all Bookstores

The John Day Co., 25 West 45th Street, New York

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

ments: "A volume could be written about Wanamaker and the piano business." He also brandishes a threatening pitchfork at possibly captious critics by stating in his bibliography that "the authority for every statement made and the quotations—very often in Wanamaker's own handwriting—are preserved on fifteen thousand cards, thoroughly indexed and classified." Nevertheless his logic is sometimes rather curious. These two sentences are taken from the same paragraph: "Wanamaker . . . was instinctively incapable of partisanship or sectarianism at every stage of his life. . . . Through thick and thin, from Lincoln to Harding, he stuck by the [Republican] Party." And once he allows a slight speck to remain on the portrait: "Although we doubt whether he read every word of it, he sometimes called 'Les Miserables' his favorite work of fiction." For few, indeed, are the dark shadows that lurk in the background of the picture—Mr. Gibbons has brushed them away. But he defends his hero so vehemently that one begins to wonder: could there have been so much smoke without a tiny blaze somewhere? And then one turns to take another look at the intriguing copyright.

And so, while this is assuredly the definitive and official life of Wanamaker, one still wonders—is it the life? Wanamaker himself, in one of his lucid moments, once telegraphed: "Thinking, trying, toiling, and trusting in God is all my biography." Perhaps Mr. Gibbons bettered this laconic utterance in his terse opening sentence: "John Wanamaker earned money for seventy-five years." A thousand years hence, will anyone remember even as little as that?

R. F. DIBBLE

Once More the Impossible

A Short History of Civilization. By Lynn Thorndike. F. S. Crofts and Company. $5.

PROFESSOR THORNDIKE has placed a tolerably adequate account of the development of civilization from the Old Stone Age to Locarno within the covers of a single volume. He has, of course, rushed in where his colleagues fear to tread. Few men in this age of specialization care to expose themselves to attack upon so many fronts. But Professor Thorndike is no novelist with a sudden enthusiasm for Kulturgeschichte, getting up his subject overnight. As a medievalist he has sure foundations for a survey of the cultural history of Western Europe. His studies in magic have led him into the heart of that complex of science, pseudo-science, and superstition which forms so large a part of our vaunted civilization. Finally, he is an experienced teacher, not in one field of history but in many. It would be rash to assert that he is the one man in the country who should have undertaken this particular task, but it is clear that he is by far the ablest who has yet tackled it single-handed.

His book is carefully planned and clearly written. The major problems of emphasis and proportion have been solved with considerable success. The Far and the Near East have received due attention, though the center of interest is naturally in Western Europe. Neither constant use of the compound adjective nor the veritably interminable flow of fact has made the book unreadable. Pert statements of the author's own prejudices are sufficiently frequent to lure the reader on. "The human mind moves slowly at best, and the military mind still more slowly." "It is not recorded that the great librarians of Alexandria ever attended a library school, but they knew what was in the books in their library." "The Fascisti with Mussolini as dictator instituted a regime of forced labor, sobriety, and order, seasoned with much sententious bombast, imperialistic 'flapdoodle,' and occasional bloodshed." This is no ordinary textbook.

New viewpoints and novel theories are to be found in the book, but they are not numerous. In the main the author has been content to skim the cream from the works of others; he has used the best books, however. The chapters devoted to medieval Europe are exceptionally good, notably that on medieval art. An earlier chapter on Hellenistic culture and later

Books for Gifts

MANY BOOKS of MANY KINDS for MANY FOLK of MANY MINDS

BIOGRAPHY

THE VAGABOND DUCHESS
By Cyril Hughes Hartmann
The Life of Hortense Mancini, niece of Cardinal Mazarin. "One of the most amazing tales ever heard."—N. Y. Sun.
Boxed, $5.00

THE FACE OF SILENCE
By Dhan Gopal Mukerji
The sublime renunciation in practice of a holy man in India by the author of "My Brother's Face." $3.00

THE CHEVALIER DE BOUFFLERS
By Nesta H. Webster
Attractively bound and boxed. $5.00

THE MEDICI
By G. F. Young
The only complete account of this great family. Two splendid volumes, boxed. $12.00

QUEEN ELIZABETH'S MAIDS OF HONOUR
By Violet Wilson
$5.00

BEATRICE D'ESTE
By Julia Cartwright
$3.00

MARY STUART
By Florence A. Maccunn
$3.00

FICTION, HUMOUR AND POETRY

ANN'S CRIME
By R. T. M. Scott
A gripping detective story in which "Secret Service Smith" appears again. $2.00

DEVICES AND DESIRES
By Vera Wheatley
A story of youth. Most attractively bound and jacketed and encased in glassine paper for Christmas giving. $2.50

PRECIOUS BANE
By Mary Webb
"Rare and fine and beautiful."—N. Y. Evening Post Literary Review. $2.00

USELESS HANDS
By Claude Farrere
author of "Thomas the Lambkin." $2.50

I SING THE PIONEER
By Arthur Guiterman
Ballads of the Making of the Nation. $2.00

THE LUNATIC IN CHARGE
By J. Storer Clouston author of "The Lunatic at Large," etc. $2.00

THE POETRY OF NONSENSE
By Emile Cammaerts
$1.75

CASEMENTS
By Richard Clondesley
$2.00

TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE

TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE IN MANY LANDS
By Cecil Gosling
$3.50

From the jacket of "The Surgeon's Log"

A NOVELIST'S TOUR OF THE WORLD
By Vicente Blasco Ibanez
$6.00

THE SURGEON'S LOG
By J. Johnston Abraham
$5.00

THE FIRE OF DESERT FOLK
By Ferdinand Ossendowski author of "Beasts, Men and Gods."
$3.00

Check the books you want and take this list to your favorite bookshop—unless you prefer to order direct from us.

Free upon Request
"Dutton Gift Books"

Fifth Avenue Dutton's at 54th Street

chapters on the religious changes in early modern Europe and on the economic changes at the beginning of the nineteenth century are new in manner and admirable in content. The comparative neglect of Charlemagne and the absolute omission of Frederick II are hard to understand. The institutional phases of European civilization have been slighted. The description of feudalism is especially unsatisfactory. The author seems curiously unappreciative of the contributions of Erasmus, Luther, and Voltaire. On the other hand both Louis XIV and Napoleon have fared better than one could expect. Henry VIII still seeks a "divorce." Many would not agree that Joseph II was the best example of enlightened despotism.

But it is as a textbook that it will be judged. And here the reviewer confesses to firm convictions. His experience, reasonably extensive, has persuaded him that we already attempt too much in our general courses in European history. Professor Thorndike would have us abandon the relatively simple thread of political history and take up the whole field of cultural achievement; he would have us start with the Old Stone Age. He thinks that we are now prevented from so doing only by a lack of able teachers and an adequate textbook. The latter he has supplied. Turn to the accounts of the Peloponnesian League or of the "fuller democracy of Athens" or to the beautifully balanced summary of Chinese culture or to the masterly digest of Restoration England. What will the average student derive from all this? To him even the names are new, almost every phrase without helpful connotation, unless he already has other and extensive contacts with history or allied subjects. Barrett Wendell once remarked that thirty years of experience had convinced him that English composition could not be taught, but that the attempt should be made. The failure of the history of civilization as an elementary subject in our colleges seems assured; the necessity for attempting it, of course, may still be demonstrated.

SIDNEY R. PACKARD

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. This year in addition a second prize of $50 and a third prize of $25 will be offered. The rules for 1926 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Wednesday, December 1, and not later than Friday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page.

3. No manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 9, 1927.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

BOOKS OF ENDURING VALUE

A Golden Book of Science and Adventure

THE ARCTURUS ADVENTURE

by

WILLIAM BEEBE

This has proved the most popular book that has come from Beebe's gifted pen. The Saturday Review of Literature calls it: "A book for everyone who is stirred by the strange and beautiful in nature, by exciting and decidedly unconventional adventure, and by a true tale well told." Lavishly illustrated. $6.00

Exploration in Mongolia

ON THE TRAIL OF ANCIENT MAN

by

ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS

This story of scientific ardors and accomplishment is one of the most fascinating volumes imaginable. The Christian Science Monitor says: "One rarely reads a book on exploration or travel written in such a charming manner and relating facts of such absorbing interest." Illustrated. $6.00

The Dark Continent Exposed

DENATURED AFRICA

by

DANIEL W. STREETER

The New York Herald Tribune says: "Richly humorous travel books are so rare that lovers of the genre are advised instantly to pounce upon 'Denatured Africa' and drag it to a secluded spot for some hours of uninterrupted enjoyment." It is sound advice. Illustrated. $2.50

An Historian Contemplates His Age

WORDS TO THE DEAF

by

GUGLIELMO FERRERO

In this volume the great Italian historian diagnoses the maladies from which the world today is suffering. Industry, art, finance, and international relations are all considered. There is intellectual dynamite in these pages. Translated by Ben Ray Redman. $2.00

G. P. PUTNAM'S SON'S

New York London

A Library List of Children's Books

In response to a request from The Nation the children's librarians of the Boston, Detroit, Chicago, and St. Louis public libraries have selected the following as the best children's books of the current season. Each librarian was asked by The Nation for five titles. Only the first four of the titles below appeared on more than one list.

Wiggin, K. D., and Smith, N. A. Tales of Laughter. Illustrated by Elizabeth MacKinstry. D[illegible]

Milne, A. A. Winnie-the-Pooh. Dutton. $2.

MacManus, Seumas. Donegal Wonder Book. Stokes. $2.

Gardiner, Alice Cushing, and Osborne, Nancy Cabot. Father's Gone Awhaling. Doubleday, Page. $2.

Skinner, C. L. White Leader. Macmillan, $1.75.

Field, Rachel. Taxis and Toadstools. Doubleday, Page. $2

Moon, Grace. Chi-Wee and Loki. Doubleday, Page, $2.

Lustig, Sonia. Roses of the Winds. Doubleday, Page. $2.

Shannon, Monica. California Fairy Tales. Doubleday, Page. $2.

Morrow, Honoré Wilsie. On to Oregon. William Morrow. $1.75.

Putnam, David. David Goes to Greenland. Putnam. $1.75.

Tee-Van, Helen Damrosch. Red Howling Monkey. Macmillan. $2.

White, Hervey. Snake Gold. Macmillan. $1.75.

Zeitlin, Ida. Skazki. Doran. $5.

Daniel, Hawthorne. Gauntlet of Dunmore. Macmillan. $1.75.

Books in Brief

Miniatures of French History. By Hilaire Belloc. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

Mr. Belloc, as a historian, has three claims upon public consideration: he writes readably, carries the burden of his learning easily, and never permits his cranky notions to interfere with fact. The present gift-volume—a very neat one in its external make-up—will be particularly acceptable to eager, studious boys and girls of sixteen or thereabouts, staring round-eyed, from the Darien-peak of their youth, upon the wonders of the human past.

Eve Walks in Her Garden. By Louise Ayres Garnett. The Macmillan Company. $2.

A volume of utterly simple poetry, which for all its delicacy covers deep ranges of emotion. It passes from rhythmic ballads to two or three-line lyrics, from strong moving assertions of faith to fresh and fanciful pictures; and in whatever the author touches is the quality of truth.

The Story of the Catholic Church. By Cuthbert Wright. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.50.

This volume lacks learning, an insight into the moving laws of human history, reconstructive power, a title indicative of content, and an index. What is left, after all these deficiencies are accounted for, is an impressionist sketch of some picturesque details of Roman ecclesiasticism. The book is evidently founded on the time-honored Greenwich Village assumption that susceptible nerves and a thin, newspapery sort of education are the sole prerequisite of writing "de omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis."

Loyalism in Virginia. Chapters in the Economic History of the Revolution. By Isaac S. Harrell. Duke University Press. $1.50.

An excellent help in the study of the static forces of the American War of Independence, which assists in putting the history of our nascent commonwealth upon the solid soil of economic fact.

The Great American Ass. An Autobiography. Anonymous. Brentano's. $3.50.

"I, the Yankee cub nursed on the milk of Massachusetts legend and reared up to roar the Yankee triumphs, am an ass

THE STORY OF THE EVOLUTION OF LOVE

by Wilhelm Bölsche

LONG regarded as the standard book on its subject in all European countries, this masterpiece, which has sold over [illegible] copies in Germany, is now available here. The story of the evolution of love, holy and profane, as the great cosmic force in all life throughout the ages, is here fascinatingly described in all its amazing variety.

SOME OF THE SUBJECTS TREATED:

LOVE and Religion; Love and Art; How Love begins in art; Relics of primitive love; The first visible evidence of love on this planet; The nature of emotion; The law against inbreeding; The animal in man; The contrast between male and female love; Polygamy, polyandry and monogamy; Communal marriage; Natural history of prostitution; The wonder of creation.

Two volumes, boxed, $10.00

THREE YEARS RUNNING

the critics have acclaimed Ford Madox Ford's book

"The Finest Novel of the Year"

FOR years Ford Madox Ford has enjoyed a subterranean reputation as one of the great writers of English prose. During the last few years the public has awakened to his importance, and each new book has enjoyed a larger audience.

SOME DO NOT, published in 1924, ran through three editions. (Acclaimed the year's best novel.)

NO MORE PARADES, published in 1925, ran through five editions. (Acclaimed the year's best novel.)

A MAN COULD STAND UP

just published, will take its place with the year's best sellers. "About the most exciting thing that has happened to the novel since The Way of All Flesh."—New York Times.

A Man Could Stand Up, $2.50 net.
The three volumes, boxed, $7.50.

Albert & Charles Boni—66 Fifth Avenue, New York

in the wilderness of frustration (p. 3-4) . . . I write the defeatist's saga of the prairie empire (p. 3) . . . 'Mother,' said [my father] 'we've raised a foolish child' (p. 12) . . . I am a mean guy and I exult in . . . wholesome extermination even though I and my own tribe be the ones that are exterminated. Down with all self-kidding weaklings. Damn them (p. 273) . . . As I flop around with a consumptive's restlessness, my sound is a rattling dirge, an aching yawp. I froth at the mouth with frustration. I think of my kin in tradition, another amiable gullible ass, Henry Adams (p. 315) . . . At any rate, it's great to be an ass (p. 140)." It must be.

Darwin. By Gamaliel Bradford. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

Seven chapters make up this book: The Observer, The Thinker, The Discoverer, The Loser, The Lover, The Destroyer, The Scientific Spirit. It is possible that Darwin may be best comprehended if viewed from these several angles; but—as Mr. Bradford is doubtless aware—any such analytical device is largely arbitrary and, furthermore, it tends to a certain amount of overlapping in both argument and illustration. As a working device, however, it is sufficiently effective and perhaps, in the case of such a man as Darwin, analysis and argument should supersede narration. If Mr. Bradford is sometimes too garrulous and repetitious, he is frequently shrewd and discriminating; if he tends to exhort too much, he has no patience whatever with the theologians who dogged and besmirched Darwin; and if he is somewhat too personal and plaintive in his concern over metaphysical mysteries, he shows a minute, judicious, and urbane knowledge of the vast revolution which Darwin was chiefly instrumental in effecting.

Causes and Their Champions. By M. A. DeWolfe Howe. Little, Brown and Company. $4.

This book has two aims: it deals with eight causes "directly affecting contemporary life in America," and with the man or woman who was principally instrumental in furthering each cause. While including Phillips Brooks as the champion of tolerance in religion, Mr. Howe yet excludes Garrison on the ground that anti-slavery "is omitted only as a res adjudicata." To those who are interested in a surface presentation of things, this distinction will doubtless appear valid; to those who, with Carlyle, believe that Negro slavery was only a symptom of a national disease that still persists in other forms, and that religious toleration is most decidedly unsettled, the distinction will be unsatisfactory. The volume, in short, while written in a clear and businesslike fashion, offers little that is new in material, in method, or in theory.

Translations and Tomfooleries. By Bernard Shaw. Brentano's. $2.25.

The Austrian novelist and playwright Siegfried Trebitsch translated into German the bulk of Shaw's work and Shaw out of pure gratitude undertook to render into English Herr Trebitsch's "Jitta's Atonement," although—as one might have guessed beforehand—he found it impossible to refrain from making it over to suit himself. This is the "Translations" (sic) of the present volume. The "Tomfooleries" include the well-known "Admirable Bashville" and "Press Cuttings" as well as several even slighter skits, one or two of which were written for theatrical benefits. Shaw's more extravagant burlesques are usually amusing in dialogue but rather feeble in general conception.

The Memoirs of Carlo Goldoni. Translated by John Black. The Blue Jade Library. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

In his introduction William Drake justly accepts the statement of Gibbon that these memoirs are the most pleasing and vital of their author's comedies. Written in old age after his retirement to France, they are admirable expressions of the same ebullient, superficial nature which went to the making of the plays and, being less artificial, have less quickly faded. Casanova himself gives a scarcely more vivid picture of rococo Venice.

LIPPINCOTT BOOKS

Gifts for Every Taste

"Anatole France to the life"
—EMILE HENRIOT in Le Temps

RAMBLES WITH ANATOLE FRANCE
By SANDOR KEMERI

Never has the personal charm of the Master been felt as in this book of his enthusiasms. Through old Paris, Milan, Naples, Rome we run the fire of his comment on art and men and ideas. From the Hungarian. Illustrated with hitherto unpublished photographs and facsimile letters. Large, handsome octavo. $5.00

FORGOTTEN SHRINES OF SPAIN
By MILDRED STAPLEY BYNE

A volume that throws Spain open like a great museum to the art-lovers of the world. 65 Beautiful illustrations, quaintly drawn frontispiece and map. $5.00

THE DEAD RIDE HARD
By LOUIS JOSEPH VANCE

A galloping tale of love, intrigue and breathless adventure, by a master of romance. It tells of that intrepid American, Andrew Brull, and his service to an imperious lady of Budapest in the days when the White Terror rode hard upon the Red. $2.00

THE PRACTICAL BOOK OF LEARNING DECORATION AND FURNITURE
By EDWARD STRATTON HOLLOWAY

A humanized course in Interior Decoration. It presents by the picture and illustration method an easily grasped survey of the whole subject, and includes suggestions for more intensive study of details. 180 Illustrations. $4.50

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES
Edited by DR. E. C. HAYES, University of Illinois
(Lippincott's Sociological Series)

The seven stimulating chapters have each been written by a specialist and cover the following fields: Sociology, Anthropology, Psychology, Anthropogeography, Economics, Political Science, History. This is a critical survey of the recent developments presented in such a fashion as to make most interesting reading. $3.50.

SOCIAL PROGRESS
By ULYSSES G. WEATHERLY, University of Indiana
(Lippincott's Sociological Series)

Here is no ordinary historical survey of theory of progress, but a stimulating study of the dynamics of change. The author's method is pragmatic rather than historical or speculative. $2.50

For Boys and Girls

Fairy Tales from India
Illustrated with Special Lining Papers, Decorations and 12 Exquisite Color Plates by KATHARINE PYLE. One of the most beautiful gift books this season. These old Deccan stories of [illegible] and Rajas, Wizards and Brahmins, cobras, jackals and wicked rakshas are colorful with the magic of a mystic land. $3.50

Martha the Seventh
By JANE ABBOTT. What happened to a "seventh child of a seventh child" at Twin Farms in the green hills of Vermont. A New England story for girls. Illustrated. $1.75

The Rider in the Green Mask
By RUPERT SARGENT HOLLAND. A dashing tale of the American Revolution—the daring pursuit of the "Wolves" of Washington's Own. Colored frontispiece, 3 other illustrations. $2.00

Little Abe Lincoln
By BERNIE BABCOCK. The true story of Abraham Lincoln's boyhood adventures and achievement, a wildwood story full of the spontaneous humor of the backwoods. Illustrated. $2.00

Wisdom of the Woods
By DAN BEARD. Fascinating backwoods secrets that will please "Scouts" and all outdoor boys. New volume in Dan Beard's "Woodcraft Series." 243 Illustrations, colored frontispiece. $2.50

The Stories All Children Love Series
26 FAVORITES—the stories that never grow old. Beautifully bound and [illegible] illustrated in color. "Cutest" and "Each, the Little Sister" are the latest additions. Ask [illegible] to see the [illegible] jackets. Each $1.50

At All Bookstores

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY
PHILADELPHIA LONDON

Apostate. By Forrest Reid. Houghton Mifflin Company $4.

Spiritual autobiography is a difficult literary medium, and this one—for all its tranquil detail, its quiet sincerity, and its unceasing effort to recapture the moods of childhood—fails to reach a rounded reality. The style is limpid and many of the pictures are vivid, but the recital seems lacking in cohesive strength. It ends, moreover, on an indeterminate note, baffling to the reader.

The Painted Room. By Margaret Wilson. Harper and Brothers. $2.

Not particularly interesting people are moved about here like furniture. Like much of the current vintage of fiction, this deals in certain contrasts between the arriving and the departing generation, but it adds little to the already overcrowded warehouse. If done brilliantly the theme still justifies itself, but here the touch is inclined to be heavy, fraying out in thin philosophy.

The Clean Up. By Mark Lee Luther. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.

The endless petty politics of the small American city in which not even a fire is handled to the satisfaction of the party that is out of office affords Mr. Luther a theme which he develops in a manner half Rotarian and half satirical. The characters are all black or all white, in accordance with the tested formula of melodrama, which simplifies the author's problem and places no mental burdens on the reader. The main outlines of the novel are conventional, but Mr. Luther is a shrewd transcriber of the contemporary idiom, and it is this which constitutes the best feature of his story.

Americana 1926. Edited by H. L. Mencken. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

"The boobus Americanus"—Mr. Mencken once informed the readers of The Nation—"is a bird that knows no closed season," and the adage explains why both barrels of Mr. Mencken's shotgun are kept smoking hot month in and month out. The editor of the American Mercury is as heedlessly destructive of our American fools as the pioneers were of wild pigeons and bison. Can it be that the supply already begins to diminish? It sounds impossible, but the fact remains that in his second anthology of American asininity Mr. Mencken ekes out his materials with an Appendix from Foreign Parts. His statement that the appendix was added at the request of various American patriotic societies contains probably a germ of truth. Lovers of our native wild life begin to sicken at the unending slaughter and to dart foreboding eyes toward a drab and foolless future. . . . But their alarm is perhaps slightly premature.

Music

Music and Common Sense—I

THE relations expressed by musical sounds, I have explained,[1] are not relations between the quantities and qualities of ordinary experience, but relations sui generis. They do not, therefore, conform to the categories derived from and applicable to ordinary experience, but to categories which are again sui generis, which represent special aural adaptations to combinations of musical sounds. This means that the common sense that is applicable to ordinary experience does not enable one to understand musical relations or provide a standard by which to judge them. What a person guided solely by common sense understands by the developing of a theme—what he knows of the process as it is applied to a subject of ordinary experience—does not enable him to understand what is meant by the process as it is applied to a musical subject, or to follow it through when he meets it; for the processes are as unlike as the subjects. And though he is familiar with a formal quality like symmetry or proportion in groups of physical objects, he does not understand

[1] In "Music and the External World," The Nation, October 13.

Books to give and to keep

Sixteen men, ranking scientists at the University of Chicago, have searched and found, and written down for the satisfaction of all other inquiring minds the facts about the world and man of life itself as they have found it. Their book,

The Nature of the World and of Man

is "fascinating reading . . . fulfilling rarely its purpose. . . . The book has taken on the unity, the coherence, the match of one great [illegible]." $4.00

Outlook for American Prose

By Joseph Warren Beach

In the New York Times Book Review J. Brooks Atkinson says, "his book is accurate, audacious, and broad." And H. L. Mencken, "This is perhaps the first book, written by an American, in which precept is backed up by practise. Mr. Beach writes very effectively, and has much of interest to say." $2.50

The Panchatantra

Translated from the Sanskrit by Arthur W. Ryder. Of this book Stuart Sherman said in Books: "Here is one of the world's oldest and most famous story books . . . a racy translation . . . refreshing in its realism, its humanity, its pervasive humor. . . ." $4.00

The Democratic Way of Life

By T. V. Smith

The professional man who conceives a ministry as well as a mission for his calling will find here enthusiastic confirmation. Mr. Smith offers "an intellectual exuberance and a brilliance in the management of abstract thought that make his pages both agreeable and stimulating to read." $1.75

Brains of Rats and Men

By C. Judson Herrick

H. L. Mencken says of it in the American Mercury: "It is, perhaps, the best summary of the known facts about mental processes yet put into English." And the Forum praises it as "one of the most readable volumes in the field of public education in science." $3.00

The Psalms

Newly Translated by J. M. Powis Smith

The Nation commends this new version which has benefited by modern scholarship as "dignified and clear." The Jewish Forum calls it "exalted, trustworthy, and beyond the ordinary cavillings of the critics of new efforts at Bible translation." $3.00

University of Chicago Press

5807 Ellis Avenue, Chicago

it and cannot recognize it when it is the attribute of groups of musical tones. A scientist, then, may not be able to distinguish one phrase of music from another, since the intellectual discipline is distinct from the specialized musical discipline that makes it possible to apprehend a type of music.

This may appear obvious, but many notions prevail which fail to observe the distinction. For example, a popular program, by which is meant one that consists of simple, obvious music, is regularly spoken of as suiting the taste of a popular audience, by which is meant one that consists of intellectually unsophisticated persons; whereas in fact it suits the taste of even educated persons to whom all but the simplest of the special materials and processes of music are something of a mystery. And of late the demand has been more insistent than ever that music and its criticism and commentary be made intelligible to the layman; or rather that music—the art discussed, as well as individual compositions heard—be made intelligible to him by means of criticism and commentary that are intelligible; a demand which again, as I shall show, ignores the distinction between music and ordinary experience and between the musical discipline and the intellectual.

Parenthetically, it is interesting that the failure to observe this distinction—like most of the errors with which musical commentary swarms—results itself from the very distinction ignored, that is, from the fact that usually the man who knows his music cannot think straight enough, and the man who can think straight does not know enough about music to avoid error. When [illegible] music is left, as apparently it should be, to be handled by the musical specialist, it is left in effect to one who usually has not learned objectivity, and who, [illegible] is constantly guilty of special pleading—and this on behalf of nothing more than his little prejudices against this type of music or for that. He sets out, as he thinks, to trace the connection between the revolutions of a century ago and music,[2] but in reality to make out a case against program music [illegible] Underwriting as being infantile. He ends, therefore, not only by not discovering the connection but by confusing, among other things, musical with intellectual sophistication. On the other hand, the identical confusion is made by [illegible] intellectually sophisticated person who out of his ignorance of music demands a musical counterpart of "Why We Behave Like Human Beings." And it is this demand, as I have said, with the relation it implies between music and common sense, that calls for discussion.

Music has its proper place with activities like philosophy and mathematics, which use a technical terminology or a special set of symbols, either to introduce a desirable economy in expression or to express relations that cannot be expressed in any other way. But even in this class music stands apart. If Einstein's final results can be expressed only in mathematical symbols, nevertheless the relations so symbolized can be reduced to (or, in a sense, expanded into) other mathematical relations and this process continued until a relation is reached simple enough to be expressed adequately and clearly in ordinary language. The same can be done, with less difficulty, for the ideas of philosophy, and with comparative ease for those of anthropology. The layman must, then, be willing to learn the definitions of certain technical terms (the successful popularizer, then, is one who can induce his readers to learn them; the most easily popularized science that one of which the technical terms are most closely related to, and most easily incorporated in, the ordinary vocabulary); but if he does learn these definitions he has the means, not, probably, of appreciating the aesthetic qualities of a philosophic or mathematical demonstration, but at least of understanding some of the materials and processes which exhibit, in certain combinations and to certain individuals, these aesthetic qualities. Not so with music. The simplest verbal definition or description of the simplest musical relation uses terms which stand for purely musical facts, and which are meaningless until these musical facts have been apprehended directly

[2]Daniel Gregory Mason, in "Contemporary Composers."

"Proof that real masterpieces can still be written in the Russian tongue."
—New York Times

Mitya's Love

By IVAN BUNIN

Translated by Madelaine Boyd
With an Introduction by Ernest Boyd

JOHN ERSKINE, author of "The Private Life of Helen of Troy" and "Galahad," says:

"It is a long time since I have read a story so profound in its psychology and so dramatic in its method. It seems to me a very perfect masterpiece. I feel that I have made the acquaintance of a writer of the first rank."

JOHN COURNOS says in New York Post:

"What a relief, after reading so-called 'modern' novels, to turn to this simple, poignant and exquisite narrative written by a living Russian, but in the traditional manner of the great Russians who went before him!"

$2.00 at all booksellers

HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY
One Park Avenue New York

"Stimulatingly provocative"

THE NEW LEADERSHIP IN INDUSTRY

By SAM A. LEWISOHN

Evans Clark in The New York Times says:

"He sees both the outside and the inside of the labor question. . . . It is rich in suggestion, both for the average reader who seeks an understanding of the world he lives in and for the scholar who would push forward the frontiers of human knowledge."

$2.00 at all bookstores

E. P. DUTTON & COMPANY, NEW YORK

MRS. SOCRATES by FRITZ MAUTHNER $2.00

"An example of the enduring qualities of good fiction." —N. Y. Sun.
"Stimulating." —Phila. Inquirer.
"Delightful." —Hartford Times.

"The book demands a hearty shout of grateful praise." —N. Y. World

THE WOMAN WORKER and the TRADE UNIONS by Therese Wolfson $1.75

CHAINS by Henri Barbusse 2 vols. $4.00

BROKEN EARTH by Maurice Hindus $2.00

OIL IMPERIALISM by Louis Fischer $2.00

WHITHER RUSSIA? by Leon Trotsky $1.50

The new THEATRE and CINEMA of SOVIET RUSSIA by Huntly Carter $3.00

EDUCATION IN SOVIET RUSSIA by Scott Nearing $1.50

FOUNDATIONS of CHRISTIANITY by Karl Kautsky $3.00

LEFT WING UNIONISM by Lovell J. Saposs $1.60

At all Book Stores — INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS 381 FOURTH AVENUE NEW YORK — Write for Catalog

as musical facts. There is, then, no making music intelligible to the absolute layman by using language that is intelligible as language. What such language makes intelligible is only whatever quantities and qualities the words refer to in ordinary experience; the judgments that are made are judgments of only such quantities and qualities; and the criteria that are introduced by these judgments are common sense criteria which govern only the aforementioned quantities and qualities. It requires knowledge of music in addition to translate these quantities and qualities into musical facts, the judgments into musical judgments, and the criteria into musical criteria. And since one possessing the requisite knowledge of music does not need the intelligible language, the use and value of such language is in any case solely that of literature or entertainment, not of enlightenment.

I have, it is true, been dealing with the extreme and rare case of the absolute layman, the person absolutely unacquainted with music; but what I have said of him remains true up the line: where the direct experience with the musical fact is adequate to a correct understanding of the verbal explanation the explanation is superfluous; where the direct experience is not adequate the explanation is useless. And so, given a person with actual but slight musical sophistication, there is no making Brahms intelligible and enjoyable to him by mere verbal descriptions of the intricate materials and processes involved. Instead there must be direct, comprehending—which means educated—experience with the materials and processes, but experience itself educated by direct experience with less intricate materials and processes. Otherwise, if the reader ever gets to a concert he finds that the verbal descriptions he understood do not confront him, and the processes that confront him he does not understand.

B. H. Haggin

Drama

"The Witch"

LAST season "The Dybbuk" illustrated one of the ways in which a playwright may avail himself of emotional experiences completely alien to his audience. Throughout, the author identified himself with the milieu he described and wrote the play as if he shared to the fullest extent the beliefs which constituted its premises. The audience was asked to put itself in the place of those with whom the story dealt, to renounce for the time being the spiritual world in which it was accustomed to live, and by an act of poetic faith to believe in the mythology of the Chassidic Jews.

The result of such a method, when it is successfully employed, is the production of a beautiful anachronism. By consenting to accept, during a certain time, an alien weltanschauung the spectator opens his soul to new terrors and new sublimities and he is led to partake in whatever strange and beautiful experiences his borrowed faith makes possible. He is frightened by things which he does not really fear, moved by passions foreign to his nature, stirred by conflicts that do not really concern him. He accepts, in a word, both the penalties and the rewards of a spiritual world not his own, so that, for example, in the case cited, he endures the dark terrors of a gloomy superstition for the sake of the compensating sense which it brings of inhabiting a universe made important by the omnipresence of unseen powers whose concern is with him: a universe, that is to say, at once darker and more sublime than that daylight one which rationality has robbed at once of its terror and its grandeur.

A play of this sort asks of the intellect sympathy, not judgment. It aims to lull the critical faculty to sleep and its purpose is to make the distant past live again exactly as once it did. Successful as it may be, such is not, however, the only way in which an alien world may be presented. We may be

Two New Plays

THE CAPTIVE

By Edouard Bourdet

Translated by Arthur Hornblow, Jr.

"An impersonated play, an emotional play, a study of a certain human complexity in the style of an unusual, erotic passion."

Alexander Woollcott in the N. Y. World

"Bourdet has wrought a play of supreme proportions of compassion and conduct and acted all of terrific dramatic effect." [$2.00]

THE WITCH

By John Masefield

Adapted from the Norwegian of H. Wiers-Jenssen

"The author has devoted himself as lovingly to native folklore for dramatic purposes as Ansky of 'The Dybbuk' did. Something of the same fervor and complete simplicity is in both plays. A worthy contribution to the drama of all nations." [$1.75]

Gilbert Gabriel in the N. Y. Sun

Publishers BRENTANO'S New York

"Belongs to all time"

FORTY IMMORTALS

by BENJAMIN DeCASSERES

The Story of the World's Great Civilizers

"'Forty Immortals' is one of the greatest books of criticism that I know. I have read nothing in criticism which is so profound as original, so profound as unorthodox. Upon the background of an imposing erudition ... flashes which illuminate ... soul, where they are ... time of study. This book is not criticism; it is creation. ... Maeterlinck.

Anatole France
Friedrich Nietzsche
Gabriele D'Annunzio
Percy B. Shelley
Walt Whitman
James B. Cabell
William Shakespeare
Gustave Flaubert
Thomas Hardy
Edgar Saltus

"Unhackneyed, brilliant." H. L. Mencken.

"Invigorating, dazzling." Van Wyck Brooks.

"You won't fall asleep over this volume." Herald Tribune.

"In 'Forty Immortals' DeCasseres ... achieving the purpose of ... criticism than any ... will be read." New York Times.

371 Pages. $3.50 AT ALL BOOKSTORES

SEVEN ARTS

PUBLISHING COMPANY

160 Fifth Avenue, New York

asked instead to go back with our eyes open, to judge events as we should judge them here and now, to react with our waking souls to other creeds and other deeds. Then we do not, as we did before, live the lives of those we watch and, starting from their premises, reach their conclusions; we stand over them instead. Viewed thus from a different angle events take on different meanings, so that the performance of a duty becomes, perhaps, a folly and justice mere cruelty. Judgment, not sympathy, is called into play and our experience is not wholly, at least, poetic, but in part critical as well.

Such is the method employed in the somber tragedy which John Masefield took from the Norwegian of Wiers-Jenssen and called "The Witch" (Greenwich Village Theater). The scene is sixteenth-century Norway and the subject witchcraft, not witchcraft as it appeared to those who lived in the days when it flourished and when burnings seemed as inevitable as executions seem today but witchcraft as we in retrospect see it. To those who played their parts in the ghastly tragedies enacted throughout the Western world it appeared as a terrible emergency, a visible eruption of hell, and upon their premises a moving play could be written; but Wiers-Jenssen has chosen to give us instead the drama of witchcraft as we see it, the tragedy, that is to say, of a delusion so cunningly calculated to play into the hand of all human weakness—superstition, fear, malice, and insanity—and to unite them into one frightful weapon of evil as to be worthy of any devil the human imagination has ever conceived. And the result is that while "The Dybbuk" made us almost regret our rationality, "The Witch" leaves us shuddering over an abyss which, thank God, no longer yawns for us.

In the beginning the author prepares us for the full significance of what is to come by striking terror to the heart with a ghastly scene in which an old woman (unforgettably played by Maria Ouspenskaya) is dragged away to the stake; then, in a series of vividly imagined scenes, he shows how the net, which she herself helps to weave, closes round the body of an unfortunate girl and destines her too for the stake. The sexually starved wife of an old man and the daughter of a dead woman upon whom the suspicion of witchcraft had fallen, she herself at moments mistakes her incipient hysteria for demonic possession, and so when her husband dies suddenly she is half convinced that her wishing killed him. The dead man's mother, seizing, without quite knowing what she does, this pretext to indulge in a long-nourished hate, denounces her and she, stricken with terror, faints under a test. Then her lover, overcome with fear and unconsciously glad of an opportunity to shift the burden of his guilt and to blame his fall upon supernatural powers, deserts her at the last moment and her fate is sealed. One by one, morbid nerves, then malice, and then fear have played their parts, and thanks to them a whole people, strengthened anew in their delusion, will harden their hearts in the name of righteousness and rejoice at the spectacle when fire wraps itself around shrinking flesh.

Montague Summers, whose researches into the drama and whose recent fanatic book upon the subject of witchcraft both give him a certain right to speak, calls "The Witch" "probably the finest piece of work dealing in domestic fashion with the warlock and sorceress that has been seen on the English stage since the reign of wise King James," and in spite of the fact that its last two acts never reach the high level of the first two and that there are moments when it loses itself in too extended treatment of the love of the witch and her paramour, I think that he is right. Here are genuine pity and genuine terror in which both the imagination and the intellect are involved.

The production is generally excellent and two performances besides that of Maria Ouspenskaya demand especial mention—the restrained intelligent performance of Alice Brady as the witch and the burning intensity of James C. Malaidy's playing in the role of a fanatical priest.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

The Neighborhood Playhouse, 466 Grand Street, N. Y. Telephone Drydock 7516
Evenings (Except Monday), Matinee Saturday
The Hindu Classic
THE LITTLE CLAY CART

Longacre Theatre, 48th St., West of Broadway. Evenings 8:30 Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2:30
A THEODORE DREISER'S
N AMERICAN TRAGEDY
"A PLAY WHICH IS BOUND TO WRENCH A MILLION HEARTS." —Journal.
DRAMATIZED BY PATRICK KEARNEY.

LIMITED ENGAGEMENT
ACTORS' THEATRE PRODUCTION
EUGENE O'NEILL'S
"BEYOND THE HORIZON"
Mansfield Theatre 47th St., West of B'way Chickering 5852
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30.

YIDDISH ART THEATRE
12th St. and 2nd Ave. Stuy. 7195
MAURICE SCHWARTZ PRODUCTION
OF ABRAHAM GOLDFADEN'S
"The Tenth Commandment"
Evenings 8.30 Matinees Saturday and Sunday 2:30

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE 105 W. 14th St. Tel. Watkins 7767
EVA Le GALLIENNE
Thursday, December 2, "Three Sisters."
Friday, December 3, "La Locandiera."
Saturday Matinee, December 4, "La Locandiera."
Saturday Evening, December 4, "Master Builder."
Monday, December 6, "La Locandiera."
Tuesday, December 7, "Three Sisters."
Wednesday Matinee, December 8, "La Locandiera."
Evenings & Saturday Matinees, 50c to $1.50. Wednesday Matinees, 35c-$1.

THEATRE GUILD PRODUCTIONS
SIDNEY HOWARD'S COMEDY
Ned McCobb's Daughter
JOHN GOLDEN Thea., 58th St., East of B'way. Matinees THURS. and SAT.

BERNARD SHAW'S
PYGMALION
"The most refreshing intellectual shower bath on Broadway, with the tingling drops of Shaw's wit to tickle the spine." Frank Vreeland, Telegram.
GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Matinees THURS. and SAT., 2:30.

SECOND DANCE PROGRAM THIS SEASON
THIS SUNDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 5TH AT 8:30 P. M.
ANGNA ENTERS
Premiere of Five Compositions in Dance Form:
(Der Rosenkavalier; Odalisque; Man, His Origin Is Dust; Colombine; and Bar Maid. Also Sapphic; Feline; Habanera; Dance of Death; Promenade; Second Empire; Bourree; Cardinal; Moyen Age; and Colombine.)
238 W. 44th St. LITTLE THEATRE Lackawanna 6620
Seats now on sale: $2.20, $1.65, $1.10.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1926 No. 3205

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 619

EDITORIALS:

Revelry and Whispers 621

Refrigerated Mammoths 622

Manufacturing News 623

IN MEXICO. By Hendrik van Loon 624

THE NICARAGUAN FARCE. By Carleton Beals 627

MOTHER'S DAUGHTER. A Poem 629

THE NATIONALISTS TAKE WUCHANG. By Anna Rochester 635

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 638

CORRESPONDENCE 639

BOOKS AND PLAYS:

Copyreader. By Ted Olson 641

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 641

Toward America Solos. By Henry Raymond Mussey 643

Hard-Boiled. By Allen Tate 643

The Problem of Races. By Franz Boas 644

Four English Essayists. By John Waldhorn Gassner 646

The Nation's Poetry Prize 646

Books in Brief 647

Drama: A Note on Tragedy. By Joseph Wood Krutch 648

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

The British Commonwealth of Nations 648

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR
FREDA KIRCHWEY

LITERARY EDITOR
MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NEW YORK STATE WATER-POWER commission, with not so much as a month to live, is determined to hand over the incomparable power resources of the St. Lawrence River to the Aluminum Trust. The commission goes out of existence on December 31. It is Republican, whereas Governor Smith, who is fighting to conserve the State's water-power, belongs to the opposite party. The overwhelming victory of Governor Smith in the recent election gave clear indication that the people of New York were behind him in that fight. And so, before the door is shut on such schemes forever, the commission summons in one of the richest and greediest corporations in the world and bids it take 2,000,000 horse-power away, on terms that must shake the sides of all the devils in hell. It is as though the commission were seeking deliberate revenge on a people for beating its party at the polls; or else had gone quite mad. No more wanton, cynical raid on the public domain has ever been recorded. Teapot Dome does not hold a fraction of the wealth that is locked up in the "white coal" of the St. Lawrence.

GOVERNOR SMITH continues to fight. He has retained Samuel Untermyer to seek ways and means of enjoining the commission's action. The federal government as well as the courts will have something to say before the deal is finally consummated. But the danger is acute, and all men and women with a spark of citizenship should range themselves—as vocally as possible—on the Governor's side. The lease provides that the Aluminum Trust shall pay the State $2,000,000 a year in taxes. Where will it get the taxes? Out of the hides of the citizens of New York in exorbitant power rates. The lease provides that at the end of fifty years the plant will revert to the State. On what terms? At cost plus 15 per cent—$20,000,000 velvet or thereabouts to be handed over to Mr. Mellon's heirs. Furthermore, a loophole is left for watering values which, if past experience in public-utility valuations is any guide, will undoubtedly be used to push up the price to such a figure that the people of New York can never afford to buy their own property back. Or worse still, they may be forced to pay through the nose when the engineering of fifty years hence is getting cheaper power from other sources. The New York World states the case flatly: "This is not a matter of private development versus public development. This is a matter of decent development, whether public or private, versus a barefaced last-minute grab."

THE GREAT FATHER IN THE WHITE HOUSE, that dauntless man, has just surrendered without discretion to the Senators from North Dakota, Nye and Frazier. The intrepid Mr. Coolidge, it seems, appointed to the position of United States Marshal in North Dakota one C. F. Mudgett, a protege of Mr. Hanna, the recently defeated regular candidate for the Senate. When this news reached Senator Nye he promptly went to the White House, demanded an interview with the President, and got it. Then and there he told the President that he would stand for no such treatment in the disposition of patronage in his State and the aforesaid intrepid President came down with the rapidity and benevolence of Davy Crockett's 'coon. Poor Mr. Mudgett, who had left his home for his new post, is to return unrewarded. Senator Frazier, too, served notice upon the White House that the President must recognize no one but the elected Senators. Washington points to the closeness of the next Senate as the reason for Mr. Coolidge's ignominious surrender, but we are inclined to think that Senator Nye's own fighting spirit helped to carry the day. Indubitably, as Frank R. Kent points out in the Baltimore Sun, this rather shoddy struggle over patronage reflects little credit upon any one involved. But, if patronage must be, there is no reason why the President should be permitted to use that of North Dakota to punish insurgent Senators who refuse to kiss the royal robes on all occasions. How, in the face of incidents like this, can the myth of the big, strong statesman in the White House persist?

WHERE WAS MOSES when the light went on? This will be the question in Washington when Senator Borah undertakes to investigate the activities of his colleague, Senator Moses of New Hampshire, in connection with the Alien Property Custodian's office. Norman Hapgood has brought out in his Washington correspondence the fact that Emory R. Buckner, United States District Attorney in New York, has in his possession three checks aggregating $6,000, drawn by John T. King to the order of Senator Moses. John T. King, it will be remembered, was the man who distributed the $441,000 which figured in the Daugherty-Miller conspiracy case, that being the money said to have been paid as a bribe by Richard Merton in order improperly to obtain release of certain alien property. Mr. Hapgood also declares that these three checks are not reported in the income tax of Senator Moses, and thinks from this it is "impossible to argue that this $6,000 was for legitimate services legitimately accounted for." He also maintains that there are letters in Mr. Buckner's possession which throw an extremely interesting light on the relations between Senator Moses and Mr. King. One of these letters relates to the attempt to get the "right kind of ambassador from Germany," and another from Senator Moses tells Mr. King that he will give him a tip as to the right kind of pressure in order to bring this about. As far as we can make out the next Senate will be devoted chiefly to investigating its new and old members. Smith of Illinois, Gould of Maine, Watson of Indiana, Vare of Pennsylvania, Moses of New Hampshire—the list is getting longer and more interesting every day.

ENTIRELY GRATIFYING is Mr. S. Parker Gilbert's report of the second year's working of the Dawes Plan. The Agent General for Reparations speaks in warm praise of the "loyalty and fidelity" of the Germans in their cooperation with the Dawes authorities, the promptness of their payments, and their ability to settle two supplementary budget contributions by the lump-sum payments of 300,000,000 marks; the latter Mr. Gilbert declares "significant of the spirit of friendly accommodation . . . a new sign of the good-will and mutual understanding that lie at the basis of the plan." Distribution of reparation payments has gone on smoothly, without trade or currency disturbances. France alone received 611,877,000 marks in cash, 225,000,000 marks in coal, coke, and lignite, 40,000,000 marks in fertilizers, and 37,000,000 in timber and agricultural products. Next year Germany must pay, all told, 1,500,000,000 marks and there is every prospect that it will be able to do so despite the heavy burden of unemployment doles. Mr. Gilbert criticizes the usual danger of too great governmental expenditure and censures the failure to work out a definite financial relationship between the Reich and the separate states and communes. But he records the stability of the currency for more than two years, the adequacy of the gold reserve, and the brave manner in which the Reich has borne the pains of reorganization after inflation. He, too, takes a slap at the preposterous European tariffs, declaring that "trade barriers are still responsible for great dislocation" and hamper the prompt movement of goods. All in all, the report reveals a situation far better than had been hoped for, one that reflects infinite credit on all concerned and upon none more than on Mr. Gilbert and his American staff.

THERE IS CERTAINLY no better—and perhaps no other—peaceful solution of the fifty-year-old wrangle between Chile and Peru over the Tacna-Arica territory than that formally proposed by our Secretary of State in suggesting that the area be awarded to Bolivia, the latter paying a price for it to be fixed by negotiation. The suggestion, commended by The Nation in its issue of March 31, last, did not originate with Mr. Kellogg, but his acceptance of it may heal a long-festering wound and restore to our diplomacy the prestige which we lost when our badly conceived attempt to supervise a plebiscite ended last spring in a fiasco. Bolivia, quite naturally, has already accepted the proposal, and it is reported that Chile is favorably disposed toward it. Such a settlement has much to commend it to all the countries concerned. The area is an arid strip between Peru and Chile of no material value to either, but it would be of decided importance to Bolivia, giving it access to the sea, a railway thereto, and the ready-made port of Arica in place of Antofagasta, which it lost to Chile in the war of half a century ago. For South America and the world at large an acceptance of the proposal would end a long-standing cause of national jealousy and potential war.

EXCITED BY A THREAT of a general strike on the part of their servants, the foreigners at Hankow, in the heart of China, telegraphed ardently for gunboats to protect them, and an international flotilla is now anchored off the concessions. But the general strike which excited such apprehension has not occurred, and the 407 American marines now at Hankow must find life dull. To the Chinese, however, the incident must have seemed just one more proof of the unity of the foreign nations. The ordinary Chinese does not know that the American Government, by announcing that it would not use its marines to maintain foreign control of the Chinese customs, had done the independence of China a real service; he knows only that whenever foreign warships threaten China the Stars and Stripes fly alongside the rest. Meanwhile, the Nationalists continue to gain ground; they have moved their capital from Canton in the South to Wuchang, opposite Hankow; their armies have captured Fuchow, the last important center of resistance south of Shanghai. A coalition of Northern war lords, meeting in Tientsin, has issued noisy proclamations of determination to down them, but while the dispatches report an intention to send 150,000 soldiers against the Southerners it remains to be seen where the coalition will find the soldiers willing to fight, the money to pay for them, or the generals capable of leadership.

"IT WOULD BE UNCONSTITUTIONAL in our country"—this oft-repeated assertion in the opinion given by William D. Guthrie, president of the New York City Bar Association, to Cardinal Hayes, sums up that jurist's argument against Mexico's anticlerical legislation. True, but what of it? Certainly legislation analogous to that embodied in the Mexican constitutions of 1857 and 1917 could not be enacted in the United States. We have, fortunately, never had an established church which dominated our entire nation politically, economically, and spiritually. Mr. Guthrie is an eminent lawyer, but he should fortify himself in Mexican history. "If," he writes, "during the last century in Mexico, fair play and religious liberty as we Americans now conceive fair play to all creeds and to all churches had been granted to the Roman Catholic church"—things would have been different. Does he not know that the Mexican Catholic episcopate unanimously decried tolerance of other creeds as "impious," "disastrous," and "anti-Catholic" three-quarters of a century after religious liberty had been written into our own national charter?

ONTARIO, TOO, HAS GONE WET—all Canada, with the exception of the Maritime Provinces, has now deserted the prohibition adopted in war time. Ontario, however, has not gone back to the saloon—she has, by reseating the Conservative Party with added strength, indorsed Premier Ferguson's program of permitting Dry communities to be Dry and of establishing package sale in communities which choose to be Wet. Prohibition was established in Ontario in 1916; 68 per cent of the voters indorsed it at a referendum in 1919, only 54 per cent in 1924; this year Premier Ferguson, after putting through a redistribution act which gave the cities the larger representation to which their increasing population entitled them, went to the people on the direct issue of abandoning prohibition altogether, and won. Prohibition, he declared, was a failure; and apparently most of Ontario's voters agree with him. It will be interesting to observe the new system in operation. Ontario apparently did not like the saloon system when she had it; she does not like prohibition; will the system of giving to any person over 21 a revocable card entitling him to buy liquor in packages at government monopoly stores please the people better?

THE CONSOLIDATION OF NEWSPAPERS goes on apace, the Scripps-Howard group having just purchased four more dailies, the Denver Rocky Mountain News, Denver Times, Knoxville Sentinel, and Memphis News-Scimitar. The Denver Times was immediately consolidated with the Express of that city, already owned by the Scripps-Howard chain; the News-Scimitar with the Scripps-Howard Press of Memphis, while the Knoxville Sentinel is similarly joined to the Knoxville News. Every week sees new combinations, while the air is full of rumors that there will soon be a Scripps-Howard daily in New York and that other sales and combinations are under way in the metropolis and elsewhere. But this remarkable trend is not confined to the large cities—it goes on in the small towns, sometimes extending to the concentration of all the dailies of a city under one ownership, as in Springfield, Massachusetts, and Auburn, New York. Since chain stores and combinations, in order to achieve economies of management, are the rule in almost all other lines of business, and since the making of newspapers is now purely a business affair, this drift is not to be wondered at. The effect it will have on the editorial side of the press is another matter. On this point we have a warning from a veteran old-school editor, Milie Bunnell, founder of the Duluth Herald, who sees in the consolidations a "disintegration" and declares that the "salvation of American thought must come from editors whose courage and brilliance will be sufficient to combat the money interests seeking to monopolize the nation's news and opinions." Fortunately, the Scripps-Howard chain rank among the most liberal daily newspapers existing in the United States today.

THE EDITOR of the St. Petersburg, Florida, Independent is grieved at an article entitled Real Estate versus Human Lives in Florida which appeared in The Nation for October 13 last over the signature of Stella Crossley. He objects to the statement in that article that "the policy of Florida newspapers, which in recent years have become mere real-estate house organs, has been to play down local storms and play up Northern ones to the advantage of the realtor." The editor assures us that the Independent never has been controlled in either its news or editorial policy by the realtors or, for that matter, by anyone except its owners and managers, none of whom are financially interested in any real-estate development." We are glad to accept his [illegible] from the general application of Miss Crossley's statement. The Independent also objects to Miss Crossley's assertion, based on an Associated Press dispatch, that "concrete benches were picked up and whirled about by the wind and frame houses were leveled." This [illegible] to J. A. Kelly, who subsequently, the Independent informs us, withdrew those statements. As for the Independent's handling of the news of the storm, however, we cannot agree that the headlines on the day of the storm were justified by the facts or the news printed under them. We have no desire to do the editors or owners of the St. Petersburg Independent the slightest injury or injustice; we are concerned only with the truth.

TWO DISTINGUISHED REPRESENTATIVES of Boston Unitarianism have died within the past month. Edward Cummings, successor of Edward Everett Hale at what was best known as "Dr. Hale's Church," was killed at a railroad crossing in New Hampshire; Paul Revere Frothingham, pastor of the congregation before which William Ellery Channing preached a century ago, died at his Boston home. Mr. Frothingham was author of an excellent life of Edward Everett, that other Bostonian of many brilliancies and scant permanent achievement; Mr. Cummings was a leader in the pro-League efforts of the World Peace Foundation. Both were men of broad vision and of singular personal charm, whose qualities early promised brilliant careers; yet neither really weathered the war. Both were stricken with that strange hesitancy which leaves Boston Unitarianism today a faint shadow of the pulsing movement which once moulded American thinking. The liberal Orthodox churches have caught up with what was once religious radicalism; and the social gospel which inspired Channing to denounce war when it was still unquestioned has, like other Boston radicalisms, been smothered in the smug ancestor-worship of the present generation. Nonetheless, Mr. Cummings and Mr. Frothingham will be missed and Unitarianism confronts the question whether adequate successors can be found.

THE SUICIDE OF GEORGE STERLING closed an attractive career of the sort that can be pursued today only, perhaps, on the Pacific Coast. To Californians, Sterling was not merely a good poet; he was in a more than figurative sense their poet laureate, and by virtue of his many admirable qualities as a person he was a civic institution as well. His rank as an American poet, whatever that may be, is worth determining; but we should also remember him as a companionable man, generous to younger poets, and the leading spirit of the Bohemian Club, whence he sent his contributions to magazines all over the United States. The last poem he contributed to The Nation, The Seventh Veil, was so energetic an expression of disillusion that Fremont Older, upon reading it, sat down and wrote this letter:

> I got a great kick out of your Seventh Veil, published in The Nation. You have expressed very beautifully what I have thought ever since I found out about the human race, but have lacked both the ability and the courage to express my conclusions. I am grateful to you.

Sterling forwarded the letter to the editors of The Nation, but before they had time to thank him he was dead by his own hand. The disillusion he had expressed was, it would seem, his own.

Revelry and Whispers

TWO books have stirred political waters in England and America and have called forth bitter denunciations. They are the anonymous "Whispering Gallery," already suppressed in London, and Samuel Hopkins Adams's "Revelry," the latter a novel and in that guise setting forth the story of the Harding Administration. It is without literary merit and has little to recommend it save that it portrays the author's idea of how the "Ohio gang" lived, acted, stole, and betrayed America in Washington. Coarseness, vulgarity, a sordidness incredible, utter unmorality—Mr. Adams's pages reek with them, and the chief characters in this lowest of dramas are but faintly disguised. Forbes, Fall, Daugherty, Sawyer, Harding himself all appear in scenes which must seem incredible to those who are ignorant of what the Harding Administration was, who have not followed the developments which sent Forbes and others to jail, brought two former Cabinet officers to the bar of justice, and compelled a series of suicides.

As for the "Whispering Gallery," which was fraudulently foisted on the publishers, it is a little difficult to understand the anger it has aroused. Many of the sketches of public personages strike us as extremely apt; the conversations attributed to some of the great are, on the other hand, artificial and made to order. Yet there breathes through it all such a clear conception of the smallness of most of the characters that guided the English world during its four years of torture that one must believe that the author, whoever he be, had not only a humane outlook on life but a real understanding of the political forces which made such a catastrophe possible. He is certainly correct in his assertion that the politicians killed themselves when they enthroned the financiers as the real rulers of the world. If he did not personally know men like Ramsay MacDonald and Woodrow Wilson he must have been near enough to them, or their friends to give pictures which, however [illegible] are all in harmony.

We are less concerned today with the books themselves than with the use of these two forms of writing in political attack. We credit Mr. Adams with the desire to do a genuine service in thus unveiling political conditions which can as yet not be handled directly without silly cries of "besmirching dead men" and "slandering a President who can no longer defend himself." Were we of the opinion that Mr. Adams wrote as a mere sensationalist, or simply in order to make money by the scandals of the Harding regime, we should of course have an emphatically unfavorable opinion to express. Assuming his sincerity, we must approve of the choice of his medium despite the crudeness of the narration. History teems with novels which have roused the public conscience where ponderous tomes and elaborate Parliamentary or Congressional reports had failed to move—witness "Ramona," "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "The Jungle," and many others, to say nothing of Charles Reade and Charles Dickens and the other crusading novelists across the seas. Yet the novel form for political or social propaganda is sometimes confusing, because of necessity truth and fiction are intermingled—not less so in the case of "Revelry" than in similar books. None the less we repeat that we deem it entirely justifiable. If "Revelry" does not shock and arouse the American people it will be because of the author's lack of artistry and depth, because of its style rather than because of its form. Some day, some time, this humiliating chapter in our recent political history must be set forth in all its shame if the country is to be preserved from its recurrence.

Margot Asquith quite naturally is defending the usefulness of intimate memoirs—always assuming honesty, truthfulness, and sincerity. She is right in declaring that the public wishes to know what the real politician is like. It should be told, for, as the Countess of Oxford says:

> If you study the susceptibilities of the living it is more than likely that you will deal inadequately with the dead. . . . I prefer the art of a brave and faithful painter to the ingenuity of a beauty specialist when ordering the portrait of a friend, and if you ignore the faults of public men you will have nailed them more securely in their coffins than any undertaker.

The public ought to have the truth about public men, especially in America, or we shall have frequently repeated the present situation when the American electorate has been led to believe that there is a big, brave, and wise statesman in the White House instead of a timid, little man who never faces an issue until compelled to do so. Novels, memoirs, "mirrors" of Downing Street or Washington—we need them all, if they are within the boundaries of sincerity and decency. The glamor that surrounds public men, which in America has led to an absurd worship of the Presidential office and the man in it, is a menace to democratic progress and to the frank portraying of the truth at all times upon which democracies must insist if their political life is to be kept pure.

Refrigerated Mammoths

THE perfectly preserved carcass of a mammoth, the Russians report, has recently been found in Trans-Baikalia, deep in a frozen bank. It has been shipped to the Leningrad Academy of Science for further study. This is not the first prehistoric veteran whose refrigerated remains have been discovered in Arctic Siberia, nor even the first shipped on ice to the former Russian capital. At least twenty frozen mammoths have been inspected in situ by Russian scientists, and four woolly rhinoceroses.

Indeed, the region about the mouth of the Lena River, and the New Siberia Isles in the Arctic Ocean, must once have been thickly populated with mammoths. The trade in "fossil ivory" brought down from Siberia into China is at least a thousand years old, and several thousand pairs have been marketed within the last two hundred years. The ancient Chinese traders understood them to be the tusks of a giant rat which, they believed, lived in dark caves near the Arctic; and a shrewd old scientist suggested that the subsoil maneuvers of these gigantic creatures might be the cause of earthquakes. The first Westerners were little wiser. Captain Müller, a Swede sent to Siberia as a prisoner in 1716, wrote of these tusks that

> The common opinion of inhabitants is that they are real elephant's teeth and have lain buried ever since the universal deluge. Some of our countrymen think it to be the Ebur fossile, and consequently a product of the earth. . . . Others again maintain that they are the horns > of a live huge beast, which lives in morasses and subterranean caves, subsisting by the mud and working itself by the help of its horns through the mire and earth, but when it chances to meet sandy ground, the sands, rolling after it so close that, by reason of its unwieldiness, it cannot turn itself again, it sticks fast and perishes.

Until within a few decades hopeful souls still planned Arctic journeys in the expectation of finding some of the great beasts still wandering alive over the tundras. Modern science insists that the last of them died ten or fifteen thousand years ago—almost simultaneously with the disappearance of the mastodons who once roamed in hurds over what is now the Eastern United States, but it cannot explain the mystery of their extinction, nor why their relics are so abundant in a restricted part of Siberia. Those whose carcasses are recovered entire are the few who plunged into clefts or abysses and, struggling, buried themselves in snow or ice which persisted through the millenniums until some wanton freshet, shifting its course, at last released them. But the others? Before the discovery of the Beresovska mammoth a quarter century ago it was permissible to suggest a change of climate. But the Beresovska animal had, in its refrigerated stomach, the remains of some eighteen species of plants, all of which still flourish in the Arctic, and when climates change so does the vegetation.

This Beresovska monarch, whose carefully preserved remains were for years the pride of the St. Petersburg Academy, was, except for the missing trunk and parts of the head, still frozen solid when the scientific expedition sent to recover it came upon it. Indeed so well preserved was it that Dr. Hertz's contemporary diary somewhat dryly reports:

> The flesh from under the shoulder, fibrous and marbled with fat, is dark red and looks as ready as well-frozen beef or horse-meat. It looked so appetizing that we wondered for some time whether we would not taste it. But no one would venture to take it into his mouth, and horse-flesh was given the preference. . . . The dogs ate whatever mammoth meat we threw them.

Manufacturing News

PAUL Y. ANDERSON, Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, performed a public service the other day when he exposed the State Department in the deliberate manufacture and propagation of malicious news and the Associated Press as collaborating in the job. Here are his facts:

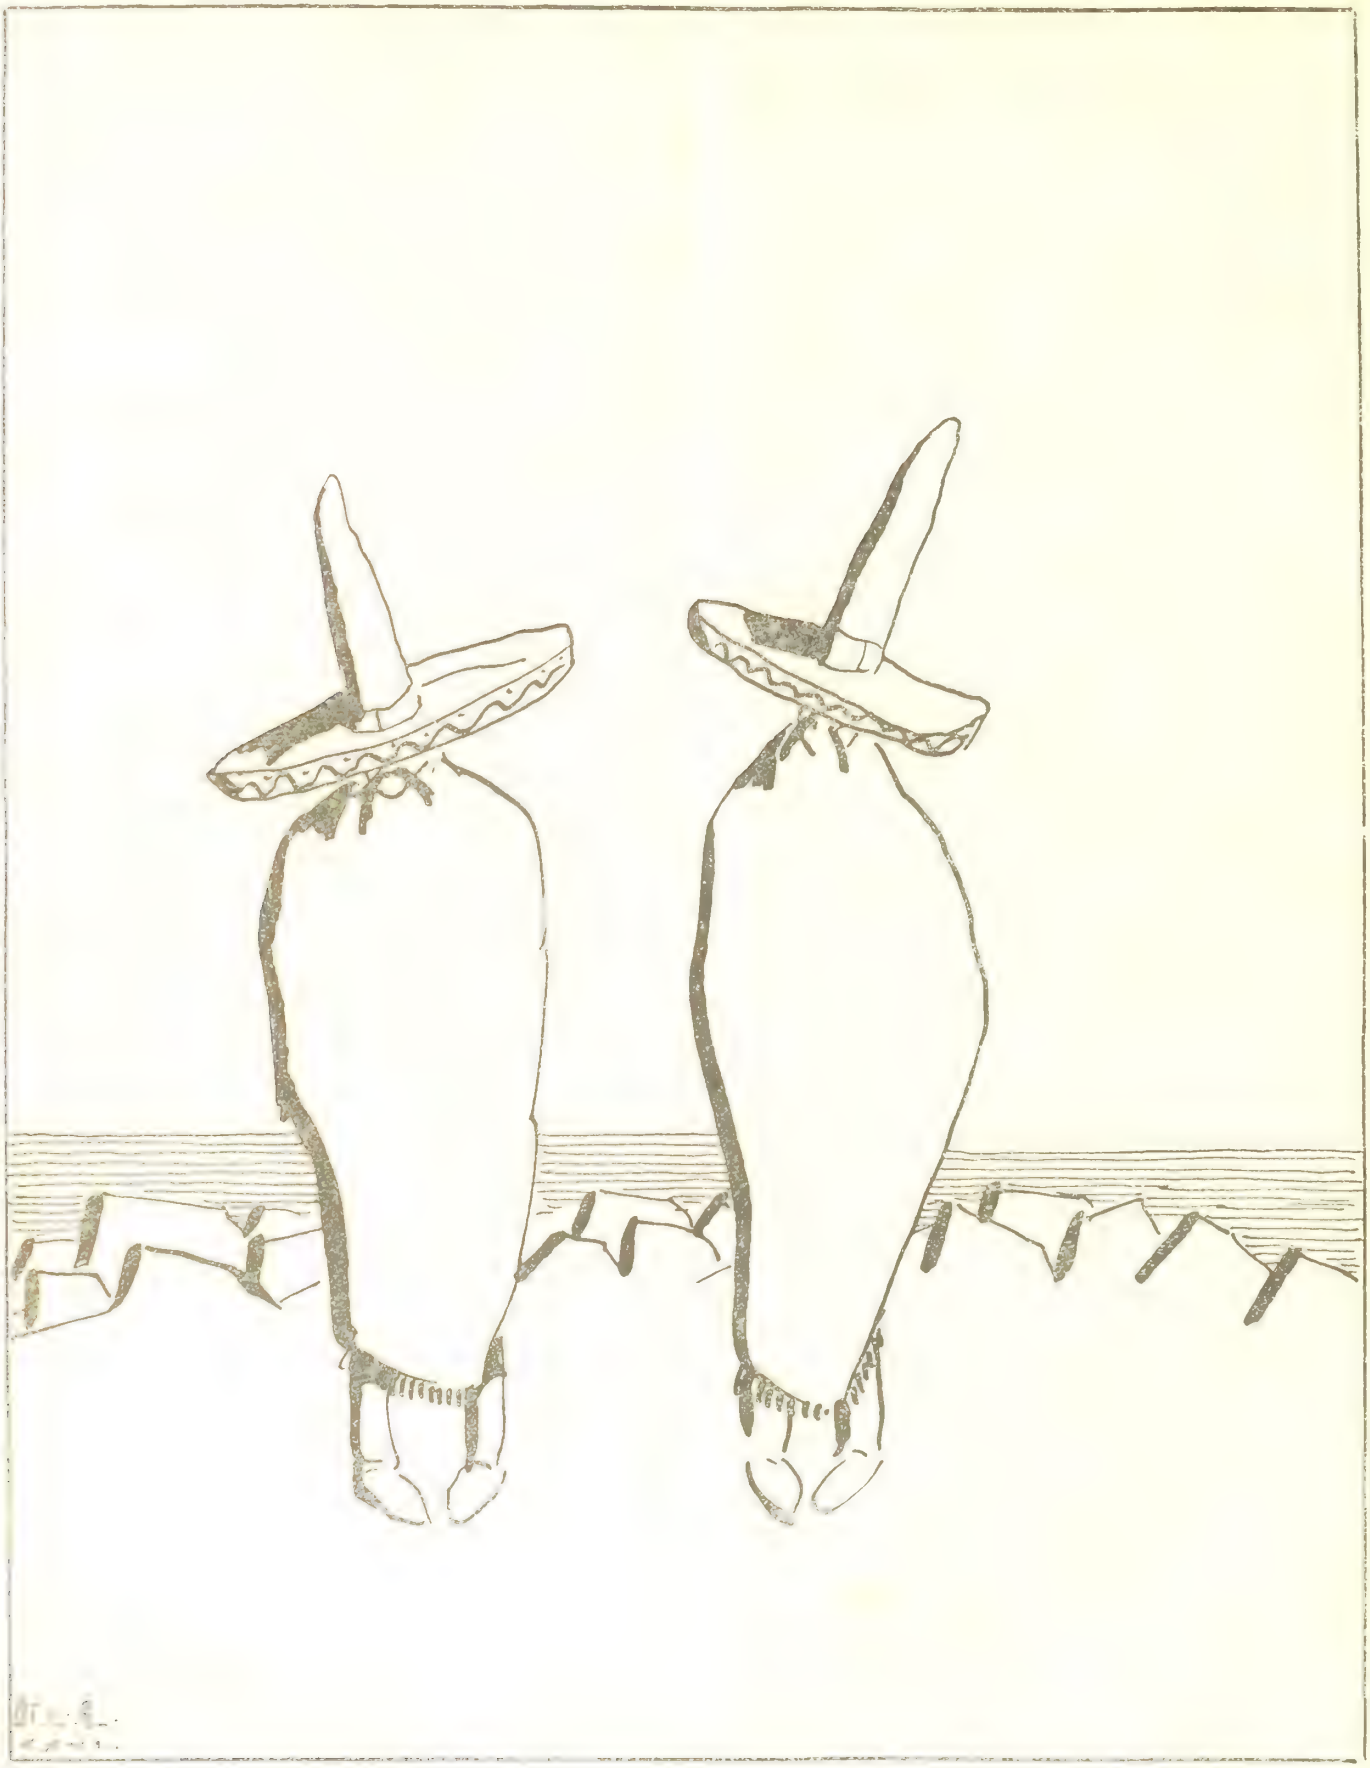
On September 16 Robert E. Olds, Assistant Secretary of State and former law partner of Secretary Kellogg, telephoned to the three national press associations which supply news to virtually every newspaper in the country and asked to have responsible men sent to see him. When these responsible visitors arrived Mr. Olds began by pledging them to secrecy, and then proceeded with a lurid picture of Mexico as a hotbed of Bolshevism.

"Gentlemen," he said, "we feel that this picture should be presented to the American people. We cannot prove it, but we are morally certain that a warm bond of sympathy, if not an actual understanding, exists between Mexico City and Moscow. . . . I want your advice and cooperation."

We understand that it was the representative of the United Press who first gave advice. "That is easy," he said. "Let the State Department issue a statement over the signature of the Secretary of State; every newspaper in the country will publish it."

Mr. Olds made a gesture of fear. The State Department could not charge a neighboring country, with which we were in ostensibly friendly relations, with things which it was not in a position to prove. It wanted the allegations made, but it did not want to be held responsible for them. It had no proof. After some discussion, one of the newspapermen suggested that Mr. Olds's unprovable bogy might be dovetailed into a story of the impending recognition by the United States of the Diaz Government in Nicaragua. And so it was—by the Associated Press.

Newspapers all over the country appeared on November 18 with scare headlines over a Washington dispatch which began thus:



> WASHINGTON, November 17 (A. P.).—The specter of a Mexican-fostered Bolshevist hegemony intervening between the United States and the Panama Canal has thrust itself into American-Mexican relations, already strained.

The Associated Press had done Mr. Olds's bidding. There was not a word in the dispatch to justify the lead, but the job was done; the news had been manufactured; the headlines flared; and the editorial writers sharpened their pencils and started their excoriation.

The United Press and the International News Service maintained their independence and discriminated between news and propaganda. We have examined the "flimsies" of both agencies for November 17, and the dispatches sent out by these agencies were honest news reports limited to statements of fact. They did not aid the State Department in manufacturing news—though some of their subscribers bombarded them with protests at letting themselves be "scooped."

Fortunately the country has learned to be a bit suspicious of anti-Mexican propaganda. But the instance is all too typical. Washington news consists in large part of "canned" material given out by the various departments, sometimes responsibly and sometimes not, and of the steady flow of disguised campaign material given out by Mr. Coolidge himself under the thin pseudonym of the "White House Spokesman." Washington correspondents, who naturally wish to preserve their "news sources," their friendships with officialdom, are loath to antagonize by refusing to put this canned propaganda on the wires. Nor is it Washington news alone which is distorted by officialdom. At the American Legation in Peking the newspapermen daily meet a young gentleman who talks of the Cantonese as "Bolsheviks" and gives his own political nuance to the news—and the Associated Press news which comes to us from China is gathered for it by a semi-official British agency.

All over the world the process goes on. Responsible newspapers and news agencies have an obligation to the public to war against it; and the public owes a debt to the United Press, the International News Service, and Mr. Anderson for serving it so well in this instance. The position of the United Press is significant. Serving, as it does, newspapers in thirty-seven countries, it cannot afford to let itself be used as a catspaw by the Foreign Office of any one country—and it is not.

In Mexico

"I see by the papers that there have been 189 murders in the United States in the last two weeks, that [illegible] mail carriages have been robbed in plain daylight, that nine million dollars' worth of jewels have been stolen. It is about time our President sent an army across the Rio Grande to reestablish order, eh, Pedro?"

The Nicaraguan Farce

By CARLETON BEALS

I

FOURTEEN years ago, November 13, 1912, the Nicaraguan press reported that the presidential train had left Managua for Corinto at 6 a. m.—three coaches, the first and third containing American marines, the middle car carrying President Adolfo Diaz, General Emiliano Chamorro, Minister Diego M. Chamorro, and Carlos Cuadra Pasos. The American marines downed the revolution, and kept Diaz as President.

Adolfo Diaz is again President in 1926, and whimpering for American armed protection against the Liberals and against Mexico. If there is a legitimate constitutional President at the present moment (Solorzano, who had been honestly elected, resigned last January under the menace of Emiliano Chamorro's guns, and Chamorro then shot his way into the Presidency) it is Vice-President J. Bautista Sacasa, who led the Liberal revolt against Chamorro early this year, and was exiled under threat of death. Nevertheless, our State Department, according to the Associated Press, brazenly announced that it saw in Diaz's election "an indication that it may be possible to reestablish constitutional government in Nicaragua."

Our State Department had declared Chamorro unconstitutional (per the 1923 Washington treaties), but winked at all shipments of arms to him from American ports and United States marines kept the rebels out of Bluefields, the key Atlantic port; and now, within a few hours of his ascendancy, we have recognized Adolfo Diaz, who had been a lickspittle for Chamorro and American interests for seventeen years. This despite the fact that the 1923 Washington treaties, cut to democratic pattern by Charles E. Hughes and forced down the throats of the Central American republics, provide that no President (or near relative of such President) shall be recognized if he comes into power by armed means.

In 1909 the cocktail was spiced with "revolution . . . ideals . . . majority will . . ." Secretary of State Knox, in his curiously bolshevistic note of 1909, delivered to the Nicaraguan representative in Washington, declared:

> The Government of the United States is convinced that the present revolution represents the ideals and will of the majority of the Nicaraguans more truly than does the Government of President Zelaya.

To clarify the chain of events: In 1909 Nicaragua was ruled by one of those ruthless, malodorous, long-term Central American dictators, José Santos Zelaya. Zelaya proved acceptable to American interests until he negotiated a loan (against our protest) with the European Ethelburga bankers. Then a well-armed and well-financed revolution, headed by Estrada, with General Emiliano Chamorro in charge and Adolfo Diaz close in the offing, proceeded to overthrow Zelaya. Knox announced that Zelaya was violating the 1907 Washington treaties, exercising undue influence in Honduras, and flouting the rights of Costa Rica, Salvador, and Guatemala. So Zelaya had to resign; the Nicaraguan Congress appointed José Madriz in his stead. But the Washington watchword was still "revolution" instead of "constitutionalism." American marines prevented Madriz from recapturing Bluefields, held by the Estrada-Chamorro-Diaz rebels (as has similarly occurred again this year, 1926). The American occupative forces were [illegible] to the rebels, prevented the regular Government from blockading the port, and permitted rebel boats to fly the American flag. Estrada's revolution had already promised, according to Thomas P. Moffat, American consul at Bluefields, "annulment of all concessions not owned by foreigners." In accordance with a pact imposed by Thomas G. Dawson (expert on Dominican customs control) the new Government was pledged to make Adolfo Diaz the next President and to accept a loan "via the good offices of the United States." This same Diaz, a Bluefields employee of La Luz y Los Angeles Mining Company (American) at $1,000 a year, contributed to the revolution $600,000, which he eventually repaid to himself. General Estrada himself stated "with brutal frankness" that American companies had put up a million dollars, and named some of them.

But the Nicaraguan Congress, after the revolution, proved refractory, attempting to adopt a constitution preventing foreign control through loans. With the approval of our State Department, this Congress was dissolved. New elections provoked popular discontent. Estrada turned the Presidency over to Adolfo Diaz, as per the Dawson agreement. The latter's election was assured by means of an American war-vessel sent into Nicaraguan waters "for moral effect." Followed a series of treaty-loans: 1911, Knox-Castrillo Convention, $15,000,000, turned down three times by our Senate in the face of Taft's insistent urging; 1911, Treasury Bills Agreement, temporary $1,500,000 loan, control of the National Bank goes to New York bankers, an American customs collector is appointed, right to solicit United States Government enforcement provided; 1912, Supplementary Loan, $500,000, customs guaranty, lien on railways which were transferred to a corporation organized in the United States (to this day the railways pay New York State income taxes); 1912, Liberal revolution led by General Mena, protesting against this loan, put down by marines from eight United States war vessels; new elections, polls guarded by United States marines, Adolfo Diaz continued four years longer in power; February, 1916, the Bryan-Chamorro treaty, by which the United States paid Nicaragua $3,000,000 to be applied to her debt and expended as the United States might otherwise designate, in return for trans-isthmian canal rights, ninety-nine year leases of the Great Corn and Little Corn Islands in the Caribbean and of a naval base in the Gulf of Fonseca.

II

The geographical situation of Nicaragua explains many of its past and present difficulties. Central America reaches its greatest width near the southern boundary of Honduras; Nicaragua tapers down again toward Panama and the Canal. Its coast and harbors have strategic importance, and its two large lakes, stretching half across the country and emptying into the Atlantic by the broad San Juan River, provide a sea-level canal almost ready made. This has long led to international contention; it was behind the 1850 Clayton-Bulwer Treaty reserving joint rights to England and the United States, and the machinations which in 1916 gave the United States exclusive rights at the moral and physical price already tabulated. The Great and Little Corn Islands, of remote importance for Panama, are indispensable for the protection of the Nicaraguan route. Also strategically important is the Gulf of Fonseca, the Pacific hub of the whole Central American wheel—politically, commercially, militarily.

On a sizzling day of last June I crossed the Gulf of Fonseca in a launch—mile after mile of glistening calm water surrounded by virginal forests and jagged purple mountains, and dotted with islands, one of the magnificent harbors of the world, beautiful as San Francisco, Guaymas, or Naples, with room for the combined navies of all the Powers. Beyond La Union in El Salvador towers the cone of Conchagua at the harbor entrance, a peak which E. G. Squier, American Minister to Honduras, climbed back in 1850 when there was no scientific map in existence, to satisfy himself, by the open vista he thus gained, that a trans-oceanic railway was feasible. The Gulf of Fonseca is one of the choice fruits of empire.

For these and other reasons Nicaragua, one of the cross-roads of the New World, has been, since the earliest times, the scene of bitter conflict. And because of Nicaragua's proximity to Panama, because of its potential waterway, because of the key positions of the Gulf of Fonseca and of the Great and Little Corn Islands, the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty was put across with the help of the hireling government of Adolfo Diaz, held in power by American marines. Greater than the rights of Nicaragua in the Gulf of Fonseca are those of Honduras and Salvador, both of which vigorously protested the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty, claiming that it violated their own rights and the 1907 treaties. The matter was carried to the Central American Court of Justice (a pro-peace body created by the United States Government), which ruled against the treaty—a decision which both the United States and Nicaragua ignored. The court was thus smashed.

Followed more treaties and loans: 1918, High Commission of the Republic of Nicaragua (one Nicaraguan, two Americans) to supervise expenditures; 1920, the Brown-Seligman $9,000,000 loan; 1921, a revolt against this loan, put down by guns and ammunition supplied from the United States; 1921-1922, repeated clashes between Nicaraguans and American marines; 1924, the coalition Liberal-Conservative Government of Solorzano and Sacasa, and the beginning of financial emancipation; 1925, American marines withdrawn, but the Nicaraguan forces placed under the unitary command of American officers; October, 1925, cuartelazo by Emiliano Chamorro against the too-liberal Solorzano; January, 1926, Chamorro assumes the Presidency, exiles Sacasa; then, the Liberal revolt under Sacasa and the futile Conservative-Liberal parleys on the U. S. S. Denver, presided over by the American Minister.

III

Enter Mexico. Mexico has been seeking the leadership of Central America—through careful selection of diplomatic representatives, gifts of airplanes, libraries, wireless stations, scholarships; the sending of labor organizers, theatrical troupes, lecturers; the promotion of international sport and literary and cultural unions; the arranging of special tours to Mexico City; newspaper subsidies and a semi-official news service, "Ariel"; improving communications, rail, cable, wireless, subsidized steamships, and cooperating in mutual difficulties such as the locust plague; offers of financial assistance and the active support of friendly Liberal governments. This is part of a large program of cultural rapprochement, a move toward the unification of the entire Latin-American cultural race-bloc, a move of which Mexico temporarily, perhaps permanently, is the spokesman, the prime mover, and the leader. To such unification and to governments friendly to Mexico the United States, for obvious reasons, is opposed.

There is plenty of evidence that Mexico, in the case of Nicaragua, has not been content to play a merely passive role, but has followed the American tactic of financial and material assistance to the side that it favors. Mexico was exceedingly friendly to the Solorzano-Sacasa Government; I have heard Mexican officials boast: "We put it into power." Mexico desires to see the Liberal constitutional regime reestablished under Sacasa. Expeditions from both coasts of Mexico have landed arms and munitions in Nicaragua. American aviators in the pay of Chamorro bombarded such shipments. (Incidentally, they were not threatened by our State Department with loss of citizenship, as were similar adventurers in Morocco.)

Chamorro, aware of these Mexican activities, sent a protest to the League of Nations. Sir Eric Drummond, Secretary of the League, transmitted the communication to Mexico. Sacasa protested to the League against such unwarranted recognition of the Chamorro dictatorship, citing violation of the 1923 Washington treaties (which have since proved his undoing), and denying Mexican aid.

A clever move, this, on the part of Chamorro, nor displeasing to Washington. It made it possible to flaunt the Monroe Doctrine, emphasize our sacred right to control the Western Hemisphere, and to settle Nicaragua's internal affairs promptly. The United States press blared that Mexico was carrying communism to Nicaragua and Central America and overthrowing popular government, that with Sacasa's aid it planned to set up Liberal (alias Labor, alias Communist) governments all the way to Panama, thus thwarting the sacred will of the people.

IV

Sacasa, even with Mexican aid, is more "constitutional" than American-propped Diaz, yet he, in turn, is dyed with the traditional Nicaraguan governing practices. Central American governments are still patterned after the old Spanish vice-regal regimes; they are still, in spirit, colonial fiefs, ruled by a number of bitterly contentious, semi-Creole families, whose heads are alternately in power or in exile, fighting to grab the lion's share of the spoils. In the last century one faction has gained its support by catering to American imperial interests, the other by catering to the growing nationalist, racial, and anti-clerical sentiments.

One can hardly blame the bankers for wanting guaranties for loans to these belated condottieri; one can accuse them of playing in cahoots with such condottieri with callous indifference toward popular and national needs; one can charge them with manipulation of our State Department. The treaty-loan system, as at present invoked, continues a vicious semi-feudal type of irresponsible government over peoples too weak to protest, peoples which under the most favorable circumstances would find the road to democratic expression thorny with difficulties. It corrupts governments, raises up unscrupulous dictators and demagogues, creates intolerable popular burdens, brings about protective raids on our own Treasury, and, for the sake of a few financial groups, jeopardizes our cordial relations with the entire Latin-American world.

These Modern Women

Mother's Daughter

ANONYMOUS

A METHODIST preacher smote the cheek of his presiding elder several years before I was born. After that my father's preaching terminated abruptly.

It was about my mother's right to be herself. The Methodist brethren wanted to force my mother into the Methodist church, an intimidation to which my father would not or could not be a party.

They met about 1870 when she was 18 and he was 29. She was teaching, and had been teaching for four years, in a little town near the mouth of the Ohio River. He came from a nearby State to teach in the same school. Girls usually married early in those days, when they had a chance, but my mother temporized about marriage for five years, teaching all the while. She married at 23, and continued to teach. Wherever the church sent my father, she taught. She was not a Methodist, but they worked together constantly; she went with him into the work of church and schoolroom, into his Sunday schools, into his mission. She may have helped him with his sermons. But she did not join his church.

Eventually they found themselves in a rabidly intolerant Southern Methodist community. Here my mother was baited and harassed because of her adherence to her good old Baptist faith. Then, too, children came, and it was doubtless embarrassing to the Methodist brethren to have their own minister's babies crawl around unsprinkled and to have their own minister's wife avoid partaking of the Methodist communion. One thing led to another and to the final break. Of course father might have asserted himself more. He might have slapped his wife rather than his presiding elder and thus held on to his frock. He did none of these things.

So Methodist and Baptist they remained, but outside of the ministry. They were Democrats, too, and consistent in a moderate Southernism. He was the son of a slaveholding planter who had lost everything in the war. She was from "immigrant" non-slaveholding stock, with little to lose. We were poor. Life was a struggle and religion a comfort. My parents believed in God, of course—the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost—and in the Resurrection Day. Nevertheless, during the six years I knew my father, I heard him swear occasionally. He indulged in tobacco, and now and then a toddy. My mother tried to teach me the steps of the dances of her girlhood. She and my father had attended opera in New Orleans. I heard him say I might become an opera singer if I held my lung-power—perhaps a Jenny Lind. One of my brothers was permitted to have a deck of cards. Checkers and parchesi and dominoes were not denied us—even on Sunday. A collection of Arabian Nights tales was in our book-case and I read it early and had the stories told me at an even more tender age. There were also Shakespeare, Carlyle, Tom Paine, Victor Hugo, and George Eliot—who, my mother told me, "was really a woman named Mary Ann Evans."

My mother drew few distinctions between her boys and girls. I have seen my brothers sweep, wipe dishes, and even cook. I had four brothers, three older and one younger. The attitude of my older brothers was friendly rather than merely protective. I followed them around, but not everywhere—not to school nor to "town" nor hunting nor fishing. But I was permitted to "help" load shells, dig worms, and make kites. I imitated them and was applauded. I learned to turn somersaults, "skin the cat," and stand on my head. I knew these things were not for public exhibition, but I do not remember who told me so or what reasons were given. By the time I was nine or ten years old I had developed into something of a tomboy. Then one of my brothers died and the other two went away.

My younger brother was frail, sensitive, and imaginative. As he was almost four years younger and not as strong and healthy as I was, my relations with him were almost the reverse of my relations with my older brothers. So I was not subdued. Perhaps I was trying to be to him what they had been to me. I became even more tomboyish and finally assumed an active physical superiority over my younger brother and over my sister, who was bookish. If they excelled me in some things, I knew where I could excel. I ran, jumped, climbed, and, not infrequently, fought.

The town in which we lived was new and on a new railroad. My father surveyed the site, but the town straggled along rather whimsically without regard to his plans. Our house stood near the center—on my father's map; but, as a matter of fact, it stood in the twilight zone between the main town and the Negro settlement known as "Jaybird." What had been planned as the street in front of the house became a yellow line of mud or dust with a plank walk on one side, leading to the road which was the beginning of Main Street. So, while a part of the town, we were isolated. If I sought playmates outside of my family I usually had to go across town to them or induce them to come across town to me. I played with both boys and girls. One of my playmates was the grandson of a neighbor. I did not realize that he was stupid as long as we were just playing. When I saw him at school I became ashamed of him, because he could not learn. So much of my study had been done at home that I had had little opportunity to make comparisons, but at school I looked about me, at playmates, classmates, and then at my books. I discovered that there were degrees of intelligence lower than my own. The tomboy began to recede and the star-pupil to emerge.

After my older brothers left home most of the out-of-door chores fell to me. I brought in the wood and coal, carried water from the well, cut the kindling, made the fires, and ran errands. I also learned to cook such simple food as we had. I went barefoot through the hot months. My mother had rather large feet and wore shoes to fit them. She talked about the foolishness of women who bound their feet and waists. She wore corsets occasionally, but she often tried to avoid them by sewing stays into her basques. She was slender. When I grew to the corset age she ordered a "corset waist." I wore it loose—and I was then fat. I have never classed my mother as a feminist, but I suspect she was one. Life would have made her one in the end if she had not been in the beginning. After my father's death she faced the necessity of supporting a large family —six of us—in a town of less than a thousand population. She taught and gave music lessons—"piano and voice." She sent local items to newspapers in nearby cities. She peddled pianos and sometimes books. Between these activities she supervised our studies, our reading, our behavior, our work; nursed her neighbors, laid out their dead, helped their children with their school essays, and was kind to the Negroes who lived in the little huts nearby. When the children of these Negroes showed a craving for "book-larnin'" as they sometimes did, she taught them. In her narrow, almost primitive field, she held her position as an unusual, if sometimes a troublesome, woman—always tolerated and sometimes acclaimed.

I am sure that there were times when my mother did not know whence the next week's food would come. One can understand how this struggle would have affected her attitude toward her daughters, even if her previous life had not shown her aversion to dependency. She fed our ambitions. She would have wanted us to go to college and to get degrees had she lived and been able to manage. A normal school was established in our town and people came to it from the swamps around and the farther hills. It was run by the Campbellites—calling themselves "Christians." Each year this school held debates on the relative mental equipment of men and women. The debates usually lasted for a week and practically the whole student body took part. I managed to get into them in some way, if only by trying to help the other girls meet the onslaught of historical data. No feminist literature was available. We got our nitrogen out of the air.

I do not remember that I was a conscious feminist until long after my mother's death. As a child and a girl I simply lived as an individual with little knowledge of the world and its poison of sex-antagonism. I left school at fourteen, because of my mother's illness. When she died I had hardly emerged from childhood, and girlhood was all but dissolved in the emotional reaction from her death and the necessity that drove me forth. I went to work very soon, in order that I might eat. This much the world was willing that I do—if not too heartily or too fastidiously.

In the South innumerable families were in economic distress; and, underneath the social traditions, there was an almost clannish effort to regain economic power without sacrificing pride or prestige in the struggle. Women had their part to play in the scheme. "Ladies" went to work—at home if they could, or at "genteel" work on the outside. One might be pitied, but if one "belonged" one could join the ranks of genteel workers temporarily without suffering social stigma. Meanwhile the conventional feminine tradition remained undisturbed. This social-psychological [illegible] to the early transition period, although it still hangs on here and there. One met it only where one was known. As time went on and the straitened ones got back on their economic feet, there was a change, a reaction. Lines were again drawn taut.

My childhood was not such as to give me a snob's viewpoint. I had always understood that if I went to a certain distant county where my grandfather had worked his slaves, I would "belong." But I did not go, except to visit. And I ignored the "genteel" 'imitations that would have preserved my status as a "lady." I studied stenography. For two years I worked with a company that manufactured articles of iron and steel and wood. There were machine shops, foundries, a carpenter's shop, and a place where pneumatic tools were turned against rivets. I wrote specifications—long lists of strange words. I studied catalogues to try to see what the words meant. I begged the foremen to take me through the shops. My interest was a nuisance and treated as such, although the interest of the office boy was encouraged as a laudable ambition to "learn the business." I was not there to learn the business but to type things. I asked my employer if he thought it would help me to take a correspondence course in mechanical engineering. He gave me a fatherly lecture on woman's sphere in life, her place in the business world.

I pointed my pencil toward the courthouse and became a "crack" court reporter. I was flattered by my lawyer friends as the wonder of the verbatim-shorthand world. I saved them a lot of work. But when I began to talk of studying law, they called me impractical and visionary. It was about time I was getting married, anyhow. I observed that young men were encouraged to "read." They were taken into offices, into the trial of cases, sponsored, even fed, sometimes, by the older members of the bar; and the banks would extend them credit while they were struggling. I had one friend more sympathetic than others, a judge who put his hand on the political wheel and turned it in my favor. He said to me: "Senator So-and-So says I can name his secretary and I am going to suggest you, so you can go to Washington and maybe find time to study law." The next day he came back. "They just would not stand for a woman; I could not make them see it." It was years before I studied law, years before I got to Washington, years before I saw a Senator's office. It wasn't much to see, when I reached there.

During my twelve years as a court reporter I saw many aspects of life that provided good training for a feminist. I heard some of the worst sex abnormalities defined and described; I heard dramatic stories of frustrations and misunderstandings. I saw the results in human terms of the legal disabilities of women. I turned to reading and encountered Ibsen, Shelley—and whom else? I remember a book by Bouck White, "The Call of the Carpenter," a revolutionary-Christian-feminist document—if one be in the mood to take the whole dose. I was in the mood at that time. Then one day I fell into an argument about suffrage. I found that almost unaware I had committed myself. I became a suffragist, an active one, finally a militant one. As I plunged deeper in the suffrage fight, I had to marshal all my defenses. Prejudices were strong. I fared better than some of my associates by virtue of the strength gained from my single-handed grappling with life. Men would sometimes say, "If all women were like you," and I had to learn to dismiss the flattery.

I have not married. I have had my chances—one of the first being a station agent who insisted on "giving me a home." I suspected that he needed assistance in checking freight bills at the depot. I have also had my disappointments—one especially. He is still singing in the choir and is president of a Kiwanis Club. Without regard to my register of eligibles, I believe I could not now be induced to enter into the present legal status of marriage. Perhaps the day will come when I shall make my peace with the conventions, submit to the law through a justice of the peace or even a bishop, and get married. I doubt it. Marriage is too much of a compromise; it lops off a woman's life as an individual. Yet the renunciation too is a lopping off. We choose between the frying-pan and the fire—both very uncomfortable.

The Nationalists Take Wuchang

By ANNA ROCHESTER

Wuchang, China, October 14

WUCHANG is wearing a festal air. On October 10, the fifteenth anniversary of the Chinese Republic, the forty-day siege was broken. But there is much more than relief from hunger and terror in the air today. The Kuomintang [Nationalist Party] administration is giving the people a fresh and invigorating experience. Even critical foreigners who expect little from Chinese are admitting that a new era seems to have begun.

The siege was no child's play for either Chinese or foreigners within the city. The day it was broken, the Merchants Guild placarded the streets with posters, "Tear down the city walls or we close our shops." And as soon as they can decide on the best disposition of the bricks in the wall—which are too large for the usual style of building—the walls of Wuchang will come down.

Food had run short. One of our foreign friends who shared in the siege told of seeing an educated Chinese pay forty cash for one raisin. Dog meat is not a usual part of the Chinese diet, but all the dogs which usually clutter the streets of Wuchang were eaten during the siege. Even the foreigners with their storerooms of beans, macaroni, and canned goods had used up their supplies and showed the marks of hunger when we came to Wuchang a week after the opening of the city.

Chinese and foreigners wrestled hopelessly with the problem of cleanliness. Wuchang still depends on the daily carrying of human offal in buckets from the city to the fields outside. Cholera developed; flies multiplied. It is only extraordinary that the epidemic did not get beyond control; how many cases there were no one knows. All the foreigners, at least, escaped it.

The moment the siege was lifted, the Chinese Red Cross of Hankow came across the river; foreign doctors told us enthusiastically about their effective work. It was the Red Cross and other Chinese benevolent organizations which, during the siege, transported 60,000 women and children from Wuchang to Hankow and Hanyang. Two or three leading missionaries helped in the negotiations which finally, on several successive mornings, opened the gates and cleared the river for refugees; but the work was carried out entirely by Chinese organizations. One foreign eyewitness told us with a rather surprised appreciation that official families and the well-to-do were conspicuously absent from the crowds which escaped. The blind and the beggars led the procession; then, day after day, it was women and children first. Twice the crowd became a mob beyond control, and men pushed and trampled ruthlessly; but considering the total numbers handled the casualties were few. No foreign women who could be of service and no foreign men left their posts within the city.

In the revolution of 1911 Wuchang was one great center of conflict, and most of the time since then the city has suffered much from undisciplined soldiers. Civil freedom has been unknown. The Kuomintang had been at work here underground, and the students and a handful of others were enthusiastic about the approach of the Southern Army. But most of the people feared that the inrush of victorious soldiers would mean a fresh onslaught of looting and terror. During the siege the private looting by the Northern soldiers within the city did more serious damage to property and gave the people far more concern than the shelling which the attacking army aimed at forts and barracks and generals' headquarters.

When the peace negotiations were completed—again with the help of an American bishop who, with a Chinese leader of the Merchants' Guild, was let down over the wall by a rope—the Northern soldiers rushed out and, after a brief interval, a small orderly troop of Southerners marched in. Once the Southern army was in full control, the pressure of years was released. The soldiers walked about unarmed, paying good money for purchases at the shops. An officer crossing the river on the public launch fell into talk with an American missionary. He asked the American what the fare was on the boats and was getting out his coppers to pay. The boatman said that soldiers never paid and refused to take the money. The officer explained that they had the strictest orders to take nothing without payment. Those who had witnessed the behavior of the Northern troops in Wuchang—or in Peking—considered this of revolutionary significance.

The city was immediately placarded with posters. A few had pictures obvious to the illiterate. A few were virtually leaflets in poster form. Most of them were short sentences in large clear Chinese character: "Do not fear death; love the nation. Do not love money; love the people." "Abolish the evil that oppresses women—unequal evil institutions." "Severely forbid opium." "Reform the city government." "Women should have the right to inherit property." "Forbid betrothal and marriage of small boys and young girls. Abolish barter in marriage." "Earnestly practice education in Kuomintang culture and principles." "The people should vigorously protect the new constructive government of Hupeh." "Punish those who are near to the enemy." "Get revenge for fellow-countrymen killed in Wanhsien." "Wipe out anti-revolutionists."

Sun Yat-sen's last book, the "San Min Chu I," or the "Three People's Principles," is the Bible of the army. One wounded Southern soldier—not an officer—was being tended by an American nurse; when the dressings were finished he pulled out his copy of the "San Min Chu I" to see what a victorious soldier in a new city was supposed to do! Of course the volume is not a manual of behavior but an exposition in terms of China's needs today of the three great words of the French Revolution: Min Ts'eo: the people's nation, equality of races; Min Ts'uan: the people's power, or democracy and freedom; Min Sen: the people's life, including industrial justice.

Almost immediately the new administration ordered that all schools within the city and outside the walls which had been commandeered for troops of either side should be cleared and prepared for use. So far they are showing friendliness to the American mission schools, provided they introduce the salute to Sun Yat-sen and the weekly reading of his last will and testament. The one tax levied thus far is directed at the owners of land or buildings. The army has collected a month's rent from all tenants with the understanding that the landlord must accept the army's receipt in lieu of the tenant's next monthly payment to him. The army is now evaluating the property occupied by owners and is demanding from such owners the equivalent of one month's rent.

For the immediate future of the Kuomintang and for the future of China the possession of Wuchang, Hankow, and Hanyang by the Southern forces is immensely important. Through it they control the strategical center of China: the head of navigation for ocean-going steamers on the Yangtze, the gateway for smaller steamers to the interior, the southern terminus of the Peking-Hankow railway line and the northern terminus of the partly completed Wuchang-Canton lines. The biggest iron and steel works in China are at Hanyang and Hankow, and the fighting south of the Yangtze and east of Wuchang, which still continues as I write, involves control of the Tayeh iron mines and the Pinksiang coal mines, the largest in central China.

Labor organization is now brought into the greatest inland industrial center of China. The quiet pioneering which had been continuing under the surface since Wu Pei-fu executed labor leaders en masse four years ago now comes out into the open. The six thousand organized ricksha coolies of Hankow held a great demonstration two weeks ago, parading and for one day refusing to pull. The cotton-mill workers in Wuchang have registered a claim for wages during the forty days of the siege when the mills (all outside the city walls) were of necessity closed. Within the Kuomintang a conflict of policy has already developed in the Wu-han cities between the Communist and the non-Communist labor leaders. At present the Communist labor leaders seem to be in favor with the administration, but there is opposition and shifts in policy may well occur.

The immediate future of the Kuomintang is beset with perils. The army is far from its home base, and continuing good-will of the people in the new provinces and cities is vitally necessary to any permanent stability. With the victorious advance of the Southerners military chieftains who care nothing about the principles of the Kuomintang have insisted on lining themselves up with what appears to be the winning side. The People's Revolutionary Army may end by wishing to be delivered from its friends.

Again, will the well-to-do responsible Chinese of the Wu-han cities be content with the Kuomintang? At present they are ready to give it a chance to show what it can do. As a leading Chinese attorney of Hankow put it: "This is the first time we have had a party in this province which seems to be seriously concerned with principles and good government. And we certainly agree with their stand against unequal treaties." But this same attorney told me his view of the British-American tobacco strike last spring. It is a very real question whether the common ground which this gentleman and hundreds of other Chinese business men now share with the Kuomintang will hold firm as the implications of pro-labor party, whether Communist or otherwise, are worked out by that party.

Meanwhile the big guns on Hanyang hill are silently trained on the British concession in Hankow, and thirteen gunboats of the United States, Great Britain, Japan, France, and Italy line the shores of the foreign settlements. The anti-imperialist demands of the Kuomintang are somewhat in abeyance while their civil war continues. But as soon as the military position of the Southern Government is strengthened, they tell us frankly that their demand for abrogation of the unequal treaties will be set forth as an ultimatum to the Powers.

Four more

Nation Dinners

If you missed hearing the debate between Clarence Darrow and Major Wright on Prohibition Enforcement, we offer our condolences and at the same time urge you to make reservations now for the dinners which remain.

A series ticket insures a favorable position at all dinners.

January 11

"CENSOR THE STAGE?"

Elisabeth Marbury, Joseph Wood Krutch
Frank Gillmore

Executive Secretary, The Actors' Equity Association

Chairman: Lewis S. Gannett, Associate Editor, The Nation

February 15

"MEN—WHAT OF 'EM?"

Ruth Hale, Lorine Pruette

Chairman: Freda Kirchwey, Managing Editor, The Nation

March 8

Songs and Dances by American Indians
Speakers to be announced on
"THE ART OF THE AMERICAN INDIAN"

Chairman: Mark Van Doren, Literary Editor, The Nation

April 12

"WHO IS CALVIN COOLIDGE?"

Frank R. Kent, William Hard

Chairman: Oswald Garrison Villard, Editor, The Nation

ALL DINNERS WILL BE HELD AT THE FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE, AT 7 P. M.

$2.75 per plate. $10 for the series of four.

Tickets may be bought only by Nation subscribers, although each subscriber may bring as many guests as he wishes.

—If you are not a Subscriber—

You may have The Nation for a year (regular price $5) with a ticket for the first dinner for $6.25, or with a ticket for the four dinners for $14.00.

The Nation
20 Vesey Street, New York
Send me The Nation for a year
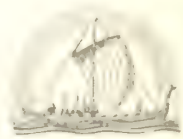
Reserve ..... places for me at
The dinner on ..... ☐
The Series ☐

Name .....

Address .....

Tickets will be mailed a few days before the dinner.



The Unimpeachable Gift

VIKING BOOKS — for more than a season

3 discoveries from 3 countries

POWER
by Lion Feuchtwanger

From Germany comes "one of the great romances of the twentieth century."—The Literary Review. $2.50.

THE TWO SISTERS
by H. E. Bates

From England comes this novel of youth by a twenty-one year old author—the discovery of Edward Garnett, discoverer of Conrad, Galsworthy and W. H. Hudson. $2.00.

THE TIME OF MAN
by Elizabeth Madox Roberts

In America Elizabeth Madox Roberts "steps with her first novel to the front rank of American writers." A Book-of-the-Month Club Selection. 47th Thousand. $2.50.

MOHAMMED
by R. F. Dibble

The story of the prophet, politician, lover, warrior and man. Carl Van Doren in The Nation says: "This gorgeous story Mr. Dibble has [illegible]" $3.00.

GAUTIER
by John Garber Palache

An informative and entertaining volume on Gautier, Balzac, Baudelaire, and other of Gautier's circle, combining biography, anecdote and criticism. Illustrated. $3.00.

The SECOND BOOK of NEGRO SPIRITUALS

Carl Van Vechten in The Herald Tribune: "I predict that this new collection will be just as popular as the first, and deservedly so." With 61 songs and an introduction. $3.50.

30 Irving Place THE VIKING PRESS New York City

ARETINO

Translated by* PUTNAM

IN TWO VOLUMES PRICE $17.50

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY

BROKEN NECKS

by* BEN HECHT

THROBBING HUMAN STORIES

PRICE $2.50

PASCAL COVICI - Publisher - CHICAGO

THE MODERN LIBRARY

REVIVES

ANDREAS LATZKO'S

MEN IN WAR

A BOLD, BLAZING BOOK, FROWNED ON IN 1917 BY A GOVERNMENT THAT WAS BUSY LADLING SENTIMENTAL SLOP ABOUT THE WAR TO THE PUBLIC, NOW OFFERED AGAIN COMPLETE AND UNEXPURGATED

OTHER RECENT ADDITIONS

JAMES JOYCE'S DUBLINERS

GEORGE GISSING'S NEW GRUB STREET

LUDWIG LEWISOHN'S UP STREAM

DANIEL DEFOE'S MOLL FLANDERS

95 CENTS A COPY

AT ALL BOOKSTORES

Send for Catalogue of the 125 Titles

MODERN LIBRARY, Inc., 71 West 45th Street NEW YORK

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

The Unimp

A Perfect Christmas Gift

EVERYBODY'S PEPYS

...a time the standard ...

60 pages of illustrations
by E. H. Shepard

...Whether he is shown sitting, outwardly decorous, at ... with his wife and a dish of ... on the ... before, he is the very, the living Pepys that we know and love.
—N. Y. Herald Tribune

At bookstores or from the publishers
$3.50

Harcourt, Brace & Co., 383 Madison Ave., New York

The Monumental Masterpiece whic...

LOVE-LIFE

by Wil...

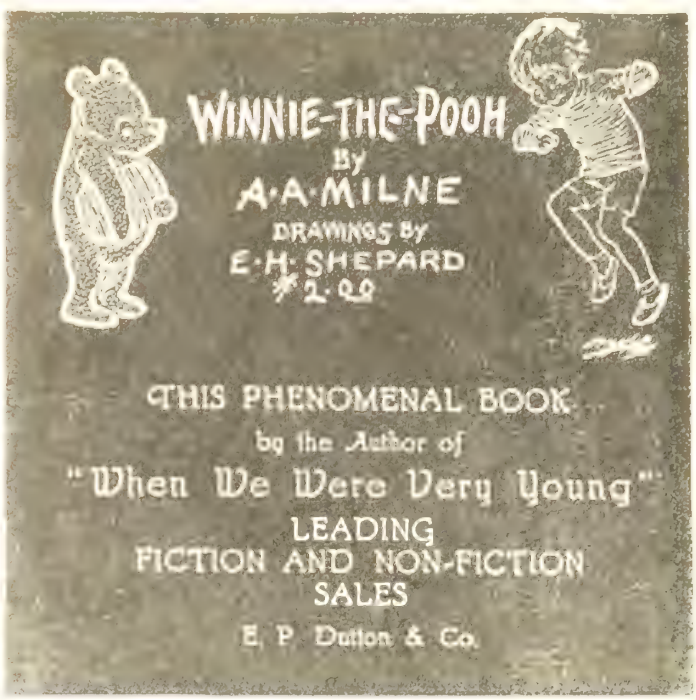
"UNDOUBTEDLY a great work. Here ... Lucretius, Spinoza, Goethe, Schopenha...

ALBERT & CHARLES BONI, - -

EUROPE SINCE WATERLOO

By WILLIAM STEARNS DAVIS

A TREMENDOUS panoramic history of a century of great events, from Napoleon and the Holy Alliance to Hindenburg and the League of Nations. History told with color and drama and suspense, in a vigorous marching style.



Dr. Davis's ROOTS OF THE WAR has been one of the most widely read non-fiction books of many years. In it he disclosed a rare coordination of scholarly authority with pictorial imagination. He revivifies history. He makes it live—as history did live while it was being enacted.

EUROPE SINCE WATERLOO is built around great men and great events, rather than vague, imponderable "forces" which have no actuality. Through more than nine hundred pages the tremendous story moves forward, a pageant of kings and conquistadores, of politicians, plunderers and patriots, of schemers and dreamers who moved the fates of nations.

Illustrated and maps, index, bibliography.
Royal octavo, 965 pages, $6.00.

THE CENTURY CO., Publishers of Enduring Books

Christopher Robin Plays Again!

ISRAFEL: The Life ...

This mighty two volume biography "imm... biographies . . . Mr. Allen brings his wo... achievements that defy succession."

by HERV...

960 pages Two vo...

DORAN BOOKS George H. ...

chable Gift

over 150,000 copies in Germany

N NATURE

ölsche

over whose composition the spirits of Plato, arwin must have presided."—The Nation.

Two volumes, boxed, $10.00

- - 66 Fifth Avenue, New York

Sherwood Anderson

America's most distinctive novelist. One of the most original novelists ever heard of. He seems to derive from no one and to have no relation to any contemporary."—H. L. Mencken in Vanity Fair.

TAR

A Midwest Childhood

by SHERWOOD ANDERSON

"When one decides, as any reasonable person must decide, that so far as writers of fiction under fifty years of age are concerned the United States makes an immensely better showing than England, Sherwood Anderson undoubtedly plays a great part in that calculation."—Rebecca West, N. Y. Herald Tribune.

"Sufficient in itself to vindicate his uniqueness of being and his importance as a commentator on American life. TAR is all the lonely boys in small Middle-West towns during the last half of the nineteenth century."—Herbert S. Gorman, N. Y. Times Book Review. 2nd Edition. Large 12mo. $3.00. Limited autographed edition, 325 copies, $10.00.

B&L

GOOD BOOKS

BONI AND LIVERIGHT, N. Y.

B&L

imes of Edgar Allan Poe takes precedence in the long list of Poe's that category of decisive and definitive Herbert Gorman in The New York Times.

ALLEN

Boxed Net, $10.00

Company BONI & LIVERIGHT

"Belongs to all time"

FORTY IMMORTALS

by BENJAMIN DeCASSERES

The Story of the World's Great Civilizers

Fascinating, dazzling, brilliant, creative essays on the foremost writers of modern times, including Nietzsche, Whitman, Maeterlinck, Blake, Strindberg, Hugo, Ibsen, France, Stendhal, Flaubert, Hardy, Cabell, D'Annunzio, de Gourmont, Saltus and others.

What "The Story of Philosophy" by Will Durant is to the history of thinking, "Forty Immortals" is to the history of fine writing. No other American writer is as intimately acquainted personally with the inner workings of the minds of the world's greatest litterateurs.

H. L. Mencken writes: "Unhackneyed, brilliant . . ."

New York Times declares: "Benjamin DeCasseres in 'Forty Immortals' comes nearer to achieving the purpose of constructive criticism than

$3.50 at all bookstores.

SEVEN ARTS

PUBLISHING COMPANY

160 Fifth Avenue, New York

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

THE FIRST CIVILIZED AMERICAN

By Phillips Russell

"One of the greatest biographies of our time." [N. Y. Eve. Post]

"A great kick is given to history by defablyizing Franklin." [Richmond News Dispatch]

"The book is as lively and charming as the man it depicts." [Chicago Daily News]

"The most brilliant biography of the year." [Philadelphia Record]

THE PERFECT CHRISTMAS GIFT FOR FIVE DOLLARS

At All Bookstores or from the

Publishers - BRENTANO'S - New York

In the Driftway

LEST readers miss the delightful controversy that has been going on in the correspondence columns of the New York World in regard to seagoing cows, the Drifter brings it to their attention. The correspondence began with a letter signed "(Miss) P. Chattahoochee Fink, Secretary, International Dry Travel League," in which the writer protested because instead of traveling on American steamships officials of the United States Government chose foreign vessels "with their bars and cigarette-smoking, cocktail-drinking men and women and sometimes almost children, so far as age and appearance go." The writer continued:

> It was only the other day that I asked a prominent government official whom I happened to meet one evening in the home of a dear friend why he went to Europe and back this summer on an English vessel instead of sailing under the glorious Star Spangled Banner which paid him his salary, and he told me that it was on account of the milk, he being on a milk diet, or partly so, by doctor's orders. All of the ocean ships, he said, excepting the American ones, had live cows on them to supply fresh milk three times daily, for, as he explained, they have to milk them three times every day instead of twice, because cows produce milk more rapidly on the water than on land. It seemed strange to me that the foreign ships should do this and the Americans not, until I was told by a sailor of whom I made inquiries that it was because several of the sailors on the American ships had been hooked by the cows, so they thought it best to get rid of them to avoid accident. Surely, Mr. Editor, that dilemma could be evaded by using hornless cows, and I am surprised that the managers of our boats have not thought of it.

* * * * *

SOMEBODY had been spoofing the writer, it would seem, or else she was trifling with the readers of the World. Several of them were curious enough to make investigations, and one reported that an official of the Cunard Line had told him: "Boats nowadays keep all supplies fresh and palatable by properly regulated refrigeration." A representative of the White Star Line had said: "Boats haven't carried cows in fifty years; not since the days of the side-wheeler."

* * * * *

BUT the marine cow is not to be disposed of so easily. She still exists elsewhere than in history or aquariums. It is true that she no longer grazes along the North Atlantic lanes between the United States and Europe, and English steamships on all routes probably threw their last cows overboard many years ago. Milk, when properly pasteurized and carried in a refrigerator, keeps from three to four weeks. Even so, Italian and French steamships on South American runs or other routes where it is difficult to obtain dependable supplies not only often carry cows for milk but also live cattle and other animals sufficient to assure their passengers a diet of fresh meat. This is in deference to the general objection of the Latin peoples of Europe or elsewhere to frozen or chilled meat and their insistence, ashore or afloat, on fresh-killed products. Not only marine cows but seagoing sheep and chickens still ship before the mast.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

More Work for Cal

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: L. H. J.'s suggestion that we readers of The Nation contribute to a campaign fund to boom Mr. Coolidge for Mayor of Northampton in 1928 is unnecessary. Mr. Coolidge at present is not only President of the United States; he is also Honorary President of the Boy Scouts of America. He can retain that office, and I believe the citizens of Northampton will prefer to have him continue with the Scouts.

Brooklyn, November 22 D. G. B.

Speak Up!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: For four or five years there has been general discussion in the press of the United States as to the success or failure of that form of government now in vogue in Russia. Recently, many articles have appeared strongly pro-Soviet in character. Why not put to the test the sincerity of those who advocate the Russian regime? Is any reader of The Nation willing to renounce citizenship in our "capitalistic state," go to Russia, and reside there permanently? Replies may be sent to

Andover, Mass., November 25 W. K. MOOREHEAD

Solving the Slums

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Many scoffers deride the plan recently presented by Mr. August Heckscher.

As an object-lesson of what Mr. Heckscher is trying to abolish I suggest that in each case where a criminal is arrested there be published, instead of his revolver, sweetheart, or captor, a picture of the room in the tenement in which he was born.

This may go a long way toward convincing the doubtful that the Heckscher scheme is in reality an investment in futures.

New York, December 1 W. FREDERICK SUENDER

Max Eastman and Mr. Ochs's Money

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I have space in your columns to tell my political friends in America that the money paid by the New York Times and other papers for my article quoting Lenin's testament was not appropriated by me? It was expended by well-known Communists in the interest of the movement.

Antibes, France, November 16 MAX EASTMAN

Don't Kiss! Don't Shake! Don't Breathe!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your comment on the hygienists' prohibition-spirit and meddling-complex as regards kissing and handshaking is very timely, as there are so many people with colds these days. There is no doubt that a person with a cold can by ordinary breathing infect Petri culture-dishes several feet away; much more dangerous is the possibility of people breathing his germs when he is speaking to them.

A logical extension of our fix-it friends' principles leads us to the conclusion that the only thing to do is to stop breathing. At least everyone ought to wear a gas mask, and communicate with others by a telephonic hearing device.

New York, December 1 J. L. MORRISON

Books and Plays

Copyreader

By TED OLSON

This, then, had been his destiny from birth—
To desiccate life's pageant to a phra[illegible]
Pity and terror, hunger, madness, mirth
Congealed in "Man Shoots Five in Murder Craze."
He'd written poems once. He wrote no more.
His wits had chilled in stereotypes too long
To kindle now one glittering metaphor.
His pulse kept time to headlines, not to song.
It was a sorry business, none knew better,
And there were moments he was more than half
Persuaded to shrug loose the ultimate fetter . . . .
Save that he knew too well his epitaph,
And somehow could not stomach quite the crass
Brutality of "Scribe Ends Life with Gas."

First Glance

WE have had a good many books about Walt Whitman since Whitman himself wrote half of the first one. There have been four within the past few months, and undoubtedly many are yet to come. What is to be learned from the best possible volume upon the subject? I am interested in the question not only because I am interested in good biography and criticism but also because I once seriously considered a request that I too write a book about Whitman. Among other things I sought then a definition of the perfect Whitman book—perfect, at any rate, for this day. And I was particularly careful to enumerate the things which the author should not attempt to do, either because they had been done once for all or because they cannot be done. The number of these things grew so large that I decided to let "Leaves of Grass" alone. Perhaps it is the perfect Whitman book.

One of the things that do not need to be accomplished again is the defense of Whitman's right to say what he liked in the manner he liked. That he died and that his book lived is sufficient proof that nothing more needs to be said there. William Sloane Kennedy, who writes the history of the controversy in "The Fight of a Book for the World" (West Yarmouth, Massachusetts: The Stonecroft Press: $2.50), lessens his usefulness to other historians by getting excited. The result of his excitement—in itself, it may be, a chivalrous and excellent thing—is a great lack of order in the presentation of his material, and hence a decided failure on the part of this material to take effect. There is a great deal of it, since Mr. Kennedy, once a correspondent of Whitman's, has long been a collector of opinions for and against him, and has long studied "Leaves of Grass" with an absolute devotion. But the material lies here in most hopeless confusion, and furthermore the book is rendered ridiculous by Mr. Kennedy's perpetual jealous fear lest any possible reader in the world still be indifferent to the hero of Brooklyn and Camden.

One of the things that, in my opinion, may never be accomplished is the biography of Whitman—so long, at any rate, as biography means more than "facts." Mr. Emory Holloway, who has made himself the authority [illegible] his "Whitman: An Interpretation in Narrative" (Knopf: [illegible] just how feeble all facts are when the problem arises of explaining a poet. Mr. Holloway remarks that he was able to put into his large volume only a portion of the information of which he is master. But more would have been worse; these things do not matter. The only fact about Whitman about which I care much up any curiosity is the fact of his suddenly breaking loose in the early fifties and achieving the freedom—if it was freedom—which found expression in "Leaves of Grass." I say it may not have been freedom; it may have been a sudden consciousness that he was bound or that America was bound. The question which of these was the case might be the subject of a book about Whitman, and a convincing answer might make literary history. Mr. Holloway goes only a little way in this direction. He knows, as all must know, that "something ineffable" happened to Whitman once, and he properly emphasizes the significance of the fact that Whitman read Emerson. But he obviously is not the man to explore the riddle of great poetry. He has performed an important if negative service by establishing the limits of Whitman's interest to the biographer. Now for the great poetry and for an answer to the question whence it came.

MARK VAN DOREN

Toward America Sober

Prohibition at Its Worst. By Irving Fisher. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

Prohibition in the United States. By D. Leigh Colvin. George H. Doran Company. $5.

IT is a pity that men's beliefs about prohibition are not based on evidence rather than on prejudice and personal habit; but facts actually count for little. The campaign goes forward on the basis of vociferation, and as the wets control the chief organs of vociferation in the effete East and the main centers of population beyond the Alleghanies, it is reasonable to expect the prohibition crime wave to continue to mount so long as the alcoholic lamp holds out to burn. None the less, reasonable persons, wet and dry alike, will be grateful for Professor Fisher's facts, whether or not they are able to accept all of his inferences. Professor Fisher is a convinced prohibitionist, but he became such against his will, on the basis of a long study of the alcohol question. Like many of the rest of us, he believes that national prohibition came too soon, before the East was ready for it, and that in consequence the first five years have been "prohibition at its worst."

What are the facts? No one questions that arrests for drunkenness decreased greatly under war-time restrictions, reached a low point in 1920, the first year of national prohibition, and have increased since. How great the changes have been, and what they mean, are the questions at issue. Mr. Stanley Shirk, research director of the Moderation League, declares the increase so great "that drunkenness just about reached the level of the old saloon years by 1924." Professor Fisher demolishes this widely heralded assertion, shows clearly a substantial lessening in the arrests for drunkenness, and on the basis of increased police severity in arresting for drunkenness, estimates that even in 1924 actual cases of drunkenness (as opposed to arrests) per thousand population were probably less than half the pre-prohibition figures. Professor Willcox, one of our most competent statistical authorities, criticizes the method used in reaching this conclusion, however, a method which masks the statistical effect produced by the increase in arrests for drunkenness since 1920. No cautious student, certainly, is going to be dogmatic about the exact reduction; but when the tumult and the shouting dies, the sober fact emerges that there is now far less drunkenness than there was in saloon days. Professor Fisher concludes that beverage consumption of alcohol is certainly less than 16 per cent of pre-prohibition consumption, probably less than 10 per cent, and possibly less than 5 per cent.

Professor Fisher figures the economic gain of prohibition at not less than six billions, a tenth of our national income. Most of us who talk with industrialists will be likely to guess that this guess is low rather than high. His figures and charts show juvenile delinquency in New York cut in half, arrests for assault and battery reduced by three-fifths, those for profanity by four-fifths, and for keeping disorderly houses all but wiped out. They show the percentage of first admissions to insane hospitals in Connecticut that is due to alcohol lessened by more than half, and in the formerly wet States generally by a third, deaths from cirrhosis of the liver in New York and Connecticut cut almost in two, deaths from alcoholism everywhere greatly reduced; but again they show an increase in nearly all these figures since 1920. Poor enforcement? Maybe; but if Americans by nature prefer to go to hell poor and drunk rather than to heaven rich and sober, all the statistics of the economic and social gains of prohibition (even if certified 99.44 per cent pure) are unlikely to change their tastes.

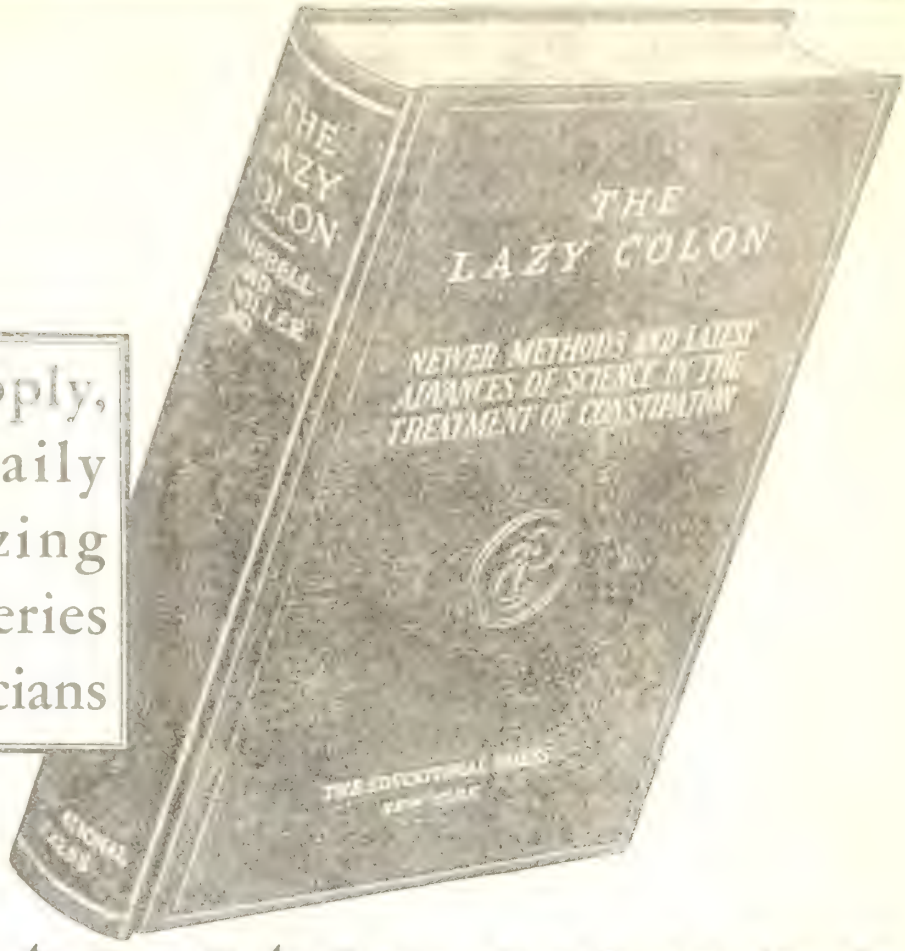
Just here is the battle joined. The Eighteenth Amendment cannot be repealed. Despite the November referendums in the wet States, by every political test the country is dry. What then? Enforcement or nullification, for the latter is what "modification" really means. There has always been a vast amount of lawlessness in the liquor trade, because a lawless liquor trade is vastly profitable. Lawlessness would scarcely be lessened even if half a dozen wet States were allowed by some legal hocus-pocus to nullify the amendment. Some of us are prohibitionists unwillingly, because we hate compulsion. Yet we are driven to go with Professor Fisher in concluding that we have no choice but an earnest attempt at enforcement and education. We believe that enforcement is improving, and that successful enforcement is possible, notwithstanding the present clamor. The question is not one of personalities; yet some of us believe that if we had a statesman instead of a graven image for president, a public-minded financier instead of an ex-distiller for secretary of the treasury, and a live lawyer instead of an American antique for attorney general, the present enforcement could be vastly improved in the course of twelve months, seeing that the overwhelming majority in Congress dare not for their political life do other than vote dry at every chance. We believe it a time to stand our ground bravely, and we welcome as doughty a champion as Professor Fisher, even if we regret the touch of asperity and the suggestion of bad faith with which he treats some of our friends the wets, even if we doubt the impregnability of all his statistical deductions.

Dr. Colvin's book, containing at least [illegible] facts (by statistical estimate, not actual count); for it has six hundred pages, and they must surely average at least [illegible] facts per page. Most of these facts seem to be strictly unimportant, and perhaps there are no subimportant facts. At any rate, here are the details of every political contest in this country, from [illegible] to which the Prohibition Party or its predecessors took part; but if the curious seeker after information tries to find how many votes the party actually cast for president in a particular year, he will find Dr. Colvin singularly reticent. The work really deals with the political politics of prohibition, for that is what interests the author, who, as vice-presidential candidate in 1924, naturally thinks that the history shows the need for a national Prohibition Party. A monumental task of assembling insignificant facts seems to have been competently and conscientiously done, and future students of prohibition politics will be grateful to the author. Anyone who still believes that prohibition was somehow foisted on an unsuspecting country at a time when it was busy killing beer-drinking Germans would do well to read Dr. Colvin's chapters on the progress of prohibition in the States before the war, and to bear in mind that this country has been in process of going dry for half a century. Dr. Colvin does not prove the need for a Prohibition Party; he does indicate the importance of the liquor interest in politics. It is dry history, in two senses.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Hard-Boiled

The Sun Also Rises. By Ernest Hemingway. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.



THE present novel by the author of "In Our Time" supports the recent prophecy that he will be the "big man in American letters." At the time the prophecy was delivered it was meaningless because it was equivocal. Many of the possible interpretations now being eliminated, we fear it has turned out to mean something which we shall all regret. Mr. Hemingway has written a book that will be talked about, praised, perhaps imitated; it has already been received in something of that cautiously critical spirit which the followers of Henry James so notoriously maintain toward the master. Mr. Hemingway has produced a successful novel, but not without returning some violence upon the integrity achieved in his first book. He decided for reasons of his own to write a popular novel, or he wrote the only novel which he could write.

To choose the latter conjecture is to clear his intentions, obviously at the cost of impugning his art. One infers moreover that although sentimentality appears explicitly for the first time in his prose, it must have always been there. Its history can be constructed. The method used in "In Our Time" was pointilliste, and the sentimentality was submerged. With great skill he reversed the usual and most general formula of prose fiction: instead of selecting the details of physical background and of human behavior for the intensification of a dramatic situation, he employed the minimum of drama for the greatest possible intensification of the observed object. The reference of emphasis for the observed object was therefore not the action; rather, the reference of the action was the object, and the action could be impure or incomplete without risk of detection. It could be mixed and incoherent; it could be brought in when it was advantageous to observation, or left out. The exception, important as such, in Mr. Hemingway's work is the story Mr. and Mrs. Elliott. Here the definite dramatic conflict inherent in a sexual relation emerged as fantasy, and significantly; presumably he could not handle it otherwise without giving himself away.

In "The Sun Also Rises," a full-length novel, Mr. Hemingway could not escape such leading situations, and he had besides to approach them with a kind of seriousness. He fails. It is not that Mr. Hemingway is, in the term which he uses in fine contempt for the big word, hard-boiled; it is that he is not hard-boiled enough, in the artistic sense. No one can dispute with a writer the significance he derives from his subject-matter; one can only point out that the significance is mixed or incomplete. Brett is a nymphomaniac; Robert Cohn, a most offensive cad; both are puppets. For the emphasis is false; Hemingway doesn't fill out his characters and let them stand for themselves; he isolates one or two chief traits which reduce them to caricature. His perception of the physical object is direct and accurate; his vision of character, singularly oblique. And he actually betrays the interior machinery of his hard-boiled attitude: "It is awfully easy to be hard-boiled about everything in the daytime, but at night it is another thing," says Jake, the sexually impotent, musing on the futile accessibility of Brett. The history of his sentimentality is thus complete.

There are certain devices exploited in the book which do not improve it; they extend its appeal. Robert Cohn is not only a bounder, he is a Jewish bounder. The other bounders, like Mike, Mr. Hemingway for some reason spares. He also spares Brett —another device—for while her pleasant folly need not be flogged, it equally need not be condoned; she becomes the attrac-

How you can apply, in your own daily life, the amazing scientific discoveries of over 300 physicians

On how to stay young

YOU can prolong your youth twenty, thirty or an even greater number of years. It is not necessarily short lived.

Scientists have discovered that the aging process (which so mars human bodies, particularly women's) is not a matter of just so many years, but actually a chronic disease. The cause is a combination of bad habits. As Seneca once wrote, "Man does not die. He kills himself."

Hundreds of cases are on record of long-prolonged youth attained even before modern scientific knowledge became available.

The case of Ninon de Lenclos

PROBABLY the most famous case of retained youth is that of Ninon de Lenclos. During her early years she led the free life of a gay Parisian. Later she became acknowledged leader of society and fashion. She radiated an irresistible personal fascination—both for men and women. At 70 she had the appearance of a mature beauty in her late twenties. Her skin was free from wrinkles, and her shoulders, bust and neck were of exceptional roundness and beauty. So beautiful was she at 90 that a young man (who knew her age) fell desperately in love with her. Her figure retained to the last the perfect contour and elasticity of a woman in her prime. Records prove she diligently pursued certain rules for the care of her body which coincide to-day with the findings of modern science.

The greatest cause of aging

THE chief reason why we lose youth and beauty (grow old) is declared by Metchnikoff and other great scientists to be intestinal stasis (one form of which is constipation). Authorities (such as Foges and Kellogg) declare that 90% of all men and women over 25 are habitually constipated. (This explains why the average person begins to fail in health within less than 7 years after that time—at 31, according to U. S. Life Tables). Intestinal poisoning (brought on by constipation) causes headaches, irritability, blurred visions, despondency, dizziness and sleeplessness; also skin troubles destructive to beauty; wrinkles, yellow skin, dry or falling hair, and sallow complexion. Many cases of over or under weight are attributable to this cause. Intestinal poisoning also gives rise to a great variety of disease—including kidney trouble, bad tonsils, hardening of the arteries, abscessed teeth, abdominal cancer, and some 30 other dangerous conditions (according to Sir Arbuthnot Lane, physician to King George V).

This book will show you how to stay young

The Lazy Colon contains a complete, authoritative presentation of what to do (and what not to do) in overcoming and preventing intestinal poisoning. This book contains the boiled down, practical part of over 2,000 technical works, medical and surgical reports, researches and discoveries made by over 300 physicians and scientists of international reputation. It is written in plain English—free from professional erminology.

The authors (Charles M. Campbell and Albert K. Detwiller, M.D.) have spent nearly 20 years in the study of this subject.

A thoughtful reading will materially change every mature person's outlook on life by showing that the bogy of middle age, if resolutely faced, can be driven forward into a receding future.

Opinions of "The Lazy Colon"

Martin W. Barr, M.D., noted physician and author, says: "Sat up most of last night reading this delightful and masterly book."

Hon. Wm. R. Green, Chairman Ways and Means Committee of Congress: "This book might well be entitled How To Add 20 Years to Your Life. Its outstanding feature, digesting in non-technical language researches of the most intelligent investigators in the world, is unique, interesting and very instructive in a field of widespread ignorance."

Dr. Paul C. Phillips of Amherst College: "I shall use this book for collateral reading in my class of Hygiene."

Dr. John A. Neva, New York: "I have read your Lazy Colon with greatest delight. Every physician and layman should have one."

It is impossible to tell you here even a small part of the epoch-making information this [illegible] it at your leisure. If you are not delighted with its sane, practical advice—return it and our check for its purchase price will be mailed at once.

THE EDUCATIONAL PRESS, Dept. B-4,
116-120 West 32nd St., N. Y. City

[illegible]

Address. . . . . .

tive wayward lady of Sir Arthur Pinero and Michael Arlen. Petronius's Circe, the archetype of all the Bretts, was neither appealing nor deformed.

Mr. Hemingway has for some time been in the habit of throwing pebbles at the great—which recalls Mr. Pope's couplet about his contemporary Mr. Dennis. The habit was formed in "The Torrents of Spring," where it was amusing. It is disconcerting in the present novel; it strains the context; and one suspects that Mr. Hemingway protests too much. The point he seems to be making is that he is morally superior, for instance, to Mr. Mencken, but it is not yet clear just why.

ALLEN TATE

The Problem of Races

Rasse und Kultur. Von Friedrich Hertz. Leipzig: Alfred Kröner.

THERE are not many books that attack the exaggerate valuation of hereditary mental qualities of races and thus attempt to counteract the popular notion of a self-evident racial superiority on the part of the European—particularly of the "Nordic." Their effectiveness is limited by the difficulty of avoiding the appearance of partisanship in opposing opinions that are violently asserted and dogmatically accepted. Caution in the selection of undisputable data and a thorough mastery of the biological problem are, therefore, a fundamental necessity for success. Jean Finot's book, "Le préjugé des races," hardly fulfils these conditions. Much more satisfactory is "Das Rassenproblem," by Ignatz Zollschan, which, however, suffers from the disadvantage of being essentially an attack upon Anti-Semitism. In its earlier editions Dr. Friedrich Hertz's book "Rasse und Kultur" is essentially a criticism of Houston Stewart Chamberlain; its new, third edition of 1925, now before us, has been largely rewritten and takes up the problem in all its latest aspects.

The author discusses the social conditions making for racial antagonism and their influence upon the development of racial theories. He discusses the various human types and the relation between type and mental life; the interrelation of race and language; the problem of race mixture; the modern race theories, particularly those of Eugen Fischer, Hans Günther, and F. Lentz. This is followed by a special discussion of cultural phenomena in various groups and finally by a chapter on the conditions of cultural progress and on the psychology and ethics of race theories. His brief historical introduction sets forth the development of race theories and the interesting fact that the students of general history of human culture, who do not deal with the history of one particular area, have always been led to assume that the essential mental characteristics of all races are alike. In this his book is in agreeable contrast to the misstatements and misconceptions of Théophile Simar, who in his "Etude critique sur la formation de la doctrine des races" does not distinguish between the actual cultural individuality of nations or of other social groups and the theory of the hereditary determination of cultural forms. Thus it happens that he includes Herder among the defenders of the theories based on racial self-appreciation, although his great purpose was to teach the value of national and tribal individuality.

In the chapter on the physical basis of the mentality of races Dr. Hertz is not so fortunate. He brings forward material that shows clearly the inadequacy of alleged proofs which are believed to justify the exaggerated emphasis that is habitually laid on heredity and stability of type; but he does not succeed in establishing his thesis of a complete lack of correlation between race and mentality. We cannot accept as conclusive all the evidence by which he tries to establish the instability of types. At the present time it is just as impossible to prove conclusively that the hereditary mental characteristics of races are alike as that they are somewhat different; but his examination of the available data does prove that it is quite impossible to show any kind of superiority of one type over another. The author is undoubtedly right in emphasizing the adaptability of function to outer conditions. This implies that human types differing considerably in build may function physiologically and mentally in similar ways.

To the criticism of Gobineau and Chamberlain in earlier editions is added a critique of modern biologists who claim a close correlation between mental character and racial descent. His criticism makes it clear that the claim of a hereditary cause for the observed differences in the behavior of nations or racial groups rests on dogmatic assertion, not on biological proof. Nevertheless, the author hardly does justice to the serious attempts to find evidence for possible functional differences between racial groups. The necessity for such investigation is evident on account of the modern findings of experimental psychologists that have shown clear differences in reaction to the so-called intelligence tests among various nationalities. It has not been proved in the least that these differences are determined by heredity, but their existence must be considered and studied. The general tendency of Dr. Hertz to minimize heredity as against environmental influences brings it about that he underestimates the importance of heredity in family lines. The error in the argument of most investigators lies in the unjustifiable confusion of biological inheritance in family lines as against the distribution of form and function in racial groups containing a large number of unrelated family lines. It is more than likely that Dr. Hertz is right in claiming that functional racial heredity does not exist. At least, his arguments seem convincing when he sets forth that tradition controls the cultural life of nations, and that, as compared to its importance, hereditary differences may be neglected. He proves that for the purpose of understanding cultural development, the functional differences between races are negligible; but he has not succeeded in proving that there may not be slight hereditary differences between various races, particularly in so far as the frequencies of different hereditary types are concerned.

It is intelligible that a book dealing with racial antagonisms, a phenomenon of our time that is exciting the passions not merely of the masses and that involves the greatest danger to sane progress, should at times transgress the limits of objective discussion. We cannot help feeling that a greater restraint upon the praiseworthy enthusiasm of the author would have strengthened the influence of the book.

FRANZ BOAS

Four English Essayists

The Background of English Literature. By H. J. C. Grierson. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

Critical Essays. By Osbert Burdett. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

Fallodon Papers. By Viscount Grey of Fallodon. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

Vision and Jewels. By Moysheh Oyved. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

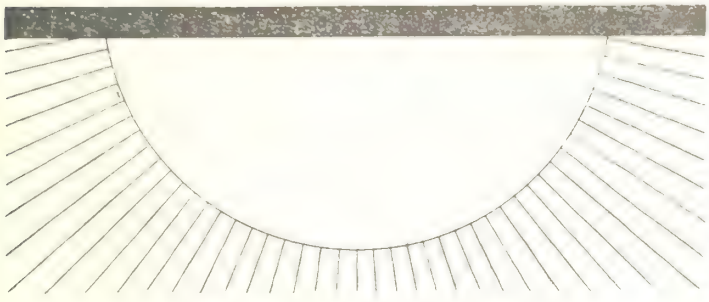
A COLLECTION of four books by a distinguished professor, a brilliant critic, a famous statesman, and the proprietor of "the oddest, most artistic little shop in London" ought, no doubt, to be representative of a nation; that it is not proves that England is larger than her leisure class and just at present expressing herself in a medium other than literature. Conversely, this implies a break between its literature and reality; and the absence of forceful writers unqualifiedly facing a post-war English nation is distressingly apparent. Shaw and Galsworthy are still smashing the old, dead gods. Intrenched behind the debris they have wrought they do not make for further advance, and Shaw, at least, possesses the clarity of self-appraisal—and also the self-assurance—to suggest that he be superseded.

Your Holiday in Europe

This Year, Next Year, Some Time——

Whenever and wherever you want to go, make your arrangements through the Workers' Travel Association, an organization—in case you don't know it—founded and maintained to encourage foreign travel as a means of promoting the growth of mutual understanding between the peoples of the world.

The W. T. A. plans and carries out holidays and tours of all kinds—to suit the most modest or the well-filled purse—for groups or individuals. It drafts itineraries, gives quotations, makes hotel, steamer, and railroad reservations anywhere in Great Britain or on the Continent of Europe, supplies leaders, if desired, and arranges for meetings with representatives of educational, political, trade-union and other movements.



The W. T. A. is official agent for the principal British and European Railroad and Steamship Companies, and can supply tickets of all descriptions.

Independent travelers and organizers of parties are invited to write early to the W. T. A., mentioning the dates of their stay in Europe, the places they plan to visit, the amount they can spend, and their main interests, so that plans can be drafted for them in accordance with their wishes.

The Workers' Travel Association Ltd

Transport House WESTMINSTER — Smith Square LONDON, S.W. 1.

Phone VICTORIA 4608—9 2 lines

Read these excerpts from

THE NEW UNIVERSE

By Baker Brownell

and you will sense his magnetic style, his grasp of modern science and philosophy, his genius for bringing scientific truths into bold relief for the intelligent but non-technical reader; and you will have a touch of the stimulation to be enjoyed in his highly individual survey of the frontier problems of science, society, art, religion, and philosophy.

"The biography of God has not been written except as science finds it in the long unwinding of natural processes. The scientists, not the 'fundamentalists', have read the Bible in the stars."
"Life is a small whisper heard here for a moment in the lull of universal thunder."
"Light is the dynamic factor of a living thing and man's worship of the sun as his creator is not far-fetched."
"Intellectually the modern world is a corral of wild horses. Each specialty kicks and bites at every other."
"Specialization, vegetable or intellectual, in time is poisonous."
"The atom, once a satisfying little lump of ultimate solidity, has become a communistic gang of electrons acting as a unit."
"Life is not the wax or wick of the candle. It is the burning."
"Society has a behavior. It is a unit of human living that is too often observed only through the peepholes of individual actions."

A book that must inevitably be widely discussed.

At all bookstores, $4.00, or by mail from the publishers.

D. VAN NOSTRAND COMPANY
8 Warren Street, New York

Celestial Sanction . . .

"THERE is nothing more agreeable than to find that Providence dislikes the same people that we do. It adds to our good opinion of Providence. Moreover it imparts a celestial sanction to comparatively cat-and-dog emotions, the pleasure of a massacre, for example, or of bombarding an unfortified town.

Bad luck for the people one does not like is always retribution. It is a term that disguises the simplicity of our natural tastes and gives carte blanche to their indulgence. Under the name of retribution scalping [illegible] for you—much of its apparent crudity and yet it hurts the other person just as much. Scalping alongside Providence is rather dignified, while still retaining all its charm.

So when one man hates another, or a nation, he should make haste to fetch in Providence. Then his simple early racial certitudes may be freely displayed [illegible] that might otherwise seem out of place in any creature that had lost its fur and tail—unless it had found Providence."

° ° °

*f*rom THE COLBY ESSAYS, the finest work of FRANK MOORE COLBY, a neglected American master of the ironic essay. Edited by Clarence Day, Jr. with an introduction by Philip Littell. Two volumes. Boxed. $7.50.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers Since 1817

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

The culture of the English litterateur makes it thrice difficult for him adequately to appraise the situation of his race without precedent in letters. Professor Grierson recognizes the social basis of literature, "the spirit of a self-confident society seeking in art and literature the expression of its ideals and convictions." His appreciations are robust; he makes Byron, as the poet of action and energy, the subject of a splendid tribute. He champions Donne and defends Sancho Panza as the symbol of dull, plodding humanity which nevertheless follows the visionary, infected with his madness. Mr. Burdett ably appraises Frank Harris, pleads for the "humanity" of letters, and writes this powerful sentence: "Joy is a quality of strength, and only in the great poets is intensity wholly free from tensity." But neither Professor Grierson nor Mr. Burdett gives marrow to the young writer bent on newer things.

For Viscount Grey writing is, of course, a release from public life. He writes interestingly of waterfowl, and this much is apparent, that he has entertained himself by writing. It is also true that his papers on fly-fishing, the coloration of birds, and the pleasures of reading are merely recreation for their busy author and not the spontaneous product of an inner spirituality such as, for example, lilts with W. H. Davies or piously trundles with Walton.

Mr. Oyved's book, the frequently charming autobiography of a beautiful soul, translates itself quaintly against an English background. It would be unfair to grudge the author the oasis he has created for himself, and his quiet mannerism would disarm criticism—were criticism possible of an elfin mood saturated with shrewd Jewish glimpses of humanity. Only, his Love—the eviscerated post-exilic thing of "Visions and Jewels"—is too amorphous a creature to carry the burdens of the Time Spirit across-stream like another Christopher.

JOHN WALDHORN GASSNER

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. This year in addition a second prize of $50 and a third prize of $25 will be offered. The rules for 1926 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Wednesday, December 1, and not later than Friday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page.

3. No manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poems will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 9, 1927.

7. Besides the winning poems, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Books in Brief

Labels. By A. Hamilton Gibbs. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

"Somehow or other, in the course of centuries," says one of the characters here, "we've got to slough off the philosophy which has led us down the wrong trail. . . . The progress of man—if any—is over the dead bodies of its conscientious objectors." This thought—both in its earnestness and its vagueness—permeates "Labels," giving it an underlying force and at the same time robbing it of drive as a piece of fiction. The author's materials have begun to date, and all his expert handling cannot keep the story from seeming remote.

Sabbatical Year. By George Shively. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

A bright and crackling homily about a misfit minister and what—when sufficiently tempted—he does about it. Briefly, he spends his vacation with a member of his congregation in a manner not exactly sanctioned by his sermons. When the affair begins to assume the proportions of a scandal, he decides to revise his pulpit utterances to conform to his conduct. The sermon which the young man preaches on his return is awaited by the reader with as keen interest as though it were the solution of a crime mystery story. The plot is daring in approximately the same sense that an evening gown might be; the talk is correctly tailored and smart; the total effect is momentarily amusing but ultimately unsatisfactory.

Drama

A Note on Tragedy

THE fundamentals of Tragedy are a protest and an adjustment. Its subject is some flaw in man or the universe; its task the generation of some mood by means of which this flaw and its consequences are made either acceptable or at least tolerable to the human spirit. No mere series of unfortunate accidents ending in catastrophe is enough, for mere accident is trivial and mere catastrophe is, in itself, not tragic but painful. Only when something inevitable is involved and only when the passion of our protest against it is in a measure stilled does Tragedy come into being, for Tragedy is always, in some measure, a justification of the ways of God to man.

The creation of Tragedy, so defined, is one of the most enduring activities of man, since it began when first he discovered how art might comfort his distress, and since it will continue until that day comes—if ever it does—when, recognizing the eternal and finally unbearable disharmony between himself and his universe, he gives up all effort to reconcile himself to it and thus dies his ultimate spiritual death. But though Tragedy is timeless, the form which tragedies take varies with the age which creates them, and no spiritual epoch has realized itself until it has created its tragedy, stating the gravamen of its protest and the terms of its acceptance. Something of this sort the great Greeks did for their age and Shakespeare for his, but no one has done it equally well for ours. Our vision, if not deeper, is more extensive, and while we perceive more completely than any before us the manifold intricacies of our predicament, the comforts which others had seem more shadowy. Perhaps, indeed, nothing is more full of dark implications than the fact that true Tragedy is more difficult to write now than ever before. Gone with the last glimmerings of religion is that acceptance of destiny in which the Greeks rested, and gone, too, is that sense of the dignity and greatness of human passions which made man seem to Shakespeare glorious even in defeat. Man, too, as we know him better, seems little; unable to bear the dignity of the sceptered pall; at best not tragic but merely pitiful.

Perhaps the real greatness of Eugene O'Neill lies in the fact that he has come nearer than any other American to writing Tragedy in this sense, and that even in a play as early as "Beyond the Horizon" (now being revived by the Actors' Theater at the Mansfield) is clearly to be seen an instinctive discernment of the laws of such writing. This play is marked by a sense of tragic fitness which is by no means the inevitable accompaniment of vigor or honesty and which lifts the play, as art, to a higher level than those two qualities alone can ever reach. In the hands of another his story might have become a vehicle for mere pathos or sentiment. If this boy who gives up his dream of a full life of adventure in strange lands for a marriage which chains him to the farm he hates had found in his marriage even the peace of gradual extinction, the play would be essentially a play of sentiment; if his wife had turned out to be merely not the woman he thought her, then his story would be only the story of an unfortunate mistake; but actually it is neither of these things. Divesting himself of every trace of faith in the permanent value of love and presenting it as merely one of the subtlest of those traps by which Nature snares Man, O'Neill turns a play which might have been merely ironic into an indictment not only of chance or fate but of that whole universe which sets itself up against man's desires and conquers them.

Time and time again as the action gives rise to it we look to admiration the way in which instinct leads O'Neill to sound the note which maintains the harmony of his conception when it would be so easy to destroy it. Thus, for example, when the brother returns and the wife confesses that it was he whom she ought to have loved, irony (something much lower than Tragedy) demands that he should confess a love for her, and any one with a less fine tragic sense would have made him do so. But O'Neill, realizing that love has no place in the world he has created, makes him merely laugh at such romantic notions instead, and the play, which might there have degenerated into a pitiful story of misplaced affections, leaps up once more into the bleak heights of Tragedy. And if, as Tragedy, it fails to take a place among supreme achievements it is only because no complete acquiescence in the events recorded is possible, because, in spite of the stoicism it inspires, there remains in it, as in all really modern tragedy, something that is merely distressing.

Last year the merits of Mr. Noel Coward's plays were somewhat overrated, and this year the commentators, having discovered that fact, cover their confusion by refusing to give the devil even his due. Actually, "This Was a Man" (Klaw Theater) is considerably better than "The Vortex"—shallow, of course, but clever, spicy, and generally diverting. "Mozart" (Music Box), the Guitry play, in a later production of which the author is to appear here, has a measure of delicate charm, but it is spoiled by the frightful descents which Miss Irene Bordoni is allowed to make into music-hall minstrelsy.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

LECTURES

JOHN COWPER POWYS
will speak at LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL
241 East 14th St., Thursdays at 8:30 p. m.
Dec. 16: Emerson
Dec. 23: Poe
Dec. 30: Whitman
Admission 50 cents
Send your name and address for our winter term announcement.

DR. ALFRED ADLER,
Noted Viennese Psychologist and Psychoanalyst,
WILL GIVE THREE LECTURES ON "Individual Psychology in Theory and Practice"
1. The Inferiority Complex
2. Inhibitions and Obstacles
3. Love and Marriage
Monday, Tuesday and Thursday, December 13, 14 and 16, at 8 P. M.
IN THE COMMUNITY AUDITORIUM, PARK AVENUE AND 34TH STREET
Course tickets, $2.50; Single Admission, $1.00. Apply to Educational Department, The Community Church, 12 Park Avenue, or at the door.

THEATER

The Neighborhood Playhouse, 466 Grand Street, N. Y.
The Hindu Comedy
THE LITTLE CLAY CART
THE DYBBUK

Longacre
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday
THEODORE DREISER'S
AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY
A PLAY WHICH IS BOUND TO STRETCH AUDIENCES' HEARTS
DRAMATIZED BY PATRICK KEARNEY.

LIMITED ENGAGEMENT
ACTORS THEATRE PRODUCTION
EUGENE O'NEILL'S
"BEYOND THE HORIZON"
Mansfield Theatre
47th St. West of B'way
Evgs. 8:30
Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30

YIDDISH ART THEATRE
12th St. and 2nd Ave. Stuy. 7195
MAURICE SCHWARTZ PRODUCTION
OF ABRAHAM GOLDFADEN'S
"The Tenth Commandment"
Evenings 8.30 Matinees Saturday and Sunday 2:30

CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE 14th St. & 6th Ave. Tel. Watkins 7760
EVA Le GALLIENNE
Thursday, December 9, "THREE SISTERS."
Friday, December 10, "LA LOCANDIERA."
Saturday Matinee, December 11, "JOHN GABRIEL BORKMAN."
Saturday Evening, December 11, "LA LOCANDIERA."
Monday, December 13, "THREE SISTERS."
Tuesday, December 14, "THE MASTER BUILDER."
Wednesday Matinee, December 15, "THE MASTER BUILDER."
Wednesday Evening, December 15, "LA LOCANDIERA."
Evenings & Saturday Matinees, 50c to $1.50. Wednesday Matinees, 50c-$1.

Theatre Guild Acting Companies in
SIDNEY HOWARD'S COMEDY
Ned McCobb's Daughter
JOHN GOLDEN Thea., 58th St. E. of B'way. Evgs. 8:40
Matinees THURSDAY and SATURDAY
Tickets may now be purchased at the Guild Theatre Box Office
BERNARD SHAW'S
PYGMALION
"The most astonishing sentimental theme ever devised for the theatre" (Heywood Broun, World)
GUILD THEATRE 52nd St., W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:40
Matinees THURS. and SAT., 2:30

MOTION PICTURE

"POTEMKIN" ARMORED CRUISER
The Sensational Russian Film!
"The Greatest Motion Picture Ever Made"—agree DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS, EMIL JANNINGS and MAX REINHARDT
CHANIN'S BILTMORE THEATRE, 47th St., West of Broadway.
Twice Daily, 2:30-5:30 (Sunday, 3 and 8:30)

The British Commonwealth of Nations

WE print herewith the concluding portion of the report of the Inter-Imperial Relations Committee of the British Imperial Conference, as cabled to the New York Times. The first section was printed in last week's Nation.

F—Coming into Force of Multilateral Treaties. In general treaties contain a ratification clause and the provision that the treaty will come into force on the deposit of a certain number of ratifications. The question has sometimes arisen in connection with treaties negotiated under the auspices of the League whether for the purpose of making up the number of ratifications necessary to bring the treaty into force ratifications on behalf of different parts of the empire which are separate members of the League should be counted as separate ratifications.

In order to avoid any difficulty in future it is recommended that when it is thought necessary that a treaty should contain a clause of this character it should take the form of a provision that the treaty should come into force when it has been ratified on behalf of so many separate members of the League.

We think that some convenient opportunity should be taken of explaining to other members of the League changes which it is desired to make in the form of treaties and the reasons for which they are desired. We would also recommend that the various governments of the empire should make it an instruction to their representatives at international conferences to be held in the future that they should use their best endeavors to secure that effect is given to the recommendations contained in the foregoing.

G—Representation at International Conferences. We also studied in the light of the resolution of the Imperial Conference of 1923 to which reference already has been made the question of representation of different parts of the empire at international conferences. The conclusions which we reached may be summarized as follows:

1. No difficulty arises as regards representation at conferences convened by or under the auspices of the League of Nations. In the case of such conferences all members of the League are invited and if they attend are represented separately by separate delegations. Cooperation is insured by application of Paragraph 1, 1-C, of the resolution of 1923.

2. As regards international conferences summoned by foreign governments, no rule of universal application can be laid down, since the nature of representation must in part depend on the form of invitation issued by the convening government.

(a) In conferences of a technical character it is usual and always desirable that different parts of the empire should (if they wish to participate) be represented separately by separate delegations, and where necessary efforts should be made to secure invitations which will render such representation possible.

(b) Conferences of a political character called by a foreign government must be considered on the special circumstances of each individual case.

It is for each part of the empire to decide whether its particular interests are so involved, especially having regard to active obligations likely to be imposed by any resulting treaty, that it desires to be represented at a conference or whether it is content to leave negotiation in the hands of part or parts of the empire more directly concerned and accept the result.

If the government desires to participate in the conclusion of a treaty the method by which representation will be secured is a matter to be arranged with other governments of the empire in the light of the invitation which has been received. Where more than one part of the empire desires to be represented three methods of representation are possible:

(a) By means of a common plenipotentiary, or plenipotentiaries, the issue of full powers to whom should be on the advice of all parts of the empire participating.

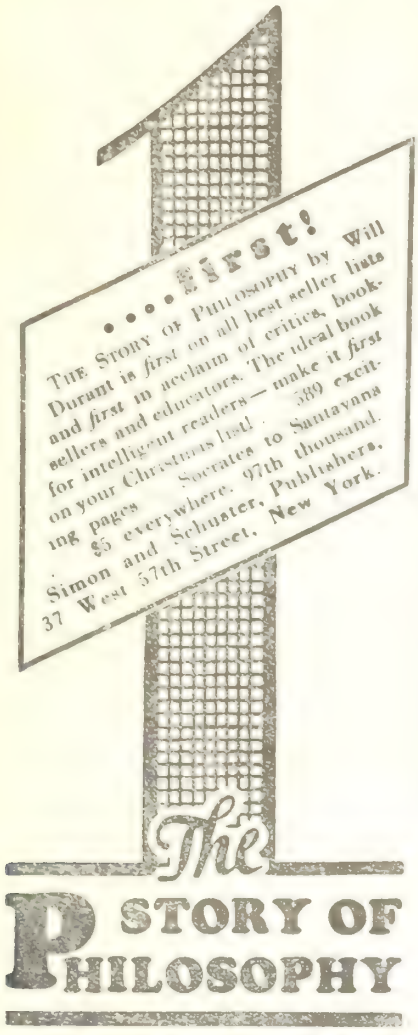
(b) By a single British Empire delegation composed of separate representatives of such parts of the empire as are participating in the conference. This was the form of representation employed at the Washington Disarmament Conference of 1921.

(c) By separate delegations representing each part of the empire participating in the conference. If, as result of consultation, this third method is desired, an effort must be made to insure that the form of invitation from the convening government will make this method of representation possible.

Certain non-technical treaties should from their nature be concluded in a form which will render them binding upon all parts of the empire, and for this purpose should be ratified with the concurrence of all the governments. It is for each government to decide to what extent its concurrence in ratification will be facilitated by its participation in conclusion of a treaty, as, for instance, by the appointment of a common plenipotentiary. Any question as to whether the nature of the treaty is such that its ratification should be concurred in by all parts of the empire is matter for discussion and agreement between governments.

H—General Conduct of Foreign Policy. We went on to examine the possibility of applying the principles underlying the treaty resolution of the 1923 conference to matters arising in the conduct of foreign affairs generally. It was frankly recognized that in this sphere, as in the sphere of defense, the major share of responsibility rests now and must for some time continue to rest with His Majesty's Government in Great Britain.

Nevertheless, practically all the Dominions are engaged to some extent, and some to a considerable extent, in the conduct of foreign relations, particularly those with foreign countries on their borders. A particular instance of this is the growing work in connection with the relations between Canada and the United States of America, which has led to the necessity for the appointment of a Minister Plenipotentiary to represent the Canadian Government in Washington.



We felt that the governing consideration underlying all the discussions of this problem must be that neither Great Britain nor the Dominions could be committed to acceptance of active obligations except with the definite assent of their own governments.

I—Issue of Exequaturs to Foreign Consuls in Dominions. A question was raised with regard to practice regarding the issue of exequaturs to consuls in the Dominions. The general practice hitherto in the case of all appointments of consuls de carrière in any part of the British Empire has been that the foreign government concerned notified His Majesty's Government in Great Britain through the diplomatic channel of the proposed appointment, and that, provided it is clear that the person concerned is in fact a consul de carrière, steps have been taken without further formality for the issue of His Majesty's exequatur.

In the case of consuls other than those de carrière it has been customary for some time past to consult the Dominion government concerned before the issue of an exequatur.

The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs informed us that His Majesty's Government in Great Britain accepted the suggestion that in future any application by a foreign government for the issue of an exequatur to any person who was to act as consul in the Dominion should be referred to the Dominion government concerned for consideration and that

BOOKS

EDUCATIONAL

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE
Program Dec. 12-18
AT COOPER UNION
(8th St. and Astor Place)
At 8 o'clock ADMISSION FREE
Sunday, Dec. 12—Dr. Bruno Roselli—"Fascismo Revamped."
Tuesday, Dec. 14—Dr. L. Pierce Clark—"A Psychological Interpretation of Leonardo Da Vinci as Scientist and Inventor."
Friday, Dec. 17—Prof. Dean Martin—"What Is the Matter with Modern Ideas? "Humanitarian Ideals."

AT MANHATTAN TRADE SCHOOL
(Lexington Ave. and 22nd St., at 8 o'clock)
Single Admission, 25 cents
Reduction for Course Tickets
Monday, Dec. 13—Mr. Mark Van Doren—"Literary Critics of Our Civilization. "E. A. Robinson."
Wednesday, Dec. 15—Scott M. Bartlett—"A Metaphysical Doctrine. "Stating the Postulates."
Thursday, Dec. 16—Dr. E. G. Spaulding—Outlines of Philosophy. "The Sources of Knowledge."
Saturday, Dec. 18—G. Kingsley Noble, Ph.D. Evolution: Facts and Theories. "What Is Inherited?"

Do You Want Your Child to Play the Piano and Enjoy Learning It?
Do You Think Your Child has no "Ear"?
Every Child has an Ear for Music. The Ear of some Children, however, must be developed. I have taught Successfully Children and Adults in Hungary and the country. My specialty is Ear Training and Concentration.
Let me Teach Your Child.
For terms and consultation address
MISS FRANCISKA SCHWIMMER
No. 2 West 83rd Street Tel. Endicott 5706

The Gift of Gifts

Fathers who read this magazine are anxiously casting about at this season to find some one outstanding gift for a small son or daughter. This is offered as a suggestion.

It is possible to place in your child's hands this Christmas morning the most valuable possession he or she could have—A UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

The process is simple. Through the educational endowment life insurance policy you may make certain that at the beginning of each college year—when your child is that age—money will be available to pay tuition and living expenses. This without regard to what may happen to you meanwhile.

ASK YOUR PRUDENTIAL MAN TO EXPLAIN THIS PHASE OF PROTECTION

Or make inquiry direct to the Home Office.

THE PRUDENTIAL
INSURANCE COMPANY OF AMERICA
EDWARD D. DUFFIELD, President
Home Office NEWARK, N. J.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

if the Dominion government agreed to the issue of an exequatur it would be sent to them for counter-signature by the Dominion minister. Instructions to this effect had already been given.

Communication Between Dominion Governments. We took note of the development of the special interest which had occurred since the Imperial Conference last met, viz., the appointment of a minister plenipotentiary to represent the interests of the Irish Free State in Washington, which was now about to be followed by the appointment of a diplomatic representative of Canada.

We felt that the most fruitful results could be anticipated from the cooperation of His Majesty's representatives in the United States of America already initiated and now further to be developed. In cases other than those where Dominion ministers were accredited to heads of foreign states it was agreed to be very desirable that the existing diplomatic channels should continue to be used as between Dominion governments and foreign governments in matters of general and political concern. . . .

VI.—System of Communication and Consultation

Sessions of the Imperial Conference at which the prime ministers of Great Britain and the Dominions are all able to be present cannot, from the nature of things, take place very frequently. The system of communication and consultation between conferences becomes, therefore, of special importance. We reviewed the position now reached in this respect with special reference to the desirability of arranging that a closer personal touch should be established between Great Britain and the Dominions. Such contact alone can convey the impression of the atmosphere in which official correspondence is conducted.

Development in this respect seems particularly necessary in relation to matters of major importance in foreign affairs, where expedition is often essential and an urgent decision necessary. The special aspect of the question of consultation which we considered was that concerning the representation of Great Britain in the Dominions. By reason of his constitutional position, as explained in Section IV (B) of this report, the Governor General is no longer a representative of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain. There is no one, therefore, in the Dominion capitals in a position to represent with authority the views of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain.

We summed up our conclusions in the following resolution, which is submitted for consideration of the conference:

> The governments represented at the Imperial Conference [illegible] with the desirability of developing a system of personal contact both in London and in the Dominion capitals, to supplement the present system of intercommunication and a reciprocal supply of information on [illegible] requiring joint consideration. The manner in which [illegible] is to be worked out as a matter for [illegible] and settlement between His Majesty's governments in Great Britain and the Dominions, with [illegible] circumstances of each particular post [illegible] it is understood that any new arrangements should be supplementary to and not in replacement of the existing methods of direct communication from government to government save the special arrangements which have been in force since 1918 for communications between the prime ministers.

VII.—Particular Aspects of Foreign Relations Discussed by the Committee

It was found convenient that certain aspects of foreign relations on matters outstanding at the time of the conference should be referred to us, since they could be considered in greater detail and more informally than at meetings of the full conference.

A—Compulsory Arbitration in International Disputes. One question which we studied was that of arbitration in international disputes, with special reference to the question of acceptance of Article 36 of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice providing for compulsory submission of certain classes of cases to the court. On this matter we decided to submit no resolution to the conference, but whilst the members of the committee were unanimous in favoring the widest possible extension of the method of arbitration for the settlement of international disputes, the feeling was that it was at present premature to accept the obligations under the article in question.

A general understanding was reached that none of the governments represented at the Imperial Conference would take any action in the direction of acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court without bringing up the matter for further discussion.

B—Adherence of the United States of America to the Protocol Establishing the Permanent Court of International Justice. Connected with the question last mentioned was that of adherence of the United States of America to the protocol establishing the Permanent Court of International Justice.

The special conditions upon which the United States desired to become a party to the protocol had been discussed at a special conference held in Geneva in September, 1926, to which all the governments represented at the Imperial Conference had sent representatives. We ascertained that each of these governments was in accord with the conclusions reached by the special conference and with the action which that conference recommended.

C—The Policy of Locarno. The Imperial Conference was fortunate in meeting at a time just after the ratifications of the Locarno treaty of mutual guaranty had been exchanged on the entry of Germany into the League of Nations. It was, therefore, possible to envisage the results which the Locarno policy had achieved already, and to forecast to some extent the further results which it was hoped to secure. These were explained and discussed. It then became clear that from the standpoint of all the Dominions and of India there was complete approval of the manner in which the negotiations had been conducted and brought to so successful a conclusion.

Our final and unanimous conclusion was to recommend to the conference the adoption of the following resolution:

> The conference has heard with satisfaction the statement of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with regard to the efforts made to insure peace in Europe, culminating in the agreements of Locarno, and congratulates His Majesty's Government in Great Britain on its share in this successful contribution toward the promotion of the peace of the world.

Signed on behalf of the committee, Balfour, Chairman

Contributors to This Issue

Carleton Beals has been living in Mexico for several years. In the issues of The Nation of August 18, September 15, and October 6 he published articles on The Mexican Church Goes on Strike, Baron Banana in Puerto Barrios, and Calles Is Gaining in Mexico.

Anna Rochester, formerly an editor of the World Tomorrow, is now in China.

Ted Olson is a Wyoming poet.

Henry Raymond Mussey is professor of economics at Wellesley College, and was formerly associate editor of The Nation.

Allen Tate is a New York critic and poet.

Franz Boas, professor of anthropology at Columbia University, is a world authority on the problem of races. He contributed an article, What is a Race? to The Nation's Nordic Myth series in 1925.

The author of Mother's Daughter is a lawyer.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1926 No. 3207

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 661
EDITORIALS:
Christmas Puddin' 663
Calvin Coolidge, Socialist 663
Claude Monet, 1840-1926 664
Friar Bacon 664
CARTOON. By Hendrik van Loon 667
DOHENY—A PORTRAIT IN OIL. By Raymond Gram Swing 665
AN AIR LAW FOR AMERICA. By M. W. Ryan 667
THE PEACOCK'S TAIL. Anonymous 668
THE FRENCH FAMILY COMMITS MURDER. By Robert Dell 669
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 669
CORRESPONDENCE 669
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
What Will She Do with Seven Fat Years? By Carroll Calkins 670
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 670
The "Different" Negro. By Melville J. Herskovits 670
The Melancholy Bull. By Joseph Wood Krutch 670
"Ad Maiorem Gloriam Dei." By Alter Brody 670
A Masterpiece in Leyne. By Ernest Sutherland Bates 670
Smollett. By Arnold Whitridge 671
Books in Brief 671
The Nation's Poetry Prize 672
Art: Modern Art—Genesis or Exodus? By Lewis Mumford 672
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Real Hungary. By G. E. R. Gedye 674

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor
MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

HOWEVER THE FALL-DOHENY TRIAL ends, the Navy Department stands guilty. The defense centered around an alleged war scare which was supposed to excuse the deal by which Doheny got the oil lands. Secretary Wilbur would not permit Admiral Robison to give details or name the Power, but everyone knew it was Japan. Now, these scare stories date from the days of and after the Washington Conference, at which Japan canceled her alliance with England, canceled the Lansing-Ishii agreement with America, agreed to return Shantung to China, and entered into a series of treaties to safeguard peace and the status quo in the Pacific. That conference caused a marked lessening of tension in the Pacific. Any war scare, at that precise time, was the purest bogy-man. We do not pretend to know whether Mr. Doheny invented the bugaboo in order to get his oil or whether there really were naval officers foolish enough to believe it. Enough has already been hinted to do a deal of damage to Japanese-American relations. Let us know the whole truth. Turn on the light, Mr. Wilbur! And is it not time for Mr. Hughes, father of the Washington Conference, to speak out?

GOVERNOR SMITH has won fresh laurels in the water-power fight in that he compelled by ten days of publicity the New York State Water-Power Commission, which is about to go out of existence, to forego its plans to lease the St. Lawrence River to the Aluminum Trust and allied interests. When the commission met on December 5 at the meeting at which it was to have given its approval to the proposed lease to the Frontier Corporation, which is jointly owned by the Aluminum Company of America, the Dupont interests, and the General Electric Company, the corporation itself wisely withdrew its acceptance of the proposed plan. On the following day the Northeastern Power Corporation withdrew its application for the creation of a river-regulating district on the Salmon River, which meant a power site on that river within the forest preserves. This is a magnificent victory, and not only for the Governor. The New York World again deserves the highest praise for its share in the campaign which resulted in so rapid a rousing of public opinion. The Water-Power Commission can now die an ignominious death, the Republican Party in the State of New York has once more thoroughly besmirched itself, and Governor Smith more than ever ranks as a defender of public rights. Will the Republicans now dare to oppose Governor Smith's program for a State Power Authority to take the State's "white coal" out of the hands of politicians?

THOUGH THE NUMBER OF MEN of courage and of zeal for truth and justice is steadily increasing in the South—witness the splendid fight made by R. Charlton Wright, publisher of the Columbia, South Carolina, Record, to bring about the punishment of the lynchers who butchered the three Negroes in Aiken on October 8—it is not often that a Southern man gets up before a Southern audience and says that "highfalutin talk about the beauty of Southern women and the chivalry of Southern men" cannot hide the lack of intellectual, artistic, social, and political progress. Professor Edwin Mims of Vanderbilt University spoke thus at the annual dinner of the New York Southern Society, and uttered among other reasonable sentiments the following: "The solidarity of the South is no longer a source of pride, but a humiliation to many of its most devoted men"; "the Southern States are still at the bottom of all statistics that register actual educational conditions of this country"; "it is also true that there is not a single university in the South that has adequate resources for the highest type of graduate work"; "even in politics an increasing number of business men (of the South) are no longer voting one way and praying another, but are following the dictates of their consciences and patriotism." He was equally outspoken in his opposition to Tennessee's anti-evolution law, which he described as the child of "political cowardice." He pointed out that the State of Georgia has recently sent to the penitentiary for from four years to life the leaders of a lynching mob, to date eleven men. This makes it easier for the brave editors of the South, such as Julian Harris in Georgia, Charlton Wright in South Carolina, and Desha Breckinridge in Kentucky, to cite only a few, to fight their unending battles for justice.

ALL HONOR TO THE BOARD OF REGENTS of the University of Utah! The Chamber of Commerce of Salt Lake City, the Commercial Club, the American Legion, and the usual list of patriotic societies recently undertook to prevent Scott Nearing from giving an address in connection with the University Extension course. He is and was a pacifist, a member of the Civil Liberties Union, a [illegible] and he opposed the entrance of the United States [illegible] World War. Therefore these solemn bodies opined that it was their sacred duty to censor the course of lectures established by the university, and notified its authorities that in their judgment the mere presence of Scott Nearing, no matter how mild his utterances might be, would be "harmful to the university students." Wonderful to relate, the Governor of the State and the Mayor of Salt Lake City were also found on the side of free speech, and when the protests of the Chamber of Commerce and its affiliated organizations came before the Board of Regents they unanimously voted to keep Scott Nearing on their roll of lecturers. We cannot too warmly commend this action. For a university board of control to allow commercial organizations to say what shall and what shall not be said on university platforms would be to abdicate the most sacred of their functions. The net result was, of course, that the Tabernacle in Salt Lake so boomed Mr. Nearing's coming that it was necessary to take for his lecture the large Assembly Hall of the Mormon church.

THE EIGHTEENTH DAYS in which a vote was worth two [illegible] and no more—unless it might be a glass of whiskey—are gone forever. Votes come higher nowadays; Senator-elect Vare has discovered how costly a Pennsylvania primary can be. And the voters of that State are discovering—although so far with no great show of indignation—that buying votes is not enough. Other subterfuges may be necessary in order to roll up a safe majority. Thus the investigation of the Philadelphia system discovered one vote recorded as cast by a man who died ten days before the election was held, and in one session of the court twenty-five witnesses testified that their votes had been falsely counted for Vare. Five members of one election board are already under arrest for fraud. In thirty districts of Philadelphia not one vote was counted for William B. Wilson, Vare's opponent. What is to be the outcome of this scandalous buying and stealing of votes? The Senate certainly should refuse to seat Senator Vare. But what are the people of Pennsylvania going to do? Nothing daunted by disclosures relating to their three-million-dollar primary, they elected the machine candidate in November. Or are they about to prove that they did not elect him and that he won the election by fraud alone?

AMONG THE ANNUAL REPORTS of the Cabinet officers the Postmaster General's stands out as the most striking, for he reports that he has cut his last year's deficit in half, reducing it by $19,772,647.87 to $19,972,379.42, and this in the face of an increase of more than $70,000,000 in the salary roll. There was an increase of 9.36 per cent in postage paid on mail, and the air mail earned $861,865.05 in excess of ordinary postal rates. Among the Postmaster General's commendable recommendations for legislation are one to exclude firearms from the mail, another to contract for group life-insurance for postal employees, and a third to reduce the postage rate on second-class transient matter. All of which shows clearly that if the Post Office Department is ever put on a purely business basis and the Postmaster General dropped from the Cabinet, where he has for generations been merely the political henchman of the President, the department can be made self-supporting. As for the other reports, those of the War and Navy departments are, as usual, demands for more men and more money, while the Attorney General backs up the President in demanding that the prohibition and anti-trust laws be made more stringent.

LITTLE BROTHER DIAZ, down in Nicaragua, has learned something from association with the State Department in Washington. He knows that one of the safest ways to fight an opponent is to call him a Bolshevist. And so, since Mexico has recognized the rival Sacasa regime in Nicaragua—and at least Sacasa has more constitutional right to call himself President than Diaz—Diaz howls loudly that Sacasa and the Mexicans are all Bolshevists. It is absurd. It is still more absurd for the Associated Press to cable 1,500 words of Diaz's ranting to the United States, and for respectable newspapers to print them. The bulk of Diaz's propaganda is suspicious. So far, he has proved that Calles has recognized Sacasa, as he should, and that some Mexicans have shipped arms to him. Meanwhile Diaz himself is aided by United States marines and aviators; our gunboats blockade the ports in his behalf; our State Department and press associations act as his press agents. It is a vast honor for a man who leaped into the Presidency from an ill-paid job as secretary of an American mining corporation; and shoddy business for a great nation. Who is behind it?

JAPAN IS WEIRDLY MIXED of medieval and modern. A Buddhist priest who attempted to present a petition to the Crown Prince provided himself with a dagger to disembowel himself after so sacrilegious an act; and the chief of police who did not prevent his reaching the running-board of the royal automobile resigned in shame. On the other hand, Japan's Farmer-Labor Party has all the modern frills. The right-wing labor unions retired when the new party decided to admit Communists to membership. Oddly, however, it was the strong Peasants' Union which insisted on including the radicals. Now there will be two labor parties. Between them they represent only 150,000 organized workers, while the latest census figures report 3,128,000 men and 1,562,000 women in industry (the latter a significantly modern figure). In any case, registration under the new Manhood Suffrage Act is proceeding so slowly that Japan may have to fight another election in large part on the old selective franchise. In diplomacy, meanwhile, Japan is ahead of the West. She is actively in negotiation with China for revision of her thirty-year-old commercial treaty, and her methods reveal a thoroughly up-to-date understanding of the farcical art of international intercourse. The Japanese Minister and the Chinese Foreign Minister conferred for three days before China presented her note suggesting revision. Every comma, apparently, was discussed before the note was sent. And even then it was not published!

THE UPPER SILESIAN municipal elections last month were very unsettling. The Poles had hoped for a decisive victory, and the heavy German vote in the industrial centers was a blow. The absurdly complicated arrangement of frontiers made by the League of Nations to accommodate Poland in 1921 doubtless contributed to the result. The rural vote went Polish, but the six chief industrial towns and districts turned in 165,000 votes for the German party, 132,000 for Polish candidates, and 9,200 for Communist and mixed candidates. Kattowitz, the provincial capital, returned 34 Germans and 26 Poles. Five years of Polish propaganda, the prosperity resulting from the British coal strike, suppression and terrorism where needed, and liberal welfare work just before the elections were counted on to swing the balance in Poland's favor. But the tradition of German skill and capital which built up the industry of Upper Silesia (and incidentally Poland's interest in this province) is deep rooted. Moreover, the current dialect, "Wasserpolnisch," is so much more like German than Polish that in some cases Polish propagandists were forced to address their audiences in German to be understood at all. And the Germans used to good advantage the contrast between social progress in Germany since the revolution and conditions under the Polish dictatorship.

MUSSOLINI'S AMBITION to make the Adriatic an Italian lake is stirring the Balkans again. This time he seems to have negotiated a treaty virtually annexing Albania. Naturally, Jugoslavia is alarmed. Not that the Serbs are devoted to the cause of Albanian independence—merely that if Mussolini succeeds in pocketing Albania they fail. Albanian revolutions in the last decade have succeeded one another with startling rapidity, and while Italy has gazed fondly on one party Jugoslavia has nursed the other. Nintchitch, the habitual Foreign Minister at Belgrade, has resigned in indignation, and at this crucial moment old Nikola Pachich, who was Serbia's Prime Minister in pre-war days and has occupied the post intermittently ever since, has died. If Pachich's death brings Stefan Radich to the helm, as seems possible, it will be almost the veteran's greatest service to his country. Radich is a Croat, and his leadership would do much to unite the racial groups of the "Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes."

"INTERALLIED CONTROL" of Germany will cease on January 31, 1927. That is good news. The outcome of the Geneva negotiations is a bargain, but a friendly bargain, reinforcing the significantly growing good-will between France and Germany. The control commission, sitting in Berlin and prying into factories all over Germany, has been an irritation from the start. Enforcement of the disarmament provisions of the Treaty of Versailles is to be turned over to the League Council. That body too may have to settle the moot questions of the German fortifications in the East and of Germany's export of semi-manufactured materials capable of use in war. Both these questions go to the Council if the Conference of Ambassadors cannot settle them; Germany's proposal to refer them for arbitration to the World Court at the Hague was refused—because, the correspondent of the New York Times avows, the members of the League Council have "a better idea of what was in the minds of the persons who drafted the Treaty of Versailles." It is bad business to tie the League to that treaty.

THE HALL-STEVENS FAMILY have been acquitted. In most civilized countries private persons unjustly accused of crime may be indemnified from the public treasury. The British Parliament appropriated £5,000 in the Beck case. Wisconsin and California allow an indemnity not to exceed $5,000 in any case of erroneous conviction of a completely innocent party. France, making concrete Voltaire's proposal, also confines the indemnity to persons unjustly convicted. But Germany, Austria, Hungary, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Portugal, and many of the Swiss cantons permit a wrongfully accused person to claim compensation from the state for the extraordinary sacrifice which he has borne. This is civilized. The state in the public interest of prosecuting crime takes from an innocent person his liberty and lays on him an extraordinary expense. The people of the state should bear in common a loss which they have unjustly imposed on a single individual. The indemnity also helps to reestablish a person's unjustly impugned reputation in the community. Our States should take up this matter by general legislation. A federal bill, making the United States responsible in case of erroneous conviction in the federal courts, introduced in 1913 by Senator Sutherland, now justice of the Supreme Court, was lost in the excitement incident to the war. Such a humanitarian measure should be revived.

IN THE SURVEY GRAPHIC'S long list of distinguished issues none is more stimulating or more provocative of thought and discussion than the recent number on "Woman's Place," edited by Mary Ross. Here we have an impressive summary of the results so far of the Women's Revolution, which may mark the first half of this century more deeply than any other social change. The emotional conflicts that confront the modern woman, the profound choices that are forced upon her, the subtle interactions in home life, in the relations of the sexes, in factory and office are here discussed lightly yet with informed wisdom. If the issue is free of merely spectacular testimony it is even more amazingly free of simple and general dicta. It is concrete and particular and balanced; if it appears partisan to the modern woman its bias is mainly a record of the way of life that the present and the future seem to offer. It is a fascinating textbook of woman in the modern world—worth keeping, after reading, as an historical document to look over in later years when women shall have found their sea legs and the impressive activities of the advancing women of today will seem like the earnest and awkward yet somehow promising movements of a landlubber on his first day out.

IF THE HAND OF PROVIDENCE had reached down and arrested the policemen who, on December 12, arrested ninety-eight persons in Irvington, N. J., for violating a 1798 law against working on Sunday, it would have been appropriate. For the policemen, too, surely violated the law in performing their labors. They arrested bus-drivers, trolley conductors, merchants, gasoline vendors, bootblacks, and even the reporters and photographers who, for hire, had assembled to catch a news story. But nobody arrested the officers of the law or Recorder Frederic Stoddard, who fined each law-breaker—except himself and the policemen—two dollars. Clarence Darrow, who, at a recent Nation dinner, declared that the way to change an unpopular law is to disobey it, is thus proved both right and wrong. For the Blue Laws have certainly not been obeyed; for a full century they have been blandly, openly, and persistently ignored. Yet when, as in Irvington last Sunday, they are obeyed their absurdity becomes so evident that they must surely be brought nearer to repeal than by a century of neglect.

Christmas Puddin'

A bag pudding the King did make,
And stuffed it well with plums,
And in it put great lumps of fat
As big as my two thumbs.

THEIR [illegible] days. In our time kings [illegible]r make plum-puddings. Perhaps that is why [illegible]ng their thrones. But though royalty does not [illegible] this big pudding, that modern king of kings, the [illegible]t on a larger scale than ever. A press dispatch from London, the capital of puddingdom, tells us [illegible] of the Savoy opened the plum-pudding season [illegible] and to-day [illegible] already made [illegible] this delectable dish for consumption in the [illegible] to speak of keeping the home puddings [illegible] dispatch continues:

> [illegible] For thirty years he has assembled his assistants about him [illegible] several weeks before Christmas. Then, with [illegible] must be taken from some quaint religious [illegible] he poured the first bottle of brandy into the [illegible] mixture. A diminutive pudding always makes [illegible]

What one result [illegible] an inkling of the solidity of Great Britain. Plum-pudding, under the [illegible] is not merely a food; it is a British institution. It may almost be called the British institution. Indeed it is probably the reason why [illegible] have a flag that the sun never sets on and that others merely set on.

Christmas pudding, they like to call it in England, although the term should be reserved for an unusually rich and mellow one, specially designed for the holiday season. "Mix your puddings several weeks in advance," advises the chef of the Savoy, "and let the flavor improve." Several weeks! That would never have done in the good old days when King Arthur did the cooking. In less opportunist times than ours the open season for plum-pudding making began as soon as summer was out of the way, but the product was preserved for the holiday season of the year following, for its contents were such that it could be depended upon to carry out the principles of Dr. Coué; every day and in every way it grew better and better. In fact, a tip-top plum-pudding is so good that it is as excellent cold as hot. That it is often eaten that way is recalled by the story of the family butler who asked his mistress solicitously: "Will you heat your pudding cold or shall I 'eat it for you?"

We Americans have never got anywhere with pudding; neither in the making nor the eating of it. Pie is our national dish, and it is fit and proper that it should have no serious rival in our affections. In the direction of puddings we have a few weak sisters: rice, bread, tapioca, [illegible]. They are baked puddings and as such are not really puddings at all. They are fluffy, unsubstantial confections which digest in two or three hours, whereas a real pudding is a sturdy dish for heroes and strong men. It is not baked but boiled in a bag like King Arthur's; and it doesn't leave you with an empty feeling a few hours after eating. It has a staying quality which has passed from it into the English people; it grapples the inside of the stomach and goes with you for the rest of the day. The national wealth of Great Britain must go into Christmas puddings if one may judge by the Savoy recipe:

> Twelve ounces Malaga raisins, 12 ounces currants, 12 ounces suet, 9 ounces flour, 4 ounces chopped apple, 1 ounce orange peel, 8 ounces brown sugar, half pint milk, 12 ounces Smyrna raisins, 12 ounces crystallized peel, 10 ounces bread crumbs, 1 ounce ginger, 1 ounce citron peel, 1 teaspoonful salt, 6 eggs, quarter of a pint of brandy or sherry.
>
> All the dry ingredients should be well mixed together. A little extra mixing well repays the trouble. Beat the eggs and add them to the milk, then pour over the dry ingredients and again mix thoroughly. Pack into greased molds and boil for six hours at the time of making. The puddings should be boiled for a further six hours when wanted for use. The best sauces are white, custard, or brandy sauce.

We do not make many puddings like that—fortunately, perhaps, because this is no country in which to eat them. When a true Christmas pudding does get itself made among us it serves chiefly as a table ornament. Nobody eats more than a bite or two—again fortunately. For America, although a land of many blessings, has not a climate adapted to bold eating. It lacks the stimulus of those cold, penetrating fogs, of that moisture-laden, marrow-piercing air. In our earlier outdoor days we were fair-to-middling eaters, but latterly there are everywhere signs of decay: consommés, salads, custards, and such flubdubbery. Any American who has ever tried to eat his way through a day with an Englishman on his home grounds has tasted life. He starts off at nine o'clock (thank heaven, the English have a reasonable breakfast hour) with porridge, followed by finnan haddie or other salt fish, which leads up to a bountiful plate of bacon and eggs, a pot of tea, and a generous portion of toast and marmalade with which to top off. The middle of the day calls for a light soup (say, purée of split pea), an evanescent mutton chop (two inches thick), a bursting potato, and a vegetable trifle like boiled cabbage. When this has been washed down with a pint of bitter one has laid a fitting foundation. He may dam up the rest of his stomach with plum-pudding, confident of some permanency in an otherwise mutable and dissolving universe. But at four o'clock one puts one's legs under the table again for tea, toasted scones, and a few trivial slices of plum cake—presumably designed to clamp the pudding down. What an Englishman eats after that no American has ever found out, because he's stretched out on a sofa asking for his passport home.

No, puddings are not for Americans, but they are the mainstay and the standby of every Briton-born. If not his first thought, they are at least his last, as evidenced by the dialogue in an East End fried fish shop:

"Gimme some fried fish."
"Hot or cold?"
"Hot."
"Eat it here or take it with yer?"
"Eat it here."
"Fork or fingers?"
"Aw [in disgust], gimme puddin'."

Some folks think it's patriotism that has made Great Britain great. Tommyrot! It's puddin'.

Calvin Coolidge, Socialist

THAT was such a sensational message which President Coolidge sent to Congress on December 7 that the New York Times placed over it the thrilling and unexpected heading, "PRESIDENT URGES CAUTION ON CONGRESS." Superficially it is a cheerful Christmas message for all of our citizens—but only superficially. True, in reporting on the state of the Union he found it "impossible to characterize it other than one of general peace and prosperity." To this he added, with his delicate sense of what is new and startling: "In some quarters our diplomacy is vexed with difficult and as yet unsolved problems, but nowhere are we met with armed conflict." With this assurance to his readers that we have no private war going on under cover unknown to the public, he launched into a panegyric on economy: "Nothing is more destructive of the progress of the nation than government extravagance."

But this is not the most striking part of Mr. Coolidge's message, nor is the early keynote which reads thus: "What the country requires is not so much new policies as a steady continuation of those which are already being crowned with such abundant success." He sagely advises that it would "be greatly for the welfare of the country if we avoided at the present session all commitments except those of the most pressing nature. From a reduction of the debt and taxes will accrue a wider benefit to all the people of this country than from embarking upon any new enterprise." However, he would have "a balanced portion of the surplus revenue" applied not to the reduction of the debt but to the reduction of taxation. Nevertheless, he favors "a speedy reduction of the debt as already required by law and in accordance with the promises made to the holders of our Liberty bonds"; but he also sees no reason why we should not come to the relief of the taxpayers by "making reductions in the income-tax payments which accrue on the 15th of March and June, 1927." These are his "convictions stated with full knowledge that it is for the Congress to decide whether they judge it best to make such a reduction or leave the surplus for the present year to be applied to retirement of the war debt." Having thus clearly and succinctly stated his opinions, Congress will, of course, know just how to act.

We confess to an uneasy feeling that the President, who has till now been rated as a very Gibraltar of conservatism, has succumbed to the insidious and soul-destroying propaganda of socialism. With alarm we find his keynote to be advocacy of a socialistic dealing with the cotton situation, urging that 4,000,000 bales of cotton be purchased and withheld from the market, thus interfering with the normal functioning of the great law of supply and demand, which is the very heart of private business. More than that, he urges "a reduction of about one-third in the [cotton] acreage in the coming year." The virus has, however, affected him even more deeply than this. We find him urging the lowering of all the freight rates of all the railroads for the benefit of all the farmers, demanding further consolidation of the railroads, and, most sinister of all, praising the Government Inland Waterways Corporation under which the government operates boats on 2,500 miles of navigable streams, a violent government plunge into private business. At point after point he wishes to put the government into private business; he wants to broaden and strengthen federal credit agencies which compete with private banks; he wishes to throw open more public lands for grazing in competition with privately owned lands; he calls for the development of those cooperative associations which some of our leading business men declare to be a step toward communistic marketing; he urges a legislative interference with the private bituminous coal industry by Congress in that he asks for the passage of legislation to enable him to interfere in any struggle between employers and employees, and in time of trouble to distribute coal and to fix the price of coal for the consumer. Next, he insists that the government rigidly supervise and control the private radio business by a radio board and the Department of Commerce.

Nor are these urgings that the government compete with private enterprise to be offset by the declaration that he is "in favor of reducing rather than expanding government bureaus which seek to regulate and control the business activities of the people." When he declares the next moment for a stricter enforcement of the prohibition amendment, advocates the extension of the Mississippi River transportation system, and refrains from urging the immediate transfer of our government-owned merchant marine to private hands we can readily see that unconsciously he has yielded to subtle influences which, as the Daughters of the Revolution and the American Legion so well know, strike directly at our fundamental liberties. What will these patriots do about it? We tremble as we await their decision.

Claude Monet, 1840-1926

THE death of Claude Monet is in a sense the death of impressionism itself. The thousands of impressionist pictures that are being turned out now, and that are likely to be turned out for generations to come, are at best the work of epigoni, at worst the result of a lifeless formula with slight relation to the life of our time.

The impressionists were a typical product of their experimental, individualist epoch. Nineteenth-century France, oscillating between revolution and reaction, republic and empire, civil and foreign war, witnessed a parallel oscillation in its cultural life. In art the classic and romantic, the realist, naturalist, and impressionist schools followed in rapid succession, each in its turn envisaging new aims, adopting new methods, accomplishing new triumphs, and each contributing its mite to the body of aesthetic riches which placed nineteenth-century France in the forefront of Europe. Other schools may have exercised a wider influence than impressionism; few have provoked more acrimonious controversy. Impressionist exhibitions were signals to battle in which every statute in the code of literary etiquette was violated. But the ferocious onslaughts of its enemies were more than matched by the passionate defense of its friends, Duret, Huysmans, Zola, Mirbeau, Mauclair, who in the end forced the recognition and acceptance of the new doctrine. Of this movement Monet was the most consistent protagonist. It was one of his own canvases exhibited in 1874 which gave the name to the movement; and since the age of sixteen, when Monet exhibited for the first time, and for almost seventy years thereafter, his work and person illustrated the halting beginning, the gradual development, and the culminating perfection of the entire impressionist school.

Impressionism sought to grip and stay the momentary impressions of things, men, and events, to render concrete and permanent the fleeting, changing aspects that colored and characterized the life of the nineteenth century. "Tout est à peindre." Crooked alleys and spacious boulevards, rickety shanties and magnificent cathedrals, the race track, the bar room, the dance hall—all the variegated modernity, crossed at certain points by traces of the medieval and ancient epochs, entered the impressionist's angle of vision. Monet himself painted still-lifes, genre pictures, portraits, but it was light playing on field, sky, and water which formed the true subject of his most characteristic pictures. The commonly accepted practice among artists to divide the march of seasons and the passage of hours into summer, winter, spring, and fall, and morning, evening, day, and night, is arbitrary and artificial. There are numberless gradations within these divisions; every hour of the day is different from every other hour of the same day. The world is to the impressionist a stream of unique sense-impressions seen once and never to be repeated. Accordingly, Monet painted his haystacks, water lilies, poplars, cathedrals.

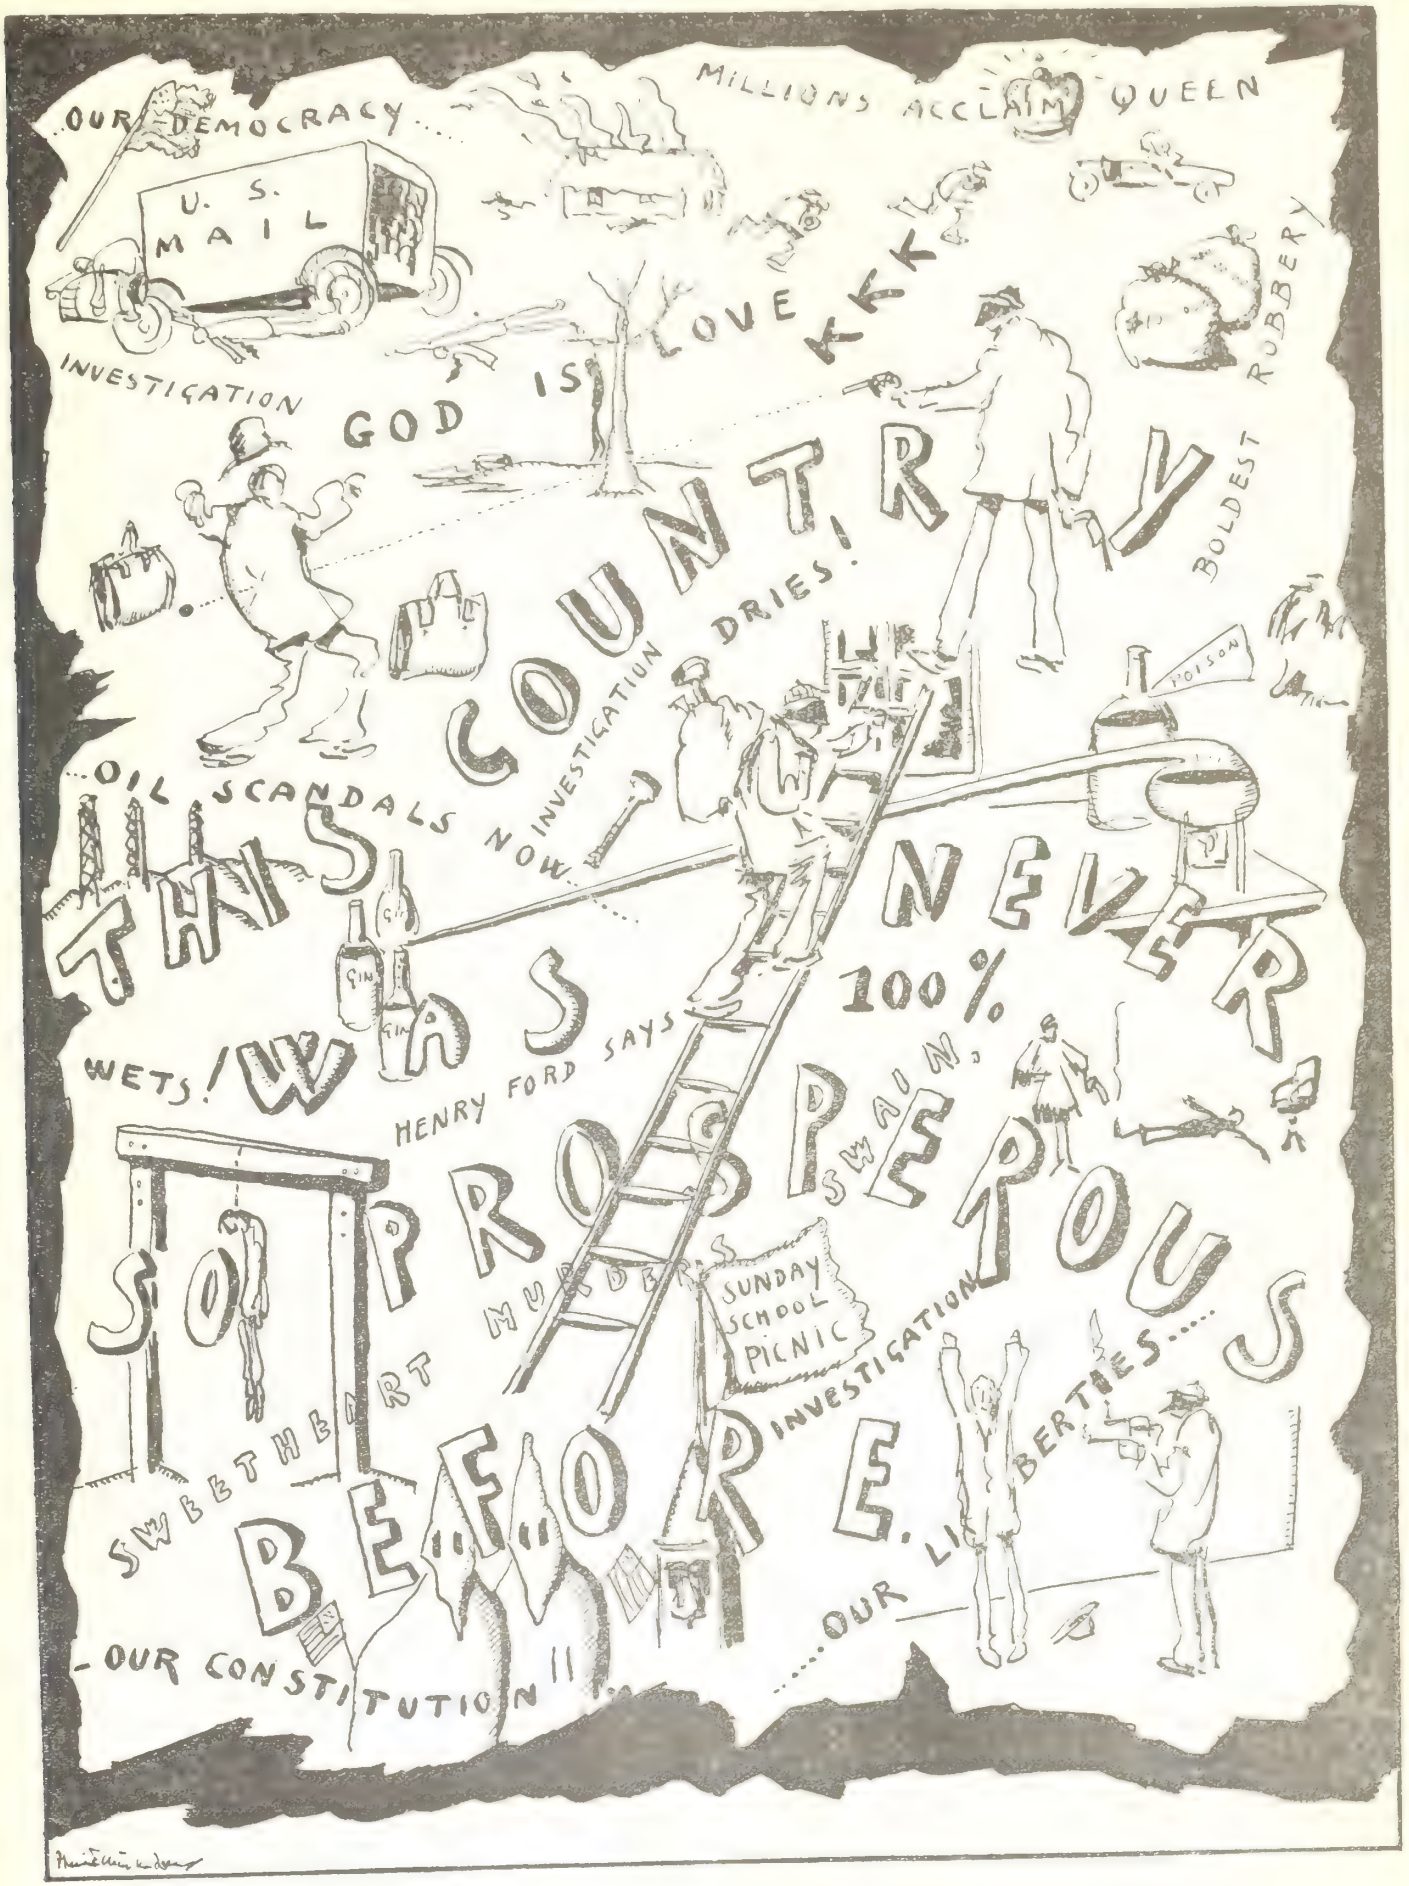
The new aims which the impressionists had set themselves required a revision of old methods. While some influences may be traced in part to Japanese art, and to Constable and Delacroix, more important still were the scientific discoveries of Chevreul and Rood. Color was raised to a higher pitch and greater variety by concentrating light upon it. A more vigorous brushwork was practiced and the technique of pointillisme was developed, in which spectral colors were used without being mixed on the palette but placed in small dots and in complementary juxtaposition on canvas, where, seen from a certain distance, they blend, giving the desired hue with great brilliance. Even the shadows were made aglow with color and vibration.

His eyesight failing and his general health weakened, Monet passed his last years at Giverny. He had lived long enough to see the triumph of the principles for which he fought. Impressionism, which began as a rebellion against the academy, ironically enough was later sanctified in academic circles and even used as a club against the newer tendencies. It is gratifying, however, to know that Monet himself was more tolerant toward these newer tendencies; and, remembering perhaps his own early struggles, he had even words of praise for their "esprit de bataille et de découverte."



Friar Bacon

AT a memorial meeting in honor of the late Professor Newbolt of the University of Pennsylvania two members of the Department of Chemistry at that institution announced the performance of an odd experiment. Working upon a hitherto unknown formula recorded in cipher by Roger Bacon, they succeeded in producing a certain salt of copper, and, though the cumbersome formula is useless, the result of the experiment is to vindicate Professor Newbolt's reading of a strange manuscript and to remind the public again of one of the most remarkable adventures of modern paleography.

About fourteen years ago a well-known dealer brought to this country a fascinating vellum volume of which the documentary history could not be traced farther back than 1665, but which appeared to be an original production of Friar Bacon. Adorned with various drawings of cell development and other microscopic details of plant structure, and having the superficial appearance of a treatise on alchemy, it was eagerly scanned by scholars on account of the half-historical, half-legendary position of its author as a man centuries in advance of the scientific knowledge of his contemporaries and possessed of secrets not known to others until they were rediscovered centuries later. The text of the work was mere gibberish, but, since Bacon was reputed to have concealed much of his knowledge rather than increase an already dangerous reputation as a magician, a cipher was suspected. Various experts failed, however, to make anything out of it until Mr. Newbolt announced before a meeting of the American Philosophical Society in 1921 that he had found the key. Under a lens each letter was seen to be composed of a number of separate strokes, and these strokes were the symbols used in a known system of Greek shorthand. Pursuing this discovery Mr. Newbolt was able to decipher considerable portions of the text and, to his amazement, brought to light records of historical events, astrological observations, and bits of philosophical and scientific theory which had doubtless been securely locked there since Bacon died late in the thirteenth century. In the opinion of some, the manuscript demonstrated his knowledge of the compound microscope, and certainly he had observed certain details of living organisms not again noted for four hundred years, until the days of Leeuwenhoek and Hamm. Unfortunately, however, the cipher was not completely unambiguous. It seemed to allow considerable latitude for the exercise of ingenuity in interpretation, and there were some, not wholly convinced, who argued that perhaps Mr. Newbolt, though perfectly sincere, was reading into the mysterious symbols the contents of his own unconscious mind, so that he died without having won entire acceptance for his reading.

Now, however, the experiment at Pennsylvania seems to have applied the best possible sort of objective test, and the result is both to vindicate Mr. Newbolt and to add support to the long-enduring legend of Friar Bacon. Not only will it awaken the keenest interest of all serious medievalists and doubtless stimulate someone to complete Mr. Newbolt's translation but it will come as a comfort also to those of romantic disposition whom it pleases to see picturesque legends maintained. Nor does the support come any too soon, for the fame of the friar has been sadly dimmed of late. In the days of Shakespeare every street urchin had heard of the wonderful brazen head which he was supposed to have made speak and many had seen him appear as a sort of Faustus upon the contemporary stage; today not everybody can distinguish him very clearly from "the author of Shakespeare's plays" and his legend has not escaped the destructive criticism of scholars. In his monumental "History of Magic and Experimental Science During the First Thirteen Centuries of Our Era" Lynn Thorndike not only questions the old story of his persecution by the church but attempts as well to prune of its extravagances the legend of his almost superhuman wisdom, stoutly maintaining that Bacon was more conspicuously a man of his age than one who transcended it. Now, however, the remarkable cipher throws a new glamor about his name: he was engaged in making actual, detailed, scientific observations, and for some reason, real or fanciful, he did think it necessary to record his thoughts in a laboriously indirect fashion. For once then, minute investigation comes to the rescue of romance, and we are at liberty again to fancy the friar, solitary in the cold cell of his cloister, penetrating secrets which were to be his alone for centuries, one more example of

A mind forever
Voyaging through strange seas of thought, alone.

On reading the first batch of home newspapers after an absence of three weeks in Europe

Doheny—A Portrait in Oil

By RAYMOND CLAPPER

CONSOLED by the presence of his family and his staff of high-priced lawyers, E. L. Doheny sits in criminal court at Washington bearing with the patient countenance of misjudged virtue the insinuations of government prosecutors who charge that he gave a Cabinet officer $100,000 to get naval oil reserves worth $100,000,000.

This florid little man is smiling in such a friendly way that we feel unkind even to suspect him. We listen to his able counsel and almost believe that the republic is an ingrate to try this man for criminal conspiracy.

For Mr. Doheny, it seems, is the unfortunate victim of a malady somewhat like that of the lamented Midas. Everything he touches turns to oil. He can't help it. In the early seventies he started, penniless, south from Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, in charge of a bunch of shave-tail mules. For every one of those mules he finally brought back a fine large oil company paying enough dividends to support for the time being most of the good lawyers in Washington, D. C. He prospected for gold and silver in New Mexico, discovered the Los Angeles and other California oil fields, went into Mexico and discovered the Tampico fields, and finally pried open the great Elk Hills naval oil reserve in California. This last deal, he said, should return him $100,000,000, and his earlier ventures also were not without profit.

Mr. Doheny took the witness stand and told part of this story. He told how he had been the town surveyor in Atchison, Kansas; horse-trader in Oklahoma, soldier in the Indian wars, school-teacher, law student, miner, oil prospector, making fortunes and losing them, finally coming out as the largest property holder in Mexico, many times a millionaire. Young members on the jury had read such stories in dime thrillers. Here was a worthy model for Horatio Alger in the flesh.

Riches have never kept him from Doing Good. Sometimes one feels, listening to his able counsel, that he was a dealer in good deeds rather than oil. He was president of the (very) Practical Patriots' League of Los Angeles. His friend President Obregon in Mexico needed money. Mr. Doheny is glad to oblige with a $10,000,000 loan. His friend in Washington needs money. "Here, Ned, put this $100,000 in the brown satchel and take it down to Albert." His country needs help. The Japs are coming to attack us. The armament conference won't save us. The navy must have oil tanks at Hawaii. "I'll save the country from the Japs. I'll build you some tanks without one dollar of profit if it takes every cent I've got." Some have suspected that he went into Mexico to make money. It is true that he did buy up 280,000 acres near Tampico for slightly more than $1 an acre from the descendant of a Spanish family which had held the land since the sixteenth century. This man had no idea his land was being bought as one of the world's richest oil fields. But as Doheny said, "years later, he was still my warm friend and never expressed any regret that he had parted with the property which afterwards proved to be more valuable than he supposed it to be."

The original discoverers of this wonderful oil region were Americans [Mr. Doheny said in a letter to Mark L. Requa, United States Fuel Oil Administrator, March 15, 1918]. Their proposed efforts in Mexico were welcomed by the government of that republic, which desired to stimulate new industries therein; by the railroad company near whose line the first development was undertaken and which hoped to and did benefit by the development of a superior locomotive fuel supply at 50 per cent of the cost of that which theretofore had been imported for its use; by the merchants of Tampico and vicinity whose business promised to be enhanced by activities thus initiated; by landowners of the region about Tampico who anticipated wider markets for their products and better prices for lands which might be supposed to contain petroleum. Even the laborers, known as peons, who could not then realize the advantage which might accrue to them, have since shown their appreciation and gratitude, by kindly feelings and helpful actions, for the treatment which these Americans accorded to them and which became possible only through the successful carrying on of the plans of these prospectors.

In its earlier years this was a somewhat discouraging venture. Nearly $3,000,000 was spent before any substantial revenue developed. Many stockholders dropped out. Doheny picked up their holdings. From a one-eighth owner, he became the holder of 40 per cent of the stock. Companies in which he is interested control 1,500,000 acres in the Tampico district, operate thirty-one tank vessels and hire many more, own 1,700 tank cars and 600 miles of pipe line. The Pan-American Petroleum and Transport Company, which got the Elk Hills naval oil lease, had a net operating income in 1925 of $32,000,000 after depletion allowances were taken out. Its assets are about $189,000,000. Although control of this gigantic holding company has passed into the hands of the Standard Oil of Indiana since the naval oil leases were made in 1922, Doheny retains a large interest in it, and in some twenty or more other oil and related concerns.

When there is anything to be done, Doheny lets nothing stand in his way. Toward the end of the Wilson Administration when he was in difficulty in Mexico, he hired Democratic job-holders as fast as they would come to him. McAdoo drew $250,000 in salaries from Doheny for pressing his oil claims in Mexico. Before Franklin K. Lane resigned as Wilson's Secretary of Interior, Doheny arranged to take him on his pay roll. He also took Lane's bright young secretary, J. J. Cotter. Former Attorney General Gregory was hired jointly by Doheny and other oil interests to handle claims for them.

Possibly the initiative has not always been on the side of Doheny. It was Fall who wanted the $100,000. Doheny has many times found hard-up politicians only too eager to take his money. Probably his code of political ethics has suffered considerably from associations. Perhaps he played the game according to the only rules he knew—rules already set when he came on the scene looking for a stake. And he had the courage to take the witness stand and defend that code against cross-examination by one of the ablest lawyers in the country.

This is the man who told the Senate committee: "I am just an ordinary, old-time, impulsive, irresponsible, improvident sort of a prospector."

Just about as improvident as Calvin Coolidge.

An Air Law for America

By M. W. ROYSE

THE long arm of the law has reached up at last into airspace. With the passage of the Air Commerce Act the last "free domain" may be said to have passed out of existence, over the protests of those who urged the old States' rights theory to prove that each State owned its airspace with no room for federal meddling, and of those who dramatically pleaded for one natural medium unlimited by man-made law.

European airmen have never stopped wondering at our backwardness in aviation. America, with its long distances, its comparatively few railroads and great resources should be leading the world in air transportation. As it was, until this year, we could not credit ourselves with even one commercial air-transportation line. Aviation reports broadcast the fact that thousands of Americans take air passage each year but these passengers are merely up for a joy-hop and not travelers going from one place to another. There is no actual air traffic. Europe, on the other hand, in spite of its miniature distances and criss-crossing railroads, its alleged old-world conservatism and post-war economic troubles, has developed a complete air-transportation system. So complete has this air development been that practically every large city in Europe has air connections with others. Today Europe can be crossed in one-fourth the fastest train time at only twice the railroad rates.

Air development in America was difficult as long as our government remained aloof, withholding from aviation even the ordinary licensing and inspection aid given shipping and the railroads. Pilots without licenses flew airplanes which had never been inspected, resulting in hundreds of crashes. Insurance rates mounted skywards and financial circles refused to support the industry. The public came to regard aviation as a dangerous sport and the airplane as a stunt machine whose chief function was to thrill people at fairs. Few Americans today think of aviation as an everyday means of transportation.

"Free air" proved itself a disastrous luxury for American commercial aviation. Government regulation, if carried out with some degree of efficiency, could have prevented many of the 508 crashes of the past three years. These crashes were caused by unairworthy machines, errors in piloting, lack of terminals, routes, and weather data. Government reports attribute 91 per cent of all the accidents to the itinerant fliers who operate without a fixed base, "through inexperience and the use of cheap and unsafe equipment." Until very recently there were no air routes, licenses, and inspections, no weather reports for airmen, no government terminals except military fields, although there were 124 aerial companies already in existence with 162 private airports located throughout the country, with some 1,100 airplanes in operation. Recently a plane crashed near Garden City, killing its passenger. Upon investigation it was found that its pilot was not a licensed airman. His main occupation in life was selling cigars and sandwiches near the flying field. Between hours he had taken a few lessons in flying, later buying a machine and embarking in the passenger-carrying business. This pilot legally was innocent, as no license or inspection regulations existed and he had therefore broken no law in risking the lives of his passengers. The past six years have seen hundreds of such cases. To the average person any pilot clad in helmet and goggle is sufficient assurance of a safe flight. Rarely is a pilot asked for his certificate of competency, or for an inspection card showing his plane to be airworthy. Private air schools of one sort or another are still graduating pilots with a bare four hours' training. Until the air law goes into effect these "graduate" pilots will be touring the country, risking the necks of thousands of passengers.

It is popularly thought that the past six years have served their purpose as the pioneering stage of commercial aviation in America. What really happened was a mushroom growth of small dealers who sold war-stock airplanes to ex-service pilots who in turn barnstormed the countryside as "gipsies," stunting at fairs and in general giving people the thrills of a flight. Occasional crashes helped spread the popular notion that aviation was a dangerous sport fit only for the young and bold. Gipsy flying made experienced airmen out of pilots, but it also gave the circus stamp to commercial aviation. Contrast this "pioneering" with the six years' experience of European air lines, operating under the control of licensed pilots on regular schedule time and competing with rail and water transportation.

Our new air law is at least a good start. It provides for a Bureau of Civil Aeronautics in the Department of Commerce. This bureau, under an Assistant Secretary for Air, has charge of federal inspection of aircraft, crews, and airdromes and the establishment and enforcement of air navigation rules. It will also furnish aids to air navigation by approving and charting air routes, establishing air lighthouses and signal stations, furnishing suitable weather reports, and providing at the government fields, in cases of emergency, supplies and repairs at their fair market value. It is to be hoped that there will be no rigid restrictions tending to stifle new experiments. The Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Air is given plenty of latitude for real action. There is, of course, a danger that he may create inspection bureaus which, as they did in England, may interfere with scientific research by hemming in experimenters with rigid bureaucratic regulations and over-strict artificial standards. This danger is more than apparent, and has already appeared in the preliminary draft of a proposed code. Last fall an Englishman, after building a light-motor airplane to be sold at cheap popular price, found that the inspection officials had altered his design so much as to make his machine an expensive regulation airplane. Most of the light parts in this design had been made heavier. These changes called for a larger motor which in turn greatly increased the price and destroyed all the commercial value possessed by the original design. If wisely executed our new air law will in no way hamper experimentation. Special provision is made for trials giving the individual complete freedom to test and fly new inventions no matter how freakish they are so long as they do not endanger the public safety. No machine, however, will be permitted to carry passengers unless it has been inspected and licensed as a public carrier. European air laws carefully protect the public against the unproved freak machine, but they in no way prohibit the building and testing of such experimental freaks, from helicopters to tailless and wingless machines.

Safe air travel will be the primary aim of the new Air Board. Public confidence in air travel must be created. To accomplish this, air accidents must be decreased to a percentage lower even than railroad casualties. In Germany a rigid system of inspection and licensing has helped cut accidents to a negligible ratio. The following experts' list of "six requisites for safe flying" will serve as a basis for the new air regulations:

1. A machine, sound aerodynamically and structurally.
2. A reliable engine of sufficient power.
3. A competent, conservative pilot and navigator.
4. Airports and emergency landing fields, sufficiently close together to insure gliding to safety.
5. Nation-wide weather forecast, specialized and adapted to the need of fliers.
6. Adequate charts of air routes.

To make air travel safe much more is needed than regulations. There must be well-equipped airways. A competent air line between New York and Chicago must have emergency fields every fifty miles for forced landings, and the airports must be large enough, and must be properly drained and maintained, all of which involves a high outlay of capital. In Europe no private company has been able to do this. European commercial aviation, after a seven years' tryout, seems to fall for the present into that category of industries which cannot exist without direct government aid. American aviation men resent this. They declare that no government help is wanted or needed. But this hardly tallies with the results of the first six months' operation of our first American airline or with European experience. Until airplanes can be built and operated at reduced costs with greater carrying capacity, less fuel consumption, with more reliable power and more certain navigation instruments, in other words, until air transportation is made safer and cheaper the independent air line will find itself hard pressed making ends meet. Not one airline in all Europe, notwithstanding the great air development, is making profit. The most efficient airlines, such as the Dutch KLM, bring in but 60 per cent of the operating costs. Last spring the greatest air transportation system in the world, the Junkers concern, with ramifications extending into Asia, went bankrupt with a loss to the German Government of over $5,000,000. The total receipts of the average line operating in Europe is about 50 per cent of the cost of operation. The various governments by means of direct cash subsidies supply the deficit.

A privately owned air line, operating here or abroad, has three means of support open to it. It can receive direct cash subsidies from the government on the basis of forming a vital arm of the national defense. Secondly, a private line can appeal to municipalities, local governments, and civic bodies on patriotic grounds and as a public utility. The German lines in this way have persuaded many municipalities and most of the local states to buy large blocks of their shares. Airdromes and free local publicity are also obtained in this way. Thirdly, an air line can operate independently as a private concern similar to any other private business, with only mail contracts to bolster up its income. For America the first two methods, direct national subsidies and indirect state or municipal subsidies, may be dismissed at once as opposed to American tradition. Only the third method is open here to airmen, and on this basis several air lines are now in operation, with mail contracts as the only guaranty of traffic. Following the European practice, chambers of commerce and other local organizations were appealed to for help. Cities along the air route responded by promising to send a minimum amount of mail via the air. It is still far too early to judge, but one air line has already changed ownership, and the largest air line operating through the Middle West is finding its pioneering extremely costly.

Another plan—well known in Europe and not untried here—has been proposed as the practical solution for American commercial aviation. It is federal ownership and operation of several main trunk lines. This would involve no radical step, as it should be recalled that our federal air-mail service has been in operation for eight years, during which time it has established a world record in efficiency. In the fiscal year ended last July the federal air-mail service covered about 2.5 million miles, nearly half of which were flown at night. Schedules were maintained to a degree not far below that of many railroads, 93.73 per cent of the scheduled trips being completed on the entire system with even a better performance record of 94.22 per cent for the New York-Chicago night service.

Our air-mail service is pointed to everywhere abroad as the only contribution we have thus far made to air transportation. Only the government could have undertaken and carried through so enormous an undertaking as the coast-to-coast trunk line, with its emergency fields, lights, stations, weather-reporting system, and night-flying equipment. The transcontinental route from New York to San Francisco alone includes eighteen regular, fully equipped air stations and ninety-two intermediate landing fields. Operation costs for the federal air mail last year amounted to $2,782,422. Cost of operation always exceeded its revenues, but the annual deficit had steadily been decreased. Had the government retained its air-mail service and simply widened its service to include passengers we would have had government-owned-and-operated air lines. The experiment would have been interesting. Personnel and equipment, airdromes, emergency fields, signal service, and a vast technical bureau were already on hand. The service was noted for its efficiency. Not a breath of scandal touched its reputation. It was altogether an ideal setting for the inauguration of government air-transportation lines. The government, however, has taken the opposite direction. Fourteen private lines are already carrying mail. By next summer our entire air-mail service will be under private control and operation.

It is only partly true that commercial aviation, as some critics would have it, is only another weapon in disguise, to be kept running in peace time and used in war. The system of air lines in Europe no doubt plays a major role in the plans for national defense, and it is well known that the real object of the foreign air subsidies is military air power, but the ultimate value of aircraft lies in its purely civil function as a great reducer of time and distance. Aerial transportation is not a paying proposition now, but the fact remains that in the airplane we have a means of reducing our present traveling time by 400 per cent, with unlimited possibilities for further development. The new air law, if enforced by wise regulations, will at least give American airmen a fair chance—their first chance—at commercial aviation. The odds for the present are against them, judging by European standards, but it is not unlikely that American methods may show Europe how to turn an air-transportation line into a profitable business.

The Unimpeachable Gift

VIKING BOOKS — for more than a season

3 discoveries from 3 countries

POWER
by Lion Feuchtwanger

From Germany comes "one of the great romances of the twentieth century."—The Literary Review. $2.50.

THE TWO SISTERS
by H. E. Bates

From England comes this novel of youth by a twenty-one year old author—the discovery of Edward Garnett, discoverer of Conrad, Galsworthy and W. H. Hudson. $2.00.

THE TIME OF MAN
by Elizabeth Madox Roberts

In America Elizabeth Madox Roberts "steps with her first novel to the front rank of American writers." A Book-of-the-Month Club Selection. 47th Thousand. $2.50.

MOHAMMED
by R. F. Dibble

The story of the prophet, politician, lover, warrior and man. Carl Van Doren in The Nation says: "This gorgeous story Mr. Dibble tells robustly and shrewdly." $3.00.

GAUTIER
by John Garber Palache

An informative and entertaining volume on Gautier, Balzac, Baudelaire, and other of Gautier's circle, combining biography, anecdote and criticism. Illustrated. $3.00.

The SECOND BOOK of NEGRO SPIRITUALS

Carl Van Vechten in The Herald Tribune: "I predict that this new collection will be just as popular as the first, and deservedly so." With 61 songs and an introduction. $3.50.

30 Irving Place THE VIKING PRESS New York City

ARETINO

Translated by* PUTNAM

IN TWO VOLUMES PRICE $17.50

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY

BROKEN NECKS

by* BEN HECHT

THROBBING HUMAN STORIES

PRICE $2.50

PASCAL COVICI - Publisher - CHICAGO

THE MODERN LIBRARY

REVIVES

ANDREAS LATZKO'S

MEN IN WAR

A BOLD, BLAZING BOOK, FROWNED ON IN 1917 BY A GOVERNMENT THAT WAS BUSY LADLING SENTIMENTAL SLOP ABOUT THE WAR TO THE PUBLIC, NOW OFFERED AGAIN COMPLETE AND UNEXPURGATED

OTHER RECENT ADDITIONS

JAMES JOYCE'S DUBLINERS

GEORGE GISSING'S NEW GRUB STREET

LUDWIG LEWISOHN'S UP STREAM

DANIEL DEFOE'S MOLL FLANDERS

95 CENTS A COPY

AT ALL BOOKSHOPS

Send for Catalogue of the 125 Titles

MODERN LIBRARY, Inc., 71 West 45th Street NEW YORK

The Unimp

"The most beautiful of all the Lincoln biographies."
Chicago Tribune.

Carl Sandburg's

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Fifth Printing

"A fresh Lincoln contribution is an event, though none has ever turned out to be an event so distinguished and unusual as Carl Sandburg's."
IDA M. TARBELL.

"... become a permanent part of American literature."
N. Y. Times.

"... a fine time."—Saturday Re...

"A masterpiece ... a glowing, beautiful piece of prose."—The Bookman

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York

The Monumental Masterpiece whic...

LOVE-LIFE

by Wil...

"UNDOUBTEDLY a great work. Here ... Lucretius, Spinoza, Goethe, Schopenha...

ALBERT & CHARLES BONI, - -

TURGENEV

The Man, His Art and His Ag...

by Avrahm Yarmolinsky

The only biography in any language o... the strange, mystic, turbulent Russ... Tator genius. An analytical soul stud... in the modern fashion, a dramatic huma... history. Dr. Yarmolinsky has recreate... the glamor and intellectual passion of a glittering and ele... gant literary age. He shows us the development of th... creative mind, going blindly forward to its goal, yet urge... always by an immitigable and predestined power. Illus... index. Royal octavo, black, gold and green. $4.00

THE NEGRO

In American Life by Jerome Dowd

A full and unbiased history of the Negro race in this country. What is the future of the Negro? Segregation? Or emigration? Or a gradual infusion into the composite American race of the future? Jerome Dowd has given 25 years to a study of this tremendous problem. He has produced a book intellectually stimulating to the general reader, invaluable as an authority to the sociologist. Royal octavo, 610 pages, index, brown, black and red. $5.00

THE CENTURY CO., Publishers of Enduring Books

Christopher Robin Plays Again!

The

DARK DAWN

DODD MEAD

By MARTI...

Author o...

Another dramatic st...

ZONA GALE in N. Y. He... invention, living beings an... sorbing reading."

JOHN COWPER POWYS ... balancing remarkable and ... other and for adding to r... weird, eerie, and uncanny ...

DOROTHY SCARBOROU... 'Shows conclusively that t... author . . . an achievement ...

$2.00

DODD, MEAD & CO.,

tchable Gift

ver 150,000 copies in Germany

N NATURE

lölsche

over whose composition the spirits of Plato, rwin must have presided."—The Nation.

Two volumes, boxed, $10.00

- 66 Fifth Avenue, New York

Sherwood Anderson

merica's most dis-ctive novelist. One the most original velists ever heard . He seems to de-e from no one and have no relation any contempo-ry."—H. L. Menc-n in Vanity Fair.

TAR

A Midwest Childhood

by SHERWOOD ANDERSON

"When one decides, as any reasonable person must decide, that so far as writers of fiction under fifty years of age are concerned the United States makes an immensely better showing than England, Sherwood Anderson undoubtedly plays a great part in that calculation."—Rebecca West, N. Y. Herald Tribune.

"Sufficient in itself to vindicate his uniqueness of being and his importance as a commentator on American life. TAR is all the lonely boys in small Middle-West towns during the last half of the nineteenth century."—Herbert S. Gorman, N. Y. Times Book Review. 2nd Edition. Large 12mo. $3.00. Limited autographed edition, 325 copies, $10.00.

B&L —GOOD BOOKS— B&L

BONI AND LIVERIGHT, N. Y.

"Belongs to all time"

FORTY IMMORTALS

by BENJAMIN DeCASSERES

The Story of the World's Great Civilizers

Invigorating, dazzling, brilliant, creative essays on the foremost writers of modern times, including Nietzsche, Whitman, Maeterlinck, Blake, Strindberg, Hugo, Ibsen, France, Stendhal, Flaubert, Hardy, Cabell, D'Annunzio, de Gourmont, Saltus and others.

What "The Story of Philosophy" by Will Durant is to the history of thinking, "Forty Immortals" is to the history of fine writing. No American critic has the background of Benjamin DeCasseres; no other American writer is as intimately acquainted personally with the inner workings of the minds of the world's greatest litterateurs.

Maurice Maeterlinck says: "There is more knowledge and wisdom in one page of Benjamin DeCasseres' critical writing than an ordinary human being can digest in a lifetime."

H. L. Mencken writes: "Unhackneyed, brilliant . . ."

New York Times declares: "Benjamin DeCasseres in 'Forty Immortals' comes nearer to achieving the purpose of constructive criticism than anybody else we can recall to mind."

$3.50 at all bookstores.

SEVEN ARTS

PUBLISHING COMPANY

160 Fifth Avenue, New York

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

THE FIRST CIVILIZED AMERICAN

By Phillips Russell

"One of the greatest biographies of our time." [N. Y. Eve. Post]

"A great kick is given to history by defablyizing Franklin." [Richmond News Dispatch]

"The book is as lively and charming as the man it depicts." [Chicago Daily News]

"The most brilliant biography of the year." [Philadelphia Record]

THE PERFECT CHRISTMAS GIFT FOR FIVE DOLLARS

At All Bookstores or from the

Publishers - BRENTANO'S - New York

STENSO

Geese"

thern Minnesota.

says: "It has vitality, ing. Further it is ab-has an unusual gift for acters against one an-melodrama something ns the effect."

Saturday Review says: woman is no one-book on and power."

s.

Ave., NEW YORK

The

DARK DAWN

DODD MEAD

These Modern Women

The Peacock's Tail

ANONYMOUS

MOTHER aspired to have a home of her own free of mortgages, children who would grow up and settle near her, each in a home free of mortgages; and a solid place in the respect of the New England rural community where her ancestors felled primeval forests and slaughtered wolf-packs.

This ambition could have been realized almost without effort in the natural course of things had she not, ironically, wished also for a "smart" husband. This yearning was the [illegible] colored thread in the fabric of her make-up. She waited until her late twenties for Prince Charming, supporting herself by school-teaching. An oddity of sex-selection: this little brown hen of a woman, with pink cheeks and dark eyes pecking modestly away, pretending to look only at the wheat-grains before her, and watching all the while for the multi-color of a peacock's tail.

[illegible] and exciting men are hard to find in the sterile back country of northern Vermont; but mother with a hard eye rejected the well-to-do and the dumb. Her reputation as a [illegible] and disciplinarian waxed as she marked time and looked through schoolhouse windows for [illegible]m of a poet's hair.

Life played a story-book trick. Into the drab neighborhood where she pounded the three R's into slow-witted [illegible] came a romantic troubadour, the like of whom had never illuminated the place before or will again. He was a young man of twenty-one who was going through the country admiring the scenery, reading Keats under trees, and teaching neighborhood "singing schools" by night to pay his way. Photographs taken at the time show a tall, beautiful youth, with hair thrown back from an intellectual brow, a sensitive face and eyes burning with—let us say genius, for so it seemed to mother. They were dark-blue eyes, expressive, glowing.

Mother knew what she wanted and lost no time in annexing it.

Alas, for the home free of mortgages, the building of a substantial family clan. These essentials in her picture of the good life she was never to have. She underwrote her genius husband while he tilted at windmills. He had to be [illegible] through bar examinations, through the stage of getting a professional foothold. Clients were few and were largely under-dogs, for father had a poet's passion for the [illegible]ppressed and a poet's dislike of being bored. He wrote fiery pamphlets protesting against injustice in various forms—for the printing of which mother paid.

Mother is rounding out this year a solid half century of school-teaching. Her six children were born prudently in vacation time. I came in the Christmas holidays, the first child of an incongruous and bitterly unhappy marriage.

I was physically backward and mentally precocious. "At the age of twelve months you were a fat, clumsy baby without a tooth, and you looked at your toys and poked them instead of playing with them. You would never build houses with blocks, but you began learning the alphabet from them when you were a year old. You would hold up blocks and ask questions about the pictures and letters. By the age of seventeen months you knew the alphabet, but you weren't so good at walking. You tumbled and got many bumps." So wrote mother when I asked her for details.

Mother wrote, too, that I was a sickly child, that my life, in its first few months, was despaired of. I was much dandled and hovered over. My father walked the floor with me night after night. Was this spoiling the beginning of the yeasty ego, the Luciferian pride which makes me hanker for a superman?

I want a man like my father! Not like father as he actually was, but like father as he seemed in the first eight or ten years of my life. This is a large order. No living person can give me the excitement I got at eight years old when father took me on his knee and in vivid Anglo-Saxon words "popularized" for me the theories of Darwin. He was a walking Book of Knowledge. He was delightful; he loved me, he was my slave.

I want a man like that. And he'd better not fall down, as father did to my undying grief and disillusion, in practical details of living which any moron manages with ease. He must not play the violin while the upper field is waiting to be plowed.

The myth of this man, the urge to find him, has been at once my greatest spur to adventure and achievement and a pest of the first magnitude. His actual non-existence is chronically annoying; but that doesn't prevent my seeking. It pushed me out of my backwoods environment; it sent me traveling, experimenting, studying. It prodded me until I could earn my living. It put me into strikes, an amateur Joan of Arc. It projected me into the Middle West in the campaign which gave Wilson his chance to keep us out of war; it has pinned my hopes on utopias of all kinds. Whenever I find my energies flowing out in a large and embattled way I can, in five minutes of reflection, discover trails which twist and tangle, cross and recross, join at last, and lead back to a tall man with dark-blue, animated eyes, sitting in a smoke-browned New England kitchen, talking passionately, talking, talking. . . .

My sister, a year and a half younger, did not share my adoration of father. She found him, on the contrary, an unendurable bore. She ran away from the conversation that charmed me. She, too, was a precocious child—but her precocity differed from mine. She had no curious hunger for the alphabet, no special affinity for the printed page. But she could run swiftly on sure feet at the age of nine months, and she used with skill the blocks and toys which I had only looked at meditatively. When we were old enough to help about the house, my cakes burned and my jelly would not "jell"; for me the cows refused to yield their milk, and horses, feeling my hands upon the reins, ignored me. But my sister excelled at housekeeping and managing the farm animals. She loved to drive the harrows and horse-rakes. She was famous for fast running and high climbing. But with all her daring and capacity for man's work she is not a feminist. She is a well-adjusted wife and mother, and a leader in Farm Bureau and rural-school activities. There is not an impractical fiber in her make-up. No trace of father is visible in the silent, prudent, capable man she chose for a husband.

Is the modern woman conditioned by what the Freudians call a "father complex"? Do her emotions search for satisfactions that never existed and thus lose their relation to biological processes? Perhaps this is true, and yet—There was mother, a stodgy, quiet woman, not an intellectual, and herself without a scintillating father; mother and her one aberrant quality: a desire for a colorful mate, a disgust with all dull men.

Physically I am almost a replica of mother. Yet I carry in my harassed inwards the conflicts of both my parents. I could, I think, write extraordinary literature—if I did not have to toil on bread-and-butter copy. That is like father. I have mother's liking for security and stability.

I have been married ten years, satisfactorily as marriage goes, to a man a trifle like father. He cares too much about amusing living to be a proper Rotarian and go-getter. Yet he does not measure up to the myth—no man could. However, I have weathered my disappointment; I stand off and look at the situation from the outside, laugh at it, manage it a bit. Only this saves my very agreeable husband from a horrid fate.

I consider our marriage permanent. The realities of marriage have had a tendency to terminate my long quest. In making a tolerable life of sex and friendship, in earning my living, in fighting for the kind of work I want, emergencies have arisen in which it has been necessary to look at impedimenta critically and to modify feelings and habits of dubious worth. So a pioneer crossing a ford might be compelled to throw overboard grandfather's clock—might discover, too, as he watched its ancient form go bumping down the stream that he was glad to be rid of its bulk and its everlasting ticking. My common sense long ago convinced me that my search for a Prince Charming should no longer be conducted with a view to practical results. It is still true, however, that the same old dynamo furnishes the motive power for my actions. As a little girl I worked for good report-cards to draw a friendly glint from father's eye. I would come home from Normal School in my teens and preen before him in my new learning.

After childhood was over and I turned to the business of earning a living and finding a mate, there were years when I scarcely gave my father a thought. But as a young newspaper reporter I dogged the footsteps of intellectual men. I gave tactful publicity to learned professors (providing they were tall), to handsome violinists, to a shrewd corporation lawyer who let me browse in his private library, to a railroad vice-president who poured forth copious language in answer to my questions. Long after it was clear to me that I was only bored by the organization of labor groups I kept on in order to enjoy the conversation and the approval of a certain liberal leader who reminded me of father.

Somewhere I have read of a musical composer who worked best when assailed by the smell of rotten apples, a smell which no doubt evoked an emotional satisfaction of childhood. Before he began the day's work he filled the drawers of his desk with them. In some such way I try before beginning a piece of creative work to talk a bit with some man who is older and presumably wiser than I, whose mind sparkles and who improvises well as he talks.

I am exacting in selecting these fathers. As long as I can believe in the overwhelming superiority of any one of them he casts a spell, and I can put through, after being with him, an enormous quantity of work. But as time goes on the number of such men tends to diminish. At thirty-odd it is hard to find a man who will respond to every question with a cascade of creative talk and who can toss unheard-of systems of philosophy through the air like a juggler's balls. With unfortunate celerity I catch Homer nodding and he is ruined. Often, when younger, I suffered poignant grief when a father toppled; but now I take such catastrophes with philosophy.

I no longer work on movements. My energies are bent on achieving an income which will enable me to write realistic novels. Do I want to do good work for the joy of creative effort, for the satisfaction of putting my life across? I believe I do—yet dimly, as through a vapor, I see the future: my books written, and some very, very great father, Bernard Shaw, Einstein, goodness knows who, coming forward to speak to me kindly and blow off a shower of glittering intellectual sparks—for me, personally.

[This is the fourth article in The Nation's series of anonymous personal records of well-known modern women. The next will appear in our issue of January 5.]

The French Family Commits Murder

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, November 10

THERE have been few cases in the history of crime raising so interesting a psychological problem as that of Mme Lefebvre, convicted at Douai on October 30 of the murder of her young daughter-in-law and condemned to death.* Here is a cold-blooded and premeditated murder committed without provocation by the highly respectable and respected wife of a wealthy citizen of Roubaix, devoutly religious, professing and practicing the strictest code of morality, and, from the traditional point of view, an irreproachable if irascible wife and mother.

Mme Lefebvre's history is that of any woman of her generation belonging to a "bien-pensante" family of the wealthy French bourgeoisie. She was educated in a convent and brought up under the restriction that French tradition imposes on a young girl. Never, one may be sure, did she read a book that was not "convenable pour la jeune fille" or fail in submissive obedience to her parents. Married at an early age to a husband chosen by her parents, after careful inquiries into the financial situation of his family, she remained true to the traditions in which she had been reared and followed them in bringing up her own family.

The French family of tradition—happily the tradition is beginning to break down—is one of the most tyrannical institutions known to man. The affection of traditional French parents for their children is despotic and they expect their children up to any age to remain under their control. The French mother in particular—for in France the mother rules the household—expects her sons to be tied to her apron-strings as long as she lives and their wives, too, when the sons marry. Mme Lefebvre's two sons had been brought up in this tradition and were completely terrorized by their mother, whose will was their law. In the witness box during the trial André Lefebvre, the husband of the murdered girl, referred to his parents as "Papa" and "Mamma" as though he were a small child instead of a prosperous notary getting on toward forty.

* On December 12 President Doumergue commuted Mme Lefebvre's sentence to life imprisonment.

Mme Lefebvre seems never to have liked André's marriage with Mlle Antoinette Mulle. She had consented to it, of course, or it would never have taken place, but not willingly. To begin with Mlle Mulle's dot was only 330,000 francs. Mme Lefebvre would have preferred her son to make a richer match. For she possessed to excess what in moderation has always been considered in France to be one of the qualities of a "bonne bourgeoise"—avarice; so much so that the fact was notorious in Roubaix and was the one flaw in her otherwise spotless reputation. Antoinette Mulle hesitated at first to accept André Lefebvre on account of his mother's avaricious and domineering character, but was persuaded by her brother to overcome her hesitation. According to the evidence at the trial, she was fond of her husband after marriage, at any rate, and was evidently an attractive girl with a lovable character. Even the defense could find nothing to say against her.

The short married life of this unhappy young woman was a martyrdom. Her mother-in-law's persecution began two or three days after the young couple had started on their honeymoon. Mme Lefebvre wrote to her son complaining that Antoinette had shown a lack of respect by sending her a post card and demanding frequent letters. The honeymoon was to have lasted six weeks, but before the end of that time Mme Lefebvre ordered her son to return on the ground that he was neglecting his work and spending too much money and said that, if his wife would not come back, he could leave her behind. She had insisted, by the way, that they should travel second-class and stay in the cheapest hotels.

When the young couple were settled in their new home, Mme Lefebvre never left them in peace. She interfered in every detail of their lives and tried to exercise a minute control over their expenditures. It was a crime to spend a sou on a theater, to dance, or to order a new frock. But the greatest crime of all was that Antoinette consigned to the lumber-room an old suite of furniture in a dilapidated condition which Mme Lefebvre had given her for a wedding present, having no further use for it, in addition to a necklace of imitation pearls which she tried to pass off as real ones. Antoinette, who seems to have had a more independent character than her husband, tried to resist her mother-in-law's tyranny, but she appealed in vain to her husband to help her. The miserable creature was entirely under his mother's domination. The girl poured out her woes to her brother, who advised her to try to make the best of it and to be reconciled with her mother-in-law. A reconciliation was arranged, but on Mme Lefebvre's side it was not sincere. Her natural jealousy of the woman whom her son had married—which perhaps no mother entirely escapes—became bitter hatred, and the hatred was still more intensified when she learned that Antoinette was about to become a mother. "Never," she said to her son, "shall you have a child of that race."

On the way back from a stay at Vichy Mme Lefebvre bought a revolver at St. Etienne. One day shortly afterward André Lefebvre took his wife and mother for a drive in his car, at Mme Lefebvre's request. He drove himself and the two women were sitting together behind him. Mme Lefebvre asked him to take a certain lonely road known as the "Way of Solitude" and as they passed a shrine or chapel she had the car stopped while she went in to say her prayers. When they had started off again, she took the revolver from her hand-bag and shot Antoinette dead by her side. André's characteristic exclamation was: "Oh, Mamma, what have you done? How will you ever be able to explain it?" And his mother triumphantly replied: "At last you are free!"

The defense set up at the trial was the only possible one—that of insanity. As usual the doctors differed. But their difference was due to the fact that their points of view were different. The experts appointed by the court unanimously reported that Mme Lefebvre was not insane and was responsible for her actions. From the legal point of view they were undoubtedly right. Mme Lefebvre certainly knew what she was about and was capable of being deterred by fear of punishment. It may safely be said that she would not have committed her crime had she not counted on the leniency of French juries, as well she might. Apart from the almost universal acquittal of wives that have murdered their husbands from jealousy and other protagonists in crimes passionnels, a Versailles jury not long ago acquitted a retired officer, also a defender of the traditions of the French family with strict religious and moral principles, who had beaten his small son to death. On the other hand, Professor Maurice de Fleury and the other eminent pathologists called for the defense were also right from their point of view, which was psychological. But the psychological view of crime would produce a change in the treatment of all criminals, if it were adopted by the law. As the law stands Mme Lefebvre's acquittal on the ground of insanity—or abnormality—would have been monstrous.

The most interesting question is how she came to convince herself, as she undoubtedly did, that she was justified in executing the rebel against the sacred traditions of the French family and the lawful authority of mother-in-law. Anybody acquainted with the theories of Dr. Freud will recognize how they fit in with this extraordinary case.

In the Driftway

Had man mastered the secret of flying a thousand years ago, there would be only a few languages in the world today, Sir Alan Cobham, famous British air pilgrim, who arrived recently on his first visit to America, told the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce last night at a dinner in his honor in the Waldorf-Astoria. By inference, he predicted that aerial transportation eventually will bring all people to the use of a universal tongue.

"It is quite evident," he said, "that, in the main, languages were formed by isolation and lack of communication. Speedy transportation naturally means greater intercourse between the nations of the earth, and this in itself will do much to blend the general trend of thought."

THE above paragraphs from the New York World indicate considerable misapprehension in the mind of Sir Alan, his reporter—or both. If, at the moment when Adam and Eve were evicted from the Garden of Eden because of abusing the premises, they had been presented with all the means of communication that mankind has today, it is probable that we should not be afflicted with as many languages as now exist. But if this gift had been reserved until the comparatively recent moment of only a thousand years ago, the Drifter doubts if it would have done much more than prevent the various dialects that have grown up within European languages. And if the only gift in the way of communication had been the airplane in its present stage of development, the chances are that its influence upon language would have been a fraction less than nothing at all.

* * * * *

AMONG means of communication that of transportation is by no means the most influential in the direction of a uniform language. We have had ships since the dawn of history, we have had railroads for a hundred years, but they have made no perceptible headway against the barriers of language. The printing press has been the one great and effective agency so far, but although it has been sapping and sharp-shooting for the past five centuries it has done little more than partially obliterate dialects and encourage people to know more languages than one. The fact that the printing press was a going concern when the United States was born doubtless prevented the development of a group of dialects such as grew up in Italy, Spain, Great Britain, and other countries that were settled earlier, but it did not prevent the introduction to the Western Hemisphere of three distinct European languages. What the radio may accomplish in the future nobody knows, but it is unlikely that it will ever be as effective in unifying language as the printing press. So far as concerns the airplane, it is a vast mistake to suppose that speed in transportation is the prime consideration. For most people speed is not so important as cheapness, and the airplane has a long way to go yet before it becomes as cheap as the steamship or the railroad.

* * * * *

AND anyhow why should anybody suppose that it would be a blessing to the world to be reduced to one language? If French were abolished, for instance, restaurants could no longer make up a dinner menu that would seem worth a dollar, while without Latin druggists would have to cut their prices 50 per cent. There are more books and periodicals in English than the Drifter can read now—what would he do if there were a single world language? And suppose this airplane-made universal tongue should turn out not to be English, some of us would have the dickens of a time trying to learn it. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Treason!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Treason has raised its hoary head"—so begins your editorial of December 1 on tax adjustment. You lament that if a refund were made 80 per cent of it would go to 1 per cent of the taxpayers. This must indicate that 80 per cent of the tax is paid by 1 per cent of the taxpayers. Such a distribution of the tax burden should be entirely to the liking of The Nation. Why complain when the movement of the funds is the other way?

"Hit the corporations" has been the slogan of all federal tax legislation to date, especially any sponsored by the radical group whose mother you so extremely and continually defend. At one time I was interested in several small corporations and holding a fair interest in some large ones. I have been the unwilling witness and victim of enough injustice in federal tax matters to be just a bit peeved at this editorial.

"If this be treason——" Well, treason's head will be quite a bit heavier before I disgorge my overpaid-out-of-my-pocket tax refunds, I'm afraid.

Mankato, Minnesota, November 30 C. R. BUTLER

Another Modern Woman

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We were packing chocolate-covered cherries on the night shift in a candy factory. We pack from the belt conveyor which carries the candy from the dipping machine through the cooler, and our hands move fast, but we talk. The younger woman wants to know what she is missing by not being married. She makes the older woman answer this:

"Sure I'm married; do I look like a chicken? Me oldest girl is sixteen. I got six kids. Work hard? My God, with six kids, whatchu think? Yestday I washed eight lines clothes meself. Today I iron them. I work all the time by night in factory. Last week I worked in hemp factory. I give it up, too hard. Me girl she earn good money in factory; but she's girl, she need money herself. Me husband and me we always fight now. I have always to keep still and give in. It looks not nice for the children. I say, 'Yeh, yeh, you right,' and he keep still too. We fight about the children. He wants I should be strict and teach them bedder. I got no time; I should worry what he say. I'm tired of me husband. Sixteen years long time to live with man. Get tired of dress, house, friend, everything, husband too.

"But I'm not crazy. I got six kids. They need father. They need eat. Anyway, who know what devil I get if I leave me husband? I know what I got." And, turning to the younger woman: "You better get married anyway. Married is bad enough, but single is worse."

There is one of These Modern Women for you—an ultra-modern woman, product of our up-to-date industrial system: mother of six, housekeeper for eight, wageworker, all in one.

Brooklyn, N. Y., December 5 S. F. FRIEDUM

The Background of Art

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It seems to me that the issue goes deeper than Mr. Pearson has made it in The Plastic Artist in America in your pages. Until modern times, art has always depended for its patronage either on religion or on some form of aristocracy. Religion being in its very essence mystical naturally sponsors an art that is abstract rather than realistic. The more mystical the religion becomes, the more abstract and expressionist is the art; witness Byzantium. A sophisticated aristocracy dislikes the brutal facts of life and turns also to expressionism in art. Both, then, lead to the same result.

But now aristocracy is dead, and the Christian religion is no longer a patron of the arts. Babbitt has replaced them. What would he want with a Cézanne? He wants facts.

And the modern artist, like all artists, is ruled by the taste of his patron. It isn't his fault that art has become a compilation of "documents"; nor is it Babbitt's. For both are results of a larger force—call it the scientific democratic wave.

Until art shall again have a spiritual emotion to express, or an aristocracy to delight, it will probably remain in its present slump. I think also that Mr. Pearson is perhaps unfair in his choice of authors. Suppose he had picked Sinclair Lewis and Francis Thompson; would opposing critics, authors, and readers agree that they both were artists?

Venice, October 28 GURDON HOWE

Books and Plays

What Will She Do with Seven Fat Years?

By CLINCH CALKINS

What will she do with seven fat years
Now that her seven lean years are over
Whose throat is baked with the parching tears
She would not shed for a faithless lover?

She is used to a broken pitcher,
She is used to an arid well.
She knows a terrible tale of drought
Which her tongue cannot tell.

To one who has filled, when the fields were failing,
Her empty sacks at an empty grange,
And sought waste grain in an ancient flailing
Enough will be strange.

First Glance

IT is the business of a novelist, as it is the business of any artist who employs the imagination, to show us a world we never saw before and shall never see again. Out of the level chaos of nature he lifts for a moment the peak of his own consciousness; though we shall see other peaks later, we shall not see precisely this one. Even the so-called realist is doing nothing else—at least for me—than I have said, for surely there is no world here and now that all of us perceive alike; the realist gives us a new earth even if he only proves the importance of what we have been looking at all the while.

"H. D.," who might have been expected always to confine herself to the unique idiom of her astounding poetry, has written a novel. But its idiom is not very different from that of her poetry, thanks to three predecessors in prose, Henry James, Virginia Woolf, and James Joyce; and its world is identically the same—though effort is required to perceive the identity. The world of "Palimpsest" (Houghton Mifflin: $3.50) is a wider one than its author has employed before; there are more persons in it, more events that can be given common names. The three separate parts of the narrative have separate scenes—ancient Rome, modern London, and modern Egypt; and though they have a single heroine, she has separate names and exists in separate ages. She is one woman—and so, unmistakably, is all this world one world. It is her world, too, and it is "H. D.'s".

"So sure was that world, so distant, yet so clear, so definite, so precise that no casual treachery could blight it. It was so personal a world that Mavis with all her years of tenuous probings had not even seen it. . . . Behind London there was another London. It was just to keep that other London that she had blinded them all, almost blinded herself by her attitude, her panache, her not quite diminished glory." So speaks Raymonde in the second and best of the three narratives which compose the book. So in different words had spoken Hipparchia in the first, and so speaks Mrs. Fairwood in the third. The three of them are one in their struggle—described with the utmost subtlety—to hold fast some inner world where, and where only, life may go on without interruption in obedience to the necessities of the soul. It is the desperation with which the three women clutch this hidden place that makes "Palimpsest" a peculiarly modern novel; when has it ever been so needful, for those wishing to live, that they should do so privately, guarding with the jealousy of the first Stoics the little or large domain they have marked out for themselves?

It is the form the action takes—if it may be called action—that guarantees the world of "Palimpsest" to be personal with "H. D." I should not like this to be construed too literally. But both Hipparchia and Raymonde are poets. They have been called "cold," the writers of "cold" verses. And Hipparchia can reflect that when her lovers complain of her unfeeling she is at "the very exalted height of ecstasy"; while Raymonde, outwardly composed, knows herself within to be "a sort of lightning-rod for all the meters." This may or may not be "H. D.'s" answer to those who have called her own poems splinters of Greek ice. Those who know them for the passionate things they are will need no answer. They should read the book, however. It is not only a most remarkable and beautiful book; it is as well an explanation and an amplification of our most reserved poet.

MARK VAN DOREN

The "Different" Negro

The Negro in American Life. By Jerome Dowd. The Century Company. $5.

MR. DOWD is not a newcomer in the field of the Negro. He has been studying him for more than twenty years. Though he is a Southerner he has no violent antipathy toward the Negro, even while honestly believing him happiest "in his place." He is affiliated with the Inter-Racial Movement, and he is obviously deeply sincere in his desire to see as little friction as possible between the two racial groups. With such a background, one would expect a pronouncement from his pen to throw important light on the problem.

One realizes with regret, however, that Mr. Dowd's habits of thought have not changed. Some years ago he attempted to make a study of the cultures of Africa. Two volumes of that work appeared, and no more. They are worthless. The slovenliness of intellectual habit shown in them was such as to make them useless for serious reference. The arrangement of the data was careless; Mr. Dowd's sources were most superficial; what monographic material existed was ignored. We have the same use of data in this book; it may be distinguished for its omissions. Unfortunately these include the most recent and important work, mostly published in scholarly journals, and practically unavailable to the general reader. It is obvious that Mr. Dowd does not know these papers. This is true not only in the biological sciences, where such lack of knowledge might be excusable, but in his own field of the social sciences. Let us see how serious these omissions are.

Mr. Dowd first gives a résumé of the historical background of the American Negro. Naturally he refers us to his own work for the African cultures, but not even to mention Phillips's standard work on slavery is inexcusable. Next comes a consideration of the Negro in the North since the Civil War. The thesis is that the Negro does not fare any better here than in the South, though most of the data presented come from sources (with the principal exception of the Report of the Chicago Race Commission) the scholarly character of which is at best doubtful. Then comes a discussion of the Southern Negro. We learn that Jim Crow cars are not any worse than the cars used by whites on branch lines, that lynching is bad but that whites are lynched as well as Negroes—always the shading, always the comparison of Negro conditions in the South with those of oppressed peoples elsewhere in the world, on the supposition, I take it, that several wrongs make a right. And, again with few exceptions, neglect of the best source material.

Part Four might better have been omitted. It discusses the part the Negro played in the World War, although just what relation this has to the author's subject is hard for me to see. The usual heroism is remarked, the usual cowardice, and one gains the impression, rather in spite of Mr. Dowd, that Negroes behaved about as the white troops did. We next come to Negro migration, and two naive points—that Negroes didn't migrate from the South because of poor treatment but because of blind economic causes, and that Negro migration hasn't hurt the South anyway because more whites than Negroes have migrated—are developed. The section is short and shortsighted in its discussion, both of the causes and of the results. The bogy of the dissatisfied and trouble-making Mulatto, notably in the person of Dr. W. E. B. DuBois, is held before the reader as the cause of much trouble. And the important work of such men as Charles Johnson and Abram Harris is quite ignored.

We then come to the Negro in literature and in art. Entertainingly enough, whites who write about Negroes are first considered. Octavius Roy Cohen is mentioned, though not Du Bose Heyward, while Thomas Nelson Page is described as "the outstanding literary exponent of the Negro of Virginia"! Then Negroes who write about themselves are mentioned—that is, some of them. Countee Cullen is recognized, but not Langston Hughes; Walter White is mentioned, but not Jessie Fauset or Eric Waldron. In the discussion of Negro folk-songs, Mr. Dowd knows of no one since Krehbiel, in spite of the excellent work of Odum and Johnson, James Weldon and Rosamund Johnson, Dorothy Scarborough, and others. On the stage, we are told of Gilpin but not Robeson. And so it goes.

The final three sections deal with proposed solutions of the Negro problem, the Negro future, and Paths of Hope. First we are told how Mr. Dowd chopped cotton with Negroes, played with Negro children, and all the rest of it. Then a short chapter is given to the argument of those who believe in racial equality—their views, incidentally, being quite misunderstood, since a statistical equality does not argue an individual one. The chapter on the inequality of races is much fuller, and the sources much more complete. It is unfortunate that Reuter's argument as to the social causes for the better position of the Mulatto is included here, as it gives a false impression of the position of Professor Reuter. But then we come to racial differences. Mr. Dowd discusses brain structure, but he does not even mention Bean's well-known work, disproved though it has been. He apparently has not heard of the remarkable work of Professor Todd on anatomical differences between Negroes and whites, or even the army measurements of Davenport and Love. He prefers Burmeister, and, looking in the bibliography, we note the date of this work as 1853! He restates the myths about the thick cranium of the Negro, his peculiar body odor, his lack of ability for sustained effort, and many other things. His chapter on the psyche of the Negro recites all the old standard stereotypes; while in his discussion of intellectual differences between Negroes and whites, Ferguson's monograph, which did most to establish difference—falsely, I think—is not even mentioned. The army psychological-test results are of course quoted, but through a secondary source. The discussion of the biological and psychological results of race mixture shows an extraordinary ability to miss the point of the matter, although the sociological consideration is somewhat better. The notoriously unreliable census figures for the number of mixed Negroes are quoted.

The rest of the book is taken up with a consideration of the solution of the Negro problem. Everything that has been said is repeated in some form or other, and the solution, other than "good homes, less politics, and more vision," consists, as far as I can see, of a pious hope for better relations. That these can come while conviction as to innate invidious differences persists, I cannot believe. And this book strongly hinders its own purpose by bolstering this hypothesis.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

The Melancholy Bull

Guy de Maupassant. By Ernest Boyd. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.
The Life, Work, and Evil Fate of Guy de Maupassant. By Robert Harborough Sherard. Brentano's. $4.50.

THE works of Guy de Maupassant neither require nor, indeed, permit much critical exegesis. No other writer to whom the adjective "great" could possibly be applied was ever at once so striking and so meager. There is no class of readers to whom his stories are not interesting, yet their limitations are almost as patent as their virtues, and when Mr. Boyd, in the course of his excellent biographical study, has remarked that "whatever power Maupassant's writing had came through the stimulation of two senses, one of which was the sense of vision," he has said nearly all that a critic can say. There is no evidence that Maupassant lacked the power to convey to his reader anything that interested him, but the range of his interests if not his technique was fatally limited. Whatever was visible seemed real to him, but in all the vast world which the eye cannot see only direct sexual attraction was other than an unsubstantial illusion, and his stories, for all the richness of their concrete detail, are either barren of feeling or monotonously insistent upon the one emotion of which he was capable. As his madness closed in upon him he added, to be sure, the nameless fear which possessed him, but the dominant impression which his works leave is of a world curiously desiccated, of life as seen by a man incapable of participating in the majority of the emotions which give it its flavor.

And despite the much-praised objectivity of his method, no deliberate "confessions" were ever more self-revealing. Maupassant was accustomed to boast of his athletic feats, sexual and otherwise, but the impression one gets as one reads the account in Mr. Boyd's vivid pages is that of a man intolerably bored by human existence because certain essential elements of the human being had been mysteriously left out of his make-up. Nothing, not even his own dazzling success, seemed able to lift the burden of his ennui. He was bored by work, bored by conversation, and even, it would seem, bored by the unvaried, unceasing pursuit of women which occupied him from his sixteenth year until he was locked in the cell of the mad house. A psychologist would probably say that his indiscriminate, mechanical amativeness was the result of a "sterility complex," and one of the delusions of his madness, which led him to plant a tree to "grow little Maupassants upon," would lend support to the theory; but women were also, like the boating which occupied much of his time and the rather stupid practical jokes in which he habitually indulged, the refuge of a mind, in many respects essentially childish, which had never learned to occupy itself with mature interests. The deceptive robustness of his physique, coupled with the somberness of his mood, earned for him the title of "the melancholy bull," but he was probably never other than a sick man, suffering from some spiritual malady whose first sign was a sort of atrophy of the soul which never let him enter fully or wholeheartedly into the business of living.

Both the long, rambling, and enthusiastic biography of Mr. Sherard and the succinct, coldly judicious study of Mr. Boyd leave no doubt that the immediate cause of Maupassant's final madness was that "general paralysis" of which syphilis is probably always the necessary condition. To Mr. Sherard it is also at once the explanation of and excuse for all the unpleasant abnormalities of his hero's character; but Mr. Boyd, concerned only with facts, does not undertake to pronounce very definitely upon the relation (if any) between this disease and either those of Maupassant's peculiarities which were manifest before its definite appearance or the general characteristics of his work. And yet the question is one obviously relevant in the biography of a literary man in which the description of abnormalities of one sort or another plays a very large part.

"The paretic is both born and made," one authority on the subject once remarked, and another was accustomed to say that it was the result of "syphilis and civilization." It is not, that is to say, the inevitable result of infection with Spirochaeta pallida but the result of the effect of that organism upon a nervous system already either definitely morbid or subject to unnatural strains; and hence, though Maupassant's end was in no sense surprising, it is in the condition which preceded rather than followed his definite infection that we should look for the most significant signs of any nervous condition which may be supposed to have had a connection with the characteristics of his work. Born of a neurotic mother and of a father who was a notorious rake, his inheritance was bad. One of his very earliest literary efforts deals with two lovers who die of sexual excess, and there can thus be little doubt that long before any acquired infection could have reached his brain he had already been mastered by the morbid preoccupation which remained with him to the end and which hovers over all his work. Perhaps it will remain always impossible to speak with any assurance of the precise nature of his disorder, but it is evident that it had a direct influence upon his work. The higher centers of Maupassant's nervous system never acquired the full organization which would have made it possible for him to understand the life of his fellowmen as they themselves understood it. He remained, in a sense, incomplete, and the effects of that fact can be traced in both the virtues and the defects of his work. Because of it the famous detachment of his stories was possible, but because of it also they represent a vision of a world from which most of what is most characteristically human has been abstracted.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"Ad Maiorem Gloriam Dei"

Kiddush Ha-Shem: An Epic of 1648. By Sholom Ash. Translated from the Yiddish by Rufus Learsi. The Jewish Publication Society of America.

KIDDUSH HA-SHEM (Sanctification of the Name), for the sake of which tens of thousands of Jews offered up their lives, is merely the Hebrew equivalent of a similar phrase, "Ad maiorem gloriam dei," in the name of which the Holy Inquisition burned them. This may strike an infidel as paradoxical, but it must be remembered that courses in Comparative Religion were not in the curriculum of the theological seminaries of the time. On the occasion of the mass martyrdom of the Jews of the Ukraine, which is the theme of Sholom Ash's epic of 1648, there were other considerations besides "ad maiorem gloriam dei." The Ukraine was then a Polish March, parceled out into vast feudal estates. To the Polish princelings who were the absentee landlords of the Ukraine their Jewish vassals were convenient middlemen, serving as managers of their estates, as tax farmers, and not infrequently (though most unenthusiastically) as garrisons for them in the hostile countryside. To this day in the Ukraine there survive synagogues with projecting upper stories, very much like our colonial blockhouses, which testify to the time when the Jews were not permitted to build a house of worship unless it could be turned into a fort in the event of a Ukrainian uprising. The Polish clergy in their efforts to convert the Greek Orthodox population to Catholicism also made use of the Jews. To degrade the Greek orthodox faith in the eyes of the peasants, the keys of their churches were delivered over to the local Jewish tax farmers, who were thus forced into a dangerous and doubly unpopular role. The result was that when the Cossacks under their hetman Chmelnitzki revolted, the Jewish settlements of the Ukraine were blotted out in an orgy of slaughter and bestiality—unparalleled until the Denikins and Petluras of our own day showed their prowess in the same locale.

It is the impact of these latter horrors that gives force and solemnity to Sholom Ash's narrative, published in Yiddish after the war. To see them in aesthetic perspective he has gone back to the events of 1648; but there is a glow in his recital which is not a reflection from the past. The simple plot from which he projects his epic of a people dramatizes the Jewish settlement of the Ukraine, and from that background marches on to the grand climax of the book—the self-immolation of the Jewish community of Tulchin. Here and there when Mr. Ash leaves his real protagonist, the Jewish People, to take up with mere individuals the epic fluffs out into rather flimsy romance. This is particularly true of the superfluous tinkering with the loose ends of the plot that follows after the magnificent chapters describing the Tulchin episode.

This is the fourth of Sholom Ash's works to be translated, and it makes an important addition to the growing library of Yiddish literature accessible in English. In the efforts to save the expiring language, the most recent suggestion offered is that Latin characters be substituted for the Hebrew. It is a provocative idea, but in the meantime it is advisable to go the whole hog, and, adding English words to Latin characters, translate to safety the best of the Yiddish literary treasures. There is a large-sized, interested public among both Jews and non-Jews. Why the Modern Library, which has room for the masterpieces of so many other languages, doesn't include a single Yiddish title is a mystery veiled in limp leatherette covers.

ALTER BRODY

A Masterpiece in Logic

Statement and Inference. By John Cook Wilson. Edited from the MSS. by A. S. L. Farquharson. Two volumes. Oxford University Press. $10.50.

JOHN COOK WILSON (1849-1915) has long been an enigmatic figure to students of philosophy who have not enjoyed the opportunity of personal residence in Oxford. His name was constantly mentioned with respect amounting to reverence by other British philosophers who acknowledged indebtedness to his views; by Oxonians he was regarded as the most influential teacher of philosophy in the university. Yet he published nothing save a considerable number of textual criticisms on Aristotle and other classical writers and a few articles on military cycling—from neither of which was it possible to gain any very clear idea of his philosophical position! One was obliged to take his importance solely on trust. Hence the unusual interest for the philosophical world of the posthumous publication of Wilson's lectures on logic, the fruit of twenty-five years of application to the subject.

The two large volumes, a model of judicious editing, were compiled by Mr. Farquharson of University College mainly from student lecture notes, supplemented by passages from Wilson's personal memoranda and his correspondence with Bernard Bosanquet and other philosophers. Under the circumstances a certain amount of verbal inconsistency and confusion was inevitable, but despite this the volumes fully justify Wilson's reputation. The work is easily the most important thing in its field in English since the publication of Bosanquet's "Logic" many years ago. It should be read in connection with the latter, since it is largely devoted to a correction of the Bradley-Bosanquet point of view. Those two great writers made of logic the royal road to philosophic idealism, but at the cost of confounding logic with epistemology and metaphysics. Cook Wilson set himself the task of disentangling a logic which should be a science of human thinking, neither more nor less. Opposed to idealistic logic, he was almost equally opposed to the symbolic logic of such philosophers as Bertrand Russell. Although himself an able mathematician, he refused to identify logic with mathematics. With something of the type of mind of the great Scholastics, he excelled in drawing subtle distinctions—splitting a hair into a thousand hairs—and yet keeping his ultimate bases close to common sense. Where James and Schiller were helpless before the deadly dialectic of Bradley and could only reply in the different language of psychology, Wilson fenced with a weapon as delicate as Bradley's and met the enemy on his own dueling-ground. Had the two volumes now first published made their appearance a few years earlier they would have played an important part in the contemporary British and American revolt against idealism. Even today, after that revolt has been at least temporarily successful, they may serve to furnish the new movement with the realistic logic of which it stands sorely in need. At any rate, apart from metaphysical implications, Wilson's theory of universals, of statement, of judgment, and of inference henceforth forms an indispensable chapter in the history of logic. Every serious student of philosophy will desire to own "Statement and Inference" as a part of his equipment.

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES

Smollett

The Letters of Tobias Smollett, M.D. Edited by Edward S. Noyes. Harvard University Press. $3.

SMOLLETT is one of the few important authors of the eighteenth century who have not yet come into their own. No critical biography of him exists and he has not even been admitted into the fellowship of the English Men of Letters series. Up till recently scholars, balked by their ignorance of the facts of his life, have left him and his works severely alone; but apparently Smollett is not to remain in retirement much longer. Last year we had Professor Buck's painstaking study of "Peregrine Pickle," and now Professor Noyes, another eighteenth-century enthusiast from Yale, has brought out a complete collection of Smollett's letters—complete, at any rate, as far as we know. Professor Noyes has been diligent and fortunate enough to run to earth fifteen letters never before published. The remaining fifty-odd letters are now for the first time gathered together and annotated in such a way that Macaulay's schoolboy, or his lineal descendant the man in the street, can understand some of the difficulties that confront the future biographer of Smollett.

This novelist, doctor, historian, playwright, and pamphleteer was too busy and too pugnacious a man to be a charming letter-writer. Whenever he wrote to a friend it was for a specific purpose—often an appeal for financial assistance—and he was hardly ever able to surrender himself, as the great letter-writers have done, to gossip and nonsense. The last letter in the book, an undated fragment, indicates what a delightful correspondent Smollett might have been if he had not been so overburdened with work. "Many a time do I stop my task and betake me to a game of romps with Betty, while my wife looks on smiling and longing in her heart to join in the sport; then back to the cursed round of duty." Smollett was always struggling to keep the booksellers supplied with copy. Sometimes it was a novel, but more often it was mere hackwork—a universal history, a compendium of voyages, or a translation of "Don Quixote."

About half of the letters are written to Scotch doctors, for Smollett's circle was medical rather than literary and he always seems to have preferred the society of his own compatriots. Boswell and Horace Walpole tell us so much about the literary, political, and social life in London that it is hard to remember that there was still a great deal which escaped their attention. They knew little about Smollett's coterie of Scotch doctors, including the Hunters, two of the most distinguished surgeons of the day. Among the other correspondents are Garrick, with whom Smollett quarreled and was afterward reconciled, and John Wilkes, the demagogue. It was to Wilkes that he wrote the well-known letter about Johnson's Negro servant, in which he referred to Johnson as the Great Cham of Literature, and which Boswell misprinted in the first edition of the "Life," mistaking Cham for Chum. As Professor Noyes admits in his introduction, the present collection of letters is interesting chiefly to the special student of Smollett, but for anyone who cares for that vigorous personality this excellently edited volume is indispensable.

ARNOLD WHITRIDGE

Books in Brief

Comparative Philosophy. By Paul Masson-Oursel. With an Introduction by F. G. Crookshank. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

In his introduction Dr. Crookshank expresses confidence that this book "cannot fail to excite interest, to attract attention, and to provoke discussion, if not challenge." Possibly it might have provoked more discussion had it not appeared at virtually the same time as the English translation of Oswald Spengler's mighty work. Masson-Oursel, who never mentions his German predecessor, employs in the narrower field of philosophy proper what is outwardly the same comparative method as that which Spengler employs in dealing with whole cultures. But inwardly there is a difference between them something like that between an eagle and a pair of spectacles. Where the German is bold and dashing, synthetic, recreating whole periods with an imagination at once grandiose and detailed, the Frenchman is cautious and hesitating, analytic, plodding slowly through an intricate forest of facts from which he never fully emerges. And yet the man of laborious talent is superior to the man of swift genius in one respect. Where Spengler repeatedly implies, although magnificently disproving it in his work, that the representative of one culture can never understand the representatives of another, Masson-Oursel's avowed aim is the pursuit of a world philosophy to which each culture shall contribute. And, to render him full justice, he makes no pretension in this volume to do more than indicate the need and possibility of such a philosophy. In this he is successful. After reading the chapters in which he essays the comparison of European, Hindu, and Chinese thought in respect to their logic, metaphysics, and psychology—pedantic as these chapters are—one can no longer limit one's horizon quite complacently to that of the Western world.

Mental Tests. By Frank N. Freeman. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.40.

The enterprise of measuring general and special abilities has probably more fruits of research to show for a quarter-century of effort than any other single phase of psychological investigation. Professor Freeman's work is an excellently organized and clearly presented summary of this immense field of facts and figures. His historical survey accounts for the present status of intelligence testing, its wide variety of forms, its off-shoots in the way of tests of personality, and the statistical techniques which have been developed to treat the assembled data. The book contains valuable bibliographical references, test reproductions, and an exhaustive inventory of group tests, containing all the information relevant to their administration. The author undertakes an elaborate analysis of the construction of tests, their materials, devices, and scoring, helpful to teachers who would adapt old forms to new uses. The résumé of experimental results adequately covers the fields of education, vocational guidance, and delinquency, but is incomplete in other spheres of application, especially with regard to the phenomena of feeble-mindedness and superior ability.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. This year in addition a second prize of $50 and a third prize of $25 will be offered. The rules for 1926 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Wednesday, December 1, and not later than Friday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page.

3. No manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poems will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 9, 1927.

7. Besides the winning poems, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Art

Modern Art: Genesis or Exodus?

TO tell the full story of modern art is to tell, first, how it began with Monet's portrayal of the fleeting aspects of nature and Cézanne's preoccupation with its solidity; second, how it gradually departed from the appearance of reality by which these artists were still bound and plunged into forms of expression whose tendency was to distort, dissociate, dissect reality so far beyond recognition that the morphological identity between the painting and the objects painted was lost; third, how finally a new departure became apparent everywhere which brought together, as it were, the split and broken parts of reality, gave them normal shape and position, and thereby established a sort of new realism which, however, profited by the experiences of the schools immediately preceding it.

The current International Exhibition assembled by the Société Anonyme at the Brooklyn Museum, one of the most comprehensive in recent years, is devoted mainly to the middle phase of the evolution just outlined; the last phase is represented feebly and the first not at all. A brief reference, however, to the first phase—the origins of modernism—will make the status of the exhibition more easily comprehensible. All of the artists mentioned in this article except Monet, Cézanne, Carra, and Herbin are on view at the Brooklyn Museum.

Monet, the most typical of all impressionists, sought to arrest the momentary transient aspects of reality. "Il faut peindre comme peint un rayon de soleil." And since effects of sunlight always vary, Monet painted one and the same field, pond, or church ten, fifteen, twenty times the same day, producing as many different pictures. But as such passing phenomena were of much shorter duration than the process of painting them, the impressionists were obliged to rely on memory as well as observation and to record their impressions by posterior reconstruction.

Precisely this was made the central doctrine of futurism. The futurist picture had to be "a synthesis of what one remembers and what one sees." Only where the impressionists required twenty canvases to paint one object during a single day, the futurists painted on a single canvas twenty positions of one object in motion. And where impressionist pictures always adhered to unity of place and time, futurist pictures disregarded this unity and recorded such snatches of reality—a profile, a room, a park—as may crowd the memory without apparent causal connection.

The expressionists went even further. Instead of the impressionist's visual effects and the futurist's memory images, the expressionist used his art as a means of making his inner urge manifest. Kandinsky, one of the leading exponents of the school, paints color harmonies which, depending on their degree of abstraction, he calls impressions, improvisations, compostions. Like Bergson he has used many an intellectual argument to disprove the validity of reason. He conceives art as born of "an inner contemplation which is inscrutable." Franz Marc also thought of art as religious and metaphysical. His favorite subjects were animals, and he painted them not "as they appear to us but as they really are." The ethereal color harmonies and naive grotesqueries of Paul Klee make him the most introspective of all expressionists. His "disseitig bin ich gar nicht fassbar" is perhaps the limit to which metaphysical aesthetics can go.

Contemporaneous with these subjective movements were movements impersonal and objective stemming from Cézanne. The great aim of Cézanne was to convert impressionism into "something durable like the art of the museums." To this end he substituted solidity, hard outline, mixed tones for the impressionists' airiness, diffused contours, and spectral colors, and devised his formula for representing nature according to the "sphere, cone, and cylinder."

The works of Picasso, Braque, Metzinger, Gleizes, and Duchamp in their first cubist period were much in the manner of Cézanne with perhaps slightly bolder distortion. A logical examination of pictorial laws—"j'aime la règle qui corrige l'émotion," said Braque—led to the decomposition of objects according to their structural articulation and their reconstruction according to plastic considerations of line, plane, color, volume, texture-contrast.

The constructivists—Lissitzky, Moholy-Nagy, Pannaggi—took over from the cubists' geometrization of form and texture-contrasts and eliminated the last vestiges of reality. They sought to relate their work to the present industrial order and scientific progress by using the materials of the one—iron, concrete, glass—and emulating the logical precision of the other. Gabo and Pevsner attempted to substitute the relations of voids for those of solids and thus like Apollinaire's bird of Benin to create masterpieces out of thin air.

Just as the main currents here described reached their culmination, a new turn toward reality made its appearance. The futurists Carra and Severini, who had preached the destruction of museums, now work in a most museum-like manner, as do also the metaphysicians de Chirico and Paladini. The cubists Herbin, Metzinger, and even Braque left dissociation to their followers and took to still-lifes, figures, and landscapes. Although this movement is spreading with amazing rapidity, it is difficult to say where it may ultimately lead. Its artists utilize freely the experiments of their forerunners. The abstract tendencies are still very active. Critics who legislated reality out of art may feel somewhat discomfited; that they should henceforth legislate less readily or that the public should take their casuistry less seriously is perhaps too much to expect.

LOUIS LOZOWICK

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

A LUNCHEON RESORT FOR THE DISCRIMINATING CLIENTELE—THOSE APPRECIATING UNEXCELLED CUISINE AND SERVICE.

EVENINGS—SPECIAL PARTIES ONLY. ANNIVERSARIES, BANQUETS, LADIES' NIGHTS, BEEFSTEAKS, SMOKERS, SUPPER AND DINNER DANCES.

OUR BANQUET DEPARTMENT SPECIALIZES IN SERVING
GROUP DINNERS UP TO 1000
AT $2.00 A COVER UP.

Ownership Management
by THEODORE KEMM

GRAMERCY 4900 to 4907

The Training School for Jewish Social Work offers a fifteen months' course of graduate study in Jewish Family Case Work, Child Care, Community Centers, Federations and Health Centers.
Several tuition scholarships and maintenance fellowships are available to especially qualified students.
The winter quarter begins January 3, 1927.
For further information, address the Director,
THE TRAINING SCHOOL for JEWISH SOCIAL WORK
210 WEST 91st STREET NEW YORK CITY

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

"An excellent magazine!" -George Jean Nathan

HALDEMAN-JULIUS QUARTERLY

THE big second issue (256 pages) of the Haldeman-Julius Quarterly is now ready—a beautifully printed, intelligently constructive magazine. Excellent contributions—scores of pictures, reproductions of paintings, drawings, etc. The Quarterly is highly endorsed by such men as George Jean Nathan, Joseph McCabe, Harry Hansen, John Cowper Powys, Upton Sinclair, E. W. Howe, etc. Comments include: "a remarkable achievement," "an interesting magazine," "informative and unique," "the richest intellectual feast," etc.

The Haldeman-Julius Quarterly is a huge magazine—the big January number contains 256 pages, and no advertising! A six months' Trial Subscription (see below) gives you this big issue immediately, and also the first issue, making a complete file. The Quarterly's purpose and tone is indicated by the contents of the big second number, now ready, as follows:

CONTENTS, JANUARY, 1927

EDITORIALS....By E. Haldeman-Julius
LINDSBORG, KANSAS: The Prairie Town Whose Art and Music Have Given It Fame.....By Clarice Cunningham
THE ART OF OSCAR BROUSSE JACOBSON: Reproductions of Ten Paintings.....With an Appreciation by William Cunningham
FROCK COATS: An Unusual Short Story..By Nelson Antrim Crawford
THE TRIUMPH OF THE X-RAY: Progress in Scientific Achievement With Roentgen Rays.By Maynard Shipley
ALMA LEVINE: An Episode of the Palmer Raids.....By James Fuchs
MIGUEL COVARRUBIAS: A Mexican Boy Brushed by the Wings of Genius..
.....By Marcet Haldeman-Julius
YOUNG OKLAHOMA'S CONTRIBUTION TO AMERICAN POETRY: Critical Essay on Young Voices Being Heard Outside the State.....
.....By William Cunningham
THE STATE OF ARKANSAS: An Appraisal of the "Wonder State" and Its Possible Future.....
.....By W. G. Clugston
W. T. BENDA AND HIS MASKS: Calm Repose, Subtle Drama, and Girls With Almond Eyes.....
.....By Lloyd E. Smith
RATIONALISM'S DEBT TO IMMANUEL KANT: The Launching of Pure Reason Against Tottering Theology
.....By J. V. Nash
THEODORE DREISER: AN APPRECIATION: He Looks at Life Honestly, Calmly, Sympathetically, Helplessly
.....By Louis Adamic
THE ABILITY TO THINK CONSTRUCTIVELY: A Sincere Regard for the Truth Is Going Begging in America
.....By Oscar Lewis
THE HUMAN ORIGIN OF MORALS: The Evolution of Morality Is Natural—Not Divine.....By Joseph McCabe
RUDYARD KIPLING'S TWELVE IMMORTALS: A Jury of Fifteen Selects a Dozen Men as the World's Greatest
.....By E. Haldeman-Julius
HOW A COLLEGE PROFESSOR MAKES HIS LIVING: The Problem of Maintaining a High Standard in the Lives of the Educated.....By Robert Tasker
MEMORY AND THE MAN: A Summary of the Significant Facts About Our Memories.....By Leo Markham
PROFESSORS AND POPULARIZATION: A Protest Against the Scientist's Scornful "Hang the Public"
.....By Carrol Lane Fenton
THE DIARY OF A METHODIST PROFESSOR: Life and Learning as It Really Is in a Southern College.....
.....By Andrew J. Lamb
ROGER BALDWIN VISITS LOS ANGELES: An Evangelist of Liberty in the City of Revivals..By Louis Adamic
THE ROMANCE THAT BALZAC LIVED: How the Great Interpreter of the Human Comedy Lived and Loved..
.....By Ralph Oppenheim
THE FIRST AMERICAN AT TUT-ANKH-AMEN'S TOMB: Dr. James H. Breasted Reveals the Truth About Ancient Civilizations.....
.....By J. V. Nash
THE ART OF SELF-CULTURE: Acquiring, Widening and Deepening a Certain Attitude Toward Life.....
.....By John Cowper Powys
THE EVOLUTIONAL ENIGMA: Is Man, Over-Developed, Doomed As Were His Dominant Predecessors?.....
.....By G. D. Eaton
E. W. HOWE: Unbuncombed, Unsentimental, Clear Thinking and Practical.....By George Jean Nathan
AN EDITOR'S NOTES AND IMPRESSIONS: An Informal Survey of the Fascinating Panorama of Life....
.....By E. Haldeman-Julius
SPEAKING OF FINER THINGS: A Little Tale of High Ideals in Moronia....
.....By Hildegarde Smith
AN INTUITIONIST CONCEPTION OF HISTORY: Out of Germany Comes an Iconoclastic Revalution of Values..
.....By Isaac Goldberg
THE METHODIST MACHINE: Why I Did Not Enter the Methodist Ministry
.....By Henry W. Thurston
SEXUAL RATIONALISM: Notes on a Changing Valuation of Behavior..
.....By Isaac Goldberg
THE MOORISH CIVILIZATION: How Its Conquest by Christianity Threw Back Progress Five Centuries.....
.....By Joseph McCabe
DR. JOHN ROACH STRATON'S MUSEUM: A Few Suggestions That May Bring Joy to the Fundamentalist God.....By Carroll Lane Fenton
THE ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT: Can Vengeance Upon the Transgressor Be Socially Justified?
.....By V. F. Calverton

6 MONTHS' TRIAL SUBSCRIPTION $1

Here is your opportunity to secure no less than 448 pages of excellent reading, together with more than 200 illustrations, for $1. Send the blank below with a dollar bill and get a six months' trial subscription to the Haldeman-Julius Quarterly. ACT AT ONCE!

PIN $1 TO THIS BLANK

Haldeman-Julius Quarterly,
Dept. Q-6, Girard, Kansas
I enclose $1 for 6 months' Trial Subscription to the Haldeman-Julius Quarterly. Begin with the first number.
Name ..... Address .....
City..... State .....

International Relations Section

The Real Hungary

By G. E. R. GEDYE

[Count Bethlen's party, as Mr. Gedye predicted, won an overwhelming victory in the December elections. The poll was done in instalments. On December 8 candidates were elected in 103 districts, in all but four by public balloting. The Government won 102 seats. Wachtler, a Democrat, was the only Oppositionist elected, even Count Julius Andrassy being defeated. On December 10, 91 more districts voted by open ballot; five opponents and 86 supporters of the Government were elected. Among the successful opponents were Count Albert Apponyi and Anton Sigreey, moderate Legitimist supporters of the Hapsburg succession. Hejjas, the terrorist, was elected as a government supporter.]

Vienna, November 21

THE "Kingless Kingdom" of Hungary, where elections are being held in December, is generally recognized to be an unfortunate country. If the interests of a people are to be identified with those of its rulers, this judgment would have to be revised. No regime in Europe has been more successful in turning national misfortune into personal profit.

Hungary is usually presented to the world as a land of peace-loving, hard-working peasants, crushed by the Treaty of Trianon, yet harboring no revengeful thoughts. It is a country which has been martyred by Bolshevism, say its official propagandists, yet which is now wisely ruled and happy in its parliamentary institutions—a country which [illegible]s the repose implied by its absence from the columns of the foreign press. Its only desire, apparently, is to be left alone by its neighbors and eventually to return to the [illegible]archy which it abandoned under pressure in 1920.

It is a cleverly drawn picture, but not one which is [illegible]able by students and friends of the Hungarian people. [illegible] Hungary [illegible] a nation in shackles in part [illegible], in part reriveted by its present rulers. It appears [illegible] as a country artificially maintained in a state of [illegible] in the interest of an oligarchy, [illegible] the people forbidden freedom of speech and opinion—a country in which this oligarchy spends large sums in artificially nourishing dreams of revenge on its neighbors and in secret preparations for their realization. The Magyar rulers seem to impartial observers to be holding in an Eastern bondage an unfortunate subject population which alone of Central European peoples fails to [illegible] in the new liberties acquired by its neighbors.

I do not wish for one moment to minimize the injustice done to Hungary by the vindictive Treaty of Trianon. Desirable as it was that her non-Magyar subjects should be freed from compulsory allegiance to the Thousand Year Kingdom which in a thousand years had failed to assimilate them, it was not right or expedient that on all debatable points their wishes should have been made law. The boundaries of Hungary were drawn with little regard to her national claims or to her economic needs. It may be doubted, however, whether the bulk of the Magyar population thus placed under alien rule has suffered more than [illegible] left to the tender mercies of the Magyar oligarchy.

In Czecho-Slovakia, Rumania, and Jugoslavia, if he has been oppressed in the matter of language and education, the Magyar peasant has shared in the distribution of land which followed the break-up of unwieldy latifundia. In Hungary there has been nothing but a mockery of land reform; the adult peasant labors on the land of his lord from sunrise until sunset for the sum of tenpence per day, his wife and children for sixpence or sevenpence. Yet the Esterhazy family owns more than three-quarters of a million acres of land, of which Count Paul Esterhazy alone owns 300,000 acres. More than eight-and-a-half million acres—33 per cent of all the arable land in Hungary—is owned by only 1,130 landowners. If you visit any Hungarian landowner, keep your hands thrust deep into your pockets, unless you wish to have them kissed by the first cringing peasant who realizes that you are a guest of his lord. Before every motor-car on the rough tracks that do duty for roads in Hungary the peasant stands with bowed head, hat in hand.

Count Michael Karolyi, the well-meaning but unsuccessful president of the short-lived Hungarian Republic, is always spoken of by the present rulers as "the Traitor"—and justly, for did he not try to institute land reform and thus betray what its rulers understand by "Hungary"—the interests of the oligarchy? Since Bolshevism ousted him and gave place in its turn to the White Terror, every precaution has been taken to fasten the yoke more firmly on the neck of the peasant. Though school attendance has decreased and school hours have been reduced the number of teachers has been nearly doubled, the additional personnel having for its main task the teaching of nationalism. In their free time the smaller boys learn the elements of soldiering in "Pathfinder" organizations; from the ages of 14 to 21, by the law of 1923, youths are forced to join the "Levente" and to attend its drills. This organization is supervised by officers of the old army, and is simply a militia disguised as a gymnastic association. Thus is the prohibition of military training set at naught. Where formerly a gendarmerie post of six men sufficed for six to ten villages, there is now one such post in every village. No wonder that 65 per cent of the national and municipal revenues of Hungary is spent on government servants.

Liberty fares little better in the cities, where misery [illegible] invisible to casual visitors who admire the flamboyant beauty of the wealthy quarters—is so extreme that in Budapest alone there were recently sixteen suicides in one day. In the court, prosecutions for speaking against the Regent, Admiral Horthy, are numerous, and savage sentences are inflicted. Perhaps the most useful weapon for stifling public opinion is the law making it an offense to say or write anything which might damage the name of the country abroad. It can be imagined, perhaps, to what an extent this is stretched to cover any utterance disagreeable to the ruling classes. The press is under special disabilities; the sale of any paper on the streets can be prohibited by a simple departmental order. In the same way, a paper can be suppressed for any length of time; there is no trial in the courts and no remedy.

To glance at three outstanding examples of the work of the law courts in the past twelve months may be instructive. Last year, Edmund Beniczky, a former Home Secretary, asserted that the Regent, Admiral Horthy, had been privy to the White Terrorist plot to murder Somogyi, a Socialist editor; he stated that, as Home Secretary, he himself had cognizance of the orders given by the Regent to prevent the punishment of the murderers. Finally, he declared that Count Bethlen also knew of these matters and that his—Beniczky's—statements were absolutely true. He was sentenced to three years' penal servitude after a trial which took place for the most part in camera, but was released after a few months. Count Bethlen made no statement on the matter.

Last winter, after strong pressure had been exercised by the French, Prince Louis Windischgraetz, M. Nadossy, Count Bethlen's all-powerful Police Minister, and other Hungarian aristocrats were put on trial for the forgery of franc notes. They declared that they had acted from patriotic motives in the interests of Hungary (that is, the oligarchy). Count Bethlen testified at the trial as to Prince Windischgraetz, saying: "I know him as a gentleman and I know him to be incapable of having acted from sordid motives." Before the Parliamentary Committee of Inquiry Count Bethlen admitted that he had learned of the proposed forgeries as early as 1921, and had given instructions that they were to be stopped. The sentences imposed on the forgers were amazingly light and have just been reduced.

This summer Rakosi and Weinberger, two Communist leaders, and their associates were put on trial. These two men had held office under the Communist regime in Hungary and had returned from Russia to try to organize a new Hungarian Communist Party. Nothing worse than this was proved against them; they were sentenced to eight years' penal servitude apiece, double the sentence imposed on the franc-forgery ringleaders. During the trial prison doctors proved that the prisoners had been brutally beaten by the police to extract confessions; the judge brushed aside the admitted evidence as unimportant, saying to the defense, in effect, "Well, all right, they were beaten. What of it? Get on with your case." This torture of prisoners is, in fact, an accepted thing in Hungary. As to the past horrors of the White Terror, these do not bear description. The White Terror murderers are unpunished, though they are all known, and one of the worst of them, Ivan Hejjas, who had nearly 200 persons, including his own brother-in-law, done to death in the wood of Orgovany, is standing as a candidate at these elections.

How is it that liberal opinion abroad knows so little of the real Hungary? Soon after the advent of the present regime Count Bethlen received the sage advice: "Get the City and Wall Street behind you, and the British and American press will be bound to follow." Every demand of international finance was complied with and foreign capital attracted to the country. The direction of press propaganda in Great Britain and America was placed in skilful British hands. Every endeavor was made to propagate the legend of "Count Bethlen, Hungary's Strong Man," and to suggest that if he were upset only Bolshevism would follow and invested capital would be lost. Hence it would be dangerous to publish anything unfavorable to his regime. The Hungarians saw to it that any British or American journalist coming to Budapest was carefully nursed; lavish hospitality, apparently spontaneous, was dispensed on a regular system, and the visitor shown just what it was desirable for him to see. Some visitors have even found very useful financial tips being tendered them. Resident Hungarian correspondents of British papers, if they were not already connected with the Hungarian Foreign Office, could always be dealt with by the methods applicable to all other Hungarian subjects. Determined and skilful attempts were made by British agents of the Hungarian Government to discredit with their papers in London and New York all

Psychological Abstracts

A new journal published monthly by the American Psychological Association. The first number will appear in January. Professor W. S. Hunter of Clark University is the editor and there is a board of distinguished cooperating editors from America and Europe. The Journal will be international in scope and will contain abstracts of current books and articles in the field of Psychology and kindred subjects.

The following topics will be covered: General Topics in Psychology; Sensation and Perception; Feeling and Emotion; Attention, Memory and Thought; Nervous System; Motor Phenomena and Action; Plant and Animal Behavior; Evolution and Heredity; Special Mental Conditions; Nervous and Mental Disorders; Social Functions of the Individual; Industrial and Personnel Problems; Childhood and Adolescence; Educational Psychology; Biometry and Statistics; and Mental Tests.

The Journal will be of value to all persons desiring to keep in touch with the psychological literature of the world.

Price $6.00 a year (overseas $6.25). Kindly make checks payable to Psychological Abstracts.

In order to secure the January number promptly, subscriptions should be sent at once to

H. S. LANGFELD, Business Editor

Princeton University PRINCETON, N. J

THAT FRIEND OF YOURS— AND CHRISTMAS?

The Manchester Guardian WEEKLY of course!

Christmas comes but once a year but The Manchester Guardian Weekly every week to be a constant reminder throughout the year of your interest and affection. To a friend with English affiliations it would be an especially appropriate gift. A suitable greeting card giving your name as donor will be sent.

——————MAIL THIS COUPON——————

To The Manchester Guardian Weekly
220 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose three dollars for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed direct from Manchester, England, to:

Name .....

Address .....

Order by .....

.....

persons writing in Hungary who were not resident in Budapest and therefore largely immune from the combination of [illegible] employed there.

What of the future? Count Bethlen has rushed through Parliament a House of Magnates Act consolidating the oligarchy and benefiting the Hapsburg archdukes. With the open ballot in 218 out of 240 constituencies, where the peasant has to declare on the hustings before the magistrate, the gendarmes, and his feudal lord whether he is for or against the Government, the latter is sure of an abject obedient majority. Whether or no Count Bethlen's motive in suddenly ordering an election [illegible] was to try to restore the monarchy, the people of Hungary will have no chance of voicing their will at these farcical elections. How long they will remain mute and [illegible] under the heel of the dictator it is impossible to say. [illegible] intolerable oppression provokes in time desperate and terrible remedies, and international finance should remember that, backing Hungary, it backs a medieval tyranny.

Contributors to This Issue

[illegible] is the Washington correspondent for the Capital News.

[illegible] is giving courses in government at the College of the City of New York.

ROBERT DELL is The Nation's correspondent in Paris.

[illegible] is a poet and essayist now at the University of Wisconsin.

[illegible] J. HINRICHSEN, of the department of [illegible] Columbia University, is making a special study of the Negro.

ALTER BRODY is a New York poet, playwright, and critic.

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES, formerly professor of philosophy at the University of Oregon, is living in New York.

ARNOLD WHITRIDGE is author of a recent critical work on [illegible].

LOUIS LOZOWICK, painter and illustrator, is a contributing [illegible] to the Soviet Union.

G. E. R. GEDYE was for years correspondent of the London [illegible] in Central Europe.

[illegible] of the Pennsylvania Bar is a [illegible]

A MOSCOW DIARY [illegible] people in Soviet Russia today.
By Anna Louise Strong. Cloth, $1.90 postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
THE SEVEN SEAS PUBLISHING CO. 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

DEBATES ☐ LECTURES

DEBATE
CLARENCE S. DARROW Famous Debater and Lawyer VERSUS DR. WILL DURANT Author of "Story of Philosophy"
SUBJECT IS MAN A MACHINE?
DARROW SAYS YES! Chairman to be announced DURANT SAYS NO!
SATURDAY, JANUARY 8th, 8:30 P.M.
CARNEGIE HALL
Tickets: $1.10, $1.65, $2.20, $2.75, $3.30, including tax.
ON SALE at Box Office or by mail or at offices of LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION 500 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK Telephone Longacre 4447
N. B. Out-of-towners can receive a printed ad verbatim report of this [illegible] by sending $1 now.

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE
Program Dec. 19-25
AT COOPER UNION
(8th St. and Astor Place)
At 8 o'clock ADMISSION FREE
Sunday, December 19—Earl Barnes—"The Future of the Teaching Profession."
Tuesday, Dec. 21—L. Pierce Clark—"A Psychological Interpretation of Leonardo Da Vinci as Scientist and Inventor."
Friday, Dec. 24—No Meeting—Christmas Holidays.

AT MANHATTAN TRADE SCHOOL
(Lexington Ave. and 22nd St., at 8 o'clock.)
Single Admission, 25 cents
Reduction for Course Tickets
Monday, Dec. 20—Mr. Mark Van Doren—Literary Critics of Our Civilization. "Robinson Jeffers."
Wednesday, Dec. 22—Scott M. Buchanan—A Metaphysical Doctrine. "Proving the Theorems."
Thursday, Dec. 23—Dr. E. G. Spaulding—Outlines of Philosophy. "The Validity of Knowledge."
Saturday, Dec. 25—No meeting.

"ASIA AND THE WESTERN WORLD"
COURSE OF SIX LECTURES
By WILLIAM R. SHEPHERD, Ph.D., L.H.D.
In the COMMUNITY CHURCH AUDITORIUM
Park Avenue and 34th Street
On THURSDAY EVENINGS, Jan. 6, 13, 20, 27; Feb. 3, 10 at 8:15
Course Tickets, $2.50, can be secured in advance at the office of the Community Church, 12 Park Avenue, New York City. Single Admission 75 cents.

True food is the foundation of Good health
Fresh Vegetables
Whole Wheat Products
Satisfying Diet for Diabetics
No animal fat used
Trufood VEGETARIAN RESTAURANT
153 W. 44th St., East of Broadway

FREE VACATIONS
THE Owners of the Newest Adult Camp in the Adirondacks are offering a two weeks' vacation free to any two persons who will suggest a [illegible] name for their new camp, now being constructed on beautiful Tripp Lake.
[illegible]
LENA BARISH,
919 Woodycrest Ave., New York City

CHRISTMAS VACATION
[illegible] and intelligent CHILDREN'S VACATION go to DELAWARE CLIFF LODGE
[illegible] in the mountains of Northern New Jersey. [illegible] fireplace, radio and all [illegible]
[illegible] Phone [illegible] Orchard 7162
[illegible] Fifth Avenue, New York City

THEATER
Modjacot Shpeel
Yiddish Marionette Theatre
95 Second Ave. Orchard 7162
Playing every evening—Saturday and Sunday matinees
[illegible] and other Puppet plays

WANTED
YOUNG woman, preferably with some experience at making contacts, for special work in advertising department of The Nation. Compensation moderate at the start. Write, giving details, including telephone number, Box 1000, care The Nation. Do not phone or call.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One Policy, One System, Universal Service

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIII NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1926 No. 3208

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS ... 677

EDITORIALS:

Government by Crooks? ... 680

Epicures in Crime ...

Walter Damrosch Retires ...

Books and Behavior ...

THE FUGITIVES. By Hendrik van Loon ...

THE ANNUAL CHRISTMAS SIDE SHOWS. By ... Lyons ...

A THIRD TERM FOR COOLIDGE? By ... R. Kent ...

COMMUNISM . . . A RELIGION? By ... Fisher ...

FRANCE AND GERMANY, FRIENDS. By ... Trent ...

BERTHA, THE SEWING MACHINE GIRL. By Ann Washington Craton 689

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the ... ...

CORRESPONDENCE ... 691

BOOKS, MUSIC, PLAYS:

Commentary on John v. 24. By S. ... Dawson ...

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren ...

Democracies at War. By ... Hutchinson ...

The Holy War. By Allen Tate ... 691

The Democratic Ideal. By ... Rodman ...

Marmaduke Pickthall. By Wilbur ... ...

End of the Aztecs. By Cleveland B. ... ...

Novels in Brief ... 696

The Nation's Poetry Prize ...

Music: A Few Happy Moments. By ... ...

Drama: The Easiest Way. By Joseph Wood ... ...

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Opposition in the Soviet Union ...

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

DOROTHY GRAFFE VAN DOREN

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor: FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor: MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors:

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, ... and to ... countries in the Postal Union, $6.50.

THE NATION, No. ... West Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 13, Woburn Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

ONCE MORE THE UNYIELDING MAN in the White House has shown that he can be turned and twisted like any town alderman. On December 9 Mr. Coolidge wrote to the editors of the Army and Navy Journal, in reply to that journal's insistent demand for more cruisers, that "my views are epitomized in the annual message and budget message presented to Congress this week. I am convinced the estimates submitted provide adequately for the services; and economic [!] administration will . . . maintain the navy in a high state of efficiency." The day this letter appeared in the press the strong man was waited upon by members of the House Naval Affairs Committee, whereupon he forgot all about his messages, "economic" administration, his program of economy, and his pledge to stand by the budget estimates, and consented not only to the three cruisers which he himself had held up since 1924 but also to a new program for building ten more new cruisers at the enormous cost of $105,000,000. Thus Economy Cal! It is represented that new facts presented to Mr. Coolidge suddenly convinced him that we were dropping to fourth place in the cruiser race; at any rate he who declared on December 7 that "No navy in the world, with one exception, approaches ours and none surpasses it," and on December 8 that to begin work on even three cruisers "would be unfortunate at this time and not in keeping with our attitude toward these [disarmament] negotiations" has joined the ballyhoo for international competition in cruisers. It is stated that this is to be a warning to Great Britain and Japan that "the United States is ready to keep pace with them." Which reminds us that it was Calvin Coolidge who on October 26, 1925, at Omaha, declared that "in spite of all arguments in favor of great military forces, no nation ever had an army large enough to guarantee it against attack in time of peace or to insure its victory in time of war." The President, evidently, has neither the power to think clearly nor the backbone to carry out his own policies.

BEFORE THE FALL-DOHENY acquittal fades out of the public mind we must protest against the assumption that the Executive or any of his assistants has the right to withhold facts from any court whatsoever. The Executive has the constitutional right to withhold from Congress information the publication of which it deems inimical to the public welfare, but we have never heard that an official has the right to conceal facts when they are demanded by a court in a regular judicial procedure. That the judge in the Fall-Doheny case refused to insist upon the production of the Gleaves documents upon which the alleged Japanese war scare was based reflects gravely upon his conduct of the case besides establishing a precedent which lawyers must recognize as extremely dangerous. It is an unfortunate coincidence that Secretary Wilbur, who took this high-handed position, comes from the same California town in which Doheny was a leading figure when Mr. Wilbur began his career; that he was only recently chief justice of California makes his action still more regrettable. The suppression of the Gleaves reports together with Mr. Coolidge's sudden plan to build thirteen more cruisers can only have unfortunate echoes in Japan.

THE SITUATION AS TO MEXICO hourly grows more serious. Secretary Kellogg threatens that if President Calles does not yield before January 1 the United States will withdraw recognition, raise the embargo on the export of arms to Mexico, and refuse all American credits. This means a deliberate effort to overthrow a neighboring government. Lifting the arms embargo can only mean that the Government intends to look with a blind eye upon expeditions against Mexico organized in America. Such action is sure to rally the Mexicans to Calles and to put him in a stronger position than he now holds. Instead of toppling him, as intended, it might make him impregnable. Still worse for the American oil interests—whose obedient ally Mr. Kellogg, erstwhile prosecutor of the Standard Oil, has now become—may be the reaction from such a policy. It may lead, in retaliation, to still more radical action against their properties. Overthrow of Calles, on the other hand, could only produce years of chaos and bloodshed, which might satisfy Mr. Kellogg and Mr. Sheffield, but would hardly produce dividends on Mexican oil holdings. Stockholders may well contrast the defiant American attitude with the acceptance of the new order by some of the English oil companies. If the American oil men are wise they will decide before the New Year to follow suit.

LET US BEGIN THE NEW YEAR with a vote of thanks to the Senate for defeating on a point of order General Andrews's request for a $500,000 appropriation for his "under-cover men" in the prohibition-enforcement army. This money was intended to be used secretly, and without [illegible] spies, go-betweens, and agents provocateurs. We are for honest enforcement of the Volstead Act as long as it is on the statute-books—in contrast to [illegible] Clarence Darrow, who wishes to kill it by civil disobedience. But we have no more use for underhand [illegible] than we have for the prohibition law itself. It is unnecessary, because there are any number of [illegible] who might be hired at once. In fact, one of the worst features of this secret-service system is almost always undertaken by scoundrels or by men who, if they are not [illegible] quickly become so. It is almost on a par with the most degrading police practice of all—the [illegible] of policemen [illegible] to commit crimes and then to prosecute them. We want General Andrews to show that the government is superior to the bootleggers and their criminal tribe; but as a beginning let the government itself [illegible] the dirty business of the snooper and the spy.

WE HOPE that the Senate will now promptly ratify [illegible] that abolishing poison gas and the pact with Turkey. Senator Borah has thrown himself into the fight for the former with courage and determination. In the face of protests from the American Legion and many chemists—all of whom were doubtless horrified when Germany began her "barbarous" chemical warfare—General Pershing, as the fair, honest, and just fighter he is known to be, has come out against poison gas. If we decline to join the other nations in barring poison gas we shall make hypocritical our insistence that we are for genuine disarmament. As for the treaty with Turkey, that does nothing more than ratify the existing status and simplify it by permitting the resumption of regular diplomatic relations. We are aware that men and women of conscience oppose ratification on sincerely held grounds. They see in acceptance of the treaty approval of all the acts of past and present Turkish governments of which public opinion disapproves. We cannot agree, and the majority of the Americans living and working in Turkey as business men or missionaries also favor ratification. The best way for the United States to aid Turkey to the right kind of position in the family of nations is to enter into those treaty relations which make for peace and give us an opportunity to influence Turkey as a friend.

GERMANY'S MINORITY CABINET has been forced out. It was a "center coalition," and could carry on only when the Socialists on the Left or the Nationalists on the Right supported it. This time the Nationalists wanted a thoroughgoing Right orientation while the Socialists denounced it for tolerating the secret enlargement of the Reichswehr disclosed in the recent Feme trials. Readers of The Nation will recall Louis Fischer's article, Is Germany Disarmed? in our issue of October 20. Secret organizations of reactionaries have drilled openly in Germany; real republicans have been barred from the army of the German Republic by its monarchist officers; political murders even have been committed by secret organizations led by Reichswehr officers. If the High Command has not been aware of these machinations it has been culpably negligent—and the Socialists who forced these issues on the attention of an unwilling Reichstag deserve credit as truer German patriots than those who, concealing facts, have increased foreign suspicions. The old Cabinet will carry on until after the holidays. Meanwhile a new uncertainty reigns in Eastern Europe, because of the Lithuanian coup d'etat. A reactionary military clique has ousted the Cabinet which had negotiated a friendly treaty with Russia, and the suspicion naturally arises that Poland's dictator, Pilsudski, has or will have a finger in the pie.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES has passed a compromise bill dealing with the alien property and American claims against Germany. It will return 80 per cent of the sequestrated property, giving to the owners certificates for the other 20 per cent, entitling them to share in payments made to the United States under the Dawes Plan, apart from the Rhine army costs. The Americans holding claims against Germany are to receive payment for 70 per cent. of their claims now, taking certificates for the balance. The unallocated interest fund, accumulated down to March 1, 1923, amounting to $26,000,000, is to be used for the American claimants, the original alien owners to receive certificates in return. This is an improvement on the original administration bill, which provided for outright confiscation of the interest, but we must express astonishment at the statement in the President's message that we have "scrupulously observed" the principle that private property may not be confiscated in time of war. Has the President heard of the Chemical Foundation case, even more outrageous because it took place after the armistice? Inasmuch as the owners of the sequestrated property, and of the ships, radios, and patents taken over by the Government itself, are glad to take what a niggardly government will permit them to have, the bill probably deserves support in the Senate. But it would make our national record a little more savory if the United States undertook to guarantee the certificates against any default in the Dawes Plan. We owe the money; why not promise to pay it ourselves?

WHO CAN VALUE UTILITIES? Can a federal judge, linked by family ties with the traction company upon whose rates he is passing judgment, throw out the testimony of as eminent an authority as Delos F. Wilcox, on the specious plea of company counsel that Mr. Wilcox was not an engineer and had never worked for a street-railway company? In the Denver Tramways Company case, to be heard soon on appeal by the United States Supreme Court, Judge Robert E. Lewis made such a ruling when a special master rendered his report after months of testimony. The city's case was virtually nullified, but the newly elected Klan administration, with Rice W. Means as City Attorney, continued impassive, having failed to criticize in any way the master's high valuation or to protest against Judge Lewis's family connections and expressions of prejudice. Public-utility valuation is an intricate subject, full of moot points, involving economics, accounting, engineering, and, above all, public policy. It calls preeminently for a mind which can correlate these many aspects and arrive at a comprehensive judgment. In the course of his wide experience in public-utility matters Delos Wilcox was chosen by the post-war Federal Electric Railways Commission to analyze the voluminous testimony given before it; and the commission styled his analysis "a complete and masterful study of the whole electric-railway problem." Various other authoritative experts who have appeared for the cities are, fortunately, the product neither of engineering schools nor of company employment. Judge Lewis's decision, if allowed to stand, would bar such men and make valuation and rate hearings field-days for the companies.

HOW MUCH MONEY do "white-collar" workers receive? The most recent and comprehensive answer is from the Massachusetts Department of Labor and Industries, covering a survey as of May 1, 1926, of 1,075 establishments in representative districts of the State. The number of persons classifiable as office workers was found to be 22,427, of whom 36.5 per cent were men and 63.5 were women. This is about 12 per cent of the total number of office workers disclosed by the federal census of 1920. The Massachusetts survey reveals a sharp difference between the earnings of men and women and some decidedly low averages for large groups of the latter. Among men 6.4 per cent receive less than $16 a week, 13.7 per cent less than $20, 25.4 per cent less than $25, 40.1 per cent less than $30, 67.8 per cent less than $40, 81.7 per cent less than $50, and 18.3 per cent $50 or more. Among women 13.7 per cent receive less than $16 a week, 38.4 per cent less than $20, 70.4 per cent less than $25, 89.2 per cent less than $30, and 98 per cent less than $40! Various morals suggest themselves; the reader may pick his own. We are content merely to compare the returns of these "white-collar" employees, generally unorganized, with the earnings of 824,313 union workers in the United States, employed in the building trades, in printing and publishing, in baking, on street railways, in laundries, and as teamsters, chauffeurs, or longshoremen. These earnings, as given by the federal Department of Labor for the year ended with last June, averaged $52.12 for a full-time week. There's a difference. Can any bright boy guess why?

THE POLICE HAVE WON the strike of the textile workers of Passaic, New Jersey—for the strikers. With the signing of an agreement between the Botany Consolidated Mills and the union this bitter industrial controversy of a year's duration is virtually settled, for, although some companies have not yet capitulated, the surrender of the most influential employing group undoubtedly fixes the terms which the others will eventually accept. The 10 per cent cut in wages—already at the impoverishing level of $12 to $22 a week—which precipitated the strike has been rescinded, and the workers have won in addition collective bargaining, recognition of their organization, and preference for union members in reinstatement. The workers have not obtained the closed shop, a wage increase, nor reduced hours, but the last two demands were not put forward for any except bargaining purposes. And to celebrate the victory what could be more appropriate than that the union should spread a banquet and invite as honorary guests the Sheriff of Bergen County, the police chiefs of Passaic and Garfield, and other administrative and judicial officials whose lawlessness and brutality raised the strike from a local protest of unorganized and inarticulate aliens to a national fight for civil liberties and common decency?

SO WE PROPOSE A TOAST to the various bullies and buffoons in high places who imagined they were helping the employers by permitting the clubbing of peaceful pickets, the breaking up of lawful meetings, and the promulgation of an absurd edict of "martial law," whereas in fact they created a nationwide moral and financial support for the strike and a determination and devotion among the strikers without which the struggle would have been abandoned and forgotten months ago. Although begun by a helpless and almost voiceless group of workers, the strike has been one of the most eloquent and resounding conflicts in recent years. Ignored if not scorned at the outset by the national union of the trade, the United Textile Workers, the strikers rallied under communist leadership but eventually won their way to organization and protection under the American Federation of Labor. It is inspiring also to reflect that a press and public which are apathetic to many wrongs have been singularly responsive to the cry of oppression from Passaic and did not dismiss it after a few brief weeks in the preoccupation of other matters. But we must not forget that a dozen prisoners still suffer in Jersey jails on what seem to be outlandishly impossible charges of using bombs in the strike. They must be freed and those who tortured and beat them must be prosecuted before we can leave the battlefield of Passaic—for another.

THERE ARE DOMAINS which science should not enter —or at least where the thought of its entrance is appalling. For example, a man today may sit in the privacy of his bedroom—even in the ultra-privacy of his bed, and, thanks to the wonderful invention of the telephone, may carry on a conversation with the most beautiful lady he knows. He may have laid his wig on the wig-stand; his pajamas may be minus their top button; there is, in short, no limit to the possible extent of his dishabille, but the colloquy may be of the utmost propriety and decorum. Science, however, intrudes; the television apparatus makes it possible for the image of the telephone speaker to be conveyed simultaneously with his voice. Privacy is gone, comfort is gone, the early hours of the morning are lost in primping and preening, all in order to carry on a short conversation over the telephone.

THE INVENTORS OF THE TELEPHOTE, of course, have no designs on a man's privacy. They plan for the image of a baseball game or a peace conference to be conveyed as speeches now are transmitted over the radio. They picture images of the opera, bright lights, gorgeous costumes, the tenor, the basso, the contralto, the lyric soprano with her golden hair in a braid down her back, floating into the family sitting-room along with the music. A desideratum indeed, for those who care for opera; just so with the prize-fight, the symphony orchestra, the Kiwanis banquet, the bedtime story of the benevolent rabbit and squirrel. But there is no guaranty that the benefits of the telephote will end with the transmittal of public activities. The inventors have imperiled the home. Nor is this the only direction from which it is threatened. In New York City a skyscraper 110 stories in height has been builded in the brain of an architect; its site has been chosen, plans for it have been filed, there remains only a question of time before it begins to hurl its steel girders into the clouds. The caverns in which pedestrians move about are becoming even darker and colder; the sun never enters. The New York home is increasingly lighted by artificial light and warmed far from the beneficent rays of the sun. Invention has made New York a city of cave-dwellers.

Government by Crooks?

All we could ask for that? The question inevitably suggests itself when we read of the acquittal of ex-Secretary Fall and Mr. Doheny and recall the escape of former Attorney General Daugherty and the former Alien Property Custodian, Thomas W. Miller, because of a "hung" jury. We admit in both cases the difficulty of proving conspiracy. That is technical and anything but easy to get over to a jury. Yet the fact remains that the Fall-Doheny jurymen were apparently moved by maudlin sentiment for a gray-haired, broken-down old promoter and his Cabinet ally, Fall, the man who had been his pal in the hard-pan days of their youth.

For some days the friendliness of the jury to the defendants had been so manifest that the reporters prophesied an acquittal. The lawyer for the accused admitted that his client Fall had lied about the $100,000 note in order to protect Doheny: "Lie? Of course he lied and every red-blooded man in New Mexico is proud of it." There was no denying the $100,000 transaction, or its juxtaposition to the Doheny lease of the naval oil reserve, or that this secret transaction about which Fall so proudly lied was anything but an above-board business deal. There was no denying that such a personal relationship between a public official and a public bidder was grossly improper and indefensible. But by means of mushy sentimentality; the apotheosis of frontier morals; an absurd naval scare that could never be substantiated; an appeal to gaze upon Mrs. Fall, "daughter of the matrons of Sparta and Rome" and "a mother of the West who in the sunset of life has taken her place by the side of her husband," and the delicate suggestion not to lift the shroud of a dead President, the jury was blinded to its duty and led to free the defendants. On both sides counsel resorted to the arts of the legal blatherskite and the government's performance rang off second best.

We do not hesitate to brand this a miscarriage of justice, for the essential issue in this case has already been adjudicated. The United States District Court in Los Angeles has declared: (1) that the actions of these two men were surrounded in secrecy in order to conceal them and to deceive Congress and the public; (2) that the conspiracy between Fall and Doheny is proved; (3) that Doheny's company was a specially favored bidder; (4) that Doheny and Fall were in cahoots as to the royalties. That court was clearly of the opinion—since upheld by the Court of Appeals, and now before the Supreme Court—that "the injury that has been done the nation, as well as the distrust of public officers that it has caused cannot be overestimated." What would it say now as to the extent of that injury in view of a jury's acquitting where the facts were so clear to it and the first court of review? We are aware, of course, that these two defendants may still be tried for bribery (a charge, it would seem, easier to prove than conspiracy)—and may receive their punishment for that—but the net result of the verdict is surely to increase throughout the United States the belief that there exists one kind of justice for rich men and another for the poor; that if you only steal a large enough sum you are safe; that if you are a poor wretch who has just stolen, for the fourth time, a sum, say, of fifty dollars you may go to jail for life, as has actually happened in New York under the Baumes law. Why should people think differently with this appalling record? "High-grade lawyers," it seems, can accomplish anything.

Why should the people feel differently when in addition they read that in defiance of public decency and elemental morality the Governor of Illinois, himself ordered by an Illinois court to pay back $1,000,000 to the State Treasury for illegal State expenditures during his incumbency, has just appointed Senator-elect Frank L. Smith to the United States Senate to fill the brief unexpired term of the late Senator McKinley? Warned by their own party leaders not to let this take place, both Governor Small and Mr. Smith defied their party as well as the decency of the Senate. This man who, as chairman of the Illinois Commerce Commission, "shook down" the public-utilities magnates in his State for contributions to his primary campaign funds running above a hundred thousand dollars, is not to wait until March 4 to present his credentials; he is to be seated at once if the Governor has his way—as if to do the bidding of the man who helped him to buy his seat. He is not even to await the findings of the Senate committee headed by Senator Reed which has inquired into the circumstances of his primary campaign. The Senate and public opinion alike are to be flouted with a brazen indecency unparalleled in recent history.

Well, the gauntlet is flung down and the issue is whether we are to be governed by and for and with crooks. That it is, whether Colonel Smith's soul is as white as snow and he is so steeped in rectitude as to be unaffected by that public-utility money and its implications, or whether he is there as the bond-servant of the donors. We have been through an orgy of corruption in high office and also of the purchasing of such office on a scale not even surpassed in the Administration of President Grant. If the Ohio gang is to go scot-free, if men about whose huge campaign receipts there can be no question are to be seated in the Senate, then let us at least cease to be hypocritical. Let us admit to all the world that we have sunk to as low an estate as any Central American republic.

The escape of Fall, Doheny, Daugherty, and their tribe is not what matters. The nation could afford even to lose its richest oil-fields if it learned its lesson. To punish a half dozen sinners would not alter the system under which they reached high office and aided one another in corruption. The menace lies in the fact that the nation still sleeps; that business men feel relieved that the system has not been upset; that jurors see nothing wrong when Cabinet secretaries secretly accept hundred-thousand-dollar gifts from old pals who happen to be oil magnates, and give away the public lands; that our national conscience has been numbed.

Governor Small and Colonel Smith at least seem to have dug their own grave. The Washington dispatches report that if Mr. Smith presents his credentials not ten Senators will vote for him. If true, let us be grateful for that. If there is any other outcome in this and the Vare case, if juries continue to free men who have soiled the United States Cabinet itself with their corruption, let us haul down the Stars and Stripes from the Capitol, hoist the black flag with a dollar mark on it, and proclaim our shame to all the world.

Epicures in Crime

THE Fall-Doheny acquittal suggests not only that we Americans have no passionate aversion to government by crooks, as indicated in an accompanying editorial, but also that we are becoming epicures in crime. We delight in —or at least we accept complacently—crimes de luxe, refined, and served on silver platters, at the same time that we turn savagely upon that which is crude, commonplace, or outmoded. If we are not becoming epicures—not to say snobs—in crime, how does it happen that in an era of striking public indifference toward political corruption and dishonest business transactions we are witnessing a spectacular outburst against such simple, old-fashioned crimes as burglary and highway robbery? It is not just a case of the rich man against the poor man. When the rich man is so ill-advised as to commit an unrefined crime we pursue him as relentlessly as if he were poor, although of course his money buys a better defense, and when it comes to hanging there is undoubtedly a feeling in the average juryman's noddle that a noose chafes a neck used to a greasy shirtband less than one coddled with a white collar. That wealth is no blanket protection against militant American morality is proved by our intolerance toward the Countess Karolyi who broke our First Commandment, "Thou shalt not commit radicalism"; and our treatment of the Countess Cathcart, who violated one of the higher numbered commandments—chiefly, perhaps, the eleventh, which reads, "And above all thou shalt not be found out."

Epicures in crime? If not that, how can Americans take so indifferently—even jocosely—the doings of our political and commercial gunmen and at the same time grow so hysterical over the acts of the old-fashioned revolver brandishers? The New York courts have been unable to convict Daugherty and Miller, but the State recently enacted in the Baumes law a code of increased vigor against the criminal resorting to older and more vulgar methods. According to this law a judge is required to send a man to prison for life if convicted of a felony four times, without reference to any mitigating circumstances, and the prisoner is deprived of any opportunity for parole. Thus a certain Negro, amiable in his cups, who for the fourth time in his life appropriated an automobile and went off for a stolen joy ride, was sentenced to life imprisonment; another whose record was sixty days in 1919 for third-degree burglary, sixty days in 1920 for petty larceny, two years in 1924 for third-degree burglary, and who was so unfortunate as to get into a fight with one of his fellow-stevedores and be arrested for assault, also will spend his life in prison. These are not desperate criminals, yet they receive the sentences usually allotted to such and the State prisons now are reported to be virtually filled. Formerly it was easier to plead guilty and rely on the possible leniency of the judge; now criminals stand trial in the hope of a jury disagreement. From June 30 to November 15 the number of indictments increased almost 100 per cent, although the same months in 1925 showed only a 10 per cent increase.

The Baumes law was intended to put the fear of jail—if not of God—into the heart of the unaristocratic criminal, but six months' experience with the above provision has called forth vigorous public disapproval from two district attorneys, several judges, and some of the leading newspapers. Yet the community at large, in violation of all that centuries of experience with penology should have taught, has been stampeded into a belief that cruel and long punishments are a protection against crime. Contemplation of this state of mind has led Heywood Broun to say in the New York World that "the community has hardened its heart against the criminal. And also," he adds, "softened its head." That our sudden fury against the old-fashioned criminal is unintelligent is demonstrated by the historical evidence that a reduction in crimes of violence has gone hand in hand with a lessening in the severity of punishment and an increased respect in the community for the sacredness of human life.

The importance of increasing rather than lessening the respect for human life makes it especially tragic that the hysteria which in New York has led to some of the exaggerations of the Baumes law has produced agitation for the restoration of capital punishment in at least two States where it is now happily non-existent. One of the most progressive aspects of criminal law in the United States in the past has been its tendency toward the abolition of the death penalty. In eight States—Michigan, Rhode Island, Wisconsin, Kansas, Maine, Minnesota, North and South Dakota—capital punishment no longer exists, and the complete elimination of this relic of barbarism ought to be a goal everywhere. But so far from a solid new ground there now seems to be danger of losing some of the old in the fright and ignorance of public opinion in the face of the so-called "crime wave." In North Dakota there is talk of restoring the death penalty and in Michigan a bill has been introduced into the legislature which would revive capital punishment in that State. Four States—Oregon, Washington, Arizona, and Missouri—restored capital punishment in the hysteria against radicalism immediately following the World War; it would be a tragedy if others stepped backward too.

And while we are in a frenzy to revive cruel and obsolete punishments it never occurs to us that a federal law limiting drastically the importation and transportation of revolvers would do more to end gunmen and banditry than all the jails and gallows ever created.

Walter Damrosch Retires

WALTER DAMROSCH is to lay down the baton after forty-two years of orchestral conducting. Not really to retire from the world of music—that is unthinkable. As long as he lives his interest in music and musical education will—must—continue. But the burden of leading the New York Symphony Orchestra he is now to shift to others after having devoted himself to it since 1903. He confesses to sixty-four years; it seems incredible, since it was surely only yesterday that he was "the young Damrosch," determined to follow in the footsteps of his great father, Leopold Damrosch, one of the best of the many gifts to the United States from musical Germany. But sixty-four is a good retiring age; Walter Damrosch deserves leisure for those other things dear to his heart which every active man puts by for the day when he retires—a day which for most never comes.

It is true, of course, that Walter Damrosch never rose to his father's heights and that his conducting could never be called inspired—it has always been uneven, at times bad. Severe criticisms of his conducting and musical taste have appeared in The Nation as well as elsewhere. There was at first a feeling that the son was following his father less because of an artistic urge than because of the temptation to profit by a city's progress which makes so many young men the law-partners of their prosperous fathers. Such feelings in regard to Walter Damrosch have long since been changed. The sincerity of the man; his tireless industry, his growth as a conductor, his power to make himself at home outside of the concert hall, his witty speeches, his unsparing efforts to make good music available to the masses, his championship of talent and genius—all these have been deservedly recognized, and it was a pleasure to record a few years ago his taking of the American orchestra for a trip to Europe—a most happy international event worthy of more than one government. Against his weaknesses must forever be set his services, which culminated in the Metropolitan Opera. In bringing the great singers and Lilli Lehmann to this country [illegible] Wagner often brought upon him the wrath of critics, his devotion to that composer and his opera company [illegible] their familiarization in the American musical world. As a program-maker he is of the very best.

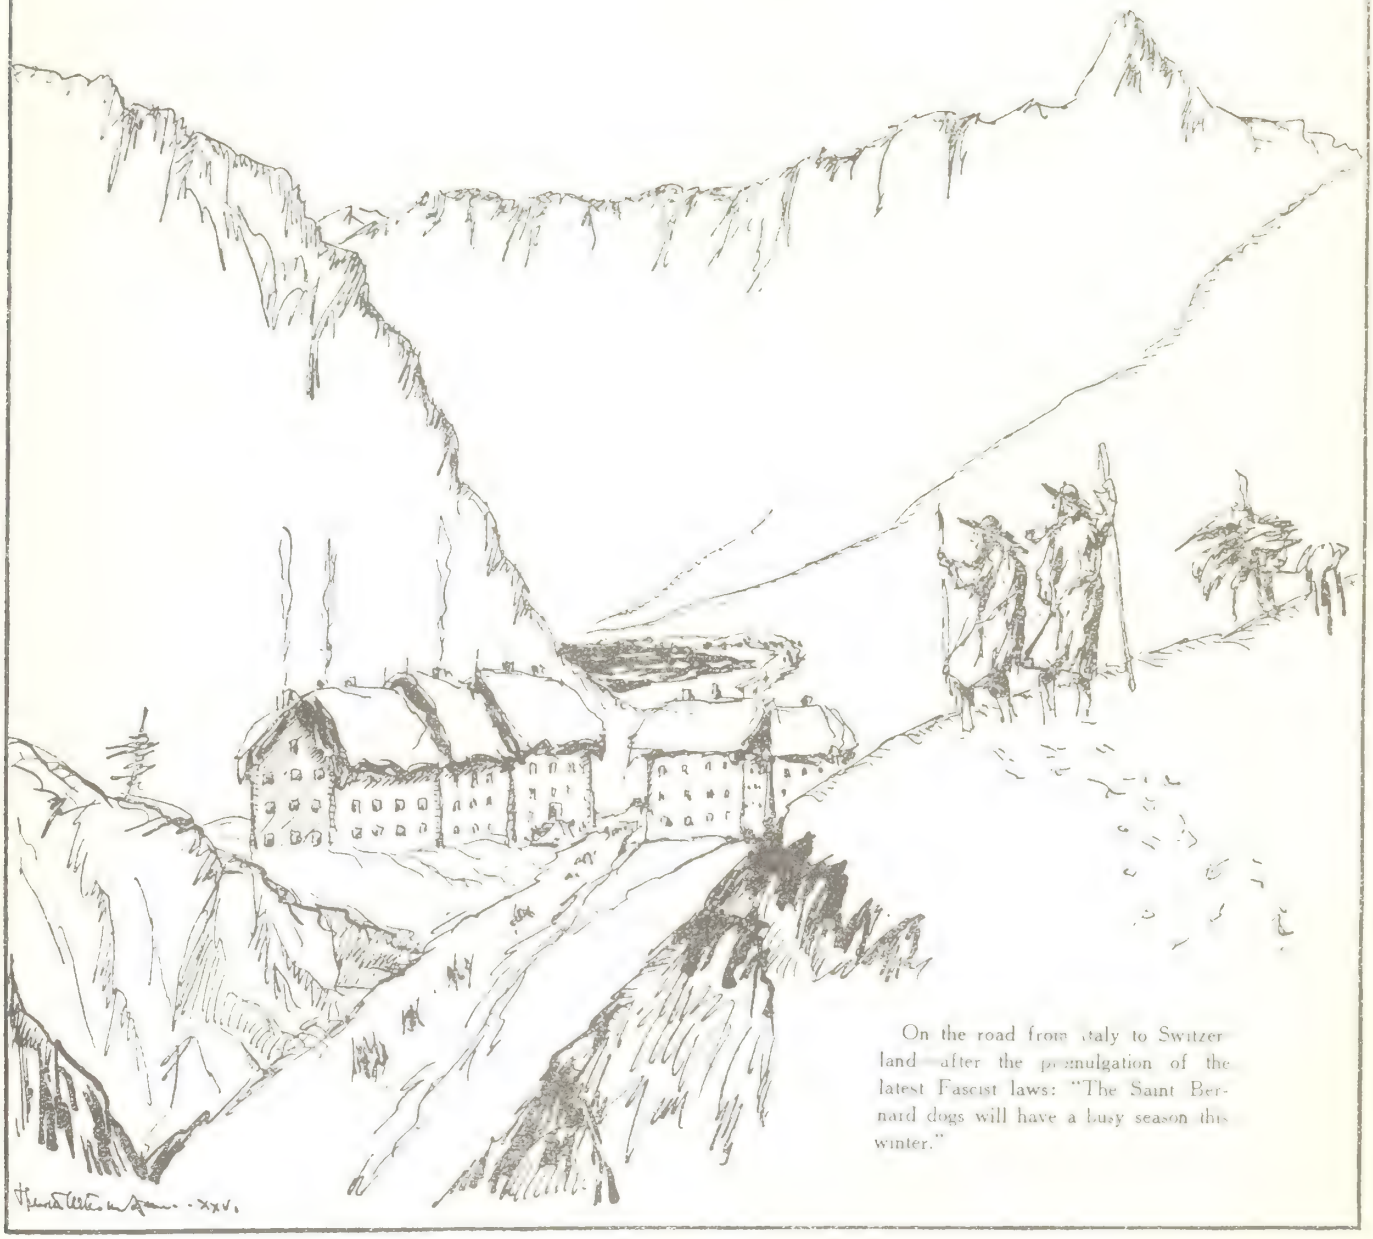
Somewhat opinion changed about his orchestra. There was a time when his alliance with Harry Harkness Flagler's extraordinary devotion and munificent generosity to the musical art seemed to imperil the success of other and more needed organizations—the Philharmonic, for instance, which soon found that it could not permanently use Mr. Damrosch's time and bring profit. There is nothing extraordinary in the spiritual and intellectual growth of America in the last quarter-century that its new appreciation of the orchestra. The establishment of great musical organizations [illegible] for West as Oregon has had its counterpart in New York where the Philharmonic is crowded, tickets for the Philadelphia Orchestra are unavailable, and the Minneapolis, Cincinnati, Boston, and other orchestras play to increasing houses. More than one great orchestra New York certainly needs; its musical growth has caught up with the Symphony. Whether the latter's deficits are as great as they were in 1914 when Mr. Flagler became its sole supporter we do not know; his purse has seemed limitless, and the reward has been his of anticipating and justifying a need. If the partnership with Damrosch is dissolved, it is gratifying to know that this generous citizen and patriot will continue to serve the musical world.

Books and Behavior

AT the bottom of the censorship question is another question which, so far as we know, has never been adequately considered. What is the effect of any book, good or bad, upon the conduct of its readers? It is generally assumed that a "good" book is "good for" human beings; everyone has heard it said of some work or other that "no one can rise from the reading of it without being a better man." People over the earth have claimed as much for their Bibles, whether they were Mohammedans, Buddhists, Confucianists, Mormons, Christian Scientists, Jews, or Christians. And Coleridge claimed as much for "Tom Jones," which he defended even against those who pointed to the dreadful episode of Tom and Lady Bellaston. Are such claims legitimate, and if they are, what do they mean? And does it follow that there are certain books the reading of which leaves one a worse or a more dangerous person?

The general question has been answered, but not adequately, by Gertrud Bäumer, a member of the Democratic Party in the German Reichstag. She was writing to the Vossische Zeitung in answer to widespread criticism in the German press of a censorship bill presented to the Reichstag. The bill is designed to discourage the publication of violent and otherwise "low" fiction of the sort which, it is reported, circulates in abundance today among the youth of the new republic. Frau Baumer said:



> It may be true that, on the whole, no great material harm is done by acts of burglary committed by youthful gangs after reading bad detective stories. What is true is that usually much harm is done to youth by these books. The question therefore is, should bad literature be permitted to get in the way of good literature and triumph over it? Which is worse, the risk that a book which may not be regarded as 100 per cent bad may be placed by mistake on the black list or the risk that one child's life be ruined by such a book?

Whatever the merits of this reasoning, Frau Baumer's argument has prevailed in the Reichstag, with the result that committees of investigation will be empowered, when six of their eight members so agree, to prevent any book or illustration from appearing anywhere in Germany henceforth. A court of appeal, to be established at Leipzig, will have we know not what mollifying effect.

Frau Baumer's reasoning is probably very bad—or it may be perfect. We do not know or care which. The point is that we are tired of reasoning per se in this connection. Are there no facts? Is there not a science of psychology, even one of physiology, that could throw light upon the processes set up in the mind, in the body, when a book is read? The body, presumably, is important, since it is with the body that a boy goes out of the room in which his mind has been absorbed and gets a gun, points it at some unsuspecting citizen on the street, and, perhaps, pulls the trigger. That is the process which Frau Bäumer highhandedly assumes when she speaks of burglaries "committed . . . after the reading of bad detective stories." She admits that there may be doubt concerning the amount of harm done by these burglaries; she has never thought to ask, it would seem, whether the burglaries were caused by the books. And does she imply, by the way, that "good" detective stories would not bring about the same results? The best detective stories we know are not about patriotism or platonic love; if they were we should not know them. Neither Shakespeare nor the Bible is wholly occupied with virtue.

If psychology and physiology could elucidate the processes we have spoken of, and if they could establish that books do influence conduct along with the imagination, there would still be the problem of deciding what actions or thoughts are good and what are bad. Ethics would come in there, and ethics, fortunately or unfortunately, is so far not a science; it changes with every decade. Doubtless it will always be difficult to know what is really "harmful" to "youth," and after that to say for certain that society is not just as well off with a little harm going on here and there. It is all very hard. And meanwhile the censorious are always raking over books and plays in America, looking for evil, and the House of Lords is considering a bill to prevent the publication of divorce-trial proceedings in English newspapers—in order, says Lord Burnham, proprietor of the Daily Telegraph, to render to the rich that protection of silence concerning their sins which is now enjoyed by the obscure poor. In England, then, they seek to leave such things to the imagination—which no government has thus far learned how to suppress.

The Fugitives

On the road from Italy to Switzerland after the promulgation of the latest Fascist laws: "The Saint Bernard dogs will have a busy season this winter."

The Annual Christmas Side-Shows

By EUGENE LYONS

A big year round the sole ring under the big top is occupied by Prosperity—a silk-hatted fellow; something of a magician, acrobat. This way, ladies and gentlemen, he rides to climax through mountains and reaches across oceans, he picks up the little fellows in Europe and South America and juggles them dizzy. [illegible] billion dollar surpluses for the government; billions of dollars in extra dividends; oodles of money—[illegible]. Millions on millions for [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] for [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] and

A Third Term for Coolidge?

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, December 18

SENATOR MOSES was right. The real business of this session of Congress is Presidential politics. Always reasonably frank, with a new six-year ticket in his pocket, the gentleman from New Hampshire can afford now to be franker than before. It was just after the election that he expressed himself to the above effect. No truer political words have been said in some time.

What's the use of writing about the session? What's the use of commenting on the silly and repetitious solemnity of the Coolidge message or the feebleness of White House leadership? Where's the good of talking about tax reduction, farm relief, and tariff changes? Every posted person knows that nothing will be done about any of them. The undignified and mortifying conciliation of insurgent Senators, the utter loss of Presidential dignity in the Coolidge-Nye incident, the White House invitations to the once blacklisted Shipstead—none of these things indicates a constructive party or a constructive program. All there is back of them is Presidential politics—Presidential politics played in a small way but unmistakable just the same. That is all anyone is interested in in Washington this session and Senator can afford to be as frank about it as Senator Mos—

Here are the facts—as things stand today Mr. Coolidge is the leading candidate for the Republican 1928 nomination. There is, however, considerable doubt that he can again "make the grade" notwithstanding the general and well-founded belief that the power of the Presidency is such that a White House incumbent can always secure a renomination. As to Mr. Coolidge wanting another term, that is too obvious to argue. No President ever liked the White House better than he. No President ever wanted to hold on to it more. When he leaves it will be because he has to. If and when he announces that he will not be a candidate to succeed himself, it will be because his prospects have faded and he is afraid to take the chance. In the last six weeks he has made his desire to stay evident in a hundred ways, and nowhere more plainly than in his conferences with the correspondents. He wants it but he doesn't want to fight for it—and he won't.

He wants to get this nomination the way he got every other nomination he ever had, beginning with that first one for Alderman in Northampton—that is, by being the organization candidate, by having back of him the machine and the machine leaders. If he does not get it that way he won't get it at all. He will make no fight because he never made a fight. In the whole of his political career there is no record of a fight. That is a curious thing to say of a man who has been a successful candidate for public office 13—or is it 14—times, but it is true nevertheless. It can't be called fighting to be the machine candidate in the primaries and run on the ticket of the dominant party in the general election. That is the Coolidge record from his first office to his last.

He is not a fighter, he's a fixer. If he can fix things so that behind him will be massed his party organization, he will go after this nomination, tradition or no tradition. Otherwise not. His game is quietly to line up behind him the machine—and anyone who thinks he is not working at it is not very observant. That's all he is working at. In his small armadillo way he is hard at it all the time—placating some leaders in one way, others in another, using federal appointments, favors, White House invitations and indorsements—particularly invitations—with considerable political cunning and skill. Not long ago he wrote a letter of indorsement of a newspaper, owned by a Washington political writer, who is sending the letter out as circulation bait. What he is really trying to do is creep up on the nomination. By the end of this session, perhaps, it will be easier to tell whether he is making progress backward or forward.

It is interesting to note the factors in his favor and then those against him. There is first the fact that as President he has vast patronage power, prestige, and prerogatives which put any other candidate under heavy handicap. Second, he has the support of the great bulk of the newspapers of the country and is still popular with the people, though perhaps his popularity has begun to wane. Third, three years of party propaganda have been particularly effective in magnifying his achievements, minimizing his failures, and keeping an heroic picture of him in the public mind. Fourth, he still has control over the National Committee, to the chairmanship of which his close friend, ex-Senator William M. Butler, though rejected by the voters of Massachusetts, clings at the request of the President. Fifth, if prosperity still prevails next year, the great business and banking interests, which are under no delusions as to Mr. Coolidge's real size, will none the less be averse to a change. He suits them, and their dominance in the Republican Party is such that they may through pressure bring into line for him reluctant and recalcitrant Old Guard leaders, who thoroughly dislike him and if left to themselves will not support him.

That's one side. It's the side you hear most about in Washington just now, but there is another. When the Coolidge assets as a candidate to succeed himself are set down they do seem sufficiently formidable to make his nomination inevitable. In a stronger man they would be. With him, however, it is a question whether the assets will not in the final test be outweighed by the liabilities. The list of the latter is longer, but scales won't begin to turn one way or the other for some time yet.

To present the arguments against him there is—First, the third-term tradition. It is all very well to talk about his "second elective" term but that phrase won't stick. Should he get another, he will have been President two years longer than any other man in our history. The limitation that Washington and Jefferson regarded as wise and to which Grant and Roosevelt yielded as final is to be broken for Coolidge? It does not seem sane. Second, the agrarian revolt in the great Republican States in the West is real, and political history shows that when they become aroused, the Western farmers have their political way, or something unpleasant happens to the party that stands in the way. That they are deeply stirred no posted person doubts. It is true that inexorable economic laws may again operate as they have in the past to mitigate agricultural grievances, but on the other hand these may grow worse. In any event, the sentiment in eleven normally Republican States constituting the well-known Corn Belt is strongly anti-administration. A significant instance of the readiness out there to disregard party lines was given in the last campaign when Republican Representative Dickinson of Iowa went into Illinois to urge the election of Democratic Representative Rainey. A third argument is that there is in the field a Presidential candidate inherently stronger than Mr. Coolidge—Frank O. Lowden. It may be that his age—66—or his health, or some other reason will keep Mr. Lowden from making another fight but there is not the least doubt that at this time he is a candidate. In 1920 he missed the nomination by the narrowest margin. In 1924 he refused a unanimous nomination for Vice-President on the Coolidge ticket. For eight years he has devoted himself to studying agricultural problems, to farming, to a quiet strengthening of his fences, to making friends. Today he has a stronger backing, more potential political power, and a better chance than any other man except Mr. Coolidge. He looms larger than any other. Popular, able, rich, with a fine record and an attractive personality, Lowden is the real candidate. The farmers are crazy about him. He is the agricultural hero.

To sum up the other Coolidge liabilities, there is the inherent feebleness of the man himself, the admitted fact that he is largely a combination of machine support, party propaganda, and accident. There is the further fact that Old Guard leaders cordially dislike him personally and resent the accident that projected him into the White House and enabled him to be nominated in 1924. But for the death of Mr. Harding no one would ever have seriously suggested Mr. Coolidge for the Presidency. The fact is he was so negligible a quantity that he might easily have failed for renomination as Vice-President. He was in Washington in 1922 a political joke and would still be but for the glamor of the Presidency.

Finally, there is the belief that the Republican nomination next time is more or less a "set up," that because of the split among the Democrats and their complete lack of an issue, the Republican 1928 nomination is equivalent to an election. Of course, they may be mistaken but that is the way they feel now. Under such circumstances it seems to the machine leaders all the more disastrous to let the nomination go to Mr. Coolidge by default. They are not going to do it if they can help it, but it comes down to this—if they can't beat him with Lowden they can't with any one. At least that is the present opinion of the "talent."

Communism . . . A Religion?

By LOUIS FISCHER

Berlin, November 22

THERE [illegible] of worship in Soviet Russia and [illegible] churches are open as the devout wish and can afford to maintain. Nevertheless, the country is bathed in atheism. The youth, when it is not frankly "godless," has no contact or sympathy with religion. The [illegible] proletariat has been infected by the spirit which the Bolsheviks propagate. Even peasants have grown skeptical. They have seen Communists defile their churches with "Red" meetings and have witnessed the burning in effigy of Jesus, Moses, Mohammed, and of God Himself. Yet no hand from heaven struck these infidels down.

Churches, synagogues, and mosques are filled but not so well filled as in the past. More and more couples prefer the congratulatory resolution of a workers' club meeting or the good wishes of the chairman of a local soviet to the blessings of a priest, and Red baptisms or "Octobrinas" take the place of christenings. "Holy Russia" stands in the sign of atheism. What is to become of her? What do the Communists offer for the religion they have destroyed?

Communism is not a religion. Yet there can be no doubt that for many people who open their souls to its influence it provides a consuming faith. It offers the staff of life to myriads who see the props and stays of their non-physical existence torn from under them by the ugliness, futility, and folly of much of the civilization about them.

Unlike religion, Communism seeks not to reform the individual but rather to create a state of affairs in which it will be difficult and ultimately impossible for him to exploit his fellow, and unnecessary for him to lie, steal, rob, murder, and make wars. The single circumstance that the roads to wealth in Russia are few, perilous, and socially degrading must have a salutary effect on the youth. Service on behalf of the nation opens a wide and attractive door to the young man who plans his future, and though it does not bar ambition it does definitely preclude the setting up of money and luxuries as the sole end of life. This applies not alone to the Communist whose salary is limited to a low maximum but to millions of state employees. Better training or greater ability will bring him a higher wage; on the other hand, he cannot under present conditions give a serious thought to becoming rich by "going into business." The Nepman is a pariah and looked down upon. The private industrial entrepreneur is the detested capitalist sitting on a tiny volcanic island in the midst of a big red sea. If the struggle for life is bitter on account of the absence of these and similar possibilities, nevertheless there exists far less compulsion or temptation to sell one's soul to Mammon. "But many people do. What of bribery?" it will be said. Quite true; conditions in Russia are not perfect; yet grafting has diminished. There is, furthermore, a more determined effort to stamp it out, and hence more talk about it.

Numerous other instances of higher ethical standards come to mind. The original misfortune which the revolution inflicted upon those women whose profession theretofore had been that of waiting for a husband is now appreciated by many as a blessing. It forced them to work, made them economically independent. It set them free for a love life and new type of family life which outside of Russia even those women who do provide for themselves cannot experience to the full because they are isolated units in a world which thinks and acts differently. I have spoken to the daughters of formerly wealthy fathers and the wives of wealthy men who, now that they are impoverished, have no regret for the sweet, lazy days of the past. They are no longer harem women, but equal, producing members of a working community. Life is harder yet richer.

The simple fact that a job as a street cleaner or a factory worker admits one to the aristocracy of a country has a moral, or if you will "religious," value which can scarcely be exaggerated. I have, for instance, seen many Jewish merchants who are forsaking their small towns to become peasants in South Russia. Their great urge is economic distress resulting from state participation in retail trade; nevertheless all are happy that this circumstance is driving them away from a parasitic existence into a life that opens the door to citizenship, to equal civil rights, and—most important—to productive labor.

The revolution has established a new social scale for Soviet Russia. The man who earns his daily bread by the sweat of his brow stands first. The student youth is second, the intellectual third (he is rising), and the private capitalist or Nepman last. Men and women do not wish to desert the ranks of labor. That they must content themselves with little material wealth is compensated by the satisfaction of belonging to the ruling class, which is laying the foundations for a future with less injustice and inequality than the present.

If it is unjust that one should live by the labor of one's fellows, then the Bolsheviks have removed much injustice. If the example of the pomp of royalty, the splendor of princes, the luxury of army officers, the leisure of landed gentry, and the prodigality of a half-grown bourgeoisie is demoralizing, then the Communists who swept these classes into the ashheap of history have performed a service to the country. In place of extravagance, frugality; in place of ceremony, simplicity; in place of loose living, puritanism. There are exceptions, to be sure, but the mass and not the exceptions sets the standard for the nation. Even the temptations of the NEP, which at one time seemed to threaten the spiritual undoing of the Communists themselves, have been largely overcome. These are achievements which evade the statistician, escape the transient or unsympathetic foreign observer, and defy the newspaperman. Yet they are facts. One need only pry into a soul here and there to find traces of their existence.

And then democracy. Democracy? But Soviet Russia is a dictatorship, it will be argued. In this non-political discussion I shall attempt neither to rebut nor to qualify the accusation except to remark in passing that the democratic forms of some countries are no guaranty of democratic content and that democracy may exist in a state whose leaders scoff at the bourgeois conception of the term. The reference here, however, is not to the legal relationship between citizen and government but rather to the human contacts which the present system permits and encourages. That word tovarish has a leveling and democratic effect. Sometimes its mere utterance establishes a bond of cordiality. You do not say "Mr. President" to Kalinin, but "Comrade" and he may sit and crack sunflower seeds with the lowly peasant who has walked a thousand miles to Moscow to air his grievances before the chief executive. At meetings in the Moscow Big Theater a headkerchiefed matushka (little mother) or a baste-shoed peasant with hay in his beard will come to the platform and explain what she or he and the folks back home think of Curzon or Lenin or taxes. In the former throne-room of the Kremlin Palace, during sessions of the Central Executive Committee—Russia's nearest approach to a parliament—hundreds of mujiks dressed in light blue polka-dotted blouses, breeches, and knee-high boots participate in important debates and bring to the capital impressions of popular sentiment along the lower reaches of the Volga, in frozen Yakutia, in tropical Turkestan, in Buriat Mongolia, and in the mountain fastness of Cis-Caucasia. Visit a museum on Sunday. Scores of workers, caps in hand, and many peasants from the urban periphery are being guided through well-stocked chambers to see treasures of whose existence they knew nothing a few years ago. Workers' reading-rooms, sport clubs, village library huts—there are tens of thousands of them. The blight of illiteracy to which "Holy Russia" gladly reconciled herself is rapidly being stamped out by its present atheist rulers, whose ambitious program is 100 per cent literacy on the tenth anniversary of the revolution. Knowledge of the three R's may not make Ivan a better man. But the methods of the Bolsheviks are opening his mind and soul. He now sees beyond his dark, ofttime depressing surroundings; his field of vision takes in a universe, where it was formerly confined to a parish, the works and the words of great men are now brought to his door, or he is brought to them; superstitions by which the church maintained its dark hold on the masses are being dispelled. The humdrum of a miserably hard life is being varied and lit up by spiritual contact and sympathy with the coolie, the peon, and the British miner.

Consider the financial assistance given the British miners by the Soviet proletariat. The Russians did not wait until they were made to weep over starving children. Nor can any selfish motive explain their splendid, spontaneous generosity. The German workers, who stood to lose much by the defeat of the miners, could not be roused to put an embargo on shipments of coal to British ports or even to give alms. Neither Russia nor her workers will obtain any practical advantage or disadvantage from the outcome of the strike. The Russian people gave because they realize that the larger interests of labor do not stop at national frontiers. It was a manifestation of universal brotherhood—the theoretical ideal of all religions. The Bolsheviks have made it a fact, at least as far as the proletariat is concerned.

One could clear away the earth from still more tender sprouts which are shooting up from the seeds planted in Russian soil by the Communists. Some would prove to be weeds. Many give promise of healthy fruit. The Bolsheviks believe neither in the holiness of the individual nor in the immutability of human nature. They are convinced that ethics, morals, character, the spirit can be modified and improved by bringing about the necessary economic changes. Thus by means of revolutionary economic change they aim to achieve the human results that religion would bring about by other means.

What Made These Women "Modern"?

The fifth in the series of personal revelations by well-known women will appear next week. If you have missed the first four, mail this announcement and fifty cents in stamps.

A psychoanalyst and a behaviorist will analyze for The Nation these anonymous articles in an attempt to discover the underlying causes of the modern woman's attitude toward men, marriage, children and jobs.

France and Germany, Friends

By IDA TREAT

Paris, December 1

[illegible] the Reichstag on Novem- [illegible] in the political mill-pond, disturb- [illegible] harmonies had swelled [illegible] the Quai d'Orsay. It is no [illegible] iments with regard to the [illegible] remain characteristically un- [illegible] rupture with Briand [illegible] onversations.

[illegible] rman Minister, suggesting the sup- [illegible] inter-Allied Military Commission and the [illegible] hineland and the Saar as a preface for [illegible] used an explosion of astonished indig- [illegible] French press. "Victorious France" [illegible] irrection. The Right—from the Liberté [illegible] d the old scarecrow of German ag- [illegible] when Briand told the Cham- [illegible] German rapprochement," the majority of [illegible] unqualified approval.

[illegible] helped to save the Briand-Stresemann negotiations from disaster during the last days of [illegible]. The Battisti affair, Italian military activity [illegible] Savoy frontier, and the disquieting statements of [illegible] regarding [illegible] have provided the Quai d'Orsay with considerable food for thought. The Italo-German alliance suggested in the Italian press would by its [illegible] alliance of two colony-seeking Powers [illegible] the Mediterranean, and at the same time by opening German coal-fields to growing Italian industry, oppose a new and powerful competitor to French manufacturers. France, somewhat isolated on the [illegible] the Theory seems [illegible] to look for friends.

[illegible] may do toward bettering the political relations between Germany and France an [illegible]. During the past months French and German industry have concluded a series of important alliances. The agreement signed last April, by the [illegible] Kali-Syndikat and the Société Commerciale des [illegible] d'Alsace divides the world potash market for a period of seven years between the two trusts, allowing a production quota of 70 per cent to the German firms and 30 to the French. German producers have a monopoly of sales at [illegible] in Austria, and in Eastern Europe; French producers [illegible] the West. A [illegible] on dividends, prices and [illegible] arrangements.

[illegible]mber and October saw the conclusion of similar [illegible]ments, not all of which are limited exclusively to French and German industries. The European Bone and Glue Trust includes fifteen countries; the Tube Trust unites France, Belgium, Germany, Czecho-Slovakia, Poland, and Hungary. The Aluminum Trust combines the foremost manufacturers of France, Germany, Switzerland, and Eng[illegible]. The Nail and Wire Trust [illegible] Holland, Belgium, Germany, and France. The United States participates with France and Germany in the alliance of electric-lamp manufacturers—an alliance which is shortly to be extended to general electrical production. Copper and textile agreements are already on the way.

The Cartel de l'Acier, concluded September 30 by representatives of the steel industry of France, Germany, Belgium, Luxemburg, and the Saar, represents by far the most important alliance yet formed. Based on an annual production of from 25 to 30 million tons of steel, the cartel regulates the production of each member of the group (Germany, [illegible] per cent; France, 31.48; Belgium, 11.56; Luxemburg, 8.30, and the Saar, 5.70); allows for the importation, duty-[illegible], of French steel into Germany—to be bought and sold by the German syndicate—and provides a system of fines and compensations—respectively $1 and $2 per ton—for those who exceed or fail to attain the stipulated ratio of production.

Before 1914 the French steel industry imported much of its coal supply from the Ruhr. The Versailles Treaty, by allotting to France the iron mines and steel plants of Lorraine, increased the coal demand tremendously. The ensuing conflict, from 1919 to 1923, between German coal magnates and the Comité des Forges found its most violent expression in the occupation of the Ruhr by French troops. While the inflation period favored the development of the German steel industry and worked to the disadvantage of the Lorraine manufacturers, the stabilization of the mark as well as the fall of the franc enabled the latter to flood central and southern Germany with iron ore and half-finished products. After January, 1925, when the customs regulations, instituted by the Versailles Treaty and favoring French production, expired, an attempt was made to eliminate French products from the German market by heavy protective tariffs. At this time the first serious pourparlers took place between the representatives of French and German steel industries.

Whether the cartel is or is not extended to include English producers, the steel alliance forms a solid basis for Franco-German relations, and the conversations at Thoiry and Geneva may be regarded as a translation into the domain of politics of the economic policy of the hour.

While diplomats converse and the captains of industry negotiate, the intellectuals of France and Germany are busy rediscovering each other. Especially is this true of France, always more chauvinistic in art and letters than her neighbor across the Rhine. The few Frenchmen who before the war labored desperately to create a current of interest between artists and thinkers of the two countries state today that never before has there been such enthusiasm for intellectual interpenetration.

A few concrete examples. Gémier takes his project of an international theater to Berlin. Thomas Mann and Alfred Kerr speak to cordial and sympathetic audiences in Paris. The prudent Tristan-Bernard attends the Reinhardt jubilee and gives out timidly enthusiastic statements to the French [illegible]. German expressionists exhibit their paintings in the French capital. Paul Valéry, generally considered as the [illegible] of conservative France, receives a warm welcome on the other side of the frontier. Rilke and [illegible] have been social lions of the Paris season. And Yvette Guilbert is to open a school of diction in Berlin. The recent Cinema Congress held in Paris was in reality a meeting of French and German producers. A proposition to give back the Legion of Honor to German scientists, artists, and men of letters is formulated by Comœdia, and a French Minister, whose name is prudently withheld, states solemnly that the time has come to offer the decoration to other German intellectuals "for services rendered to science, literature, and humanity; in other words, to the policy of pe[illegible]"

French popular sentiment also is undergoing a change. If one must speak in a foreign tongue, it is on the whole better to talk German than English in the streets and cafes of Paris today. A recent scene in the subway may serve as illustration. An Englishman and a German, both considerably inebriated, were disputing a vacant seat. The discussion was in French, with varying accents. The crowd took sides with the German. To be sure the latter showed an astonishing grasp of crowd psychology.

"If it hadn't been for . . . the French," he announced to the gallery, "we would have wiped you off the earth back in 1914."

The Briton had to get off at the next station to avoid being mobbed!

As for the middle-class—

"It begins to look as if we would have to fight the Italians. Insufferable race with their toy Bonaparte!" The speaker, a middle-aged leather broker, threw down his newspaper in disgust.

"And the Kaiser?"

"Just as bad. 'Insupportables, tous!' They make me long for a second Joan of Arc! Do you know, the only people I can stand today. . . . O they destroyed the north of France, they killed over a million of us, and they committed atrocities—perhaps. But they at least know what it is to suffer. I tell you, the only people I can stand today are the Boches!"

Geneva or no Geneva, Franco-German rapprochement is in the air.

Bertha, the Sewing-Machine Girl

By ANN WASHINGTON CRATON

TWENTY years ago Bertha the Sewing-Machine Girl vied in popularity with Nellie the Beautiful Cloak Model. Who cares for the Berthas of 1926? Perhaps popular interest may be revived because the Fox Film Corporation is doing a stupendous movie, which will soon be released. Bertha's struggles in a dressmaking establishment will be portrayed by the charming Madge Bellamy. The research department of the Fox Films in order to provide a realistic background made an exhaustive search for a dressmaking establishment where old-fashioned sewing machines were still in use, operated by American —not foreign-born—girls. Bertha made her living in the sweatshop days before trade-union organization had abolished the most flagrant evils in the garment trades. The dress shops in the wholesale district were impossible to film; they were housed in model loft-buildings, with adequate lighting, and used the latest electric-motor machines. Finally the long-sought location was found among the exclusive establishments in the fashionable shops about Fifth Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street, where theatrical costumes and custom dresses are made. Here were girls, American girls, the very type of the Bertha of 1906, toiling over old-fashioned, pedaled sewing machines, which probably were in use even before the days of Bertha.

The dramatic organization campaign and strike recently conducted by the Ladies' Tailors, Custom Dressmakers, Theatrical Costume and Alteration Workers' Union, Local 38, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, centered attention on Fifty-seventh Street. The union's agreement with the Couturiers' Association, representing sixteen of the most exclusive houses, such as Madame Frances, Henri Bendel, Bergdorf Goodman, Tappé, Madame Thurn, Hickson, Farquharson and Wheelock, Stein and Blaine, expired September 25. The Association shops and numerous independent shops employed some 1,000 organized men tailors and about 10,000 women dressmakers, of whom only 5 to 10 per cent were organized before the strike. The union tailors received a wage-scale of $55 for a forty-four-hour week; the union dressmakers from $38 to $50 for the same number of hours; the 10,000 unorganized but highly skilled experienced dressmakers received an average wage of $22 for a forty-seven-hour week, in shops where the price of a dress was $275! In renewing the agreement, Local 38, making demands for the tailors, also made demands for the dressmakers for a forty-hour week, 5 to 10 per cent increases in wages, guaranty of forty-four weeks' work in a year, and limitation of overtime. The association was willing to concede most of the demands for the men but was not prepared even to discuss the demands for the women. Edwin Goodman, head of the Couturiers' Association, scoffed at them. "The dressmakers don't want an increase in wages, they don't want anything; the dressmakers are satisfied," he said.

The custom-dress industry is largely a women's industry. The heads of many of the most exclusive houses are women, such as Madame Frances, Madame Thurn, and Lucille. The patrons and customers are the wealthiest women in America, who wear the most exquisite, the most expensive, and the most beautiful clothes in the world, Paris not excepted. The models in these houses are frequently young show-girls who find it advantageous to secure such employment in their off-seasons. Finally, the 10,000 dressmakers are women. In the rush season, when society and the theater are demanding their costly and beautiful garments, the dressmakers work until late at night without extra pay for overtime. Women are difficult to organize, particularly in such an industry. The prevailing theory is that American women cannot be organized. "American girls don't want a union," insisted the employers at the conference table.

The working unit in the dressmaking department includes various crafts. The fitter, who cuts the dress, receives $50 to $100 weekly. The drapers, usually seven in number, average $30 a week. Each draper has three or four dressmakers as helpers. The finishers receive from $16 to $22. They handle the most delicate materials, requiring intricate handwork and severe eye-strain, and produce gowns, wraps, and dresses that sell for hundreds of dollars. One highly skilled draper who makes $35 a week made by herself in less than a week an entire dress that sold for $1,000.

Why [illegible] union dressmakers worked for such [illegible]s and under such conditions in New York City, where the garment workers have been so firmly intrenched for [illegible] For the most part, they are timid, unaggressive, simple American women. Many have worked for five or six [illegible] in one room. There is not a large [illegible] turnover. One woman who has worked for various Fifth Avenue [illegible] for thirty years began at $7 weekly; today she receives $18 as a skilled draper. She lives in a [illegible] town up the Hudson, more than an hour's trip on the train. At six o'clock she dashes to the ferry and the train; there is the same rush back to be at work at 8:30 in the morning. Too weary and discouraged to mix with [illegible] night, what opportunity had she to think [illegible]? Many of the women are Italians, beautiful needleworkers, but always difficult to organize—grandmothers, mothers, daughters, whose combined earnings go [illegible] family wage. There has recently been a steady influx of South American women, convent-trained, [illegible] to fine needlework. They speak Spanish and know nothing of American standards of hours and wages. Since [illegible] French dressmakers from the dress shops of Paris, [illegible] the dressmakers have only recently been organized, [illegible] been coming over, unfamiliar with American conditions and handicapped by language.

Analysis of pay envelopes proved that $250 to $300 [illegible] was considered a good season's earning, or $5 to $6 a week as an average for the slack time between seasons. Few had yearly slips of as much as $1,000. Not one had paid an income tax. Among the finishers $500 and $600 a year was common. I visited all of the beautiful establishments, [illegible] with the beautiful houses; I mounted marble stairways to elaborate drawing-rooms, with period furniture and oriental rugs, where the elegant customers wait for fittings. Contrast the workrooms, crowded and [illegible], with the old machines. There were no proper rest-rooms. A light rattan couch hidden in a dark room under the coats was the only provision required by law for a sick or worn-out girl to rest for a few minutes. The toilets were inadequate and crowded.

Local 38 made history in organizing women in less than six weeks. Its campaign, directed by a woman, Juliet Stuart Poyntz, established a record. Street meetings were held in front of Mrs. Vanderbilt's house, on Fifth Avenue, at noon and in the evening. Automobiles decked with union banners proclaiming the union demands were [illegible] in evidence on Fifth Avenue. Eager and [illegible] dressmakers listened to their first trade-union [illegible] speeches, and cheered the union leaders. A [illegible] union sentiment was created. Then the Contractors' Association went into action. Fifth Avenue became an armed camp. Police and detectives guarded [illegible] entrances. A truck, anything but exclusive and smart, stood in front of the entrance to Madame Frances's for several nights; between a line of police the dressmakers were marched into it and driven away to subway stations, [illegible] union literature. Active union girls were arrested daily; the first day of the strike thirty of us spent night hours in jail.

[illegible] On the eve of the strike Henri Bendel, employing 500 dressmakers, granted wage increases of from $2 to $5 weekly, reduced working hours from 47 to 44, and granted a full hour for lunch. The majority of the employers followed suit. The standards of the entire industry were raised even where actual union organization did not result. Many new shops were organized, and a strong sentiment for unionization and higher standards was established among the women workers in all of the leading houses. Wages started going up, the forty-four-hour week was generally established for the unorganized dressmakers, while the tailors and organized dressmakers won the forty-hour week besides wage increases. The union now plans an intensive and continuous organization campaign among the dressmakers to consolidate the newly won gains.

The poor little starved dressmakers of Paris won a strike not long ago and won better conditions for themselves. The Mimis of the Paris dress shops received universal support. The New York dressmakers of Fifty-seventh Street must receive the same support because their successful organization will give a tremendous impetus to the movement to organize the millions of unorganized women workers throughout America.

In the Driftway

GEORGE T. HUGHES of New Brunswick, New Jersey, has expressed his conviction that if any improvement is possible in this land of the noble free it is through more and better pies. To this end Mr. Hughes organized the Watchung Community Pie Association, which has just held a championship competition. As fitting so important an occasion, three mayors and a former assemblyman were called in as judges. The Drifter does not know why he was not invited. As a pie-baker he makes no broad claims, but as a pie-taster he feels that he has no superior between Massachusetts and Mars. Failure to call in the Drifter led to vulgar bickering among the judges, and it was finally necessary to summon a police chief to settle the contest.

* * * * *

THE trouble seems to have been that the judges got into a wrangle over the relative excellence of various kinds of pie instead of weighing the merits of the individual entries as samples of the pastry-makers' art. Each judge was handed five pies from which to make a preliminary selection. One picked a cheese pie, another a lemon meringue, a third a pumpkin, and the fourth an apple. Thereafter the judging became a heated argument over the claims of these four models of the pie-making craft.

* * * * *

THE Drifter wishes to register his profound contempt for cheese pie—whatever it is. Never having sampled any—or ever heard of it before this contest—he has the true obscurantism of ignorance. If cheese pie is anything like cheese cake the Drifter hates it as a result of gloomy personal encounters with that sad and soggy confection. If any reader thinks the Drifter is too hastily jumping at conclusions, he (or she) is invited to send in a cheese pie for analysis and report. Lemon meringue, pumpkin, and apple pie, the Drifter admits, all have high claims to distinction, but is the queenly mince to be ignored; or that splendid example of Southern chivalry, sweet-potato pie? For sweet-potato pie the Drifter is willing to forgive the South even the invention of the Ku Klux Klan. Then, too, there are such sublime evidences of the superiority of man to the other mammals as gooseberry, blueberry, and cherry pie. An old friend of the Drifter's once remarked: "There may be something better than cherry pie, but I don't see why anybody should want it."

* * * * *

UNFORTUNATELY the New Jersey judge who held out for apple pie was not content to support his preference on its own merits, which are undeniably many. For instance, when ordered in a restaurant, apple pie is less certain to be bad than any other kind served by these institutions for spoiling food and degrading the glorious art of cooking. The New Jersey judge attempted to justify his preference for apple pie by appealing to quite extraneous considerations. He demanded: "Is a cheese pie a la mode as appetizing as apple a la mode? Is lemon meringue a la mode as appetizing as apple a la mode?"

* * * * *

WHEN a judge resorts to that sort of argument one can only retaliate in kind. What, declaims the Drifter, pointing one index finger menacingly at the New Jersey judges and the other toward Hollywood—what would become of our great screen drama, of the mighty motion-picture industry which has permeated the earth, without the aid and abetment of the delectable and clinging contents of the custard pie? THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

After Oil

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The author of When the Oil Gives Out in your issue of December 1 did not mention what many scientists consider the most hopeful source of motor fuel for the future: bituminous ("soft") coal, of which there is comparatively an abundance. Friedrich Bergius's process of hydrogenation of coal, which effects a liquefaction to petroleum, is now being commercially exploited in Germany. Franz Fischer's process, though still in the experimental stage, promises to be even more useful than that of Bergius. The samples of synthetic petroleum which were displayed at the recent International Conference on Bituminous Coal showed clearly the possibilities of the Fischer method.

Pittsburgh, November 28 J. B. SHOHAN

Hell

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My attention was recently attracted to a headline, Abolishing Hell, over an article noting that dignitaries of the Church of England together with the "liberal" clergy in general had conspired against this ancient and useful institution. Imagine the indignant protest from profane swearers everywhere who for centuries have depended on the pulpit for the enrichment of their vocabularies! It is a blow at all wit and humor which is dependent on contrasts; the more drastic the contrast, the more pungent the wit! I often heard my mother, Harriet Beecher Stowe, tell how witty the old Puritan ministers of her girlhood were as they assembled in her father's kitchen to drink good old New England rum, smoke strong tobacco, and crack jokes. There is nothing like it in the clergy of today, who are a hectic, dyspeptic lot, full of problems but barren of jokes, all run to seed over the Eighteenth Amendment, prohibition, and the tariff, but disbelieving in hell-fire, the devil, and the brimstone lake.

I have passed my three-score years and ten and mean to die in the faith of my fathers, loyal to New England rum, hell fire, and the devil.

CHARLES EDWARD STOWE

Santa Barbara, California, November 26

Poor Old Britain!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a Britisher I cordially agree with Judge Bausman in deprecating the stupid attacks which irresponsible English journalists have recently been making upon the debt settlement between Great Britain and the United States. But he has made some remarkable assertions in the course of his onslaught upon the European Powers.

It is not true that the French "refused to settle on any basis at all." The terms they offered were very nearly twice as good as those offered by Italy and accepted by the United States Government. Nor is it true that the whole of the French debt was contracted after the war was through. Were that the case there would be no question for dispute, since France has never attempted to deny full liability for post-war debts. And as for the "incredible quantity of food and munitions" she is declared (on no particular evidence) to possess, I should be interested to hear just how she can "turn them into cash." Who will buy them? The United States?

Now for my own country. (1) Judge Bausman paints a very rosy picture of the value of the British "spoils of war." "Mesopotamia alone," he says, "will reimburse Great Britain" (for what? For the whole cost of the war?). Again, "Tanganyika, enormously rich in minerals and tropical products, must be considered forever the property of the English." If Judge Bausman will pardon my saying so, this is mere rhetoric. Tanganyika's commercial value is negligible (its total trade is about one twenty-seventh of that of Porto Rico), and even if it were true that it is doomed to perpetual British control, its resources cannot be and are not monopolized by British traders. And to regard Mesopotamia as an asset is, I submit, ridiculous. Britain has already spent millions of pounds upon it (I have not the exact figures to hand), and here, too, there can be no question of discrimination in favor of British trade, since that is expressly forbidden by the mandate which gave the English control of it. The other members of the League of Nations can be trusted, in their own interests, to see to it that the terms of that mandate are adhered to!

(2) In view of the fact that the Washington Conference put the American and British navies on a precisely equal basis, to say, as Judge Bausman does, that it left Britain mistress of the seas is a compliment to the superior efficiency of the British navy which (coming from such a quarter) I welcome but which in the interests of truth I must refuse to accept.

(3) From the reference to rubber in the last paragraph of his letter it appears that Judge Bausman believes the Malay Peninsula to be a post-war acquisition to Britain—one of her "spoils of war." That is a good indication, I suggest, of the accuracy of the knowledge on which his assertions are based.

Princeton, N. J., November 15 LINDLEY M. FRASER

Look-a-Way, Dixie Land!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If any of your readers have letters, documents, papers, or facts of any kind, whether hearsay, anecdote, or affidavit, about the late James B. Duke, tobacco magnate of Durham and New York, I should appreciate their communicating with me. I am writing a biographic study of the great merchant-manufacturer and facts about his early days in New York are especially obscure. RODNEY CROWTHER

Asheville, North Carolina, November 24

A Happy New Year To Nation Readers

Perhaps this is the first time you have read THE NATION. Perhaps, on the other hand, you have read it for sixty-one years.

In either case, you will be interested in Henry T. Finck's description of its Editor, Oswald Garrison Villard, which appears in Mr. Finck's book, "My Adventures in the Golden Age of Music," just published by Funk & Wagnalls.

> "While holding different views, I could not help admiring his courage and audacity, as well as his rare journalistic ability, incisiveness, wit and vivacity. No one, it is safe to say, has ever yawned over one of his editorials, and the new Nation became, as a whole, a decidedly readable periodical."

This from a man who for twenty-one years was closely associated with Mr. Villard on the New York Evening Post, and who looked askance at him when he sold the Post and embarked on his "journalistic steam yacht," as Mr. Finck dubs The Nation.

But this same "journalistic steam yacht" is free to head anywhere. Often it steers straight out into the murk behind the news and brings back many a surprise. It is manned by a staff of newspaper men and women and its news is good news in the sense that it is significant and sound.

Wouldn't you like to take a voyage with Mr. Villard for one year, let's say, or two?

Next Week

THE NATION'S HONOR ROLL FOR 1926

Noteworthy Americans at home and abroad in the fields of Politics, Business, Foreign Service, Economics, Literature, Science and Music, especially worthy of commendation by liberals and progressives.

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, N. Y.

Send The Nation { for one year ☐ $5 / for two years ☐ $8

Name .....

Address .....

Add 50 cents for Canada, $1 for foreign.

12 29-26

Books, Music, Plays

Commentary

On JOHN x, 34.

By S. FOSTER DAMON

We are lost deities made manifest,
Forced to a hateful fellowship of dreams.
Caught in the selves by which we are obsessed,
Each prays, unwakable; each one blasphemes.

O many Christs, with eyes gray-aureoled,
Caught in the whirlpool of fantastic pain,
Reach out your hand!—reach through the sable cold,
And touch the hand you will not find again.

First Glance

THE title of Herbert S. Gorman's new book, "A Victorian American: Henry Wadsworth Longfellow" (Doran: $5), might mean much or little. It might mean, what anyone knows, that Longfellow lived in America at the same time that Victoria lived in England. Or it might mean that Longfellow had certain qualities—probably certain defects—common to most imaginative writers of the English language during the last three-quarters of the nineteenth century. In the second case a number of definitions would be called for; one would assume that Mr. Gorman had written his book in order to make clear just what, at this remove, the term Victorian does mean after all, and after that to show how Longfellow, being a true son of his time, shared its deficiencies. Mr. Gorman, indeed, promises all this and more in his excellent preface—the best part of the book. There we learn that Longfellow is "a representative figure of the dominant urge of his time," and that "it is necessary to understand him and his age if we are to understand our own and ferret out why we are what we are and from what curious urges we evolved."

What are we, then? What was Longfellow? What was his urge, if any, and what is ours? After reading Mr. Gorman's book and being entertained by its sympathetic narration of this man's long, pathetic, and highly successful life, I do not know the answers to these questions. I am not saying that I believe there are any—simply that Mr. Gorman, who in his book on James Joyce showed himself a gifted critic, here seems not even to have tried to do the thing he tells you he is doing. So far as his critical theme was concerned he might as well have stopped on page 64, where, speaking of Longfellow's youthful writings, he says: "He entered literature with those weaknesses that were to be with him all through his life, weaknesses of dependence, weaknesses of didactic emphasis, weaknesses of prosiness, weaknesses of the creative instinct." A little later, when Longfellow has gone for the first time to that Europe which was to give him "background," Mr. Gorman reflects: "If Henry had been an authentic genius it would have been much better for him to have stayed in Maine minus those standards that are evolved by backgrounds and to have worked out his own destiny and developed an autochthonous achievement. But he is not an authentic genius."

Well, is not that the whole story? Longfellow was not a genius; he "was never mentally brave"; he was a prosy poet. It would be interesting if Mr. Gorman could prove that Longfellow was thus and so because he was a Victorian American, or because he was born in Maine in 1807; or because he was a professor at Harvard; or because he lived in one house too long. But he does not try, and—what is more serious—he does not try to explain Longfellow's failings through an examination of the works themselves. No definition of the creative instinct is supplied; no suggestion is made as to why the author of the Psalm of Life suffered from didacticism while the authors of "De Rerum Natura," "Paradise Lost," and the "Divine Comedy" grew great through the practice of it. So, except for the fact that Mr. Gorman has very engagingly retold the life of his subject, we are where we were before. A little patient thinking would have helped—and it might have revealed a great deal.

MARK VAN DOREN

Democracies at War

Soldiers and Statesmen: 1914-1918. By Field-Marshal Sir William Robertson. Charles Scribner's Sons. Two volumes. $12.

WHEN I first viewed these two large volumes I feared yet another of those belly apologies produced by flunkeys since the war ended by soldiers and statesmen hoping to put themselves right with history. A course of such pabulum usually makes nauseating reading. Never before have so many evasions, so many contradictions, so many abdications from responsibility been gathered together. Fortunately, Sir William's book is not of this kind, but an honest and straightforward account of the development of British strategy during the war. In a style as dry and unemotional as that of an official dispatch he describes the innumerable councils in which soldiers and statesmen, professionals and amateurs, wrangled over the plans which meant life and death to hundreds of thousands. Far too often, in his opinion, the amateurs won the debate and lost the battle. He concludes, therefore, that if a modern democracy is to wage war successfully the respective functions of civilian ministers and military chiefs must be clearly defined.

During the Boer War Lord Salisbury remarked: "I do not think that the British Constitution as at present worked is a good fighting machine." Democracy has of course some military advantages—the willing horse, equipped with blinkers, is better fighting material than the driven ox—but a democratic government is a hindrance to soldiers waging war and a still greater hindrance in the preparation for war. In 1902 it was Robertson's business, as head of the Foreign Intelligence Department of the War Office, to scan the horizon for probable enemies. He picked Germany and in a memorandum to the government recommended: "That instead of regarding Germany as a possible ally we should recognize her as our most persistent, deliberate, and formidable rival." The Foreign Office conceived the same idea about the same time and, as the department of state least subject to democratic control, began to involve Britain in an anti-German alliance. The soldiers who saw how events were shaping urged on the government the necessity of adequate preparation. Their position was entirely logical. But the government, though prepared to follow a secret policy likely to lead to war, was not courageous enough to propose to the electorate that Britain convert herself into a military power on the continental model. According to Lord Asquith, any government making such a proposal "would have committed political suicide."

When the war came democracy was speedily thrown overboard. But sufficient of its trappings remained to embarrass the soldiers—the Cabinet system, for instance. For the general conduct of the war, for the coordination of the national effort in all its branches, the Cabinet was responsible. Robertson admitted this freely, but he thought that on questions of strategy [illegible] responsible professional head should be accepted. The troublesome question was: Where did policy end and [illegible]

In 1915 the author became Chief of the Imperial General [illegible] controlled the operations of the British armies in all parts of the world. The correct strategy, in his [illegible] sible force on the Western Front [illegible] ere. Expeditions elsewhere he [illegible] unlikely to have a decisive influence on [illegible] and he would be defeated everywhere. With all the very considerable pertinacity at his command he urged these views again and again despite their unpopularity in some quarters.

Now, whatever its merits, this policy was certainly not exciting [illegible] appeal to Lloyd George. That [illegible] gentleman had probably never given a thought to military matters before the war. The limelight shone on other [illegible] soldiers, he thought, lacked vision. Their policy of hammering away at the Western Front produced no apparent results save heavy casualty lists, which were politically [illegible] way. "Knock away Germany's props" and the [illegible] would yield. To this end he planned new cam[illegible] Minor, the Balkans, the Italian Alps. At other times he urged the capture of cities which had dramatic if not military value—[illegible]. But at no time did he heed the plea of Robertson to form a comprehensive policy and stick to it.

In the [illegible] between politicians and soldiers [illegible] The soldiers could not get a free hand; the politicians could not undertake the responsibility of entirely rejecting military advice. And so there were delay, inefficiency, [illegible] lives, while England somehow muddled through. Had the war continued an attempt might have been made to clear out the statesmen and set up a military dictatorship. Robertson [illegible] hints at the possibility or desirability of such a drastic [illegible] Yet surely it would have been a logical one; and if there [illegible] that democracy might to have learned from the war it is that war and democratic institutions are incompatible. "Soldiers and Statesmen" clearly, though unintentionally, points [illegible] moral, and, because of that, pacifists will render Sir William Robertson their unexpected thanks.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The Holy War

Sex Expression in Literature. By V. F. Calverton. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

THE critical program set forth in this author's "The Newer Spirit" and in the present volume purports to be the "sociological criticism of literature." So far as it is a method and legitimate at all, it is limited. But Mr. Calverton is ambitious. He is not satisfied to trace out a simple parallelism between the structure of a society and the moral outlook of its literature; he argues that the social structure encompasses and exhausts, by means of some obscure metaphysical efficiency, the entire content of a literature. Literature, the effect, can be wholly explained in terms of society, the cause. Unless we are much mistaken, the prevalence of this type of vulgar thinking is a serious threat to the immediate future of literature. The proper limitation of Mr. Calverton's method would be simply to indicate a correlation between a society and its literature. He assumes instead a causal relation. The various refutations of this assumption are obvious.

First, although Mr. Calverton justly points out that the rise of the middle class in the eighteenth century was attended by the rise of sentimental comedy, he yet fails to tell us why one of these dramatists should be better than another. If there is a perfect causal relation between society and letters, why are not all writers equally good? Granting that the moral tendency of Defoe's writings came from the middle class, why did he describe in "Captain Singleton" the African wilderness, which he had never seen, just as he did rather than in some other way? The middle class had nothing whatever to do with the artistic effectiveness of such passages in his writing. Since the Elizabethans "expressed" (whatever that may mean) the ideas of the feudal aristocracy, why were not Chapman and Shakespeare, assuming their equal exposure to those ideas, equally good poets?

If Mr. Calverton could think as well as he can dig out correlations his books would rouse a certain legitimate interest. At worst they would sink into that class of "scholarly research" which turns the literature of the past into a parasitically infested corpse. Criticism need not be intellectually sound; it need only be novel. It may, of course, boldly espouse some cause.

For it is not only in mistaking correlations for causal relations that Mr. Calverton exceeds the integrity of scientific exposition. He misnames his books. The present volume should be called "Sex Expression in Society," with the quaint subtitle "As Recorded in Literature, Combined with a Defense of Freedom in Love and Speech." Mr. Calverton does not care a straw for literature. He quite simply prefers a social order in which fornication may be mentioned as freely as sneezing or football. This is Mr. Calverton's affair; it is none of literature's. But the chief inference one gets from this book is that the best writers are invariably engaged in a holy war on puritanism; this is the meaning which, God help us, he attaches to Joyce. As for this part of the "theory," it is sufficient to point out that Henry James was a better novelist than Floyd Dell. Mr. Calverton's method is too muddled to be valid and too shopworn to be new. He tosses complacently on the backwash of the eighteenth-century Enlightenment.

ALLEN TATE

The Democratic Ideal

The Democratic Way of Life. By Thomas Vernor Smith. The University of Chicago Press. $1.75.

THE democratic creed is based on a mystical faith in the potentialities of the ordinary man. Belief in democracy is a form of popular religion. It assumes that no individual is outside the pale of salvation. Self-realization is possible for all. The anti-democratic belief, on the other hand, substitutes for the mystical belief in the ordinary man a mystical distrust. Nature is held to be oligarchical and "history a good aristocrat." Regeneration is possible only for the few. The vast masses are fated only to obey. This, in the last analysis, is the issue between the Socialism of Sidney Webb and the Toryism of Lord Hugh Cecil. Both sides, it should be noted, are ultimately based upon mysticism, for the verifiable data underlying the issue are still meager.

It is the mysticism of democracy that Mr. Smith offers. Democracy, he says, is not, as Bryce suggested, merely a form of government; it is a way of life. The concentration of democratic theory on government is due to a realization that self-government is an essential means. The end, however, is not self-government but the good life for the bulk of the population. This wider meaning of democracy is best contained in the trinity of liberty, equality, and fraternity. Fraternity implies the extension to all humanity of the sense of kinship felt in the family circle. This consciousness of the brotherhood of man is also the central source of religion and is, in fact, necessitated by our universal interdependence. Liberty, in turn, means to do as one pleases, but the democratic ideal requires that the individual should be pleased to do acts which are compatible with the interests of his fellows. Equality means equal opportunities for all for self-development, as all men must be considered potentially able to realize rational ends. This ideal postulates an approach to a greater economic equality.

Mr. Smith also discusses the problems of industry and leadership. The good life for the masses, he says, is impossible without a radical alteration in the conditions surrounding their working lives. The workers must hence be given active participation in the affairs of industry. This ideal also necessitates that greater attention should be given to making the productive process less monotonous and more capable of enlisting the interest of the workers. The cooperative sharing of common experience, the participation of all in the invention of new departures, the fostering of creation rather than acquisition, which now in the main actually exist in the professions, should be extended to all types of work. Leadership in a democracy must be based not on prestige but on knowledge of facts. Authority will thus rest on tools and measurements and not on esoteric claims. The ideal of democracy is to make each citizen both a leader and a follower, a leader in the special field which he has mastered and a follower of others in other fields.

The views that Mr. Smith offers are not novel; they are, in fact, the common possession of writers on social theory. Yet a vigorous summary of the theory of democracy is not irrelevant. In an age when democracy is so frequently questioned, it is pertinent to restate first principles. The extension by our author of the democratic creed to economic activity is especially commendable, for it is obvious that unless the principles of liberty and equality are given a wider signification than that given by the early philosophers of democracy, self-realization for the ordinary man will be impossible. In time of skepticism faith may be strengthened by a restatement of the creed, and this Mr. Smith's little volume has creditably achieved.

Yet it may also be suggested that more pertinent than a résumé of the democratic creed is the translation of that creed into institutions. Whether or not we accept the mysticism of democracy, the vast remoteness of the actual realization of democracy from its ideal purpose is unmistakable. If the ideal of democracy is capacity for sustained initiative on the part of the ordinary man, democracy is non-existent. The vast masses have neither the means nor the intelligence to realize their best selves. Politically what actually exists is not democracy in any real sense but the rule of oligarchy. It is thus the function of critical political philosophy not to elaborate the obvious but, among other things, to show concretely how to reconcile the demands of the "Great State" with the significance of the individual, how to equate mystical nationalism with the demands of an increasingly unified world, how to make self-government in industry compatible with productive efficiency, and how to give to the ordinary man the capacity of intelligent articulation so that he may recognize in others than Rudolph Valentino his ideal self. Only in the perspective of such a solution is it at all possible to visualize a realization of the noble ideal of democracy of "a society of free men and women, each at once ruling and being ruled."

LEWIS ROCKOW

Marmaduke Pickthall

The Valley of the Kings. By Marmaduke Pickthall. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

IN "Oriental Encounters" Marmaduke Pickthall told of his longing for escape from London and his dreams of the East at 18 years of age. Ultimately he did break away, to the scandal of all good Englishmen. At Jaffa he met J. E. Hanauer, whose "Folklore of the Holy Land" he was later to edit; and with his aid and that of a dragoman he learned Arabic and lived like a native. That is the background. Many men have done as much, and nothing has come of it aside from miscegenation. But Pickthall brought with him a mind ready for understanding—a mind already [illegible] and a style that responded to his mind. One of the results was "Said the Fisherman."

After six years, during which Pickthall published only two novels of the East, "The Valley of the Kings" appeared. If there remained any who thought "Saïd" had been a tour de force, they were quickly undeceived. Its successor is a lighter book, [illegible] of the success of "Said" was going, but it has the same relentless fidelity to Eastern life and manners and turn of thought. Even the intrusion of an Englishman as one of the chief characters only serves to strengthen that faithfulness. We see him as he is reflected in the eyes of young Iskender, blinded by worship, and gradually he assumes his proper shape through his own words and actions; but poor Iskender goes on worshiping, never fully realizing that his idol is smashed.

Iskender lives in a small village of Syria, dreaming and painting while he is being prepared for the ministry by well-meaning Protestant missionaries. His mother's shrill, scolding voice, the cold eyes of the mission head, "Father of Ice," and the supervision of two ancient virgins do not offer him much inducement to continue on the path they point out to him. When he is dismissed from the mission for kissing the young Sitt Hilda while she is teaching him to use his paints, he attaches himself to an English traveler who has encouraged him in his painting; and together they go on a wild, disastrous chase after a gold-strewn valley whose existence is in the mind of Iskender.

The reader cannot fail to perceive Pickthall's criticism of Anglo-Saxons in the Orient, though this is never directly voiced. What a world it would be if nations like Great Britain and the United States were to send out men like Marmaduke Pickthall as emissaries to their conquered dependencies!

WILBUR NEEDHAM

The End of the Aztecs

Cortés the Conqueror. By Henry Dwight Sedgwick. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

JUDGED either as history or as literature, this biography of the greatest of the Spanish conquistadores is a distinguished piece of work. Mr. Sedgwick has achieved the rare and delightful combination of eminently capable historical research with an alert and fluent style. He has worked conscientiously from original sources, yet his writing has the swing and the unity that one hopes for, too often in vain, from the popular biographers.

He defends Cortés against the charges traditionally brought against him of cruelty, corruption, lust, and trickery, and this not by attempting to whitewash him but by showing that, granted the aims of the Spaniards, such methods were inevitable and that Cortés's great genius consisted of his ability to use them in moderation and with telling effect. That Cortés was endowed with a gift for organization, with a dexterity in handling men, and with a tactical genius equal to that of Napoleon or Caesar is the sole conclusion to be drawn from the author's carefully documented study.

Mr. Sedgwick not only succeeds in presenting Cortés for the first time as a human being and, as such, fascinating if not admirable, but he also gives us an unequaled knowledge and understanding of the atmosphere of the Spanish conquest—of the miserly and superstitious incompetence of the Spanish councils, of the gay, reckless, undisciplined courage of the adventurers themselves, and of the tragic yet, one feels, predestined fate of the native Aztecs, so dignified, so civilized, and so inexplicably childish. As to the latter one eyewitness quoted by Mr. Sedgwick reports: "There are jewelry shops as well arranged as in any market-place anywhere; the earthenware and crockery are as good as the best in Spain; there are shops coals, edible herbs, and herbs for drugs. There is a kind of barber-shop where there is shaving and heads are [illegible] are baths." Soldiers who had been in Constanti[illegible] declared that they had [illegible] market-place with such a throng or with [illegible]

Novels in Brief

Maxwell Bodenheim. Boni and Liveright. $2.

[illegible] ement, [illegible] and [illegible] American speech, and he draws shopgirls, [illegible] olitan loafers with lifelike vigor. [illegible] —with Mr. Bodenheim [illegible] and relating hard.

[illegible] By Hamlin Garland. The [illegible] ny. $2.50.

[illegible] story narrative cleverly [illegible] and sometimes poetic and it earnestly [illegible] the theme of life by [illegible]

[illegible] By Stark Young. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.

[illegible] like logic and [illegible] anything in James Stephens, but one believes in [illegible] unity, but never a dull one.

[illegible] By Verily Benson. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

[illegible] son seems to resent his presence even as a spectator. It is a [illegible] illuminated—by thrusts at America.

[illegible] Ada and Julian Street. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

One could be more enthusiastic about this story of the soil if [illegible] of the soil were in the form of real estate. No doubt the growth of Chicago is significant as the reflection of an era of American expansion, but in "Tides" the theme is handled with documentary thoroughness rather than dramatic effectiveness. The [illegible] have drawn a number of interesting characters, but one has to plow through so much sociology to follow them.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. This year in addition a second prize of $50 and a third prize of $25 will be offered. The rules for 1926 are:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Wednesday, December 1, and not later than Friday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the [illegible] author in full on each page.

3. No manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 100 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poems will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 9, 1927.

7. Besides the winning poems, The Nation reserves the [illegible] to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Music

A Few Happy Moments

CONTRARY to general opinion even critics have their happy moments when on duty. Some of these come when an artist fulfils their expectations, and others again when the artist exceeds them. Several years ago, for instance, I stated in these very columns that Sophie Braslau held within her voice and herself all the ingredients that go to the making of the great artist. And recently she came very near the peak of realization. Where the voice was once hampered in production it had now won its freedom and, with it, the brilliant height, the 'cello medium and depth, and the flexible, lustrous texture that make the pure alto the richest as it is the rarest of voices. Where, too, the singer herself used to be possessed by its emotional content she now controls its utterance with an inward poise that points the beauty of the sound as well as its meaning. Only occasionally do the old harshness and exaggerations appear; and as they are only occasional, one can well lay them now to nerves rather than to habit. It was not only the best recital Miss Braslau has ever given, but one of the best vocal recitals heard here in many moons. One may even go farther and say that it stamped Sophie Braslau as the greatest contralto of her generation.

Gitta Gradova is another artist who has justified my faith. Three years ago I acclaimed her in print as a great pianist. This year I heard a Philharmonic audience repeat this acclamation in applause. It was her first appearance in this city with orchestra, and she was happy in the choice of her offering —Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto. Its passionate lyricism seemed to have found a perfect medium in her art. I cannot indeed remember ever hearing this work played with such a singing fire, or the second movement with such exquisite sensitiveness. With it all, Miss Gradova has grown. Musical understanding has always been hers; but with it now has come the authority and grasp of a rich nature that has found itself.

Genius is an intangible substance that cannot be measured by years, as little Shura Cherkassky proves again. Ever since he was ten, he has been charming American audiences with his playing of the piano. At that tender age, enthusiasts in Baltimore, where he was then living, even compared him, because of his poetic fire, to the youthful Paderewski. Today at thirteen —or is it fourteen?—he is less poetic and more of a Josef Hofmann, with whom he is now studying. And meanwhile criticism rages around him because he is sharing that study with public playing. But after all it is notorious that critics do not usually come from the ranks of public performers. If they were they would realize that one learns as much again from the public as one does in the studio. Moreover, a break now would mean years of agony later to get back into the routine of public playing. And besides, a genius as mature as Shura's is difficult to gauge. Are there not those who tell us that Heifetz was as mature at twelve as he was at seventeen?

Genius can be as elusive as it is intangible. There is, for instance, Nicolai Orloff—a young man who looks not unlike Charlie Chaplin and who is supposed to be the greatest pianist in Russia. This same incongruity invests his playing, which has the fire of the Slav and the restraint of the Anglo-Saxon, and while as unsentimental as a modern Russian marriage is poetic to the last note. A prodigious technic tempered by a delicious touch completes a musical personality that defies classification.

To the small number of great violin talents must be added that of Frances Berkova, a Russian-California girl still in her teens, who made her New York debut a short time ago. It was the most successful of its kind of the season, and one richly deserved. Her broad, luscious tone and fiery temperament would alone arrest attention. But slow movements, the test of the musician, are her crowning achievements; and I am still haunted by the smooth beauty of her legato passages. She is that rare thing, a musical prodigy! Among the even smaller number of great 'cellists must now be classed Maurice Maréchal. A rich tone, a fiery temperament, and a virtuoso technic, graced by refinement of phrasing and style, proclaimed him an artist of the first rank. Even his program was a delight.

M. Salignac's French company of Opéra-Comique has given pleasure beyond all expectation. The first two operas presented, Lecoq's "Giroflé-Girofla" and Audran's "La Mascotte," still hold their sparkle after fifty years, and the singers themselves live up to this quality. It is more than mere amusement that they give us. Their art belongs to a school of opera that is classic of its kind; and the traditions around it have sprung from that peculiar ability of the French to skate over the thin ice of vulgarity without breaking through. To ignore these traditions is to court disaster, as the American alternates of the French company quickly learned. Broadway methods, as their failure proclaimed, have no place in the exquisite gaiety of Opéra-Comique. But Opéra-Comique apparently has a place on Broadway.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

Drama

The Easiest Way

THERE were those who maintained that Sydney Howard's "They Knew What They Wanted" was much overpraised and that its virtues were exclusively theatric. I was not among them, but a similar charge may be brought with a good deal more show of reason against his new and stirring melodramatic comedy, "Ned McCobb's Daughter" (John Golden Theater), which the Guild has just produced. Here is a play centering about a definite theme and marked by excellent characterization, but one which, nevertheless, steadily degenerates as it goes along because at every turn the author takes the easiest way and ends in sheer melodrama. Beginning with a first act which makes a considerable appeal to the head, he ends with a last one which affects the spine alone.

Seized by a somewhat unfashionable admiration for the New England conscience and convinced that even a stubborn, unimaginative code of honor is better than none at all, he has wished to contrast the character of a shrewd daughter of Maine with that of a typical product of the polyglot slums of New York, where, according to his theme at least, conscience has no fundamental sense of decency in those who survive the rough-and-tumble life. In order to bring the two together he has invented a story in which the New England girl is married to a fugitive from justice, and for a time all goes well. The keen, crisp speech of Maine, contrasting with the uncouth guttural jargon of New York, serves as a sort of symbol of the two traditions, and so, too, does the equally violent disparity between the prim decorum of the one character and the boisterous vulgarity of the other. Unfortunately, however, the mere machinery of the plot gradually usurps more and more the attention of the author, and its merely melodramatic interest gradually destroys all quieter values. Forced to choose between the difficult task of keeping up the tension by means of events which take their interest from their relevance to the theme and the easier one of relying upon conventionally melodramatic situations, he chooses the latter. Bootleggers descend upon the quiet household; government agents burst in at appropriately inappropriate moments; plots and counterplots are formed; and by the time the end is in sight the spectator has lost all other concern in a nervous fear lest Virtue shall not be found to hold the trump card. To be sure, Virtue does hold it; but by the time it is played affairs have got into so complicated a state that one is not quite sure just why it beats all others, and one is compelled to leave the theater without any emotion more definite than that involved in a comfortable assurance that, anyway, it all turned out for the best. The honor of the simple country girl has been saved from the machinations of the city villain (the exigencies of melodrama have simplified the two characters who started out so well into types little more complex than here indicated), and the bootleggers are compelled to go elsewhere to ply their nefarious trade.

From the standpoint of the average theatergoer all this is doubtless no defect. The beginning of the play is not stereotyped; it merely slides by slow stages into the agreeably conventional. But from the standpoint of the critical spectator this is not less than distressing, and though as plays go "Ned McCobb's Daughter" is both good and probably destined to considerable success, it will add more to its author's bank account than to his reputation as a serious American dramatist.

On the whole, the production which the Guild has given it is more consistently good than the play. Alfred Lunt, as the bootlegger, gives one of the richest and most full-blooded performances of his career in a part somewhat different from those he is accustomed to play, and Claire Eames is almost equally good in a role which, fortunately, depends less than most of her recent ones upon the exploitation of certain mannerisms which seemed to me less perpetually delightful than they seemed to some others. On a somewhat different level the performance of Margalo Gillmore is also good. Miss Gillmore is a charming young lady who has always been pleasing in straight ingenue parts, but who here undertakes character. In comparison with Mr. Lunt and Miss Eames she is deficient in technique, but she has obvious talent.

At the present moment France is represented by two more or less official ambassadors to Broadway—Mme Cecile Sorel of the Comédie Française at the Cosmopolitan Theater and Mlle Jenny Syril of the Opéra Comique at the Jolson. As an actress Sorel is, of course, a museum piece—remarkably fine in her genre but part of a dead tradition and as out of place on the contemporary New York stage as a Louis Quinze bed in a co-operative apartment. Those who like modern Broadway operetta will find "The Desert Song" (Casino Theater) well and lustily sung. Its source is the recently popular tradition of manly music with lots of soldiers' choruses and other booming melodies.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

International Relations Section

Opposition in the Soviet Union

THE question of the opposition within the Soviet Union Communist Party was discussed at length at the recent party conference in Moscow. Stalin delivered a report on the relations between the party and the Opposition Bloc; Kamenev, Zinoviev, and Trotzky attempted to explain and justify the opposition position, at the same time declaring their loyalty to the party as a whole. Following are brief excerpts from the stenographic reports of the discussion as it was printed in Moscow newspapers during the week of November 19.

From Stalin's Report

The basic question on which the party differs with the opposition bloc is the question whether the victory of socialism is possible in our country; or, what is the same, what is the character and what are the perspectives of our revolution?

There are three questions involved:

1. Is the victory of socialism possible in our country in view of the fact that so far ours is the only country with a proletarian dictatorship?

2. If this victory is possible, can it be considered a complete, a final victory?

3. If a victory of this kind cannot be considered as final, what conditions are imperative if this victory is to become final? . . . The fact that the imperialist front gave way in connection with the imperialist war in Russia shows that, as capitalism develops now, the imperialist front can be broken, not only in a country with a highly developed industry but in a country where the proletariat, in its struggle against the imperialist power, has a strong ally such as the Russian peasantry. . . .

In 1918, when we introduced the new economic policy, Lenin repeatedly declared in his speeches and articles that, by introducing the "Nep," we were not retreating from our program but proceeding under new conditions to lay the "socialist foundation of our economic development" "in union with the peasantry," "under the leadership of the working class." . . .

As if in reply to this, Comrade Trotzky, in January, 1922, published the Introduction to his book "1905," in which he says that socialism cannot be established in our country in union with the peasantry; that the life of our country will develop along the lines of hostile conflicts between the working class and the peasantry, until the proletariat is victorious in the West.

We thus have two points of view on the questions of the possibility of building up socialism in our country and the victory of the socialist elements of our economy over the capitalist elements. Leninism offers a positive solution to this question. Trotzkism, however, denies the possibility of socialism winning in our country through the inner forces of our revolution. If the first is the line of our party, the other line represents an approach to the views of the Social Democrats. . . . We are in a position to . . . achieve a victory over our own capitalists, we are in a position to build up socialism. But this does not mean that we are in a position to insure the country of the proletarian dictatorship against the outside menaces, against the danger of intervention and the restoration following in its wake. . . . We live in capitalist surroundings. The fact that we are building socialism and are thus revolutionizing the workers of the capitalist countries cannot but stimulate the hatred and hostility of the whole capitalist world. Therefore, as long as we remain in capitalist surroundings, as long as the proletariat has not been victorious at least in a number of countries, we cannot consider our victory as final, whatever our successes. . . .

Discussing the differences in matters of practical policy, Stalin continues:

The party considers that in its general policy, particularly in its economic policy, it must be guided by the principle that there should not be a division between agriculture and industry. Hence, our socialist method of industrializing the country through the constant improvement of the material conditions of the laboring masses, including the peasantry.

. . . The basic advantage of the socialist as opposed to the capitalist method is expressed in the fact that it leads toward the unity of the interests of industrialization and the interests of the laboring strata of the population, that it expands the internal market. Hence the idea of the junction of the socialist industry with the peasant economy—in the first place through the mass cooperation of the peasantry—the idea of the directing role of industry in relation to agriculture. Hence our taxation policy, and the policy of lowering the prices of industrial commodities, etc., taking account of the importance of maintaining economic cooperation between the proletariat and the peasantry. The opposition bloc, on the other hand, starts from the premise that industry is in opposition to agriculture and blunders along the road of detaching industry from agriculture. . . .

Concerning the attitude of the party toward the opposition, Stalin declares:

In accepting the thesis dealing with the opposition bloc, the October plenum of the Central Committee and the Central Control Commission had in mind not repression but the necessity of carrying on an educational campaign against the unrescinded errors of the opposition for which it is prepared to continue the fight within the limits of the statutes, as was announced by the opposition in its declaration of October 16.

Extracts from Kamenev's Speech

Two weeks ago the Central Committee accepted with satisfaction the declaration of a number of members of the C. C., and the party newspaper on the following day stated that the communication of the Central Committee and our own declaration were "historical documents." . . . This declaration, which summed up a very serious period in our inner party history, was actuated not by any maneuvering but by our understanding of the situation in the party, by our realizing what the rank and file of the party demanded of us. For us it is a political document, an obligation which we have assumed before the central institutions of the party, before the whole party, and before all the proletarian masses. . . .

I take the resolution proposed by Comrade Rykov on the economic situation. I read there: "We must in the shortest possible time strive to overtake and then to surpass the level of industrial development in the leading capitalistic countries." I ask: Is this correct? And I answer: Absolutely correct. But why is it imperative? Because only by overtaking and surpassing the level of development in the capitalist countries will we be able to prove the actual superiority of the socialist economy over the capitalist economy. . . . That means that you recognize this pace as imperative, just as we do, and the non-accomplishment of this task is fraught with some dangers and difficulties. Military intervention is not the only obstacle to the building up of a complete socialist society; another is failure in this task of keeping up with the level of capitalist countries. . . .

Once the proletarian dictatorship is accomplished in a country with a majority peasant population . . . we have to face the conclusion that the lower ranks of the state authority will not be in the hands of the factory proletariat but in the hands of the peasants. [Disturbance. Interruption from the floor: "Do you propose to take the workers from the factories and send them into the village soviets?"] Permit me to ask you, comrades: Is this a fact? If you have a hundred million peasant population and if you carry out a correct line of soviet democracy, then it is inevitable. A proper policy would consist not in denying the fact but in extending the leadership of the proletariat in those lower branches of the soviet authority which inevitably are being taken over by the peasantry. . . .

We thought that the party was wrong in its estimation of the concrete class relations in our country in 1925. It seemed to us that a number of comrades and particularly the press were underestimating the processes which were taking place not within the socialist but within the capitalist sector of our economy.

In order to carry out a correct taxation policy it is necessary that the party recognize two things. First, that the growth of private capitalist accumulation both in the cities and in the villages is a fact. Second, that the matter of the redistribution of the national income, that is moving accumulated wealth from the capitalist sector into the sector of state industry, is a question of class struggle.

In his concluding remarks Kamenev said:

I ask: Is it possible to confine our existing differences within the limits of our common work and our joint responsibility for the work of the party? We declare: It is both possible and necessary. You must be aware, comrades, that by adopting the resolution about our "Social Democratic deviation" you are making it more difficult. But we, on our part, are prepared for practical work on the bases of the decisions of the congresses, of the Central Committee, and of the conferences of the party, and to subject all our activities to the supreme principle of the unity of the party and the strengthening of its dictatorship. . . . We consider that to defend our opinions is our duty as Communists, but that to submit to party discipline, to carry the responsibility for the common work of the party, is also a duty which we will fulfil.

FROM THE SPEECH BY TROTZKY

The resolution accuses the opposition, including myself, of a Social-Democratic deviation. . . . I must state that the questions of difference and our position in these questions give absolutely no basis for accusing us of a "Social-Democratic deviation."

We have disagreed first of all on the question, What is the danger that menaces us at present? Is it the danger of falling behind in our state industries or the danger of growing too fast? The opposition, including myself, has maintained that the real danger before us is the danger of our state industries falling behind the development of our national economy as a whole. We have pointed out that in view of the existing policy in the matter of the distribution of the national income this disparity may increase.

We have disagreed on the pace of industrialization and I was one of those who pointed out that the present pace is insufficient; this . . . lends particular importance to the process of class differentiation in the village. . . . We have striven for a more elastic taxation policy for the various strata of the villages, the lowering of taxes for the lower layers of the middle peasantry, increasing them for the richer upper strata of the middle peasantry, and a more energetic exertion of pressure upon the fists, particularly along the lines of their union with trade capital.

We said that the growth of differentiation in the village, as long as industry is dragging behind, creates the necessity of double guaranties in the political field, i. e., under no circumstances can we tolerate the widening of the voting rights for the fists, employers, and exploiters even of the small type.

There were differences on the question of wages. We thought, and we still think, that at the present stage of the development of our industry, of our economy, at the level already achieved, the worker cannot first increase his productivity, and thus make possible an increase of wages, but that the system must be the reverse: an increase in wages, even a modest one, must precede the increase in the productivity. [Interruption from the floor: "Where will the money come from?"] Whether this is right or wrong, there is nothing Social-Democratic in it.

We argued, further, against the overestimation of the economic elements of stabilization [of capitalism in Europe] and against the underestimation of its political elements. If we should ask, let us say, in relation to England, in what ways her economic stabilization is expressing itself at present, we should find that she is deteriorating, that her trade balance is unfavorable, that her foreign trade is diminishing, that her production is falling. Such is the economic "stabilization" of England. But what is it that sustains bourgeois England? It is not Baldwin, not even Thomas, but Purcell. The Purcell attitude is the foundation of the present "stabilization" in England. This is why we believe that, in the face of the working masses who carried out the general strike, for us to solidarize ourselves with Purcell directly or indirectly would be utterly wrong. Therefore we demanded the breaking up of the Anglo-Russian committee. From these differences, from the position we defended during these differences . . . it is impossible to construe a Social-Democratic deviation. . . .

In the latter part of his speech Trotzky considered the possibility of building and maintaining socialism in one country alone.

. . . It is not only a question of intervention. . . . Intervention is war, and war is the continuation of politics through different means, and politics are generalized economics. Accordingly, the question concerns the economic relations of the Soviet Union with the capitalist countries. . . .

I shall ask you, comrades, and this is a fundamental point: What is going to happen to Europe while we are building our socialist society? You say: We will build up socialism in our country independently of what is happening in Europe. All right. How much time do we need for the building up of socialism? Lenin figured that in twenty years we would not be able to build up socialism, considering the backwardness of our peasant country. . . . Let us accept thirty to fifty years as a minimum. Now, I ask you, what is going to happen in Europe during this time? I cannot give a prognosis for our country without giving a prognosis for Europe as well. . . . If you think that in the course of thirty to fifty years the European proletariat will seize the power as a matter of course, then there is no discussion. . . . Do you think that capitalism will find a new dynamic equilibrium, do you think that European capitalism is in a position to insure for itself a new period of growth, a duplication of the process which was in existence before the imperialist war? If we should consider this possible (and I believe that capitalism has no such chance) this would mean that capitalism . . . had not exhausted its historical mission, that it was not an imperialistic deteriorating capitalism but a growing capitalism, advancing economically and culturally. But this would signify that we [the Soviet Union] had arrived too early. . . .

I maintain that there are no theoretical or political reasons to believe that it will be easier for us to build up socialism with the peasantry than for the European proletariat to seize the power.

No, the chances are entirely on the side of the European proletariat. But if this is so, then I ask: Why are these two elements put in opposition to each other, why are they not united as "two conditions," as Lenin does? Why do we need a theoretical admission of the possibility of building up socialism in one country alone? . . . I still think that the victory of socialism in our country can be insured only with victorious revolution of the European proletariat.

The adoption of the proposed resolution, in our view, will be harmful. But as far as I can judge the attitude of the comrades of the so-called opposition, the adoption of the resolution will not move us from the line [expressed in the declaration] of October 16. . . . Each of us, without minimizing the differences—there are differences—will endeavor to confine these differences within the boundaries of uninterrupted work and the common responsibility for the policies of the party.

EXTRACTS FROM STALIN'S CLOSING SPEECH

. . . I must say that none of the definitions of our differences given by the opposition at this conference is either objective or complete. You want to know, comrades of the opposition, what are our practical differences, what the party demands of you?

The party cannot and does not intend to tolerate a situation in which each time a member finds himself in the minority he comes out into the streets and declares a crisis in the party.

The party cannot and will not permit a member who fails to obtain a majority within the party to assemble all sorts of dissatisfied elements as a material for a new party. . . .

We know that there are great difficulties to be met in building up a social system. We see these difficulties and we are able to overcome them. We would welcome every assistance on the part of the opposition in the work of surmounting these difficulties. But the party cannot and will not tolerate attempts to use these difficulties to make our situation worse and to attack the party. . . .

The party is aware . . . that the development of industrialization and the building of socialism are possible only with the uninterrupted material and cultural improvement of the position of the working class. The party is adopting and will adopt all measures to improve the material and cultural position of the working class. But the party cannot and will not tolerate it if the opposition comes out with demagogic declarations in favor of immediate increase of wages by 30 to 40 per cent, when they know perfectly well that industry is not in a position to advance wages to such a degree at the present moment; when they know that such demagogic declarations have for their aims not the improvement of the position of the working class but the cultivation of dissatisfaction among [illegible] elements of the laboring classes. . . .

The party cannot and will not tolerate it if the opposition continues to break up the bases of the union of the workers and peasantry by propaganda for raising industrial prices and increasing the pressure of taxes on the peasantry, attempting to "construe" the relations between the proletariat and peasantry not as relations of economic collaboration but as relations of the exploitation of the peasantry by the proletarian state.

Contributors to This Issue

[illegible] wrote Second-Generation Aliens in The [illegible] of April 25, 1923.

FRANK R. KENT, vice-president of the Baltimore Sun, [illegible] in [illegible] his brookly letters from Washington.

LOUIS FISCHER, formerly The Nation's Russian correspondent, now writes regularly from Berlin.

[illegible] ALLEN is publicity director of the American Civil [illegible] Union.

[illegible] is in Paris and sends occasional reports of events in France.

[illegible] Waterbury Chapter, a labor organizer, is at present with the American Red Cross in Florida.

[illegible] DAVIS, poet and critic, is the author of "William Blake, His Philosophy and Symbols."

KEITH HUTCHISON is the author of "Labor in Politics."

ALLEN TATE is a poet and critic of New York.

LEWIS ROCKOW, who is on the faculty of philosophy at Syracuse University, is the author of "Contemporary Political Thought in England."

CLEVELAND B. CHASE is the author of "Young Voltaire."

HENRIETTA STRAUS, for several years a writer on music for The Nation, is preparing a book for publication.

Mr. EDWARD W. TITUS, publisher, of 4, Rue Delambre, Paris XIV, France, invites subscriptions to the autographed de luxe edition, limited to 500 copies for America and not to be printed there, of

THE CASE OF MR. CRUMP

by

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Author of Up-Stream, Israel, etc.

a work that enlarges the boundaries of imaginative narrative and exhibits the writer's mind and style at a new and unforeseen height of culmination.

Ten dollars the numbered copy.

To obtain a copy mail your check to the above address to-day.

PUBLISHED DECEMBER 25

THE REBEL BIRD

In this daringly romantic novel Miss Patrick has followed, through the lives of two beautiful, unusual women, the perilous flight of the bird of love which "knows no laws."

$2.00 the copy

E. P. BUTTON & COMPANY
681 Fifth Avenue - New York

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

In answering this advertisement please mention The Nation.